PREFACE.

AT the entrance on a New Year, the laws of cuſtom, the impulſe of gratitude, and the ſenſe of obligations conferred, unitedly call on the Proprietors of the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE to expreſs their acknowledgments to the Public for the attention which has been paid them, and to renew their engagements to purſue that line of conduct in future, which they obſerve with pride and exultation has met with ſuch diſtinguiſhed approbation, as to raiſe them to a higher point of reputation than even the moſt reſpectable of their competitors.

When they review the Volumes of the laſt year, and obſerve the regular and increaſing ſale of their publication; when they have the ſatisfaction of knowing that it circulates through every part of Europe, and finds its way into the remoteſt parts of the Eaſt; that it is ſought after in America, and is not unknown even where European Literature has ſeldom been ſeen; they cannot but feel themſelves, as well from gratitude as intereſt, bound to pay that attention to the future conduct of their publication, which may inſure them a continuation of the favour they now enjoy.

Some improvements to render it more perfect, will be introduced in the courſe of the preſent year. One alteration ſuggeſted by ſeveral Correſpondents, is adopted at preſent, viz. a change in the ſubject of the Frontiſpiece. The allegorical plates of ſome former Volumes having been diſapproved of, a plate of a work of art is this time ſubſtituted, which will either be continued or changed, as the ſenſe of our Friends may be either for or againſt it.

The Proprietors of the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE think it unneceſſary to add any thing further, than that their Publication may improve, but that it will not be inferior to what it has been in the courſe of the preceding year.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FRONTISPIECE,

BEING THE GOTHIC FONT IN DEDEN CHURCH, ESSEX

THIS curious display of Gothic taste was executed at Coade's Artificial, or rather Ornamental Stone Manufactory at Lambeth. Its form is octagon. The upper part forms eight pannels, and contains the baton. In four of these pannels are represented the arms and the crests of the donor, Richard Mathias French Chilwell, Esq. and in the other four are Gothic flowers. Cherubs appear to support this baton. Below are eight niches, arched in the Gothic stile, wherein are most exquisite models of Faith, Hope, and Charity in the front. On each side are the Cardinal Virtues, taken from designs of Sir Joshua Reynolds, forming that most grand display of painted glass in the window at Oxford. On the back is an emblematic statue of Life. Each of these statues are placed upon Gothic pedestals, and the whole forms the most beautiful and masterly piece of workmanship, and does great credit to this valuable manufactory. We have heard that, at the desire of some gentlemen of high character in this kingdom, it was taken to the Royal Academy for exhibition, but, for what reason we know not, rejected. His Majesty soon afterwards expressing a desire of seeing it, it was taken to Buckingham House, where it remained some weeks for the inspection of the curious.

ACCOUNT of JOHN CASPAR LAVATER.

SWITZERLAND has had the honour of calling the very acute and ingenious ſubject of our preſent attention the ſon of her children, and the felicity to boaſt of him as one of her diſtinguiſhed ornaments. To acknowledged originality of genius he has ſuperadded qualities which genius does not always poſſeſs, but without which wit is a feather, and great acquirements ſcarce ſufficient to preſerve the owner from contempt.

Our author was born at Zurich on the 15th of November, 1741. In his infancy he was more devoted to the polite arts than to abſtruſe ſpeculations. Bodmer and Breitinger gave him his firſt taſte for ſtudy, and from their example he firſt began to think for himſelf. His love of truth, and his moral perceptions, drew him frequently from the abyſs of metaphyſics, into which the darkneſs of his genius often prompted him to explore. He joined to much meditation a very active ſcene of life, during the progreſs of which many inſtances might be produced of an enthuſiaſtic devotion to the true intereſt of patriotiſm. At this period it was much the faſhion for young people to ſtudy the works of Rouſſeau, and much zeal was expended both by the oppoſers and defenders of that remarkable man. Among other circumſtances which took place on this occaſion was the eſtabliſhment of an excellent periodical work, in which our author had a very diſtinguiſhed ſhare, inculcating againſt ſome adverſaries the intereſts of good manners and practical religion. The Helvetic Society of Schinguack alſo engaged him to celebrate the moſt memorable of his countrymen, the Swiſs, which he executed with ſucceſs.

In 1761 he entered into orders, and two years afterwards travelled with Monſ. Heſſ and Fuſſli the painter. With them he went to Berlin. At this place Spalding, with whom he reſided, formed his genius and his ſtyle. His letters, addreſſed to Bahrdt, and publiſhed in 1763 at Breſlaw, prove that he had caught the ſpirit of liberty which the theologians of Berlin poſſeſſed, without adopting their ſyſtem. He continued to write on various ſubjects, and engaged in ſeveral controverſies, ſome ſolid, ſome viſionary; in a few inſtances combating errors with ſucceſs; in others defending opinions which can ſcarce be ranked higher than mere chimerical reveries.

The work, however, by which he has rendered himſelf the moſt remarkable is, that on Phyſiognomy, which if not ſolid is at leaſt highly ingenious, perhaps poſſeſſes more ſolidity than will readily appear to a careleſs reader. The hiſtory of this work is well worthy of notice, and we ſhall therefore relate it at large in his own words.

"I had attained my twenty fifth year before I thought of writing a word of phyſiognomy, or even reading any book that treats of that ſcience. I had made ſcarcely any obſervations relating to the ſubject, much leſs had I formed the deſign of collecting and methodizing my remarks. Sometimes, however, at firſt ſight of certain faces, I felt an emotion which did not ſubſide for a few moments after the object object was removed, but I knew not the cause, and did not even attend to the phyſiognomy which produced it. Theſe ſudden impreſſions, frequently repeated inſenſibly, led me to form a judgment of characters, but my deciſions were turned into ridicule, I bluſhed at my own preſumption, and became more circumſpect. Years elapſed before I ventured again to expreſs any of thoſe inſtinctive judgments, when the impreſſion of the moment diſtated. But I amuſed myſelf occaſionally with ſketching the features of a friend, after having fixed him in a particular attitude and ſtudied it attentively. I have felt from a child an irreſiſtible propenſity for drawing, and eſpecially for portrait painting; but without either patience or ability to execute any thing of importance. In the proſecution of my favourite amuſement, my confuſed ſenſations became gradually more clear and diſtinct, I grew more and more ſenſible of proportion, difference of feature, reſemblance and diſſimilitude. Happening one day to draw two faces immediately after each other, I was aſtoniſhed to find that certain features in both were perfectly like, and my aſtoniſhment was the greater, as I knew, beyond the poſſibility of doubting, that the characters were eſſentially different.

"May I be indulged with going into a more particular detail of one of my firſt obſervations of this ſort? About fifteen years ago the celebrated Lambert paid a viſit to Zurich, where I ſaw him. I have ſince had the pleaſure of meeting that gentleman at Berlin. His phyſiognomy, from the ſingular conformation of the features, ſtruck me exceedingly, the emotion was quick and powerful, and produced in me a ſentiment of veneration which I am unable to deſcribe. The emotion which I have juſt mentioned, was, though the intervention of other objects, imperceptibly effaced. Lambert and his features were remembered no more. About three years after, I liſtened the face of a dying friend, to preſerve at leaſt that memorial of a man whom I loved. A thouſand times had I contemplated the face of my friend, without once thinking of a reſemblance between his features and thoſe of Lambert. I had ſeen them in company and heard them converſe together, an inconteſtible proof that my phyſiognomical diſcernment was not at that time very acute. I did not obſerve a ſingle trace of likeneſs. But as I proceeded in my drawing, the prominency of Lambert's profile recurred to my memory, his image ſeemed to ſtart up before me, and I ſaid to my friend, Your noſe is exactly that of Lambert, and if it is ſo advanced, the reſemblance of this feature becomes more perceptible. I pretend not to compare my friend to Lambert. It becomes not me to ſay what he might have been, had it pleaſed God to prolong his life. He poſſeſſed not undoubtedly the tranſcendent genius of that extraordinary man, here was, beſides, as little conformity in their features as in the character of their eyes and foreheads, but they greatly reſembled each other in the ſhape and delicate turn of the noſe, and I beg leave to ſubjoin, they both poſſeſſed, though in different degrees, a capacious and enlightened mind.

"The reſemblance of the noſes, however, ſeemed to me ſufficiently ſtriking, to ſerve as an inducement to become more attentive in drawing to ſimilar relations. Theſe when appeared oftener than once, between particular features of different faces, which I happened to ſketch on the ſame day, I carefully noted. I was at pains to mark, together with this, the moral ſimilitude of the perſons concerned, at leaſt in certain views of their character, and the diſcovery of ſuch relations fixed my attention ſtill more cloſely on the ſubject.

"I was nevertheleſs very far from having reached the depths of the ſcience, and from giving myſelf up to the ſtudy of phyſiognomies, I took care to make a very ſparing uſe even of the term.

"Being on a viſit one day to Mr Zimmerman, now phyſician to his Britannic Majeſty at Hanover, and who then lived at Brougg, we ſtepped together to the window to look at a military proceſſion which paſſed along. A face with which I was abſolutely unacquainted ſtruck me ſo forcibly, notwithſtanding my near ſightedneſs and diſtance from the ſtreet, that I inſtantly formed a decided judgment upon the caſe. Reflection had no ſhare in it, I did not imagine what I had ſaid deſerved any notice. Mr Zimmerman immediately aſked me, with ſigns of ſurprize, on what I founded this judgment? On the turn of the neck, replied I.—And this, properly ſpeaking, is the æra of my phyſiognomical reſearches.

"Mr Zimmerman attempted downright impoſſibilities, in order to encourage me to proceed, he obliged me to furniſh him with my judgment of certain propoſed caſes. I ſometimes hazarded an opinion, but my conjectures were for the most part wretchedly erroneous, being no longer dictated by a sudden impulse, and, as it may be called, a kind of inspiration. To this hour I cannot conceive how a gentleman of his genius could persist in his solicitations, nay, make a point of my committing my observations to writing. From that time I entered into a correspondence with him on the subject, and drew imaginary faces, to which all subjoined my remarks. I became tired, however, of this employment, and abandoned it for years together. I smiled at my own essays, and neither read nor wrote on physiognomy. My turn came to produce a piece for the Physical Society of Zurich, and being embarrassed about the choice of a topic, I fixed, after a little deliberation, on that which I had so long renounced, and began to compose my essay, God knows how superficially, and with what precipitation. Mr Klokenbring, of Hanover, requested the favour of my papers for the inspection of Mr Zimmerman. I intrusted him with them, imperfect as they were. Mr Zimmerman put them to the press without my knowledge, and thus I was suddenly and undesignedly brought forward the avowed champion of the science of physiognomics. The publication of a second essay accordingly followed, after which I considered myself as relieved from the necessity of any further appearance in this cause, at least for a season. Two very different motives soon concurred to change my intention, and induce me to resume the subject. I heard very absurd opinions pronounced, not against my essays, I was abundantly sensible of their imperfection, and needed no critic to point it out to me, but against the science itself, while my own persuasion of its reality and importance daily acquired strength, as I continued to reap new truths unpressed on the physiognomy. These rash decisions on the one hand, and on the other pressing solicitations addressed to me from every quarter, by men endued with wisdom, probity, and religion, joined to the pleasure of making fresh discoveries, determined me to expose to the public eye what is now before the reader, and which he may denominate, if he will, the ravings and reveries of a visionary.

"Above seven years have elapsed since I formed this resolution; and every step I advance in the execution, I meet with obstacles as numerous as unexpected, which, however, prevent not my collecting new observations sufficient to enable me to promise somewhat interesting.

"I have procured a great number of drawings relating to my plan. I have examined and compared a variety of human figures of every class, and I have had recourse to my friends for assistance. The endless blunders committed by those whom I employed to draw and engrave have become a plentiful source of enquiry and instruction for me. I was under the necessity of carefully studying myself, in order to make a proper choice of expressions, I was led to investigate and compare many objects, to which I had hitherto paid very slight attention. The exercise of my ecclesiastical function had brought me into connection with some very singular and remarkable characters. A journey which I was induced to undertake, partly for the sake of health, partly to obtain the pleasure of personal acquaintance with distinguished friends and strangers whom I had not yet seen, presented to my eye, inexperienced but attentive, a diversity of new and interesting objects. Thus my intelligence, such as it is, fixed, extended, and improved itself.

Oftener than once I began to study the authors who have written on physiognomy, but was soon disgusted with their verbose jargon, and I discovered that most of them only pilfered from Aristotle. I then gave up books, and applied myself as formerly to the study of nature herself, and the images which represent her, making it my principal aim to discover the beautiful, the noble, the perfect, to define them, to familiarize them to my eye, and to give fresh energy to the sensations which they excited. New difficulties every day arose, but resources multiplied as fast. Every day I fell into mistakes; and every day I acquired knowledge and conviction. I was praised and censured, ridiculed and extolled. I could not refrain from smiling at this, well assured that I merited neither the one nor the other. But my inward satisfaction encreased, while I anticipated the pleasure which my work might communicate, and the benefits it might confer. This supports and consoles me under the weight of my enterprize. And, at the moment I write, my progress is such, that upon some physiognomies it is impossible for me to pronounce any judgment, while at the same time on many other faces and figures I am able to decide with a certainty equal to that which I have of my own existence."

[To be concluded in our next.]

A RELATION of the MURTHER of Mr THOMAS SCOTT, AUTHOR of "VOX POPULI."

MR Thomas Scott, Batchelor of Divinitie, and Preacher to the English Compunie at Utrecht, in Holland, was murdered by an English soldier, named John Lambert, on Sunday the 18th of June, 1626, neare to the church-yard of St Peter's churche there about two of the clock in the afternoone, being going along in the companie of his brother Mr William Scott, and his nephew Tho Scott, to performe the afternoone exercise of that daie in the said churche, having preached there likewise in the forenoon The said Lambert being taken and examined for the said murder, made this plaine and ridiculous relation, (viz.) that the spirit of his mistresse the Heaven's elect, the favourite to Queene Elizabeth, the late Queene of England, whose spirit transmigrated into her Majestie the Queen of Bohemia, which Queene so favoured him, that she intended to receyve him into her service And considering with himselfe why he was not entertayned, a spirit suggested to him that the said Mr Scott hindred him untill suche tyme as Mr Scott was killed, he should not be entertayned into her Majesty's service, whereupon he was resolved to kill him He confessed also, that he was never hyred or induced by the perswasions of anie priest, Jesuit, or other person, to attempt that bloudy fact He was twice racked and whipped on the rack, at which time, and at other times of his private and publique examinations, yet even to his death, he continued in his said confession. LETTER V.

Mr LOCKE to Dr MAPLETOFT.

Exeter House, 19th Oct 72.

DEARE Dr

I WANT noe thing to compleate all the satisfaction I could expect from a journey that carryed me away from you, but an assurance that you, and the reſt of that good company with you, accomplished yours with as good ſucceſſe, though I hope with better weather then we did ours. For whether it were that hardſhips doe naturally ſtalke the undertakings of puiſſant as well as errant Knights, and that Heaven feldome ſmiles upon their enterprises, or whether the tutelar angell of the country would not favour the flight of a man that had bilked one of the moſt conſiderable men of the place; for what more worthy perſon then a French taylor? or what greater offence can there be then to goe away in his debt? but what ever was the cauſe, ſoe it was, that from the time we tooke horſe in Paris, which was within an hower or two after your departure, till we came to Calais, we had not one dry day And as if all the rain that was ſtored in the clouds had been laid up there only for us, when we were got within a league of Calais, it fell on us as if it had been powerd downe with buckets, which violence of the ſtorme purſued us till we juſt got at the gates, and as ſoone as we were got to ſhelter it preſently broke up, and we had noe rain till, after ſeverall days we had been in England This wet was ſome of the worſt of our ſtory, for we had by the way ſome adventures worth reciting, which I muſt adjourne till an other time, that I may doe what is more neceſſary for me, and may returne thoſe thanks which thoſe obligacons I received when I was with you, call for from me. You know how little ſkill I have in ſpeeches, and my ignorance in French, which is the very mint of compliment, will excuſe a dull oyſter if it only gapes and by that you muſt gueſſe at my meaning, which is all manner of thankes and acknowledgment to that excellent lady to whoſe favour I owe my voiage and all the advantages of it This you are to put into the beſt words you can finde, and on this occaſion you cannot ſay too much For if Leoncourt and Chantilly, St Germans and the Lover, be ſights which cannot be ſufficiently admired, I m ſure there cannot be enough ſaid in returne for that favour which added a grace even to thoſe fine places, and made me value the ſight of them more then otherwiſe I ſhould have doune. When you are about to doe me this kindneſſe, I would not have you reflects upon my declineing to perfect the recovery of my health in ſoe advantageous a way, and in your company, leaſt you ſhould thinke ſoe inconſiderate a man unworthy your patronage, and forbeare to try ſome thing for me which may preſerve me from being thought ungrateful even for that health which I have got by goeing ſoe far, and which I ſhould be glad to imploy in the ſervice of thoſe to whoſe kindeneſſe I am indebted for it But you know that our journey as well as pilgrimage in this world have their ſetled bounds, and none of us can goe beyond the extent of that tether, which certainly tyes us. In that danceing country, where every one thinkes he may ſkip up and downe as he will, I know not whether you will admit of this doctrine But thinke it as extravagant as you will, I m ſure, ſoe I found it, and Mr. Vernon, if he be with you, will juſtifye this fatall neceſſity Pray preſent my moſt humble ſervice to Lady Bette To Mrs Ramſy, with my ſervice, give an account that her letters were ſafe deliverd at Northumberland Houſe. Let Dr. Blomer and my ſiſter know that I have a great deale of ſervice for them, and that I deliverd the ones letters and the others tokens. Dr Tilotſon was well ſatisfied about the bookes, but the two litle ſtummes are like to goe togeather by the ears which ſhall have both the ſleeves They have only made a truce for ſoe long time the can ſend them word whether there be any French trick to make one ſleeve ſerve for two armes In the meane time they grumble, and deſire hes to remember that all the cold in the world (however ſhe be troubled with it) is not in France, and that ſuch ſcanty cloaking will ſcarce preſerve a worme remembrance of her in her friends in England this winter Pray alſo remember me very kindely to my brother Scawen, to whome pray give this incloſed bill, with my ſervice and thankes I had writt to him my ſelf this turne, had not my chimny been this day on fire, which fild my chamber with ſoe much company, ſmoake, and confuſion, that I have ſcarce recovrd breath yet, and ſhall not bring my ſelf and things in order this good while But pray all them I ſent his letter away by the poſt as ſoone as I came to ſo[illegible] wi e, which was t' e day ſeventh night I [illegible]ter from you, and his token to Dr Millington I ſent away ſince by a ſafe hand And now I come to you beloved, firſt with a word of informacon that your coſin Collet is well, and his wife well brought to bed the day after I returned Mr.

Firmin and his wife very well Secondly, with a uſe of diſcomfort, becauſe there is yet noe uſe nor principle to be got. I wiſh Poole hold ſtanch, for Mary and Maning I feare are leaky veſſells, and hold noe thing but emptyneſſe. But of this affair your coſin Collet and I will take all the care we can,
and when that is doone, what ever happens,
I think you will not have one ſigh the more, nor will I have one laugh the leſſe The prorogacon of Parliament till the Spring, I doubt not but you have heard of. Other news we have little, the King being but juſt returned from Newmarket I deſire to heare from you how you all doe, and where you have fixed, and whether any body walks along the journey with you beſides your owne company, for we have here noe news of Mr.
J S who, if he were in England, I am confident would tell us ſoe I wiſh you all

LETTER VI.

Mr Locke to Dr. Mapletoft,

DEAR SIR, Paris, 22 June 77.

IF you make not uſe of the ſame goodneſſe in excuſeing my abſence, as you uſe to doe in affording me your letters, I ſhall be in great danger of your hard thoughts, and you will in appearance have reaſon to imagin that I know not how to value either your friendſhip or correſpondence as I ought When I thinke on the particular accidents and conſiderations that have cauſed this neglect in me, methinks I have ſome thing to ſay for my ſelf,
but when I looke on the length of time all at once, me thinks noe thing is enough to ex-cuſe it. However I will not enter upon the long ſtory of my vindication, I choote rather to throw my ſelf wholy upon your mercy
I know your kindneſſe will ſtand a greater ſhock then this, and you will not be much angry with me for a fault wherein I have been the ſufferer as well as the guilty If I thought it were neceſſary to ſay any thing more then this, I would refer you to the incloſed But I phanſy with my ſelf that is ſome kinds of merit of your pardon, that I dare expect it of you, without troubling you with a long ſtory, which for my vindication
I have thought neceſſary to tell one, who yet
I thinke a very good freind and very good-natured I arrived here about the beginning of this month, with the remains of a very untoward ague upon me, which ſeiz'd and kept me a good while upon the way, but I thanke
God have now pretty well recoverd my ſtrength, ſoe that if you had any commands for me here I might hope to execute them
But I have litle expectacon of any from you, you, that when you were here your ſelf, and breathd the aire of this place, which ſeemes to me not very much to favour the ſeverer ſects of philoſophers, were yet ſoe great an one as to provide for all your neceſſitys with the expence only of a crown or two, will not, I gueſſe, now you are out of the ſight of all our gaudy faſhionable temptations, have much imployment for a factor here But yet if either abſence (which ſometimes increaſes our deſires) or love (which we ſee every day produces ſtrange effects in the world) have ſpirited you, or diſpoſd you towards a likeing of any of our fine new things, 'tis but ſaying ſoe, and I am ready to furniſh you, and ſhould be ſorry not to be imployd I mention love, for you know I have a particular intereſt of my owne in it When you looke that way, noe body will be readier as you may gueſſe to throw an old ſhoe after you, much for your owne ſake, and a litle for a freind of yours. But were I to adviſe, perhaps I ſhould ſay to you, that your lodgings at Greſham colledg were a very quiet and comfortable habitation I know not how I am got into this chapter of love, unleſſe the genius of the place inſpires me with it For I doe not finde that my ague hath much inclind me to the thoughts of it My health, which you are ſo kinde to in your wiſhes, is the only miſtris
I have a long time courted, and is ſoe coy a one that I thinke it will take up the remainder of my days to obteyn her good graces and keep her in good humor She hath of late been very wayward, but I hope is now comeing about again I ſhould be glad that my conſtant ad-dreſſes ſhould at laſt prevaile with her, that I might be in a better condition to enjoy and ſerve you, being with all ſincerity,

by all the art and industry I could use, I could not get a booke of his to Montpellier till the weeke after I had left it I shall be glad to heare that every day gains ground, though that be not always the fate of usefull truth, especially a first setting out I shall perhaps be able to give him an account what some ingenious men thinke of it here, though I imagin he is soe well satisfied with the truth in it, and the designe that made him publish it, that he matters not much what men think. And yet here is usually a very great and allowable pleasure to see the trees take and thrive in our own time, which we our selves have planted

LETTER L.

Mr Robert Nelson to Dr Mapletoft.

London, the 12 Dec 1679.

Dear and Honoured Sir,

AS soon as I came to town, which was about ten days ago, I made a first enquiry concerning your welfare, which I counted myself not a little concerned in, by reason your many favours and obligations, besides the just value of your person, have engaged me to a particular respect and esteem for yourself, so that my own happiness will be much increased by any addition to your satisfaction I was soon informed of the alteration of your condition, and that you had made the grand experiment of human life, which seldom admits of any mean, but carries us to the utmost boundaries of happiness or misery, and being well satisfied that your great prudence would secure the former of the two extremes—for nullum numen abest, si sit prudentia—I thought it no ways disagreeable to congratulate your present enjoyment, nay friendship and affection obliged me to express my just resentment, and be assured that the news of your great felicity under your present circumstances finds a welcome reception from no one more than from myself, the only reason that forbids my regret for your absence here in town I heartily wish those ideas and notions you framed of matrimony may be exceeded in the possession, that propriety and enjoyment may whetten the edge of your affections, and that no part of your happiness may leave you now, it ceases to be imaginary; and though Thales, who was a wise man, would seem to insinuate as if marriage was never convenient for the wise; yet, as Alex ab Alex observes well, "licet hoc ambage velet, sapientis nun- quam uxorem ducendam demonstraret, tentamen qui hoc proposito judicio explorare vult, profecto in conjugis multa invenit commoda usus vitæ necessarios, sine quibus vix homini sapienti contigerit vitam ducere expedite, &c. Nay all nations have honoured those that are married, and punished Celibacy Even the Ubiquians, that seem to have the most refined and abstracted notions of things, would have those that lived single punished, as useless in a common-wealth The creation of the world would be to little purpose without it, for humanæ genori immortalitatem tribuit, and therefore indigne vivit per quem, ō vivat et alter; nay, 'tis the opinion of some, that it is impossible to be saved without it —It would be endless to prosecute all the arguments, and enumerate all the authorities in its behalf; though I am sensible there has a great deal been said on the other side: however, if it consisted with my interest and convenience, and the object gratified my inclinations, it is not the rant and satyre of a Poet, or the declamation of an Orator, that should prevail so far as to make me suspend the execution of that, for which my motives were so specious and plausible: but for all my zeal I am still mea juris as ever, and have yet no prospect of being otherwise; and shall always pray, that all the advantages of your condition may center in your match; that you may be long happy in the embraces of an excellent wife, blessed with a prosperous offspring, which may inherit your virtues as well as estate, and then all other inconveniences may be well dispensed with As to news, what we now most talk of, is the prorogation of the Parliament till the 15th of Nov with a promise that the King may call them sooner if he pleases It is their petitioning has enraged him, and he swears by God they may knock off his brains, but shall never cut off his head. For all this, they say they will still go on in getting subscriptions: the consequence I am afraid may be bad I cannot enlarge because Mrs Lumm sends for my letter, and says it will be too late, if it does not go presently My humble service to your Lady, Mr Dear, and my Lady Brograve and all the good company, and be assured that I am,

Your obliged humble servant,
ROBERT NELSON.

All your devout friends are much your servants.

My mother presents her humble service to you and your Lady

LETTER II

Mr ROBERT NELSON to Dr MAPLETOFT

London, 2d January 1679

WORTHY SIR,

I AM very sensible that the true ground and reason of most of the disappointments many men meet with in the grand transactions of their lives, proceeds not so much from the nature of things themselves, as from those extravagant conceptions they form of them, and that the chiefest ingredient of their unhappiness, is the false opinion they have entertained of sublunary enjoyments, whereby their expectations are raised to so high a pitch, that as 'tis not in the capacity of things to gratify, so they were never designed for that purpose, which gave occasion to that noble saying of Epictetus, homines perturbantur non rebus, sed iis quas de rebus habent opinionibus, and to that of Seneca to the same sense, sæpius opiniones quàm re laboramus Now, a wise man, that takes a true estimate of all those things which make the greatest figure in the world, will never promise himself complete satisfaction, because they are not the adequate objects of his desires He knows that the best state of things here has a great mixture, and he is the happy man whose condition admits of the least inconveniency, a total exemption being now the privilege of human nature And hereupon I could lay a sure foundation for your happiness, since those notions I have observed you to entertain, will never tend to diminish it Besides, your present circumstances must greatly enhance it, for according to the Italians (for whose acquaintance I must always acknowledge myself debtor to yourself) senza moglie al fato, l'huomo non è beato Sir, I was lately to wait upon Madam Houblon, who made strict enquirys after you Your letter enabled me to give her full satisfaction in all points, tho', she says, she reckons you so discreet a person, that now you are married, you'll never complain of any inconveniencies, but make the best of a bad market; however, I look upon this as measuring other people's corn by our own bushell, imagining our sentiments must be the rule for others to steer by notwithstanding, I was so far obliged as to be esteemed among your friends and acquaintance, which is no small addition to my own character According to the company men keep in town, you well know we have our apprehensions of public affairs In some places we are told, the petition for the parliament's setting goes on, and that 'tis countenanced by men of credit and reputation in another place, you shall hear it exposed, and confidently affirmed that none but the rascality and fanaticks are engaged in it I heard from pretty good hands yesterday, that the parliament would be dissolved before the 26th January, 'tis hoped, in order to call a new one. We expect the Duke of York here in ten days the design of his sudden return is not known. We talk mightily of a letter the Prince of Orange has sent to the King; some say, to perswade him to a strict alliance with Holland, others, to forewarn him of the designs of the Monsieur against him, who has, 'tis said, drawn down many of his men to Dunkirk and Calice; but I think every spring of late years has afforded us discourse of a French invasion Your friend and schoolfellow, Mr Dryden, has been severely beaten, for being the supposed author of a late very abusive lampoon There has been a good sum of money offered to find who set them on work: 'tis said, they received their orders from the Duchess of Portsmouth, who is concerned in the lampoone My humble service pray to your lady, who I am glad to hear thrives so bravely, as to give hopes of an hans en kelder; the like to the rest of the good company, and be assured that I am

Your obliged humble servant,

ROBERT NELSON

My mother's service attends you and your lady

An ESSAY on the END of the WORLD.

By JOHN WATKINS

(Concluded from Vol XIV. p. 408)

Esse quoque in fatis reminiscitur affore tempus,
Quo mare, quo tellus, correptaque regia Cæli
Ardeat, et mundi moles operosa laboret. OVID.

HAVING seen, by anticipation as it were, the World in ruins, and assigned the most probable cause thereof, it may now be deemed a necessary point to enquire, WHEN THIS EVENT WILL TAKE PLACE? History informs us, that the Chaldæans not only maintained that the World would finally be deſtroyed by fire, but even preſended to fix the time when this would happen, by the help of aſtronomical calculations. Theſe appear, however, to have been founded rather on the very weak foundation of aſtrological vanity, than upon the grounds and rules of true ſcience, for they concluded that if all the planets ſhould be in conjunction in Capricorn, there would inevitably follow a great deluge on the Earth; and, on the contrary, when they ſhould be in the ſign Cancer, then the final conflagration would be the certain event. But ſuch inferences, ſo raſhly drawn from ſuch circumſtances, are too great to be granted, in this unbelieving age, when the aſtrological art and its preſumptuous predictions are in ſo very little repute. For, how abſurd muſt it be to ſuppoſe, that the planets ſhould be drawn up in battle array againſt their poor contemplator the Earth? And from whence ſhould they, being opaque bodies of the ſame nature as our globe, acquire the means to pour ſuch tremendous deſtruction thereon, as a deluge of water, or an over flowing maſs of fire?

Beſides, when we conſider the diſtances of the planets from our Earth, that of Venus, which is the neareſt, being, at the leaſt diſtance, 5,585 of the Earth's ſemi-diameters, or about 22060750 miles, and that of Saturn, the fartheſt, being not leſs than 175670 of the Earth's ſemi-diameters, or about 693996500 miles, this ſhews how impoſſible it is, that they ſhould have any influence at all upon our planet.

The Moon, indeed, being a ſecondary planet, and not above ſixty of the Earth's ſemi-diameters diſtant from us, or about 237000 miles, has, according to the law of gravitation, and from ſenſible experience, a very powerful influence on the fluid part of our globe, ſtill, however, not ſo great as at any time to cauſe a deluge; and it is abſolutely impoſſible, that ſhe ſhould ever have any ſuch influence as to cauſe a conflagration.

Thus much for the aſtrological judgment of the Chaldeans, which may ſerve, likewiſe, to confute all the other pretenſions of that art concerning future events in general, and the End of the World in particular. For, ſome have attempted to determine it by a pretended revolution of the fixed ſtars, which are now known to be ſo many ſuns placed in the center of ſeveral planetary ſyſtems; and, conſequently, perform no revolution at all, but each, as our Sun, turns only on its own axis. The neareſt of thoſe ſolar bodies, likewiſe, being found from obſervation, to be not leſs than 48600,000,000 miles, this ſhews how impoſſible it is that they ſhould have any influence on other bodies at ſo vaſt a diſtance. Let us here leave, then, theſe viſions of ſcience, (if it deſerves ſo honourable a name) and proceed to examine what prophecies there are concerning the time of this great cataſtrophe.

Among the ancient Heathens we find ſome prophecies concerning this event, but they are* of very little authority, and of as little value, being couched in language ſo enigmatic, as to be really incomprehenſible.

There is, however, a famous and remarkable prophecy of one Elias, a Jewiſh Rabbi, who lived about four hundred years after Chriſt, and which indeed, is much greater degree of credit than any of the reſponſes of the heathen oracles. This prophecy is founded on the ſuppoſition, that the time wherein the World was created, is typical of its duration; therefore, as the World was created in ſix days, the continuance thereof, in its preſent ſtate, will be ſix thouſand years. But Elias, who was either the original author, or, more probably, the reviver of this prediction, hath divided the ſuppoſed period of the World's duration into three parts, thus: two thouſand before the Law, two thouſand under the Law, and two thouſand under the Meſſiah. Now, as all this is evidently falſe, we muſt conclude, that the diviſion was only a corrupt refinement, common enough in all commentators.

Although this prophecy is found in the Jewiſh Talmud, and on that account might merit little conſideration, yet it has a conſiderable number of ſupporters among the moſt reſpectable writers of the ancient chriſtian church.—Lactantius poſitively aſſerts, that "the World ſhall laſt but ſix thouſand years, becauſe it was created in ſix days; and as the ſeventh day was then ordained to be a day of reſt or ſabbath, ſo after the expiration of ſix thouſand years, the great ſabbatiſm, or thouſand years of reſt muſt follow."

Irenæus was of the ſame opinion, and for the ſame reaſon†, as were Saint Cyprian‡ and Saint Jerome, Saint Hippolytus the martyr‖, Saint Hilary, and above all the reſt, Saint Juſtin the martyr§; and the great Saint Auguſtin, though he doubted of the Millenium, yet declared himſelf of this opinion with regard to the age of the World¶.

Now

Now it appears, that the chief reason which prompted moſt of thoſe Fathers of the Church to be of this belief was, that God ordained the Seventh Sabbath as a type of the Eternal Sabbath, wherein Chriſt will reign in peace and righteouſneſs over his redeemed people for a myſtical thouſand years And they alſo conceived, that as this great ſabbatiſm will immediately follow the End of the World, therefore the number of days of its creation are typical of its duration It remained then only to enquire what a day ſtands for in allegorical ſcriptures; and which, according to what the Pſalmiſt ſays in the xcth Pſalm, verſe 4 and the Apoſtle Peter in his IId Epiſtle, c. iii. v 8 is a thouſand years. From theſe two paſſages alone, thoſe Fathers concluded, that they were ſufficiently warranted in believing that the age of the World is limited to the period of ſix thouſand years, a day in Scripture being allegorically uſed to repreſent a thouſand years

There are many who reject this opinion, as a ſilly conceit, and only the weak dream of a Jewiſh Rabbi But as we are aſſured that Elias, the ſuppoſed author of this prophecy, flouriſhed before Chriſt, and this even from the confeſſion of the Jews themſelves; it muſt, in the minds of thinking and religious perſons, weigh greatly in its behalf. We have, likewiſe, herein a very conſiderable evidence of the truth of our religion, ſince it is ſaid, that from the giving of the Law to Chriſt the Meſſiah, is a period of two thouſand years, which, though chronologically wrong, yet proves ſtrongly againſt the Jews, from their own moſt eſteemed book, that the Meſſiah is already come But in the behalf of this prophecy we may well obſerve, the extreme improbability that a Jewiſh Rabbi ſhould, but two centuries before our Saviour, undertake to deliver ſuch a remarkable aſſertion, couched in ſuch poſitive and bold terms, entirely on his own authority, without the ſupport of ſome ancient tradition. Nor does it appear credible, that it would be ſo well and generally received, eſpecially by ſuch an unbelieving bigotted nation as the Jewiſh, built on ſo weak a foundation On the other hand, it ſeems moſt likely, that this prophecy having been long entirely hid, or known only to the learned Doctors and Rabbins of the Jewiſh nation, it was firſt made public by this Elias, and therefore, as is commonly the caſe, he received the honor of being celebrated as its original author

It may, however, be objected, that if this prophecy had been the genuine product of any inſpired perſon, or ſeer, it would certainly have found a place in ſome part of the ſacred code, as well as the other prophecies. But to this we may reply, on the beſt of authority, that there were other prophecies, which though delivered by men inſpired from above, yet never obtained a place among the canonical ſcriptures; ſuch were the prophecies of Enoch, the ſeventh from Adam, which are mentioned by the apoſtle Jude in the 14th verſe of his Epiſtle Now it appears that thoſe prophecies were merely traditional, and being never committed to writing, in great length of time were either entirely loſt, or but a very few particulars of them preſerved. And here I cannot help deeming it as highly probable, that the prophecy now under conſideration was one of the patriarch Enoch's for as it is not reaſonable that a Jewiſh Rabbi would have dictated ſuch an important prophecy to the world, without having the authority of tradition on his ſide, this will, neceſſarily, carry it back to the ages of ſimplicity, when prophecies and all ſuch communications were merely oral and it is very obſervable, that this prophecy bears a very cloſe reſemblance to that which Jude has cited as a known prophecy delivered by Enoch

But it may be objected further, that as the ſcriptures have expreſly forbidden us to examine or pry into the matter, therefore we are to give no credit to this prophecy, or to any conjecture which may be made concerning the time of the end of the World. To this I ſhall readily grant, that any thing merely conjectural aſſerted relative to this event, deſerves no credence, but the prophecy before us is ſomething more than conjecture, it reſts upon ſtrong proofs, and is evidently a very ancient and reſpectable tradition With reſpect, however, to the objection drawn from the ſcriptures prohibiting us to examine into this or any other future event, I conceive it will, on conſideration, be found futile, for thoſe aſſertions of our Saviour, It is not for you to know the times and ſeaſons which the Father hath put in his own power, and of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the Angels that are in Heaven, but my Father only,—were evidently intended as rebukes unto his diſciples for their needleſs and unſeaſonable curioſity concerning matters of no importance to them at that time, when things of greater moment ought to have engaged their attention, namely, the beſt means to propagate the doctrines of their maſter To them, therefore, the reprimand of our Lord, that it was not their place to contemplate or ſtudy the times and ſeaſons of future events, was very proper, but the reproof and exhortation extend not to us, otherwiſe, why are we commanded to ſeek out of the book of God, and read, to ſearch the ſcriptures, which contain ſo many prophecies of events yet to be fulfilled, and above all, to look for the day of God?

The fact is, we are to look forwards; to extend by faith our view to that period when God will arise with awful majesty to take vengeance on his enemies, and to reward his friends.—The precise day and hour when this event will take place, are, indeed, unknown to us, and ever will be until it actually breaks upon us; and should any rashly presume to fix the time so exactly, as to the hour, the day, or even the year, we may justly esteem them as deceivers and lying spirits.—We are of opinion, it is true, that the period of the World's duration, in its present state, is six thousand years, but as the chronology of the World is evidently defective, we are not assured of the World's exact age at this present, and therefore can never be certain when the six thousand years will be completed. Still, then, that great event will come suddenly upon us, even as a thief in the night, taking mankind, as the flood in the days of Noah did, unaware, and, as the scriptures have foretold, in general unprepared.

There are some prophecies contained in the volume of inspiration, relative to events which shall be accomplished in a gradual order even down to the end of the World. These are chiefly to be found in the Apocalypse of St John, but they are couched in language so obscure, in terms so enigmatic, as to render the study of them amazingly, if not insurmountably difficult, and after the most critical examination and intense research into the mysteries of this book, an exposition of the greatest part will be found the mere offspring of fancy. There are, indeed, the times or periods mentioned of many of those particulars predicted therein, but these times, or periods, are mostly typical of some larger portions of time, as an hour, a day, a month, and a year, which are universally allowed to be mystical, and for the accomplishment of the prophecies must certainly be so. But the period called χρονος, or, according to our translation, a time, is most undoubtedly typical of some unknown, but fixed portion of time. Unless, therefore, we can arrive at the knowledge of the several periods meant by these prophetical expressions, an hour, a day, a month, a year, &c. it will be impossible for us to know how long the duration will be of any of the prophetical events. And should we be acquainted with these particulars, yet unless we knew precisely at what time to fix their commencement, we shall still be at a loss to know when they will have an end.

I shall not attempt, then, to support the above hypothesis by critical disquisitions on this book, by historical researches into its particular circumstances, or by mathematical calculations of the several times or periods mentioned therein, being fully persuaded of the weakness and vanity of such attempts. Indeed, I cannot but be of opinion, that this book was designed not for the amusement of the wise and learned, but for the use of all ranks of christians; and therefore, though it is a book even now almost wholly sealed up, yet in process of time it will be entirely unfolded to the comprehension of the plainest understanding, and reflect shame on all those who have pretended to unlock its mysteries with keys of their own fabrication. We have only but to wait a little day, down, when the apocalyptical visions will be fully explained; and it is my humble persuasion, that even its important parts of the apocalyptical prophecies are yet to be fulfilled, and that even the men of this generation will see plainly many of them accomplished. Are the vials of wrath yet poured out? or is Antichrist yet destroyed? Are not the spirits of Infidelity and of Heresy broke loose upon us; and with a rapid violence do not they threaten the most dismal effects; to which a Laodicean lethargy hath given, and still continues to give, the greatest encouragement? In short, there is the utmost reason for our keeping a watchful eye upon the conclusion of the present, and the beginning of the ensuing century; together with an earnest zeal to keep our moral garments unspotted, and our minds in a constant readiness, for great revolutions may justly be expected in the World.

Human wisdom is nearly arrived to its acme; and the latter part, may be end of human depravity, which, with various other circumstances, serve to indicate that we are considerably advanced (if I may venture the expression) into the evening of time. The shadows are deepening fast, and night is listening on apace; and though we have apparently more than two centuries to complete the sixth millennial age of the World, yet its chronology is defective; and we are also assured by Him who formed the World, and all things therein, that those days shall be shortened, which though primarily spoken of the destruction of Jerusalem, yet it is no certain that our Lord alluded likewise to the future destruction of the World. Excellent then was his advice both to that, and this occasion; Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come.

OBSERVATIONS on the NATURAL HISTORY of the CUCKOO.

THE first appearance of cuckoos in Gloucestershire (the part of England where these observations were made) is about the 17th of April. The song of the male, which is well known, soon proclaims its arrival. The song of the female, if the peculiar notes of which it is composed may be so called, is widely different, and has been so little attended to, that I believe few are acquainted with it. I know not how to convey to you a proper idea of it by a comparison with the notes of any other bird, but the cry of the dabchick bears the nearest resemblance to it.

Unlike the generality of birds, cuckoos do not pair. When a female appears on the wing, she is often attended by two or three males, who seem to be earnestly contending for her favours. From the time of her appearance, till after the middle of summer, the nests of the birds selected to receive her eggs are to be found in great abundance, but, like the other migrating birds, she does not begin to lay till some weeks after her arrival. I never could procure an egg till after the middle of May, though probably an early-coming cuckoo may produce one sooner.

The cuckoo makes choice of the nests of a great variety of small birds. I have known its egg intrusted to the care of the hedge-sparrow, the water-wagtail, the titlark, the yellow-hammer, the green-linnet, and the whinchat. Among these it generally selects the three former, but shews a much greater partiality to the hedge-sparrow than to any of the rest: therefore, for the purpose of avoiding confusion, that bird only, in the following account, will be considered as the foster-parent of the cuckoo, except in instances which are particularly specified.

The hedge-sparrow commonly takes up four or five days in laying her eggs. During this time, generally after she has laid one or two, the cuckoo contrives to deposit her egg among the rest, leaving the future care of it entirely to the hedge sparrow. This intrusion often occasions some discomposure; for the old hedge sparrow, at intervals, while she is sitting, not unfrequently throws out some of her own eggs, and sometimes injures them in such a way that they become addle, so that it more frequently happens, that only two or three hedge-sparrow's eggs are hatched with the cuckoo's than otherwise: but whether this be the case or not, she sits the same length of time as if no foreign egg had been introduced, the cuckoo's egg requiring no longer incubation than her own. However, I have never seen an instance where the hedge-sparrow has either thrown out or injured the egg of the cuckoo.

When the hedge-sparrow has sat her usual time, and disengaged the young cuckoo and some of her own offspring from the shell, her own young ones, and any of her eggs that remain unhatched, are soon turned out, the young cuckoo remaining possessor of the nest, and sole object of her future care. The young birds are not previously killed, nor are the eggs demolished, but all are left to perish together, either entangled about the bush which contains the nest, or lying on the ground under it.

The early fate of the young hedge-sparrows is a circumstance that has been noticed by others, but attributed to wrong causes. A variety of conjectures have been formed upon it. Some have supposed the parent cuckoo the author of their destruction; while others as erroneously, have pronounced them smothered by the disproportionate size of their fellow nestling. Now the cuckoo's egg being not much larger than the hedge-sparrow's (as I shall more fully point out hereafter) it necessarily follows, that at first there can be no great difference in the size of the birds just burst from the shell. Of the fallacy of the former assertion also I was some years ago convinced, by having found that many cuckoo's eggs were hatched in the nests of other birds after the old cuckoo had disappeared, and by seeing the same fate then attend the nestling sparrows as during the appearance of old cuckoos in this country. But, before I proceed to the facts relating to the death of the young sparrows, it will be proper to lay before you some examples of the incubation of the egg, and the rearing of the young cuckoo; since even the well known fact, that this business is intrusted to the care of other birds, has been lately controverted; and since, as it is a fact so much out of the ordinary course of nature, it may still probably be disbelieved.

I. The titlark is frequently selected by the cuckoo to take charge of its young one; but as it is a bird less familiar than many that I have mentioned, its nest is not so often discovered. I have, nevertheless, had several cuckoo's eggs brought to me that were found in titlark's nests, and had one opportunity of seeing the young cuckoo in the nest of this bird. I saw the old birds feed it repeatedly, peately, and, to ſatisfy myſelf that they were really titlarks, ſhot them both, and found them to be ſo

II A cuckoo laid her egg in a water-wagtail's neſt in the thatch of an old cottage The wagtail ſat her uſual time, and then hatched all the eggs but one; which, with all the young ones, except the cuckoo, was turned out of the neſt The young birds, conſiſting of five, were found upon a rafter that projected from under the thatch, and with them was the egg, not in the leaſt injured On examining the egg, I found the young wagtail incontained quite perfect, and juſt in ſuch a ſtate as birds are when ready to be diſengaged from the ſhell The cuckoo was reared by the wagtails till it was nearly ready capable of flying, when it was killed by an accident

III A hedge ſparrow built her neſt in a hawthorn buſh in a timber-yard: after ſhe had laid two eggs, a cuckoo dropped in a third The ſparrow continued laying, as if nothing had happened, till ſhe had laid five, her uſual number, and then ſat

June 20, 1786 On inſpecting the neſt I found, that the bird had hatched this morning, and that every thing but the young cuckoo was thrown out Under the neſt I found one of the young hedge ſparrows dead, and one egg by the ſide of the neſt entangled with the coarſe woody materials that formed its outſide covering On examining the egg, I found one end of the ſhell a little cracked, and could ſee that the ſparrow it contained was yet alive It was then reſtored to the neſt, but in a few minutes was thrown out The egg being again ſuſpended by the outſide of the neſt was ſaved a ſecond time from breaking To ſee what would happen if the cuckoo was removed, I took out the cuckoo, and placed the egg containing the hedge-ſparrow in the neſt in its ſtead The old birds, during this time, flew about the ſpot, ſhewing ſigns of great anxiety, but when I withdrew, they quickly came to the neſt again On looking into it in a quarter of an hour afterward, I found the young one completely hatched, warm and lively The hedge ſparrows were ſuffered to remain undiſturbed with their new charge for three hours (during which time they paid every attention to it) when the cuckoo was again put into the neſt The old ſparrows had been ſo much diſturbed by theſe intruſions, that for ſome time they ſhewed an unwillingneſs to come to it however, at length they came, and on examining the neſt again in a few minutes, I found the young ſparrow was tumbled out. It was a ſecond time reſtored, but again experienced the ſame fate

From theſe experiments, and ſuppoſing, from the feeble appearance of the young cuckoo juſt diſengaged from the ſhell, that it was utterly incapable of diſplacing either the egg or the young ſparrows, I was induced to believe, that the old ſparrows were the only agents in this ſeeming unnatural buſineſs, but I afterward clearly perceived the cauſe of this ſtrange phænomenon, by diſcovering the young cuckoo in the act of diſplacing its fellow-neſtlings, as the following relation will fully evince

June 18, 1787, I examined the neſt of a hedge-ſparrow, which then contained a cuckoo and three hedge-ſparrow's eggs. On inſpecting it the day following, I found the bird had hatched, but that the neſt now contained only a young cuckoo and one young hedge-ſparrow. The neſt was placed ſo near the extremity of a hedge, that I could diſtinctly ſee what was going forward in it; and, to my aſtoniſhment, ſaw the young cuckoo, though ſo newly hatched, in the act of turning out the young hedge ſparrow

The mode of accompliſhing this was very curious The little animal, with the aſſiſtance of its rump and wings, contrived to get the bird upon its back, and making a lodgement for the burden by elevating its elbows, clambered backward with it up the ſide of the neſt till it reached the top, where reſting for a moment, it threw off its load with a jerk, and quite diſengaged it from the neſt. It remained in this ſituation a ſhort time, feeling about with the extremities of its wings, as if to be convinced whether the buſineſs was properly executed, and then dropped into the neſt again With the extremities of its wings I have often ſeen it examine, as it were, an egg and neſtling before it began its operations; and the nice ſenſibility which theſe parts appeared to poſſeſs ſeemed ſufficiently to compenſate the want of ſight, which as yet it was deſtitute of. I afterward put in an egg, and this, by a ſimilar proceſs, was conveyed to the edge of the neſt, and thrown out Theſe experiments I have ſince repeated ſeveral times in different neſts, and have always found the young cuckoo diſpoſed to act in the ſame manner In climbing up the neſt, it ſometimes drops its burden, and thus is foiled in its endeavours; but, after a little reſpite, the work is returned, and goes on almoſt inceſſantly till it is effected It is wonderful to ſee the extraordinary exertions of the young cuckoo, when it is two or three days old, if a bird be put into the neſt with it that is too weighty for it to lift out In this ſtate it ſeems ever reſtleſs and uneaſy. But this diſpoſition for turning out its companions begins to decline from the time it is two or three till it is about twelve days old, when, as far as I have hitherto seen, it ceases. Indeed, the disposition for throwing out the egg appears to cease a few days sooner, for I have frequently seen the young cuckoo, after it had been hatched nine or ten days, remove a nestling that had been placed in the nest with it, which it suffered an egg, put there at the same time, to remain unmolested. The singularity of its shape is well adapted to these purposes, for, different from other newly hatched birds, its back from the scapulæ downward is very broad, with a considerable depression in the middle. This depression seems formed by nature for the design of giving a more secure lodgement to the egg of the hedge-sparrow, or its young one, when the young cuckoo is employed in removing either of them from the nest. When it is about twelve days old, this cavity is quite filled up, and then the back assumes the shape of nestling birds in general.

Having found that the old hedge-sparrow commonly throws out some of her own eggs after her nest has received the cuckoo's, and not knowing how she might treat her young ones, if the young cuckoo was deprived of the power of dispossessing them of the nest, I made the following experiment:

July 9. A young cuckoo that had been hatched by a hedge sparrow about four hours, was confined in the nest in such a manner that it could not possibly turn out the young hedge sparrows which were hatched at the same time, though it was almost incessantly making attempts to effect it. The consequence was, the old birds fed the whole alike, and appeared in every respect to pay the same attention to their own young, as to the young cuckoo, until the 13th, when the nest was unfortunately plundered.

The smallness of the cuckoo's egg in proportion to the size of the bird is a circumstance that hitherto, I believe, has escaped the notice of the ornithologist. So great is the disproportion, that it is in general smaller than that of the house sparrow, whereas the difference in the size of the birds is nearly as five to one. I have used the term in general, because eggs produced at different times by the same bird vary very much in size. I have found a cuckoo's egg so light that it weighed only 43 grains, and one so heavy that it weighed 55 grains. The colour of the cuckoo's eggs is extremely variable. Some, both in ground and pencilling, very much resemble the house-sparrow's; some are indistinctly covered with bran coloured spots, and others are marked with lines of black, resembling, in some measure, the eggs of the yellow hammer.

The circumstance of the young cuckoo's being destined by nature to throw out the young hedge-sparrows, seems to account for the parent-cuckoo's dropping her egg in the nest of birds so small as those I have particularised. If she were to do this in the nest of a bird which produced a large egg, and consequently a large nestling, the young cuckoo would probably find an insurmountable difficulty in solely possessing the nest, as its exertions would be unequal to the labour of turning out the young birds. Besides, though many of the larger birds might have fed the nestling cuckoo very properly, had it been committed to their charge, yet they could not have suffered their own young to have been sacrificed, for the accommodation of the cuckoo, in such great number as the smaller ones, which are so much more abundant, for though it would be a vain attempt to calculate the numbers of nestlings destroyed by means of the cuckoo, yet the highest observation would be sufficient to convince us that they must be very large.

Here it may be remarked, that though nature permits the young cuckoo to make this great waste, yet the animals thus destroyed are not thrown away or rendered useless. At the season when this happens, great numbers of tender quadrupeds and reptiles are seeking provision, and if they find the callow nestlings which have fallen victims to the young cuckoo, they are furnished with food well adapted to their peculiar taste.

(To be concluded in our next.)

[Concluded from Vol. XIV. p. 400.]

At length in August or Sept. 1770, he put his resolution of retiring into practice, and went to his estate at Corscombe, in Dorsetshire. In a letter to a friend, dated Sept. 24, he says, "An absence of fifteen years from this country, has occasioned several inconveniences to me, and would occasion many more, were I not now on the spot to prevent them. It is probable I shall stay here till towards Christmas, and then go only to town for a month, two or three, if possible to get clear of it. Retreat is now become more and more acceptable to me. Where I shall dwell afterwards precisely, I do not know at present, but is near to this place as may be. It is called Urles, or Urles farm, farm, and is a moſt healthy, and I think beautiful ſpot, the very earth itſelf is ſweet beyond a noſegay, but the houſe is a bad and very old farm houſe.

"I thank God I am well, but I feel in ſeveral ways, the effects of my late long moſt rigid plan. I riſe from ſix to ſeven, and to bed from eleven to twelve, and the whole day, each to the other, paſſes in ſuch a variety of tranſactions, ſome not perſonal and of ſcope, that I am often ſurpriſed at the recollection of them. That of which I am moſt chary, is my time, and people knowing the ſtraitneſs of my apartment, and that I mean well, under certain ſingularities, are cautious enough in general, not to break in upon and conſume it. The idea of ſingularity, by way of ſhield, I try by all means to hold out."

In what manner he paſſed the remainder of his life does not appear with certainty. His death, which happened on the 1ſt of Jan. 1774, was ſudden. The following account of it is extracted from a letter to Mrs. Macaulay, from Mr. Toplady, printed in that gentleman's poſthumous works. "Early in the afternoon of New Year's-day, Mr. Hollis was in a field at ſome diſtance from his place of reſidence at Corſcombe, attended by only one workman, who was receiving his directions concerning a tree which had been lately felled. On a ſudden, he put one of his fingers to his forehead, ſaying, "Richard, I believe the weather is going to change, I am extremely giddy." Theſe words were ſcarce off his lips, when he dropped. He fell on his left ſide, and being near an hedge, his head was received by the ſubjacent ditch. The man (I know not whether a carpenter or a common labourer) ſprung to his aſſiſtance, and raiſing him from that ſad ſituation, adminiſtered what little relief he could. The expiring Patriot was ſtill ſufficiently himſelf to ſay, "Lord have mercy upon me! Lord have mercy upon me, receive my ſoul!" which were the laſt words he was able to pronounce. His lips moved afterwards, but no ſound was formed. In a few ſeconds more his ſpirit was diſimpriſoned. The frighted aſſiſtant loſt no time. Leaving the corpſe on the graſs, he haſtened away for ſuperior help; but in vain, the lancet, when applied, was without effect.

"It ſeems Mr. Hollis always wiſhed that his death might be ſudden. Providence was pleaſed to grant his requeſt. Was I qualified to chuſe for myſelf, and were it lawful to make it a ſubject of prayer, I would wiſh for the ſame indulgence, whenever my appointed change may come. It is, I think, the moſt deſirable mode of departure. Where the perſon is in a ſtate of grace, how happy to be ſurpriſed into heaven! and to ſave his friends, it is but a ſingle ſhock on for all.

"At the time of his deceaſe, Mr. Hollis was ready booted, intending to ride that day to Lyme Regis.

"When I was there, it was my melancholy lot to occupy the chamber in which he always ſlept during his occaſional ſtay in that town, and which had been prepared for his reception two or three nights before; it was at the Three Cups, an inn which he had purchaſed a few years ago."

Mr. Toplady adds with ſome warmth, "Though this valuable man lived entirely to the benefit of others, and may be claſſed with the moſt public-ſpirited worthies that ever breathed, yet I have ſeldom known a death ſo little regretted by the generality."

After his death, many extravagant panegyricks were written concerning him, and a moſt pompous publication of his life, by the author of the Confeſſional, as is ſuppoſed, made its appearance in 1780. From this we may collect, that he was a man of great zeal, liberality, and good intentions, was ſubject to ſome ridiculous whimſies, and influenced by prejudices incompatible with true greatneſs. Theſe, if they had not been attentively diſplayed as virtues, might have paſſed unnoticed: but when the blemiſhes of a good man are held up as objects of admiration, it is fit that the folly of ſuch panegyrics ſhould be marked with the diſapprobation it merit.

"Mr. Hollis, we are told, roſe early, and in town went out very early, and ſpent his evenings generally at home, in arranging what he had done or procured, and ſetting for the next day's employment. He generally read, or played on the flute, at the cloſe of the evening, which he found to ſoothe and compoſe his mind; he was fond of muſick, was a judge of it, and had a large collection. His principal public entertainments were operas and oratorios, to which he ſometimes went, but not very often. He was a great walker, even to exceſs, and rode ſometimes for exerciſe, but always gently, and made his walks and rides anſwer ſome good purpoſe. He ſerved many years with his favourite maſter Mr. Martin, the father, even to an extreme, ſo that it became neceſſary to him, and it is thought he hurt himſelf by it. Moſt abſtemious in his diet at dinner, and latterly eat very little, and very plain, drank no wine or beer, nor uſed ſalt or ſpices of any ſort, nor butter, milk or ſugar, but drank great quantities of tea, morning and evening, with only dry toaſt. He was very luſty, and grew fat, nor was he reduced by his abſtinence and great exerciſe. He was inattentive to heat and cold when in the open air, and attended only to partial cold and air in rooms, &c. He could not go through the little attentions neceſſary at entertainments, and therefore ſeldom entertained any but very particular friends, and towards the latter end of his life, not even them. To all parade he was an enemy, thought it troubleſome, and therefore kept no chariot, nor the number of common ſervants which are generally thought neceſſary to attend a gentleman of his fortune. In fine, he had the reſolution to follow ſtrictly his own principles and plan of life, and to ſpend his fortune agreeably to them."

His fortune, which was very conſiderable, he devited to Thomas Brand, Eſq. of the Hide, in Eſſex, who had been his fellow-traveller, and who has ſince taken his name.

ANACREON.

THE entrance upon a new year never fails opening to the thinking mind, a large ſcene of retroſpective and proſpective contemplation.

We look back with ſilent wonder on the various mutations, public and private, which have diſtinguiſhed the preceding annual circle of time.

In the quick ſucceſſion and complicated variety of political occurrences we beſtowed little, if any, ſerious reflections on particular incidents, but when we review them, in their regular order, as compoſing the hiſtory of the laſt year, and our eye is undazzled with the pomp of deſcription, we weigh their cauſes in an even balance, and mark their effects with more impartial minds.—Many circumſtances which we thought too inſignificant to merit much of our attention, and which in a little while were entirely eradicated from our minds by the more important events which ſucceeded them, yet now, when ſeated in a calm ſituation, enjoying no other pleaſures from the paſt tranſactions of the world but what ariſes from contemplation, and the temporary miſts of prejudice being removed from our ſight, we obſerve thoſe very trivial circumſtances in active exerciſe producing effects that ſhall materially diſtinguiſh the year before us. We feel ourſelves intereſted in things we deſpiſed, and look for the events which will flow from them with anxious ſolicitude.—The ſickneſs or death of a great man, the change of a miniſtry, or the inſolence of a factious demagogue in the ſenate, may intrinſically, perhaps, be matters of little moment, but when we reflect that even leſſer circumſtances than theſe have occaſioned revolutions in empires, which ſometimes have ended in their total deſtruction, we ſhall watch with an eagle eye the minuteſt contingent effects that ſhall iſſue from any one of ſuch public circumſtances.

But though the various conſiderable additions which have been made to the chronology of remarkable events juſtly merit our attentive conſideration, as tending to furniſh our minds with enlarged and magnificent ideas of His power and providence whoſe "kingdom ruleth over all,"—yet it is by carefully retracing the ſhort and humble path which we ourſelves have trod, that we can gain ſuch a ſtock of intereſting knowledge, as, when united with virtue improved by experience, will ſupport our ſpirits, animate our hearts, and crown our heads with honour, through the remaining ſtages of life.

When labouring up the ſide of ſome lofty hill, our eye is bent towards the ſummit, and we take but a very ſlight obſervation of the various beauties and precipices around us, but when arrived at the place of our deſtination, we ſurvey again every part of the ſcene over which we have travelled, and our imagination ſhudders at a number of dangerous places which we eſcaped without notice, and accuſes us of negligence in not having obſerved minutely many delightful ſpots where we might have agreeably refreſhed ourſelves.

There are ſcarcely any who neglect making ſimilar obſervations at this ſeaſon, on the changes and chances which diverſified their particular ſphere of action during the laſt twelve months, but it is to be lamented that the number is very few who make theſe reflections of experience the ſource of improvement. It is too commonly the caſe, indeed, that every year ends as the former, filled with the ſad fragments of broken reſolutions, and with innumerable vacuities of time wherein we neglected to do good to our-

ſelves on others In the firſt moments of meditation at the commencement of a new year, theſe diſagreeable appearances caſt a damp upon our ſpirits, and our ſouls feel a temporary pang of remorſe, which brings forth, for our preſent ſatisfaction, ſtrong purpoſes of amendment,—but no ſooner do we actively engage in the cares and pleaſures around us than the ſcene behind us cloſes, our reflections are buried under preſent labours and engagements, the reſolutions with which we buoyed up our minds grow flagged, and when one of the leaſt of them falls beneath the influence of ſome tranſient temptation, the diſcomfiture of the whole rapidly follows, we become reduced to our former imperfection,—end the year as uſual, and from the ſummit of a new one, review the number of our miſ-ſpent years once more enlarged

To the mind of ſenſibility there is nothing, ſurely, can afford more poignant concern than this deplorable weakneſs of human nature And therefore, by inveſtigating its cauſe, we may perhaps do ſome good to thoſe who feel their debility, and are more the ſlaves of vice from cuſtom than from inclination The great misfortune, then, leſs in this When a man hath been long enamoured with the mercenous charms of a ſinful courſe, he cannot on a ſudden diſengage himſelf, becauſe his ſtrongeſt paſſions prove his firmeſt chains ſhould he, however, be ſufficiently alarmed of the danger he is in, as to reſolve directly on attempting his liberty, inſtead of coolly forming a previous plan of operations, and acting in a regular manner accordingly,—he raſhly makes a ſtruggle which alarms all his paſſions at once, and he falls beneath their united force, a greater ſlave than ever

There are many perſons, poſſeſſed of excellent underſtandings and good diſpoſitions, who go on even to the end of their days in this courſe of alternate vice and repentance And if they are preſſed ſeriouſly, in a cool moment, upon the folly of their conduct, they will readily plead guilty to the charge, yet in extenuation of themſelves they will endeavour to throw the blame on the conſtitution of human nature, the paſſions of which are ſo ſtrong as to be incapable of ſtanding firm againſt the power of the many temptations which are ſcattered along the road of life But, notwithſtanding ſuch plauſible pretences, the evil is far from being rooted ſo firmly in our nature as to be proof againſt every attempt to eradicate it, indeed if we violently endeavour to pluck it up at once by the roots, ſo far from ſucceeding in the attempt, we ſhall only have the mortification of feeling, more ſenſibly, the force we have ſuffered it to gain upon us—Still, however, there is a ſure method of extricating ourſelves from the ſlaviſh yoke of vice, under what appearance ſoever it may have captivated us, and that is, in the firſt moments of awakened reaſon to act with the utmoſt circumſpection. After having deliberately ſurveyed our chains, and diſcovered its weakeſt link, let us break it; and ſo proceed from the meaneſt till we have conquered thoſe of the greateſt force. —In other words, we are firſt to get entirely rid of that bad habit which fits lighteſt, and hath the leaſt hold upon us, then engage with another, and ſo on in a gradual ſeries, 'till we are reſtored to the active uſe of our reaſon and the poſſeſſion of a good conſcience. This, it is certain, muſt be the buſineſs of time, but if carried into regular execution cannot fail of an happy and honourable iſſue

It hath been often obſerved, and the truth is abſolutely inconteſtible, that no man ever falls ſuddenly into the depths of wickedneſs; We become pleaſed with one ſinful pleaſure, and after getting familiar with that we venture further, till the way of innocence and the light of truth are loſt entirely to our view.

And as we fell ſo we muſt endeavour to riſe, by conquering, gradually, our evil habits, and gaining thoſe of oppoſite character. A blind man never attempts to haſten his journey by running, as that would endanger his life, but, prudently, walks with a ſlow pace, feeling the objects before him with his ſtick to avoid misfortune, and arrives ſafely, though late, at the place of his deſtination.

Thus are we to act in our return to virtue and its happineſs, reſolve with firmneſs, and proceed with prudence; and ſhould a dangerous temptation encounter us, knowing our own weakneſs by ſad experience, inſtead of meeting it in an affectation of bravery, endeavour to avoid it, and turn our attention upon things of an oppoſite nature. At a ſeaſon like this, therefore, when ſerious reflection upon the paſt prompts us to look forwards to the future, we ſhould determine, once more on purſuing the path which alone leads both to temporal and eternal happineſs. Another year is added to the inſignificant number which are allotted as the period of our exiſtence.—During the revolving circle we muſt, undoubtedly have experienced many diſappointments, and, perhaps, in ſome of our moſt favourite deſigns.—Probably we have dropped the tears of genuine grief on the graves of our deareſt friends, or have ſeen others of our fellow-mortals taken off the ſtage of life, on whom our chief hopes of ſupport and preferment depended.—In ſhort, no one can look back upon the preceding year without obſerving, in his own concerns, and thoſe of the world around, the vanity of human life, neither will any venture to deny that that he hath added confiderably in that fhort period to the meafure of his iniquities. It would be happy if thefe reflections fhould prompt us to look ſeriouſly into the future, and accompany us through every moment of the year before us. As it is uncertain whether we fhall be permitted to accompliſh the year that is now begun, let the time paſt be ſufficient to have walked in the way of wickedneſs. The clouds of darkneſs may ſuddenly arife, and the direful compact may hurry us away in the midſt of all our guilty practices into the world unknown. Say not that theſe truths are too gloomy for this mirthful ſeaſon; that they are calculated to throw a damp upon the ſpirits, and to prevent us from partaking of thoſe comforts which the Almighty hath given, to enable us to paſs through with delight a time which would otherwiſe be cheerleſs.

Virtue and pleaſure are not numerical to each other, but where they are united the pureſt joy abounds, the joy of innocence; that ſpecies of joy which no libertine knows any thing of, but from his want of it.—But it cannot be diſmal to contemplate virtue, to avoid remorſe, and to hope for endleſs happineſs. Shortly both the writer and the reader of this ſhall be entered on that world where years and ſeaſons are unknown. Virtue and vice are the only diſtinctions which will diſtinguiſh the inhabitants of eternity.—ſurely then it behoves each of us to ſecure that peace of conſcience in time, which alone will render us happy in the eternal world.

ANECDOTES of THOMAS AMORY, Eſq.

THIS Gentleman, who is yet living at the age of 97 years, was the ſon of Counſellor Amory, who attended King William in Ireland, and was appointed Secretary for the forfeited eſtates in that kingdom, where he was poſſeſſed of a very extenſive property in the County of Clare. Our Author was not born in Ireland, as it has been ſuggeſted. It has been conjectured that he was bred to ſome branch of the profeſſion of Phyſic. Whether, ſays a perſon who appears to have known him, he ever followed that or any other profeſſion I have not heard. When I knew him (i. e. about 1757) he lived in a very reclute way on a ſmall fortune, and his reſidence was in Orchard ſtreet, Weſtminſter.* At that time alſo he had a country lodging for occaſional retirement in the ſummer, at Bellont, near Hounſlow. He had then a wife, who bore a very reſpectable character; and by whom he had a ſon, who, if living, is a Phyſician ſomewhere in the north of England.†

On the ſame authority we are told, that he was a man of a very peculiar look and aſpect, though at the ſame time he bore quite the appearance of a gentleman. He read much, and ſcarce ever ſtirred abroad, but like a bat in the duſk of the evening, and then he would take his uſual walk, but ſeemed always to be ruminating on ſpeculative ſubjects, even when paſſing along the moſt crowded ſtreets.

From the many ſtrong marks of genius as well as whimſical peculiarities to be found in his writings, it would be very acceptable to the publick to have a more particular account of him and his works. Of the latter we ſhall endeavour to collect what is at preſent known, and ſhall be glad to receive more information.

In the year 1751, on the publication of Lord Orrery's "Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr Swift," the following Advertiſement appeared in the Whitehall Evening Poſt, Dec 12, 1751, but we have not been able to diſcover that the Pamphlet was ever printed.

"Soon will be publiſhed,

"A Letter to Lord Orrery, in Anſwer to what his Lordſhip ſays in his late Remarks in Praiſe of Swift's Sermon on the Trinity, being an Attempt to vindicate the Divinity of God, the Father Almighty, and to convince his Lordſhip, if he has a Mind open to Conviction, that the Fifteenth Diſcourſe preached by the Dean of St Patrick's, is ſo far from being that Maſterpiece my Lord Orrery calls it, that it is in reality the moſt senſeleſs and deſpicable Performance that ever was produced by Orthodoxy to corrupt the divine Religion of the Bleſſed Jeſus. By Thomas Amory, Eſq."

In 1755, he publiſhed "Memoirs, containing the Lives of ſeveral Ladies of Great-Britain. A Hiſtory of Antiquities, Productions of Nature, and Monuments of Art. Obſervations on the Chriſtian Religion, as profeſſed by the eſtabliſhed Church and Diſſenters of every Denomination. Remarks on † This gentleman, Dr Robert Amory, is now living at Wakefield, where he has practiced phyſick above 27 years. He has three ſons. The characters of the Ladies celebrated in this work, are singular and extraordinary They are not only beautiful, learned, ingenious, and religious, but they are all zealous Unitarians to a very high degree, as is the Author himself At the end of the history of these Memoirs, he promised a continuation of them, which was to contain what the publick would then have received with great satisfaction, and certainly would still, should the MSS luckily remain in being His words are as follow

"N B In an Appendix to the second volume of this work, the reader will find an account of two very extraordinary persons, Dean Swift, and Mrs Constantia Grierson, of Dublin

"As to the Dean, we have four histories of him, lately published; to wit, by Lord Orrery, the Observer on Lord Orrery‡, Dean Swift, Esq and Mrs Pilkington, but after all the man is not described The ingenious female writer comes nearest to his character, so far as she relates, but her relation is an imperfect piece My Lord and the Remarker on his Lordship have given us mere critiques on his writings, and not to satisfactory as one could wish They are not painters And as to Mr Swift, the Dean's cousin, his Effay is an odd kind of history of the Doctor's family, and vindication of the Dean's high births, pride and proceedings His true character is not attempted by this writer He says it never can be drawn up with any degree of accuracy, so exceedingly strange, various, and perplexed it was, and yet the materials are to be gathered from his writings. All this I deny I think I can draw his character, not from his writings, but from my own near observations on the man I knew him well, though I never was within-side of his house, because I could not flatter, cringe, or meanly humour the extravagancies of my man I venture I knew him better than any of those friends he entertained twice a week at the Deanery, Stella excepted I had him often to myself in his rides and walks, and have studied his soul when he little thought what I was about As I lodged for a year within a few doors of him, I knew his times of going out to a minute, and generally nicked the opportunity He was fond of company upon these occasions; and glad to have any rational person to talk to; for, whatever was the meaning of it, he rarely had any of his friends attending him at his exercises One servant only and no companion he had with him, as often as I have met him, or came up with him What gave me the easier access to him, was my being tolerably well acquainted with our politics and history, and knowing many places, things, people and parties, civil and religious, of his beloved England Upon this account he was glad I joined him We talked generally of factions and religion, states and revolutions, leaders and parties Sometimes we had our subjects Who I was he never knew; nor did I seem to know he was the Dean for a long time, not till one Sunday evening that his Verger put me into his seat at St Patrick's prayers, without my knowing the Doctor sat there Then I was obliged to recognize the great man, and seemed in a very great surprize This pretended ignorance of mine as to the person of the Dean had given me an opportunity of discoursing more freely with, and of receiving more information from, the Doctor than otherwise I could have enjoyed. The Dean was proud beyond all other mortals that I have seen, and quite another man when he was known

"This may seem strange to many, but it must be to those who are not acquainted with me I was so far from having a vanity to be known to Dr Swift, or to be seen among the fortunate at his house (as I have heard those who met there called) that I am sure it would not have been in the power of any person of consideration to get me there. What I wanted in relation to the Dean I had. This was enough for me I desired no more of him I was ennobled by the means related to know the excellencies and the defects of his understanding; and the picture I have drawn of his mind, you shall see in the Appendix above mentioned; with some remarks on his writings, and on the case of Vanella and Stella

"As to Mrs Grierson, Mr Ballard's account of her in his Memoirs of some English Ladies, lately published, is not worth a rush. He knew nothing of her and the imperfect relation he got from Mrs Barber is next to nothing I was intimately acquainted with Mrs Grierson, and have spent a hundred afternoons with her in literary conversations in her own parlour Therefore it is in my power to give a very particular and exact account of this extraordinary woman In the Appendix you shall have it

These promised accounts, however pleasing

The Monthly Reviewers of the time having given an account of this work unsatisfactory to the Author, he published (for there can be little doubt but he was the Author) a pamphlet intitled, "A Letter to the Reviewers," occasioned by their Account of a Book called MEMOIRS By a Lady 8vo 1755. This Lady signs herself Maria de Large; and subjoined, are some remarks signed Anna Maria Cornwallis.

In 1756 he published the first volume of "The Life of John Buncle, Esq containing various Observations and Reflections made in several Parts of the World, and many extraordinary Relations," 8vo which may be considered in some measure as a supplement to the Memoirs, and in 1766 appeared the second volume. Both parts exhibit the same beauties, the same blemishes, and the same eccentricities It has been thought, that in the character and adventures of Mr Buncle, the Author intended to sketch his own picture, and perhaps there may be some truth in the conjecture Both the Memoirs and Life have been reprinted in 12mo the former in two volumes, the latter in four.

Dr Amory, in the Letter already quoted, says, that his father never had but one wife, when young, was a very handsome man, at present will not see any company, nor ever comes out of his room, and that he has published many political and religious Tracts, Poems and Songs

Counsellor Amory, the grandfather of the Doctor, and father of our Author, was the youngest brother of Amory, or Damer, the Miser, whom Pope calls the wealthy and the wise, from whom came Lord Milton, &c He married the daughter of Fitz Maurice, Earl of Kerry; Sir William Petty, and her daughter, and the grandfather of the Duke of Leinster, a third

An ADDRESS to My COUNTRYMEN on SLAVERY and the SLAVE TRADE.

Vincit amor humani generis

THIS subject having happily become the object of general and anxious attention, and being shortly to be unfolded before Parliament for its decision, I claim the right of an Englishman to declare my sentiments at the tribunal of the Public

Is it not a matter in which we are all interested? Who is indifferent to the cause of humanity? But the motives which actuate the breasts of Englishmen on this great question, are various and important. Such not only feel for an object suffering under the hand of unprovoked cruelty, to whose rescue they advance, but, sensible from indubitable evidence that Providence has not made any difference in intellectual ability between the Negroes and the Whites, they reflect on the privileges of that constitution of government under which they live, on that liberty they enjoy, not obtained without the blood and tears of their ancestors, and compare it with the Negroes chain They revolt!—This constitution (the stupendous wonder of surrounding nations), if it teaches any thing, teaches this first, that I treat with a high degree of respect every human being, as invested with the noble faculty of reason and an immortal spirit, that I move towards him on the principles of justice Here then begins the foundation of RIGHT, respecting which it is only needful to refer to the illustrious names of Selden, Littleton, and Lord Coke they tell us in strong terms (and it is the foundation of their great name) that "LIBERTY IS EVERY MAN'S RIGHT, LIBERTY TO THINK AND ACT, WHEREBY HE MAY ARRIVE AT THE SUMMIT OF HUMAN ATTAINMENT, THAT HIS PERSON IS NOT TO BE TOUCHED BY ANY WITHOUT DEFAULT, THAT HIS PROPERTY IS SECURE, THAT PERSONS IN THE LOWEST RANK OF SOCIETY HAVE VARIOUS RIGHTS, EQUAL IN IMPORTANCE WITH THOSE IN THE HIGHER Such is the dignified language of our greatest Legislators, that LIBERTY is defendedly held in the breasts of Englishmen a possession invaluable, the assistant of every virtue, the distinction of our worth and fame amongst the nations

But to return a little How does the Christian feel for the oppressed natives of Africa? —He feels every sentiment of the patriot with increased sensibility In his breast it is we must find that sympathy which flows from love, and the sense of the greatness of the deprivation of many of the favours he possesses He shall enter into every sorrow, —when a thousand husbands were torn from their wives and children, and their faces sad with unutterable grief —He shall participate in their distress, when the wife and the children were taken while the husband was from home, when the brother was missing; when the town was set on fire, and all were taken, within the chance of a bloody battle put the Prince in possession of hundreds of unconsolate prisoners he shall view the horrors of the scene!—When chained they travel the sandy deserts, and water them with tears, he shall know their gloomy retrospective thoughts, and be acquainted with every sigh. The husband remembers his beloved wife and children, but with no hope to see or hear of more, the wife thinks often of what has befallen her husband but with no relief, the sister speaks of her brother, the brother of his sister

It is the Christian that, leaning over the afflicted African, can say, "My friend and brother! what can be done for thy unparalleled sufferings? I will pour the balm of consolation of a future state into thy bosom. Lost in astonishment at the greatness of thy wrongs and that some of my countrymen, pretenders to freedom, are the perpetrators, I will assail them with remorse, and grief, and shame I will open the door to thy participation of every social comfort; and the light of the glorious gospel shall shine into thy domain Africa, so long the stage of desolation and misery, overspread by the wings of peace, may flourish as a garden, her sons adorn the walks of science, and shine conspicuous in the cause of virtue"

Surely sentiments and feelings such as these have strongly affected the breast of this nation, on behalf of the greatly injured Africans, UPWARDS OF ONE HUNDRED PETITIONS HAVING BEEN PRESENTED TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS FROM THE PRINCIPAL COUNTIES, CITIES, AND TOWNS IN THE KINGDOM. What has been the consequence? The Privy Council have investigated the circumstances attending the Slave Trade, and collected a voluminous body of evidence; and the House of Commons stands pledged to enter upon their examination of this subject early in the present Session of Parliament. Arrived at this situation, it becomes every friend of humanity to be doubly attentive to the cause they have espoused. There is great reason to believe the interest of many is so deep in this unnatural commerce, and the trank in life affording them such influence, that the point is not likely to be gained without an arduous conflict. At present all is pretty hushed on their side, well knowing that were a literary defence of their traffic to appear, it would but weaken their chance, and raise an insurmountable indignation in the breast of a generous people. But the time is approaching when the dealers in human blood, and their advocates, must appear before the Grand Inquest of the Nation; and then it shall be seen, whether the demands of nature and of conscience are not greater than any plea they can produce

WHEN THE LONG ACCOUNT OF UNATONED GUILT AND CRIMES PERPETRATING, CHILLS EVERY HEART WITH FEAR,—SHALL NOT THE VOICE OF TRUTH BE AS LOUD AS ITS OBJECT IS EXTENSIVE, AND DROWNING EVERY SUBTILTY OF ERROR AND DECEIT, PRONOUNCE ITS ABOLITION?

Quid sit turpe, quid subtile, quid dulce, quid non.

The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne in the County of Southampton, with Engravings; and an Appendix, contained in Letters to the Hon. Daines Barrington, and Thomas Pennant, Esq. By the Rev. Gilbert White, A. M. 4to. 21 sh. boards White and Son

THOUGH the book of Nature has always lain open, yet mankind had done little more than regard it with brute unmeaning gaze till within a century, for the writings on this subject, which the ancients left us, for want of accuracy of description, have furnished more matter of conjecture than of information The works of the moderns, therefore, we must consult, if we wish to find unerring guides to lead us through the animal, vegetable, and fossil world Since by the arrangements of Ray and Linnæus we are enabled to ascertain with precision the individual of the three kingdoms, thoſe writers moſt deſerve our eſtimation who bring us acquainted with the œconomy and manners of animals, and the properties of plants and foſſils. An Author then like this before us, who "profeſſes to be an out-door naturaliſt, one that takes his obſervations from the ſubject itſelf, and not from the writings of others," p. 215 is ſuch as is moſt worthy of our commendation. But the ſtudy of nature without doors, is not valuable merely for the knowledge which may be acquired Setting aſide the benefits which may accrue to medicine and agriculture, purſuits of this ſort never fail to be conducive to health in an eminent degree Exercise for health alone is engaged in reluctantly, and ſoon becomes irkſome and laborious, while the naturaliſt ſeldom returns from his walk or ride without having met with ſomething amuſing at leaſt, if not inſtructive If he chance to find

A bird unknown, or undeſcribed plant,
Bleſſes his ſtars, and thinks it luxury.

They greatly err who imagine that the fields afford no objects of amuſement except thoſe of the chaſe

Nor ſhould the man of letters diſdain ſuch researches, as totally unconnected with his ſtudies. Few had read or remembered more than Warburton, yet neglecting to look abroad, he tells us that a raven and a crow is the ſame bird of prey, and he altered the text of Shakeſpeare accordingly *

From among the various ſtructures in the different branches of natural philoſophy which Mr. White's performance exhibits, we cannot refrain from inſerting the whole of the letter where he deſcribes that very rare bird the Charadrius Himantopus, of which he has given an elegant engraving In the formation of this animal, nature, as if in a ſportive mood, ſeems inclined to ſhew how widely ſhe could depart from her accuſtomed models.

Selborne, May 7th, 1779

"It is now more than forty years that "I have paid ſome attention to the ornithology of this diſtrict, without being "able to exhauſt the ſubject. new occurrences ſtill ariſe as long as any inquiries are kept alive In the laſt week "of laſt month five of thoſe moſt rare "birds, too uncommon to have obtained "an Engliſh name, but known to naturaliſts by the terms of himantopus, or "longipes, and charadrius himantopus, "were ſhot upon the verge of Frinſham-pond, a large lake belonging to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and lying between "Woolmer foreſt and the town of Farnham, in the county of Surrey. The "pond-keeper ſays there were three brace "in the flock, but that after he had ſatisfied his curioſity, he ſuffered the "ſixth to remain unmoleſted One of "theſe ſpecimens I procured, and found "the length of the legs to be ſo extraordinary, that at firſt ſight one might "have ſuppoſed the ſhanks had been "faſtened on to impoſe on the credulity "of the beholder they were legs in caricatura, and had we ſeen ſuch proportions on a Chineſe or Japan ſcreen, "we ſhould have made large allowances "for the fancy of the draughtſman. Theſe "birds are of the plover family, and "might with propriety be called the ſtilt plovers. Briſſon, under that idea, gives "them the appoſite name of Hechaſſe. My "ſpecimen, when drawn and ſtuffed with "pepper, weighed only four ounces and "a quarter, though the naked part of the "thigh meaſured three inches and an "half, and the legs four inches and an "half. Hence we may ſafely aſſert that "theſe birds exhibit, weight for inches, "incomparably the greateſt length of legs "of any known bird The flamingo, "for inſtance, is one of the moſt long-"legged birds, and yet it bears no manner of proportion to the himantopus, "for a cock flamingo weighs, at an average, about four pounds averdupois; "and his legs and thighs meaſure uſually "about twenty inches But four pounds "are fifteen times and a fraction more "than four ounces and one quarter, and "if four ounces and a quarter have eight "inches of legs, four pounds muſt have "one hundred and twenty inches and a "fraction of legs, viz. ſomewhat more "than ten feet; ſuch a monſtrous proportion as the world never ſaw! If you "ſhould try the experiment in ſtill larger "birds, the diſparity would ſtill increaſe. "It muſt be matter of great curioſity to "ſee the ſtilt plover move, to obſerve "how it can wield ſuch a length of lever "with ſuch feeble muſcles as the thighs

* "——RAVENS crows and kites] A raven and a crow is the ſame bird of prey the firſt "name taken from its nature; the other from its voice We ſhould therefore read,

——do RAVENOUS crows and kites.

"Beſides, this epithet denotes the circumſtances that make the ſpeaker conſider them as "birds of omen." Warburton's Edit. of Shakeſpeare. vol. VII p. 84. 8vo.

" ſeem to be furniſhed with. At beſt one " ſhould expect it to be but a bad walker; " but what adds to the wonder is, that it " has no back ſee. Now without that " ſteady prop to ſupport its ſteps it muſt " be liable, in ſpeculation, to perpetual " vacillations, and ſeldom able to pre- " ſerve the true center of gravity. The " old name of himantopus is taken from " Pliny, and, by an awkward metaphor, " implies that the legs are as ſlender and " pliant as if cut out of a thong of lea- " ther: neither Willughby nor Ray, in " all their curious reſearches, either at " home or abroad, ever ſaw this bird. Mr. " Pennant never met with it in all Great- " Britain, but obſerved it often in the " cabinets of the curious at Paris. Haſſel- " quiſt ſays that it migrates to Egypt in " the autumn and a moſt accurate ob- " ſerver of nature has aſſured me that he " has found it on the banks of the ſtreams " in Andaluſia. Our writers record it to " have been found only twice in Great- " Britain. From all theſe relations it " plainly appears that theſe long legged " plovers are birds of South Europe, and " rarely viſit our iſland, and when they " do, are wanderers and ſtragglers, and " impelled to make ſo diſtant and northern " an excurſion from motives or accidents " for which we are not able to account. " One thing may fairly be deduced, that " theſe birds come over to us from the " continent, ſince nobody can ſuppoſe that " a ſpecies not noticed once in an age, and " of ſuch a remarkable make, can conſ- " tantly breed unobſerved in this king- " dom." P. 268.

We obſerve it is ſaid at p. 18 that " the (Biſhop's) Waltham blacks com- " mitted ſuch enormities, that govern- " ment was forced to interfere with that " ſevere and ſanguinary act called the " Black Act." Either this Author or Burn's miſtaken; for the latter ſays in his Juſtice, that the 9 G. c. 22 " was oc- " caſioned by the enormities committed in " Epping-foreſt, near Waltham in Eſſex. " (Black Act.) But we apprehend this gen- tleman from his local information is moſt probably in the right, and that Burn from the ſimilarity of names has confounded Waltham (Epping) foreſt near London, with South or Biſhop's Waltham in Hamp- ſhire†.

The Naturaliſt's Summer-Evening Walk is replete with rural images, both novel and pleaſing, and we could gladly have accompanied Mr. White in other po- etical excurſions, had he given us the opportunity. The concluding ſimile is as happy an application of a claſſical ſtory, as we believe Engliſh poetry can produce.

" The chilling night-dews fall:—away, retire;
" For ſee the glow-worm lights her amorous fire!‡

" Th' impatient damſel hung her lamp on high.
" True to the ſignal, by love's meteors led,
" Leander haſten'd to his Hero's bed."
P. 70.

The revival of the tortoiſe and ſhell-ſnail at the ſame time from torpidity is a curious remark of this writer.

April 21, 1786.

" While I was writing this letter, a " moiſt and warm afternoon, with the " thermometer at 50, brought forth " troops of ſhell-ſnails, and, at the ſame " juncture, the tortoiſe heaved up the " mold and put out its head, and the " next morning came forth as if they were " raiſed from the dead, and walked about " till four in the afternoon. This was " a curious coincidence, a very amuſing " occurrence! to ſee ſuch a ſimilarity " of feelings between the two ὀρφικοὶ! " for ſo the Greeks called both the ſhell- " ſnail and the tortoiſe." P. 268.

Heſiod directs the vine-dreſſer to ceaſe from digging his vineyard when the ὀρφικὸς quits his hibernaculum.

Αλλ' ὁπότ' ἂν ὀρφικὸς ἀπὸ χθονὸς ἐς φόως ἔλθῃ,
Πληιάδα θ' ἑπταγύην, τοτὲ δὴ σημαίνεσθαι ἄρουραν.

Works and Days, v. 571.

Some commentators have rendered ὀρφικὸς (houſe-bearer) the tortoiſe; others following Athenæus contend that the word here ſignifies a ſnail: but if Πληιάδες φύσιν meant avoiding the rain, to which none object, it is by no means applicable

† Since the above was written we are ſatisfied that our conjecture is well founded. Our Author is right, and Dr. Burn erroneous. We have now before us a pamphlet intitled, " The Hiſtory of the Blacks of Waltham in Hampſhire," and thoſe under the like denomina- tion in Berkſhire," 8vo. 1723. It contains a narrative of the enormities and cataſtrophe of theſe wretches.

to the snail, which reptile every gardener knows is never so alert as in wet seasons. Whereas the tortoise, of which the annotators were probably ignorant, we from what we have ourselves seen can assert, shuns a shower with the greatest precaution. For in the words of this diligent observer, "no "part of its behaviour is more striking "than the extreme timidity it always ex- "presses with regard to rain, for though "it has a shell that would secure it against "the wheel of a loaded cart, yet does it "discover as much solicitude about rain "as a lady dressed in all her best attire, "shuffling away on the first sprinklings, "and running us head up in a corner. "If attended to, it becomes an excellent "weather-glass, for it sits as it walks "elate, and as it were on tip-toe, feed- "ing with great earnestness in a morn- "ing, so sure will it rain before night." P. 149

May not Baum, which is relied on as descriptive of the snail-ascending plants, full as likely relate to the tortoise crawling over them? The poet would certainly prefer the tortoise, whose first appearance in spring must be more remarkable than that of the snail.

—— "Far abroad

"Or where the embowering vine o'erhangs the steep,

In a work of such multiplicity of information as this now before us, we cannot pretend, limited as we are, to enter into every article; but we assure the reader, if he turn his mind to the contemplation of the wisdom of Providence, that he will derive much satisfaction in its perusal. We allude more particularly to the monographies of the British Hirundines, the hints and remarks on the birds of passage, and on the notes and language of birds, the answers on echoes, the monographies of insects, and the calculations on population taken from the parish-registers. However, we cannot wholly pass over the extraordinary discovery, that during a severe frost, the air is warmer on the hills, than it is in the valleys. It appears from this account, that the thermometer at the bottom of the hill went down to one degree below Zero, that is to thirty-three degrees below the freezing point, when at the same time that on the hill, two hundred feet or more above, fell only to seventeen, and was the next morning at twenty two, though the one below was at ten so that the difference of cold between the two places was once eighteen degrees less above than below, and thro the whole frost continued ten or twelve. This variation was confirmed by the total destruction of the foreign evergreens in the valley, those on the hill remaining unhurt. Page 296. As thermometers still of late years engaged the attention of but few, and the difference between real and sensible cold is so great, that we feel more cold when the mercury stands five degrees below the freezing point with a brisk wind, than when it is sunk fifteen below, and the air is still, we are not much surprised that mankind should have hitherto erroneously supposed that mountains are cold in proportion to their height.

Were we inclined to cavil, we should say that the materials might have been arranged more systematically than in the present form of occasional letters, and that perhaps "Observations on Natural History "made in a series of visits at Selborn" would have been a more suitable title for the work. Having been tempted to extend this article to a considerable length, we are constrained to postpone the consideration of the Antiquities to a future Number.

ALTHOUGH the rapid progress of infidelity hath long been the cause of lamentation to every sincere lover of religious truths, as opening a wide floodgate to practical licentiousness, yet, to the sensible christian, those swarms of controversial books which are daily issuing from the press, in defence of christianity, prove much more offensive, as hereby its adversaries obtain that degree of consequence which is their primary wish, together with those opportunities of temporary advantage for which they are always on the watch.

But notwithstanding the ridicule of infidels, the severe drubbings of the critics, and the still more severe neglect of the public, our conceited divines, conceited laymen, and even conceited females, will be foolhardy enough to obtrude themselves on the world, as literary knight-errants in defence of religion. By reflecting on the success of a Davis, a Beattie, a Jenyns, and a Macnaay, cum multis aliis, in this dangerous field, religious zealots may learn the prudence of preserving themselves from contempt, and, what is of more consequence, Religion from profanation. But peace be unto the manes of those who have fallen or field, we have now the pleasure of viewing a champion indeed, and one who appears to be fully capable of wielding a sword with glory, in the arduous but noble cause

At all times animated by the love of truth, and of his fellow-creatures, Mr. Necker employed the interval of his retirement, or exile from public business, in investigating those important doctrines, whereon the temporal as well as eternal interests of mankind chiefly depend He saw in France, the brightest of its geniuses combating, not merely those particular refinements of religion which compose the chief standard of their national faith, but those primary principles which enter into the foundation of public order and private happiness. To say that Mr. Necker has in the treatise before us fully routed these enemies of religion, would be saying what is barely just, but we have the pleasure of adding, that he has herein provided, in an ample manner, for the entertainment of the most philosophic, and the comfort of the most simple christian

The Introduction is a master piece of good writing, being elegant, entertaining, instructive and pious, it is, in short, the picture of a religious philosopher retired from the world, and shews more of the goodness of Mr Necker's heart, than even his public conduct, or literary productions The only particulars we can well select from this Introduction, for the use of our readers, is the prayer which concludes it "O thou GOD unknown! but whose benehcent idea has ever filled my soul, if thou ever throwest a look on those efforts which man makes to approach thee, sustain my resolution, enlighten my understanding, raise my thoughts, and reject not the desire I have to unite still more, if possible, the order and happiness of society with the intimate and perfect conception of thy divinity, and the lively idea of thy sublime existence!"

The first two chapters treat of the connection of religious principles with public order,—in the discussion of which Mr Necker hath occasion to observe the universality of religious sentiments and of public worship in ancient and modern times, from whence there is a natural conclusion against those who maintain that religion is inimical to the interests of public bodies Whatever may be the defects of particular societies, owing to the unequal distribution of power and wealth, of slavery and authority, riches and poverty, of luxury and misery, yet, as Mr. Necker strongly infers, "this disproportion could not be remedied by the destruction of religion, and the substitution of a political mechanism that would equalize these things, as, by so doing, there would be two opposite interests among men, which would set them at eternal variance."

His reasoning on this head is so masterly and elegant, that we cannot but select a part for the benefit of our readers. "We are then, says Mr. Necker, under a great illusion, if we hope to be able to found morality on the connection of private interest with that of the public; and if we imagine that the empire of social laws can be separated from the support of religion. The authority of these laws has nothing decisive for those who have not assisted to establish them; and were we to give to the hereditary distinctions of property an origin the most remote, it is no less true, on this account, that the poor succeeding inhabitants of the earth, struck with the unequal division of its rich domains, and not perceiving the limits and lines of separation traced by nature, would have some right to say, These compacts, these partitions, this diversity of lots, which procure to some abundance and repose, to others poverty and labour; all this legislation, in short, is only advantageous to a small number of privileged men, and we will not submit to it, unless compelled by the fear of personal danger What are then, they would add, these ideas of right and wrong, with which we are entertained? What are these dissertations on the necessity of adopting some order in society, and of observing rules? Our minds bends not to those principles, which, general in theory, become particular in practice. We find some satisfaction and compensation, when the idea of virtue, of submission, and of sacrifice, are united to religious sentiments, when we believe we shall render an account of our actions to a supreme Being, whose laws and will we adore, and from whom we have received every thing, and whose approbation presents itself to our eyes, as a motive of emulation, and an object of recompence: but if the contracted bounds of life limit the narrow circle in which all our interest ought to confine itself, where all our speculations and our hopes summate, what respect or gratitude to those whom nothing has forced to put us to those men sprung from lifeless clay, to return to it again with us, and to be lost for ever in the same dust? They have only invented these last laws of juſtice, to be more tranquil uſurpers Let them deſcend from their exalted rank, that they may be put on our level; or, at leaſt, preſent us with a partition leſs unequal, and we ſhall then be able to conceive, that the obſervance of the laws of right is of importance to us: 'till then, we ſhall have juſt motives for being the enemies of civil order, which we find ſo diſadvantageous; and we do not comprehend how, in the midſt of ſo many gratifications which excite our envy, it is, in the name of our own intereſt, that we ought to renounce them.

"Such is the ſecret language which men overwhelmed with the diſtreſs of their ſituation, would not fail to uſe; or thoſe, who, merely in a ſtate of habitual inferiority, found themſelves continually hurt by the ſplendid ſight of luxury and magnificence."

From this, and various other arguments equally ſtriking and judicious, Mr Necker plainly proves, that there is nothing capable of reſtricting men to a quiet contentedneſs in their different ſtations of life, but the force of religious opinions, and the grand hope of future happineſs built upon them.

In contemplative ſpeculation, enjoying the comforts of life, we may eaſily be made to believe that every ſituation is good, but if we are neceſſitated to occupy ſome one of the menial ranks, we ſhall ſtand in much greater need of hope than of abſtract reaſoning on a few vague principles, to enable us to bear our lot without repining. It is "Religion alone, therefore," as Mr. Necker obſerves, "that has power to perſuade with celeſtial authority: it alone has the means of rendering obvious what it recommends, becauſe it ſpeaks in the name of GOD, and it is only to inſpire reſpect for him, whoſe power is every where evident to the eyes of the ſimple and ſkilful, to the eyes of children, and men advanced to maturity."

Againſt this grand truth, our author fairly adduces all the objections that have been or can be made, and with the greateſt ſtrength of argument ſhews their futility. The following paſſage ſtruck us, as beautifully ſublime: "The infinity of a GOD, creator and director of the univerſe, is ſo far from having power to divert our reſpect and adoration, that even the clouds with which he envelopes himſelf, lend a new force to religious ſentiments." What an elegant vindication of Divine Providence in its moſt awful decrees!

At the concluſion of this part of his ſubject, Mr. Necker draws a "parallel between the influence of religious principles and of laws and opinions." This, though a very intricate, is a very intereſting queſtion; and it is here managed with all that judgment and ſagacity which ſo peculiarly characteriſe this great man.

Religion is ſhewn to be that univerſal ſpirit, without the inſpiration of which, neither laws nor opinions would have any active force. "Every thing," as he concludes, "is replaced and firmly eſtabliſhed by religion: it ſurrounds, I may ſay, the whole ſyſtem of morality, reſembling that univerſal and myſterious force of phyſical nature, which retains the planets in their orbits, and ſubjects them to a regular revolution; and which, in the midſt of the general order it maintains, eſcapes the obſervation of men, and appears to their feeble ſight unconſcious of its own work."

The two next chapters are ſhort, but contain very able anſwers to two objections againſt revealed religion, the one "drawn from our natural diſpoſitions to goodneſs," and the other, "from the good conduct of many irreligious men." In replying to the firſt, though Mr Necker, for the honour of human nature and its Author, readily allows "the exiſtence of our natural inclination towards goodneſs," yet he very properly turns the tables on the adverſaries, by clearly proving, that without the aid of religion this inclination would be unable to attain the deſired end. To the latter objection Mr Necker's anſwer is equally clear, and contains a remark that will, probably, ſtagger many who build their infidelity in a great meaſure on the good conduct of the leaders of their party, viz. That "all thoſe who free themſelves at a certain age from the yoke of religion, have been at leaſt prepared by it to reſpect virtue."

There is another, but at the ſame time a very inſignificant, objection which Mr Necker here takes an opportunity to overthrow: and that is the melancholy "conteſt, ſo frequently perceived, between the conduct and the religious ſentiments of the greater part of men." But, as our author obſerves, unleſs the cauſe of this could be proved to originate from a religious education, it can have no force at all. "Men," as he ſays, "termed religious, forming the major part of the populace, we muſt, among them, neceſſarily meet the greater number of malefactors." We ſhould not have quoted this plain remark, was it not known to us that many religious ſceptics in our own country exultingly make make uſe of the objection, to which it replies, as an argument. in palmarium againſt the national religion

Mr Necker concludes his fourth chapter with the following bold, but honeſt declaration "You have ſeen, and you will perceive ſtill more, in the progreſs of this work, that I do not endeavour to elude difficulties, for before I determined to defend, according to my abilities, a cauſe which I would wiſh to render clear to mankind, I carefully ſtudied the means, and after having fortified myſelf againſt the ſyſtems oppoſite to my ſentiments, I feared not to examine the motives which ſerve to ſupport them."

It may be ſaid, perhaps, that a conſiderable part of Mr. Necker's reaſoning in the chapters we have been conſidering, is far from being new. This may be juſt; yet it cannot be denied that he hath ſet his arguments in ſo ſtriking a light, and arranged them in ſo maſterly a manner, as to give them nearly the appearance, and entirely the force of novelty.

Having dwelt ſo long on this truly intereſting article, we muſt, in juſtice to the many productions for which we are indebted to the public, refer the further conſideration of it to our next Review.

A Vindication of the Authenticity of the Parian Chronicle, in Anſwer to a Diſſertation on that Subject, lately publiſhed By the Rev. John Hewlett. Octavo. 4s. Edwards.

AS the Parian Chronicle had maintained its credit, and been cited both by Engliſhmen and foreigners as the higheſt authority in chronological queſtions, for 160 years, it could not be expected that a late Diſſertation, in which its authenticity is called in queſtion, ſhould paſs without animadverſion. The performance we are now conſidering is the firſt which has appeared upon the ſubject *, but we are ſorry to ſay, it is, in many reſpects, defective or exceptionable. The Author's "aſperity" is too conſpicuous. "His refutation, as he ſays himſelf, amounts only to negative proof, or hypothetical reaſoning." The argument which he produces in favour of the Chronicle, from the numeral characters, is ſo far from having any weight, that we are rather ſurprized the Author of the Diſſertation had not produced it in ſupport of his hypotheſis. Herodian, who mentions theſe numerals, lived about 400 years after the date of the Chronicle. His tract on that ſubject was well known about the beginning of the laſt century. The Vindicator repreſents the Author of the Diſſertation as expecting a uniformity between the characters in the Chronicle and other ancient inſcriptions. This is evidently a miſrepreſentation. The 2d chapter of the Diſſertation is nothing more than a preliminary ſtatement of facts, and, en paſſant, an account of other inſcriptions. In like manner, the entertaining chapter on ancient and modern forgeries is repreſented by Mr. H. as "not applicable to the preſent queſtion;" whereas we muſt do the Diſſertation the juſtice to obſerve, that he produced thoſe examples with no other view than to ſhew the CAUTION with which we ſhould receive all pretended reliques of antiquity, when their authenticity is not fully aſcertained. The quotations or tranſcripts from the Diſſertation are ſo copious, that, in a collective view, they amount to a plagiariſm. We meet with ſeveral hallucinations in the Vindication, which are very reprehenſible. In ſhort, every claſſical reader will certainly conclude, that this writer did not ſufficiently conſider the extent of his abilities, when he attempted to refute one of the moſt acute and learned productions of the preſent æra.

An Eſſay on the Powers and Mechaniſm of Nature, intended by a deeper Analyſis of Phyſical Principles, to extend, improve, and more firmly eſtabliſh, the grand Superſtructure of the Newtonian Syſtem. By Robert Young 8vo. Buckſ, 1788.

A JUDICIOUS view of the doctrine contained in this Eſſay, having already been given by a Correſpondent, (Vid our laſt Vol page 176) we think it needleſs to enter here into a larger diſplay of it. After premiſing therefore, that the account above referred to is, in every inſtance, impartial, we have only to obſerve, in addition thereto, that Mr Young hath ſhewn himſelf to be endowed with more ſtrength of judgment, depth of penetration, and candid modeſty, than generally fall to the ſhare of thoſe who profeſs themſelves the Authors or deſtroyers of ſyſtems.—And in how much contempt ſoever the philoſophically orthodox may probably hold him and his work, yet it is our opinion, that he is entitled to a full reply and complete refutation (if ſuch can be given him) from the higheſt living characters in the Newtonian ſchool. In expectation, therefore, of beholding a champion worthy both of his and our notice, we leave our author, for the preſent, in poſſeſſion of this ſterile part of the literary field. W

Theſaurus Eccleſiaſticus; an Improved Edition of the Liber Valorum, containing an Account of the Valuation of all the Livings in England and Wales, their Charge in the King's Books, reſpective Patrons, &c. With an Appendix. By the Rev. John Lloyd, A. B. late of Jeſus College, Oxon. 8vo. 7s. 6d. boards. Davis, 1788.

THIS improved Edition of Ecton's Liber Valorum muſt make a neceſſary article in every Clergyman's Library. The Editor has carefully collected the names of the reſpective patrons; and given, where he could, the real value of the livings. The Appendix contains many particulars of uſeful information to thoſe who are, or intend to be Miniſters of the Church of England.

But we cannot help thinking that the price of the Book might well have been abridged, by omitting the large Index at the end, which (conſidering the general arrangement of the work itſelf) is totally uſeleſs except as make-weight. W.

Alfred and Caſſandra. A Romance. Tale. 2 vols. 6s.

THE Author of this truly Romantic Tale ſeems inclined to ſhelter his work from the ſhafts of criticiſm "under the ſhadow of a mighty name." He has accordingly proclaimed himſelf to be a man of deep and extenſive erudition, by exhibiting in his title pages no leſs than eight different quotations, in four different languages, from Maſſinger, Voltaire, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, Plautus Joſephus, and Calmet! The charms of learning have without doubt conſiderable influence upon the minds of men, and many there are who reverence its votaries, not from admiration, but from a miſtaken notion that he whoſe education has enabled him to behold the myſteries which an acquaintance of the dead languages conceals from vulgar eyes, muſt have made proportionable advances in the fields of knowledge and in the regions of ſcience. The concluſion, however, cannot be of long continuance; for a ſmall portion of good ſenſe will ſoon convince its poſſeſſor of the vaſt difference between the characters of a mere Philologiſt and a true Philoſopher. In the preſent inſtance indeed, we ſhrewdly ſuſpect that the Author has attempted to ſhine in borrowed plumes; for it is difficult to imagine that a man of ſuch extenſive reading ſhould have ſo far neglected the obſervation of Horace as to call, with ſuch manifeſt incongruity, the French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages in aid of a trifling and "Romantic Tale."

"Undique collatis membris, ut turpiter atrum

"Spectatum admiſſi riſum teneatis amici?"

The Author, however, "begs the candid reader to impartially read over the work, and then to judge how far the ſucceſs of the narration deſerves the bays of literary fame." We truſt that we have complied with his requeſt, and, in the impartiality of our judgment reſpecting its literary merit, we can ſay—NOTHING. But we ſhall tranſcribe from the preface a deſcription of its moral tendency, which while it affords a ſpecimen of the ſtile of writing, will inſpire a lamentation that ſo deſirable an object has not been more happily attained—"The "principal thing aimed at is to draw "characters ſo connected yet contraſted, "whereby the inexperienced may profit "by advice, and learn to ſhun the path "that is trod by the vicious, which "leads the unthinking to the high road "of deſtruction, and inevitably periſh "through an obſtinacy, in ſwerving from "the wholeſome admonition of virtue, "which is the only guide in this life to "peace and tranquility here, and never-"ending joys in a world to come."

Letters on Greece; being a Sequel to Letters on Egypt, and containing Travels through Rhodes, Crete, and other Islands of the Archipelago; with comparative Remarks on their Ancient and Present State, and Observations on the Government, Character, and Manners of the Turks and modern Greeks. Translated from the French of Mr. Savary 8vo. 6s Robinsons.

THE work to which this correspondence is said to form a sequel, was elaborately examined in our Review for the year 1787*; and many assertions of fact were clearly refuted, and some prejudices latent in the author's mind, detected and exposed History is finely figured to be "philosophy teaching wisdom by examples" TRUTH therefore, in those writings, which, imitating history, profess to delineate the "government, character and manners" of any particular nation, is highly important and interesting to the happiness of mankind Having made this prefatory remark, we shall leave the facts of the present work to speak for themselves, especially as the author, writing to a lady, appears more anxious to entertain the mind of his correspondent with elegant descriptions of interesting objects, than to propagate wisdom by a deduction of useful and philosophic truths —He sets sail from Alexandria with an intention to proceed to Rhodes, and on bidding farewell to Egyptian land he indulges himself in the following rhapsody, which we transfer here as an authority for the observation we have made, and as a specimen of the translator's style

"Adieu, ye burning shores of Egypt! I lay aside with pleasure the turban, the long robe, and the mustachio, those necessary habiliments for every European who is inclined to visit these countries! Adieu, ye superb monuments, on which I have so often gazed with admiration and astonishment! I rejoice that I have seen you, but wish not to behold you a second time, till the country in which you rear your lofty heads shall be no longer under the dominion of a barbarous people Adieu! ye ever verdant gardens of Rosetta and Damietta, and ye grottos the soft retreats of voluptuous enjoyment! How do your perfumes embalm the air! How delightful were the coolness of your charming shades, impenetrable to the ardour of a burning sun, did not death await the rash mortal who shall too thoughtlessly dare to enter them Such, Madam, were my reflexions, while I cast a parting glance on objects by which I had been so deeply affected, as I followed the Zanthiot captain to the ship The boat glided gently over the surface of an unruffled sea, and my reverie continued till suddenly it struck against the vessel, when the shock dissipated the illusion, and I mounted the deck"

He proceeds to sea, and describes with equal eloquence the beauty of a favoring breeze, the awful appearance of the ocean, the glorious scene of the sun rising at sea, the terrors of a storm, the ignorance of Greek sailors, and his difficult arrival in the port of Castel Rosso, on the coast of Caramania, or ancient Lycia

"This island is but half a league in circumference, and is only separated from the continent by a narrow streight The coast is inaccessible, except on the side of the harbour, where there is a small town, consisting of about one hundred houses. It is built upon a rock, on the point of which is a small Turkish fort, which serves to frighten away the Corsairs. The space it occupies is extremely confined, both by the sea, and a very steep mountain, above three hundred feet high, which has the appearance of a wall, from which huge masses of rock seem ready to fall upon the houses, and precipitate them into the waves. I climbed it with difficulty, and found on its summit a plain, about a quarter of a league in circuit, uncultivated, and nearly covered with grass, half burnt up In the middle is a small chapel, very wretched, and very solitary

"From this eminence we discover the Mediterranean to the north and south, while the rest of the horizon is bounded by the lofty summits of Mount Taurus. When we descend into the town, we find ourselves in a bottom environed by steep cliffs, which lose themselves in the clouds These are a circle of bare and hanging rocks, which heated by the sun, reflect a vivid light, injurious to the eyes. Never did verdure embellish these melancholy shores, we only meet with a few bulbous plants, and thorny shrubs, which delight in such situations Such is the prospect the inhabitants of Castel Rosso have incessantly before their eyes It presents the image of eternal sterility, nor do I believe the whole world affords a more desolate and horrid habitation

"You may imagine, Madam, how wretched the Greeks, who inhabit such a place, must be They can neither sow

nor rasp. The island produces neither vegetables, fruit, nor grain. Their plantations are confined to about fifty feet of olive trees, and they have no cattle but goats, which climb among the rocks to find subsistence. To complete their misery, there is only one spring in the island, and that is almost at the top of the hills from whence the women are obliged to fetch water. I have often seen them labouring up a steep path, carrying large pitchers on their shoulders, and returning heavily laden, at the risk of being dashed to pieces with their burthen. Such a place of abode is not to be envied. Accordingly, the handsomest house lets only at twelve livres (or half a guinea) a year, and the bride who receives for her portion a foot of olive ground and a she goat, is esteemed wealthy.

"Fortune seems to have intended to recompense the inhabitants of Castel Rosso, by giving them indolent neighbours. In the time of harvest, they pass into Caramania, and get in the corn for the Turks. They bring back with them grain, wine, and various kinds of provisions. Their situation has rendered them seamen, and they make voyages during three months of the year, and return in winter, to enjoy, with their families, the gains they have made. Most of them carry on a trade in wood, which they purchase at a low rate, and sell high at Alexandria. For carrying this, they make use of decked boats, which do not stow much, but sail very quick, and require little care. They likewise supply their wants by fishing; and by these various means obtain a subsistence.

"Could you imagine it, Madam, on this desolate spot I found a native of Provence, who is settled here, and connected in business with a Greek; they live in the same house, and are partners in a vessel. The former trades with the Turks, and purchases fire-wood, and timber for ship-building, in Caramania, which the other sells in Egypt; from whence, in return, he brings various articles which are in full here. They appear to inhabit some fortable, and live in harmony together. The Frenchman considers himself as the agent of his nation, and renders his countrymen all the services in his power, in return for which, he receives from them some little presents. I have every reason to be satisfied with his politeness. To do us honour he killed a sheep, perhaps the only one in the island, and regaled us in the best manner he could, with Muscadine grapes, gathered on the Asiatic shore. The oriental customs were observed in every thing. We sat upon the ground, seated round the dishes, on the carpet, and, afterward, all drank out of one large cup, the only one, doubtless, in the possession of these partners. Next came coffee, and then pipes, of which we were obliged heartily to partake. I asked our host many questions, and among the novelties I learnt from him, the following appeared worthy to be preserved.

"'In my excursions through the mountains of Caramania,' said he, 'I found at the foot of a tree, somewhat different from the mulberry, large balls or cones, of a white and fine silk, much bigger than those of the common silk-worm. On examining the leave, I discovered the insects that produced them, some of which were still spinning. They were caterpillars of a blackish colour, larger than silk-worms. I brought away four of them, and sent them to the consul at Rhodes, but they cannot have been received, as I have never heard of them more.'

"I repeatedly requested my host to conduct me to the place where he had seen this species of silk-worm, but he answered, that, war having broke out between the Turks of that province, it was impossible to go so far. He promised me, however, as soon as peace should be restored, to send me some of them to Candia, with the leaves of the trees on which they feed. I relate these particulars, to induce travellers, who may hereafter visit these countries, to endeavour to procure some of these valuable insects. The trees which grow on the high grounds of Caramania would thrive well in France, and it would be an advantage to mankind in general, and a source of riches to our own nation in particular, could we discover and multiply a new species of worm which produces silk."

Travels through Italy, in a Series of Letters written in the Year 1785, by the Abbé Duparty. Translated from the French by an English Gentleman. 8vo. 6s. Robinsons.

IN our Review of literary phenomena for last month, we commenced an analysis of the work now under inspection, and it is with great increase of pleasure that that we continue to ſelect a portion of the many curious and intereſting particulars with which it abounds The modern race of European Itinerants have, in general, communicated to their readers a ſeries of adventures, inſtead of facts, interſperſed with the relation of private anecdotes, and ſometimes enlivened by the introduction of occaſional ſentiment, but the genius of L'Abbé Dupaty ſoars far beyond that narrow ſphere It is the nature of MAN, and not merely the ſuperficial appearances of THINGS, or the hiſtory of unimportant EVENTS, that he appears anxious to repreſent. He views his objects with the eye of a profound philoſopher, and deſcribes them with the accuracy of a ſcholar, and the eaſe of a gentleman We left him at Toulon inſpecting the criminal juriſprudence of France, in the puniſhment of the Galley-Slaves, from whence he proceeds to Nice, which he deſcribes "as the garden of the Heſperides," and mentions Mr Thomas, an artiſt there, who has "for thirty years paſt worked day and night at his ſtatue" He then embarks on ſhip-board, and, after touching at Monaco, arrives at Genoa Having viewed the Palace of the Sun, the Senate-Houſe, the Public Monuments, the Hoſpital, the Free-Port, the public Bake Houſe, the Palace of Durazzo, and the Picture Galleries, he pays a viſit to THE GALLEY SLAVES of Italy

"Five ſorts of wretches are faſtened indiſcriminately to the chain, malefactors, ſmugglers, deſerters, Turks taken by the Corſairs, and voluntary galley-ſlaves

"Voluntary galley-ſlaves!—Yes—Theſe are poor men whom government get hold of between hunger and death It is in this narrow paſſage that they wait, and watch for them Theſe wretched beings, dazzled with a little money, do not perceive the gallies, and are enliſted Poverty and guilt are bound in the ſame chain! The citizen who ſerves the republic, ſuffers the ſame puniſhment with him who has betrayed it!

"The Genoeſe carry their barbarity ſtill farther; when the term of their enliſtment is near expiring, they propoſe to lend a little money to theſe miſerable creatures. Unhappy men are eager for enjoyment, the preſent moment alone exiſts for them, they accept but, at a week's end, nothing remains to them but regret and ſlavery inſomuch that at the expiration of that time, they are compelled to enliſt again, to diſcharge their debt, and ſell eight years more of their exiſtence Thus do the greateſt part of them conſume, from enliſtments, to loans, and from loans to enliſtments, their whole lives in the gallies, in the midſt of wretchedneſs and infamy! There they expire.

"We ſaw among them a Frenchman, a young man. In returning to his miſfortune, he ſhed tears. We gave him a trifling preſent, and his tears flowed ſtill more abundantly. Let us eſcape from theſe ſorrowful abodes, where we are unable to alleviate the miſeries we lament. What abodes muſt thoſe be where pity is of no avail!

"But what is that kind of priſon in the corner, ſaid I to the man who conducted me? How low, dark, and damp it is! It conſiſts too of two ſtories What are theſe animals ſtretched out on the ground, and on the upper floor? They can ſcarcely crawl. Thoſe hideous heads, which peep out from beneath the blankets, are covered with long hair Their looks are ſtupid and ferocious Do they eat nothing but this hard black bread?—Certainly not.—Have they no drink but this dirty water?—Certainly not —Do they always continue lying?—Yes.—How long have they been here?—Twenty years —How old are they?—Seventy.—How do you call them?—Turks

"Theſe miſerable Turks are totally degraded from humanity They are ſtrangers to every thing but bodily wants. They have worn out, in this ſort of tomb, the ſmall number of ideas and recollections they brought with them from nature and their country.

"The other Turks, who are not yet ſixty years old, are chained under little niches opened at the diſtance of every ſix feet in a long wall, where they can ſcarcely ſit or lye There they reſpire the little air that is allowed them, or rather that they can ſteal.

"The Genoeſe, however, have given an example of toleration but little to be expected from them. They allow theſe Turks a moſque The proteſtants in France have no temples!!

"Let us add one more trait to this picture of the gallies. I ſaw the wretches ſtealing from bench to bench, coveting, diſputing, ſtealing even the fragments of aliments, which the dogs in the ſtreets had refuſed

"Genoa, thy palaces are not ſufficiently lofty, ſpacious, numerous, nor brilliant; we ſtill perceive thy gallies"

Affecting as the deſcription of this ſcene muſt be to the feelings of humanity, and ſurprizing as it is that ſuch a barbarous ſyſtem of policy ſhould exiſt in the preſent advanced ſtate of civilization, it will appear ſtill more lamentable, that ſuch a character as our author deſcribes the ex-doge to poſſeſs, ſhould not have had the power, for ſuch a man muſt have felt the inclination, to reform it.

"I cannot refrain from ſaying a word concerning the ex-doge, L.

"M L.. is an amiable and reſpectable old man. He is intimately acquainted with ſo many countries and books, and, in the different poſts which he has filled in the republic, has had ſo much experience of the various characters, paſſions, and weakneſſes of different men, of the whole human heart, that he is no longer merely a noble, an ex-doge, a ſenator, nor a Genoeſe. He is a man.

"Every moment that M L can ſteal from occupations that muſt beſtow on him the moſt deſerved fame, he devotes to nature in his delightful gardens of the Poggi. His life there glides gently on, like the waters that ſtream through them, and murmur night and day from his cryſtal fountains.

"M L receives, with the moſt hoſpitable politeneſs, all ſtrangers who come to viſit him at the Poggi, even thoſe who pay them viſits only to the place. His houſe, his mind, his gardens, all are open. His manners are ſimple and noble, they are the habits of a man who, though raiſed by merit, has not been puffed up by arrogance. Nothing can be more affable and courteous than his whole behaviour. His viſitor forgets that he is with a great man, and is freed from all reſtraint from the firſt moment.

"The converſation of M L is often ſuch as you would wiſh it, and always ſuited to his company, for no body knows how to forget himſelf ſo much in converſation, and to think more of others. He prefers, however, talking of arts, ſciences, and literature, which he has cultivated all his life, and which, after contributing to his glory, are now the amuſement of his retreat. His imagination and memory are ſtill ſtored with the moſt beautiful paintings, and the fineſt lines that poetry has produced in every language. Quotations, but which naturally ariſe from the ſubject, ſallies of wit, and reflections which ſeem ingenious, but are in fact profound, ſparkle inceſſantly in his diſcourſe, among the thoughts incident to age.

"You may contradict M L.... you run the riſque indeed of ſhocking his opinion, but never his ſelf-love. He knows not what it is to deſpiſe, for when he doubts no longer of his own, he ſtill doubts of human judgment. You may boldly interrogate him. He has not forgotten that he learnt every thing he knows, he anſwers without reſerve the truth he beſtows liberally to all, but without preſumption.

"M L is invariably the ſame in town or in the country, in the ſenate, when framing a law, and in his gardens, when planting a tree.

"The gardens of the Poggi are delightful. They are very far from reſembling thoſe, the heavy regularity of which is planned by oſtentation, and executed in all the dulneſs of art, thoſe, where, under the rigid and monotonous empire of the ſheers, the rake, and the ſtraight line, each border preſents but one flower, each alley but one tree, each ſpace but one large walk, and where the whole forms only one cumbrous maſs, thoſe whoſe waters held captive in baſons, are condemned to eternal ſleep and ſilence, thoſe in a word, which, however vaſt, ſeem to have been formed only for a firſt glance, and the amuſement of an hour.

"Every thing, on the contrary, that the knowledge and love of beauteous nature can execute, at once to charm the eye, the imagination, and the heart, with turf, earth, water, flowers, with all the ſhades of verdure and the diſpoſition of light, has been executed by M L.

"Theſe delightful gardens preſent, or rather conceal an incloſure of no great extent, but which yet ſufficiently affords ſpace for excurſion, objects to the eyes, and meditation to the mind. Within them confines there is not a flower but ſhines, not a drop of water which does not murmur, and which does not flow, not a tree but is ſufficiently ſeen, though not a ſingle one that obtrudes itſelf. There is a cottage, here a grotto, further on a flock. A thouſand objects placed by chance appear to meet the eye by chance. Though in a garden, we inceſſantly imagine ourſelves only contemplating the natural beauties of the country, beautified, with the enjoyment of which we are never tired.

"It is true, the verdure of theſe gardens conſiſts, in a great meaſure, of thoſe ſerious and gloomy trees which other ſeaſons ſeem to have rejected and bequeathed to winter; the pine, the cypreſs, the larch and the green oak. But theſe winter trees are ſo happily blended with the gayeſt ſhrubs of ſpring, the richeſt plants of autumn, the moſt ſplendid trees of ſummer, with the lilac, the lime, and the plane, that their melancholy verdure, exhilarated

[illegible] by the vicinity and alliance of these more amiable trees, ceases to affect the mind, and to repulse the eye. The verdure of these gardens resembles the conversation of the owner. The thoughts and sentiments of age prevail, but the well chosen recollections of earlier times break forth at intervals, and render it still more agreeable.

"M. L. is the creator of these gardens. It is there, in that charming retreat, that he at length possesses and enjoys himself.

"He has had the rare courage, on arriving at old age, to dismiss all his passions, even the love of glory. He has retained only the love of humanity.

"Sometimes he is surrounded in his palaces by the neighbouring peasants, who enter his gates unfortunate, and return happy. Sometimes, straying over his fields, amid the concerts of his birds, or through the silence of his woods, to the murmurs of his fountains, he enjoys a fine morning of the spring, the calm of a summer evening, or seizes one of the pleasant hours of winter.

"Often too, from amidst a thicket, seated alone and retired in a little marble temple, he contemplates at a distance, through the foliage and the columns, the sea agitated by the tempest, and the pinnace of Genoa by agitation. This is the evening of a sage's life."

The author passes through Lucca, Pisa, and arrives at Florence, and if the amiable picture he has thus ably drawn of the private character of THE EX DOGE of Genoa be enchanting to the virtuous mind, how will the heart kindle into an enthusiastic admiration of the more extraordinary, if not more virtuous, character of the present GRAND DUKE of TUSCANY.

"The first gallery in the world is at Florence, but I will not now speak to you of paintings, statues and images, I have seen Leopold and his people.

"Leopold loves his people, and has suppressed all such imposts as were not necessary: he has disbanded almost all his troops, retaining only sufficient to preserve the art of military discipline.

"He has destroyed the fortifications of Pisa, the maintenance of which was very expensive, he has overthrown the stones which devoured mankind.

"He found that his court concealed from him his people: he has no longer any court. He has established manufactures. He has every where opened superb roads, and at his own expence. He has [illegible] the world imagine the hospitals in Tuscany were palaces of the Grand Duke. I have visited them, and found in them all, cleanliness, good order, and the most humane and attentive care. I have seen sick old men, who seemed rather waited on by their children. I have seen sick children, who seemed as if nursed by their mothers. I could not without shedding tears, behold this luxury of compassion and humanity. In the inscriptions on the front of these hospitals, they have bestowed on Leopold the title of Father of the Poor. The hospitals themselves give him this title. These are monuments which stand in no need of inscriptions. The Grand Duke comes frequently to visit his poor and sick; he does not neglect the good he has done; he possesses not only the sudden feelings of humanity, he has a humane soul. He never makes his appearance in this abode of anguish and sorrow without causing tears of joy, he never leaves it without being followed with benedictions which are the gratitude of a happy people; and these songs of thanksgiving are sent up from an hospital!

"You may be presented to the Grand Duke without having four hundred years nobility, without descending from those who disputed the crown with his ancestors. His palace, like the temples, is open to all his subjects without exception. Three days only in the week are more particularly consecrated to a certain class of men, neither to the great nor the rich, neither to painters, poets, nor musicians, but to the wretched.

"In other countries, commerce and industry, like the lands, are become the patrimony of a small number of individuals; with Leopold, every thing you can do, you may do it: you have a living, if you possess any peculiar talent, and there is no exclusive privilege but genius.

"The prayers offered up to God for harvests no longer bring down famine on the country. This prince has enriched the year with a great number of working days, which he has recovered from superstition, to restore them to agriculture, to the arts, and to good morals. He is occupied in a total form of his legislation. He has discovered a new light in some of the French publications, and is hastening to communicate it to the laws of Florence. He has begun by simplifying the civil, and mitigating the criminal code. Blood has not been shed on a scaffold in Tuscany for these ten years. Liberty alone is banished from the prisons, which the Grand

Grand Duke has filled with juſtice and humanity.

"The mitigation of the laws has ſoftened the manners of the people. Atrocious crimes are become rare, ſince barbarous puniſhments have been baniſhed: the priſons of Tuſcany have been empty theſe three months.

"The Grand Duke has enacted two admirable ſumptuary laws; the favours he ſhews to ſimplicity of manners, and his own example.

"When the ſun riſes on the ſtates of this prince, he finds him already occupied in the duties of his ſtation. At ſix in the morning he has wiped away many a tear. His ſecretaries of ſtate are ſo many clerks.

"The nobles think that he does not diſtinguiſh and honour them enough, the prieſts, that he does not fear them enough, the monks, that he does not enrich them enough, men in office, that he watches them too cloſely. In his territories, the magiſtrate judges, the ſoldier ſerves, the prelate reſides, and the placeman does his duty, for the prince reigns.

"His children are not brought up in a palace, but in a houſe: he endeavours to make men of them, not princes, which they are already. The education they receive makes them early acquainted with the misfortunes from which their birth exempts them. Their hearts are expoſed to every thing that can render them open to pity and beneficence.—I have ſeen in their hands the works of Locke.

"I only know," ſaid the Grand Duke one day, "two ſorts of men in my dominion, men of worth, and bad men."

"Preparations are this moment making to entertain the king and queen of Naples, a very moderate tax was propoſed to him to defray the expences of them. "My "wife," ſaid he, "has ſtill three millions "worth of jewels*."

"The Grand Duke is happy for his people are happy, and he believes in God.

"What muſt be the enjoyment of this prince, when every evening, before he ſhuts his eyes upon his people, before he allows himſelf to go to ſleep, he renders an account to the ſovereign Being of the happineſs of a million of men during the courſe of the day! Figure to yourſelf ſuch a prince, enjoying ſuch a confidence in God.

"I had almoſt forgotten an apophthegm of this modern Titus. A perſon was regretting one day before the Grand Duke, that his territories were not more extenſive. "Alas, cried he, "they "contain but too many who are wretch-"ed."

A General Deſcription of China, containing the Topography of the Fifteen Provinces which compoſe this vaſt Empire, that of Tartary, the Iſles, and other tributary Countries, &c. &c. Illuſtrated by a New and Correct Map of China, and other Copper-plates. Tranſlated from the French of L'Abbe Grozier, 2 vols 8vo 12s. G. G. J. and J. Robinſon.

THE general ſcope and deſign of this highly entertaining work was explained at large in our Review of laſt month, accompanied by ſuch extracts from the firſt volume, as appeared immediately adapted to gratify public curioſity, or capable of affording private amuſement. The ſecond volume opens with an elegant and apparently correct detail of the government, religion, manners, and cuſtoms of this vaſt and ſingular empire, and cloſes with obſervations on the extraordinary advancement which the Chineſe have made in literature, and in the arts and ſciences. It is an obſervation made by the celebrated Monteſquieu, that the laws relating to women are, in every country, more deſcriptive of the general diſpoſition and genius of the people than any other local ordinance whatever, we ſhall therefore ſelect ſuch parts of the preſent volume as relate to this intereſting ſubject. "The laws which concern marriage," ſays the Abbe Grozier, "are, in China, very extenſive.

"A Chineſe can have only one lawful wife, and it is even neceſſary that her rank and age ſhould be nearly equal to his own, but he is permitted to have ſeveral concubines, whom he may receive into his houſe, without any formality whatever. He muſt, however, firſt pay to their parents a certain ſum of money, and enter into a written engagement to treat them daughters well.

"Theſe wives of the ſecond rank are totally

totally dependant on the lawful [illegible] they are (or, at least, ought to be) always obedient to her orders. Their children are considered as her's; they address her as mother, and can give this title to her only. After her death, they are obliged to wear mourning for three years, to absent themselves from public examinations, and to resign their governments and offices. The death of their natural mother would not subject them to the observance of any of these regulations.

"A widower, or a widow, may enter a second time into the matrimonial state; but equality of age and rank are then no longer necessary conditions. The new husband may choose from among his concubines whomsoever he pleases to be his lawful wife, and, in all cases, this new marriage requires very few formalities.

"A widow who has children becomes absolute mistress of herself: her parents can neither compel her to remain in a state of widowhood, nor to enter again into that of marriage.

"Widows of moderate rank do not enjoy the same privilege when they have no male children. The parents of their first husband can place them in marriage, without their consent, and even without their knowledge. They are authorised by the law, to dispose of them in this manner, in order that they may indemnify themselves, in part, for the money they have cost their former husbands. This may be properly called, a power of selling them: however, if they are left big with child, this traffic is suspended, and it cannot take place if they bring forth a son.

"To this law there are two exceptions: the first is when the parents of the widow assign her a proper maintenance, and reimburse those of the deceased husband; the other is when the widow embraces a religious life, and becomes a bonzess.

"Divorces are granted in China, as they were among all ancient nations, but with less facility, and only in certain cases, such as, of adultery, mutual dislike, incompatibility of tempers and dispositions, indiscretion, jealousy, absolute disobedience, sterility, or of hereditary and infectious diseases.

"No husband can send away or sell his wife, until a divorce has been legally obtained and sanctioned by authority. If this regulation is not strictly observed, the buyer and seller become equally culpable.

"If a wife, who is acknowledged as lawful, withdraws privately from her [illegible] immediately flies [illegible] house is dishonoured, and she may sell the fugitive, who then ceases to be his wife, and becomes his slave.

"The law protects also every wife who is abandoned by her husband. If he absents himself for three years, she is at liberty to lay her case before the mandarins, who can authorise her to take another husband. Were she to anticipate their consent, she would be exposed to the most rigorous punishment.

"The law forbids marriage in certain circumstances, or declares it null if the parties have entered into that state contrary to what it prescribes. The following are the cases in which marriage is illegal.

"First, if a young woman has been betrothed to a young man, and if presents have been given and received by the parents of the intended husband and wife, that young woman can have no other husband.

"Secondly, If, in the room of a beautiful young woman shewn to the female confidant whose business it is to make up the match, another be substituted of a disagreeable figure; or if the daughter of a free man marry his slave, or, lastly, if any one give his slave to a free woman, and persuade her parents that he is his son or relation, the marriage is null and void; and all those who have had any share in carrying on the fraud are severely punished.

"Thirdly, Every mandarin of letters is forbid to form any alliance with any family residing in that province or city of which he may be governor. The marriage is not valid if he trespasses against this law; and he himself, besides, is condemned to be severely bastinaded.

"Fourthly, It is unlawful for any Chinese youth to enter into a state of marriage while he wears mourning either for a father or mother. If promises have been made prior to the death of his parent, every engagement ceases upon that event, and the young man is obliged to give information of it to the parents of his intended bride. The parents, however, are not on that account entirely freed from their promises. After the usual time of mourning is expired, they are obliged to write to the young man, to remind him of his engagement, but the young woman is at liberty to give a denial, in case he does not persist.

"Marriage is also suspended when a family experiences any severe misfortune: it would be even sufficient, were a near relation thrown into prison; but this regulation relation may be set aside, provided he gives his consent.

"Fifthly, Two brothers cannot espouse two sisters; a widower is not at liberty to marry his son with the daughter of the widow whom he espouses, nor is a man permitted to marry any of his own relations, however distant the degrees of consanguinity may be between them.

"This political regulation is much more necessary in an empire abounding with such an immense number of inhabitants as China, than in any other country, and every where else it ought to be considered as a very wise institution.

"Public decency has been always respected in China, because great care and attention have been employed to enforce it. Marriage—that bond so necessary, so favourable to good order, recommended and encouraged by all great legislators, is particularly protected in China. Rarely does marriage here give rise to those scandalous intrigues that so often embitter its sweets, and disturb the domestic peace of families in other countries; we may say, further, which make the state of wedlock much more dreaded than desired. The denunciations of the law against those who offend in this respect are terrible. Whoever seduces the wife of another is put to death, and the same punishment is generally inflicted on the person who debauches a young woman. It is true, that, in both these circumstances, the precautions dictated by conjugal custom tend greatly to support [illegible], and often render it superfluous.

"The Chinese women are almost condemned to perpetual imprisonment within the precincts of their own houses, and, what is still more in its favour, a Chinese enters into the married state without ever having seen the woman whom he espouses. He knows nothing of her looks or person, but from the account of some female relation or confidant, who, in such cases, acts the part of match-maker. It is true, that, if they impose upon him, either with respect to her age or figure, he can have recourse to a divorce. Here the law, in its turn, serves to correct the abuses of custom.

"The same matrons who negociate a marriage, determine also the sum which the intended husband must pay to the parents of the bride; for, in China, a father does not give a dowry to his daughter; it is the husband who gives a dowry to his wife, or, we may say with equal propriety, who purchases her.—She becomes his property, and by a double title.

"The parents of the bride fix the day for solemnizing the marriage; and they always take care to consult the calendar, in order that they may make choice of one that is lucky, for they consider some as favourable, and others unfavourable to every great undertaking. During this interval, the two families send presents to one another, and the bridegroom purchases for his intended spouse some jewels, such as rings, pendants or bracelets. Frequent letters pass between the parties; but they are not permitted to see one another: the whole treaty is carried on by the means of other people.

"When the day appointed for the ceremony arrives, the bride is placed in a chair, or close palanquin. Every thing that composes her portion is borne before and behind her by different persons of both sexes, while others surround her, carrying torches and flambeaux, even in the middle of the day. A troop of musicians, with fifes, drums and hautboys, march before her chair, and her family follow it behind. The key of the chair in which she is shut up, is committed to the care of a trusty domestic, who must deliver it to no one but to the husband only. The husband, richly dressed, waits at his gate for the arrival of the procession. As soon as it approaches, the key is put into his hands, he eagerly opens the chair, and, at the first glance, he may learn his fortune, and perceive whether those he employed have served him with fidelity. It sometimes happens, that the husband, discontented with his intended spouse, suddenly shuts the chair, and sends her back to her relations. To get rid of her, it only costs him a sum equal to that which he gave to obtain her.

"If the husband is contented, she descends from her chair, and enters the house, followed by the relations of both, where the new-married couple salute the Tien four times in the hall, and afterwards the parents of the husband. The bride is then committed into the hands of the women who have been invited to the ceremony, and who, together with her, partake of an entertainment, which continues the whole day: the male part of the guests are treated in the like manner by the husband. The same form prevails among the Chinese at all their grand feasts: the women amuse themselves separately, and the men do the same in another apartment.

"We

" We shall now speak of [illegible] marriage ceremonies which are used among people of the middling class. As the population increases according to the riches and rank of the parties, it diminishes also in the same proportion.

" We have already seen, in the Chapter of Civil Laws, that a Chinese is permitted to have only one lawful wife; but that he may, at the same time, purchase several concubines. The maxims of antiquity established this custom merely in favour of population. Every Chinese, who is desirous of keeping on good terms with his wife, pretends to be actuated by the same motive: he is particularly careful to let her know, that if he takes concubines, it is only with a view of procuring her a greater number of women to attend her.

" They are, indeed, her servants much more than rivals in authority. She has the same power over them as over the meanest domestic in the family: their children are even supposed to belong to her, and to be her own; but they have also a right to share with those born of her, in their paternal succession. If she happens to die, they are obliged to wear mourning for three years, to absent themselves from all examinations, and to resign their offices and employments. They may dispense with the observance of this regulation on the death of their real mother, but they rarely take advantage of that indulgence.

" Other husbands, desirous of having a male child, which their lawful wife cannot, perhaps, give them, take a concubine from this motive only, and dismiss her as soon as their wishes are accomplished: they then give her permission to espouse whomsoever she chooses, and often they even provide a husband for her themselves.

" A husband who becomes a widower, raises sometimes his favourite concubine to the rank of lawful wife. He is not then obliged, as in the former case, to examine whether the rank of her whom he espouses approaches near to his own, and he is also freed from the preliminary formalities, of which we have already spoken.

" These concubines are almost all procured from the cities of Yang-tcheou and Sou-tcheou, where they are educated, and taught singing, dancing and music, and every accomplishment suitable to women of quality, or which can render them agreeable and pleasing. The greater part of them are purchased in other places, to be again disposed of. This is the prin-

[illegible] law. This [illegible] to the emperor, princes of the blood, and [illegible] and nine, [illegible] emperor [illegible] more than nine.

[illegible] rank above the common. Widows marry a second time, [illegible] state of marriage when she has children. Being carry their delicacy to a much greater length: [illegible] they only betrothed, it is sufficient to make them relinquish every other engagement, if their betrothed husband happens to die before the celebration of the nuptials. Widows of ordinary rank, who have children, generally avail themselves of the liberty which is granted them, and unite themselves to another husband. Those of the poorer sort are not free to follow their own inclination: they are sold for the behoof of the parents of the deceased.—As soon as the [illegible] is concluded, a couple of porters bring a chair, which is guarded by a number of lusty people. The widow is shut up in this chair, and in that manner conducted to the house of her new husband.

" Masters, for the most part, are very desirous of promoting marriage among their slaves, whatever Mr Pauw may say, who, without any foundation, has ventured boldly to assert the contrary. They have even very strong motives to induce them to encourage these marriages: the children produced by them are still their slaves; they become new property to them, and they substitute a fresh race, which watches the brothers and fathers more and more at their service.

" The Chinese women, even those of the meanest rank, seldom quit their apartment. It is situated in the most retired part of the house; and there they live, secluded from all society but their domestics. The Book of Ceremonies requires, that there should be two apartments in every house, the exterior for the husband, and the interior for his spouse. They must even be separated by a wooden partition, or a wall, and the door must be carefully guarded. The husband is not at liberty to enter the inner apartment, nor must the wife ever quit it, without a sufficient cause. 'A wife,' adds this book, 'is not mistress of herself; she has nothing at her own disposal, she can give no orders [illegible]' the evidence of her own sentiments, as which all her authority is founded. [illegible] will appear, no doubt, extraordinary, that the same Book of Christianity rejects this practising and indulgence of adulterous women whose causes appeal unto authority a divorce.

A woman, however, cannot be repudiated, on this account, if she loses her virginity after her marriage, or if she has worn external mourning for the death of her husband, father or mother."

An Appeal to the Public, respecting George Lukins, (called the Yatton Demoniac) containing an account of his affliction and deliverance; together with a variety of circumstances which tend to exculpate him from the charge of Imposture By Joseph Easterbrook, Vicar of Temple, in the City of Bristol. Octavo. Hardsfield and Scollick, 1788.

IN two of the pamphlets now before us we have the long exploded and horrible notion of natural influence palmed upon us.—Had this most ridiculous Imposture been performed about a century ago, it would have been well timed, and have found a place in that delectable magazine of superstition, cruelty and deceit, Glanville's Sadducismus Triumphatus; but we live in a very unbelieving age, wherein stories of Witches and Demoniacs find no credit, except among those whose credit is nothing. Mr. Jeffery, by whose subaltern's thus marvellous discomfiture of Satan and his regiments is performed, is himself a great advocate for the Demonological doctrine; and undoubtedly with him and his followers, the Easter operations, and the circumcised brother, will be precious. But, alas! the true for their rejoicing on this account, is not yet come; for Mr Norman, who appears to be a man of good sense and respectable character, tells a plain and honest tale, which in our opinion fully acquits old Satan and his fix coadjuters from the very heavy charge laid against them. Indeed, we think, that too much abused personage to be of more real honour than to debase himself by assailing the body of a taylor in such an unequal manner, and more especially as the gentlemen of that profession are in general such fast friends to his interest.—On an impartial view of the whole controversy, therefore, we think the poor devils must be honourably acquitted, and we leave it to their own judgment to bring an action against the Taylor and his methodistical confederates for scandalum magnatum. The Reflector. A Selection of Essays on various Subjects of Common Life. 2 vols. 12mo. 6s. Dilly.

THE REFLECTOR is a species of the MIRROR, well framed to exhibit at every glance the features of virtue and the meanness of vice. The Author, however, has not ventured to hold up his GLASS against the bold and flagrant follies of the metropolis; but has modestly contented himself with the exposition of those minor obliquities which present themselves in rural life. "Simple and affecting," says the Author, "to their immortal honour, were the first who brought philosophy from schools and colleges to visit the drawing-room and the parlour;" and our Author, with a becoming gallantry, has wooed her "to take a trip with him towards the farm-house and the cottage," and, in our opinion, his solicitations have been in general crowned with success. Perhaps these sensible little essays would have better promoted the cause of good sense and virtue if they had been less preceptive; but they contain lessons of such pure and genuine morality, and appear to have been dictated by such a cordial spirit of philanthropy and benevolence, that the Author may with justice say he has imitated the laudable example of Thomson in not publishing

"A line which dying he might wish to blot."

The

THE ſponſors to this literary offspring of fancy have certainly made a miſtake in its name; for, if we are not greatly deceived, inſtead of an "Original" it might with much more propriety have been called an "Allegorical Tale." The characters indeed bear Eaſtern appellations, but their manners are purely European. In its allüſion to domeſtic politics, the deſcriptions of the three great leaders of the cabal immediately point out the originals they are intended to repreſent. MIRASSOUD is the ſon of a nobleman, whoſe father enjoyed power and acquired riches during the preceding reign. To the ambitious he talks of advancement, honors, and power; the avaricious are gained by munificence, and the vain are won by flattery. He had told the people, in his perſuaſive way, that their advantage was the ſole aim he had in view. Charmed by his eloquence they believed and adored him.*" which is always composed of the nobility, gentry, and beauty of that county, which for the above qualities and extent, splendour, fertility, and hospitality, well merits the epithet of the garden of England — The Dover Theatre is filled with literally the best company, and exhibits on each evening of representation as much worth, elegance and beauty, as can possibly be assembled in any private Theatre. It was called a Turkish Paradise, conveyed to Dover; but it would perhaps have been nearer the truth to say, Mr. Fector's Theatre was graced with very many of the loveliest women of this native country, which produces more beautiful females than any part of the cultivated earth; and in that country no where more abundantly than in that division of it which is called Kent. It would seem invidious to select any particular names, where general elegance and grace characterize the whole. At the last play many of the fair visitors sported yellow ribbons, which was elegantly hinted at by Mr. Gilliland in the following couplet:

" Still, proudly still the yellow Ensigns wave,
" Beauty's bright colour, guarded by the brave,"

In correspondence with this favourite line, both the livery of the servants and the lining of the Theatre were bright British blue, and Orange-yellow. The scenes, scenery and decorations are extremely pretty, and the whole entertainment conducted with that propriety, hospitality and good will, for which the family of the Fectors have ever been distinguished, from the founder of that family, Peter Fector, Esq. to the founder of the Theatrical feast I am now celebrating, William the first. Perhaps in further confirmation of this honest tribute, it ought not to be omitted that this young gentleman, in the present vacancy, was strongly solicited by the majority of constituents to represent the ancient town of Dover; which, with great modesty, he declined at present in favour of his worthy friend and school fellow Mr Pybus. There cannot be a greater proof that his virtues are equal to his genius; and that both, in the prosecution of an innocent and virtuous amusement, deserve every encouragement which can be given by the author of the Fashionable Rosciad

JANUARY 10,

MISS Wallis, a young lady who had not then attained the age of 15 years, appeared the first time at Covent Garden, in the character of Sigismunda. Her figure is of the middle size, and not inelegant. Her features are expressive, her voice pathetic and interesting, and she exhibited great marks of feeling and sensibility, in some parts so much as to impede her utterance. Her action, chiefly and deportment were peculiarly easy and graceful.

An occasional prologue was spoken by Mr Farren, the object of which was to recommend Miss Wallis to the candour and kindness of the audience.

SIR,

HORACE somewhere observes, "that the very attempt at any-thing great is a praise-worthy undertaking." Let the authority, then, of such an illustrious Author plead my excuse for endeavouring to explain a few passages in an Author still more illustrious. Great, Mr Editor, you will allow my attempt to be, after such commentators as Malone, Johnson, Steevens, &c. nevertheless, it not unfrequently happens that chance will effect as much as study and observation.

Prospero, in the "Tempest," Act 4th, Scene 1st—at the conclusion of that beautiful speech, "the cloud-capt tow'rs, &c." says, they shall all "dissolve, and, like the baseless fabric of a vision, leave not a rack behind." Wrack should be the word, (say his commentators); for what does rack mean? and wrack, in most of the editions, it is printed. "Rack" is, however, a very common word amongst the lower order of people, in the midland counties, and means those black clouds which commonly precede rain—"It will rain, for the rack goes so fast," is an usual expression with them. Shakespeare, moreover, in this, as in many others, explains one passage by another. The player, rehearsing his speech before Hamlet, says,

——"So have we seen,
Before some storm, a silence in the Heavens;
The rack stands still," &c.

"Brief as the lightning in the colly'd night," says Lysander, in "The Midsummer Night's Dream," Act 1st, Scene 2d.—Dr. Johnson would have it read coly-eyed, i. e. black ey'd, but, why alter the original word colly, which is that black kind of dust that is gather'd round pots, kettles, &c.? The "colly'd night," i. e. the black night, is, surely, a more pleasing expression than black-ey'd night, which, with the generality of readers, might carry with it too ludicrous an idea.

Lear, speaking of the cruelty of his daughters, enumerates, amongst other things, "they scant me of my feeding." This expression is by no means clear to most of Shakespeare's readers. It is a phrase taken from some of our colleges, particularly that of King's, in Cambridge: it means that portion of meat or liquor (especially the latter) which was allowed to each man as his share, &c. The expression was used long before our Author's time, and is, sometimes, even to this day.

Perhaps, Mr Editor, it may appear strange to you, that I should assert, that the scene of our Author's "As you like It" is laid in France. "There needs no ghost, my Lord, to tell us this." Yet it is still more strange (yet not less so than true) that the generality of actors, and very many others, particularly persons residing in Warwickshire, affirm, that the scene is laid in that county, viz. in the Forest of Arden, near Stratford-upon-Avon; and even Mrs Pope, who is very justly said to possess a great share of judgment, very improperly dresses the character of Rosalind in an old English habit. May I, then, be permitted first to observe, that the names of the characters are French ones, which would, of course, afford the greatest presumption; and, secondly, to point out to them the following lines, which they carelessly overlook, but which reduces the matter to a certainty.—Oliver, in Act 1st, Scene 3d, when he is cruelly depreciating the character of his brother, Orlando, to Charles the wrestler, says, "I tell thee, Charles, he is the stubbornest young fellow of France, full of ambition, &c."

The FIERY ORDEAL. A JUDICIAL ANECDOTE.

TOWARDS the end of the Greek Empire at Constantinople, a General, who was an object of suspicion to his master, was urged to undergo the fiery proof of the Ordeal by an Archbishop, a subtle courtier. The ceremony was this: three days before the trial the patient's arm was inclosed in a bag, and sealed by the royal signet, he was expected to bear a red hot ball of iron, three times, from the altar to the rails of the sanctuary, without artifice and injury. The General eluded the experiment with pleasantry. 'I am a soldier,' said he, 'and will boldly enter the lists with my accusers, but a layman, a sinner like myself, is not endowed with the gift of miracles. Your piety, holy prelate, may deserve the interposition of heaven, and from your hands I will receive the fiery globe, the test of my innocence.' The Archbishop started, the Emperor smiled, and the General was pardoned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, DEC 29

THE order of the day for taking into consideration the report of the Committee on the State of the Nation, being moved, the three Resolutions voted on Friday the 26th * were read On the first Resolution,

Lord Rawdon said he rose, not to repeat the arguments he had before submitted to their Lordships, but merely to move the amendment he had proposed in the Committee, that the mode of proceeding which he and many other noble Lords thought the safest and most constitutional might be recorded on the Journals

The amendment was negatived, and the first and second Resolutions agreed to without any debate.

The third Resolution being read,

Lord Hay (Earl of Kinnoul) rose, to protest against it as inimical to the Constitution, as tending to create a fourth estate, and to destroy that equipoise of the three branches of the legislature, by which the country had flourished for ages He touched with particular feeling on the melancholy circumstances which occasioned the interruption of the executive Government, as calling for the greatest and most respectful delicacy in their proceedings to supply the defect. He admitted the propriety of referring to precedents, because it gave solemnity to their deliberations, but contended that precedents ought not to have been produced or argued from, unaccompanied by the circumstances of the times in which they had taken place. The times were times of tumult, confusion and violence, and the precedents of such times could never be applied to times of order and tranquillity He could not admit the position, that there was no difference between an heir presumptive and an Heir Apparent An heir presumptive was one between whom and the succession another person stood, and on whom that succession might never perhaps devolve An heir presumptive therefore, if he were a man of ambition, might attempt to secure to himself the possession of that by improper means which might never become his by right, an Heir Apparent on the other hand was one who had no competitor, to whom the succession must come in the course of nature, and who therefore had no temptation to aim at securing it by indirect or violent measures It was necessary to guard against the designs of an heir presumptive, but an Heir Apparent could be liable to no suspicion except attempting to retain power after the capacity of exercising it returned to the rightful owner. He argued on the improbability of any such suspicion attaching to the Prince of Wales, whose filial duty had been displayed in so exemplary a manner, and insisted that he ought to be invested with the uncircumscribed powers of the prerogative during the continuance of his Majesty's illness. The powers of the prerogative were such as the experience of ages had shewn to be necessary for the purposes of Government; they were not a useless pageant, nor given for the benefit of the possessor, but for the interest and advantage of the nation, and could not be abridged without detriment to that interest.

Lord Kinnaird complained that the Resolution was obscure in its meaning, and wished that some noble Lord who from his official situation understood the purport of it, would explain the nature of the proceedings intended to be had in consequence of it. No explanation being given, his Lordship said, he was reduced to the necessity of arguing against surmises and conjectures none of which might have any foundation He then proceeded to consider the Resolution in various points of view as they occurred to him, and contended that in no shape whatever could their Lordships proceedings in consequence of it be reconciled to the principles of the Constitution, or the law of Parliament

The Earl of Suffolk also opposed the Resolution, and quoted De Lolme on the Constitution on the necessity of preserving the counterpoise and independence of the Three Estates of Parliament. He adverted to the intended limitations, which he considered as calculated to preserve those in power who now possessed it, and to keep out their opponents Among those who were not in power, he believed there was a much ability and character as had ever been found among any body of men, and it was the dread of their abilities, and the apprehension of their securing the exclusive possession of power to themselves, that had operated chiefly against them when they had been in office. Should the limitations be such as would oblige the Regent to retain men in office, in whom he could not place confidence, the country would soon oblige them to grant that power, which they now wished to withhold Let them be careful of Limitations that would make the Regency

an office must for a gentleman to accept.

The Duke of Norfolk wished to understand the nature of the proceedings with which it was intended to follow the Resolution. If the Prince of Wales was to be the same agent of the King, it was fit that he should be consulted. If their Lordships, as a Council, were understood to be in place of the King, they ought to be made acquainted with the consequences of the Resolution before they gave their assent to it.

The Duke of Richmond said, he could only explain as an individual what he himself understood by it; that the Great Seal was still to be put to a commission for representing the King in Parliament, and to another for giving the Royal Assent to such a bill as should be agreed on by the two Houses for settling the Regency.

Lord Porchester said, if the Keeper of the Great Seal was to be empowered to signify the will of the King, he might differ in opinion from the two Houses and in that case he was well assured from his knowledge of the noble Lord's integrity and firmness, that he would not assent to any bill that might pass. They were therefore reduced to the necessity of owning, after having declared their right, that they had no such right.

The Duke of Norfolk professed himself dissatisfied with the Duke of Richmond's explanation, and said he now rose to arraign the conduct of Ministers in not having consulted the Prince of Wales.

Lord Viscount Stormont said, there was a reason for the silence of Ministers, which they did not choose to give, and which he wished could not be given. They could not undertake to say what further was to be done, till they received their instructions from the House of Commons. He did not regret these times, in which the House of Lords had so great a preponderance in the Constitution, but he regretted that the time was past in which they sustained an equal part. It had been said to be merely accidental that their Lordships proceedings had not kept pace with those of the Commons on the present occasion, considering the superior advantages, with regard to legal information and advice, which they possessed, it would have become them to take the lead. It had been understood on Friday, that the third Resolution was to be debated on the report; but since Ministers chose to be silent, and to make no reply to the strong arguments that had been urged by noble Lords near him, he would not go at large into the question, but leave it to rest on those grounds on which it had been so ably put by those who considered it as he did. His Lordship touched on a few collateral points, and complimented the minority in which he had the honour to divide, and said, it was the most respectable both in numbers and in character he had ever witnessed in that House.

The Duke of Richmond admitted that the question was still open for discussion to any noble Lord who wished to declare his opinion; that privilege, however, was no reason for renewing the debate on a subject which had already been very fully argued on both sides. He for one thought that on their part it had been sufficiently exhausted, it would therefore be highly improper to take up the time of the House in repeating what they had already said. With regard to what fell from the noble Duke (Norfolk) he wished to say a few words, because he was anxious to do away the effect of an insinuation, which seemed to be calculated to throw odium on those with whom he acted. The noble Duke had accused them of failing in that respect which they owed to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales from not having previously communicated to him their intentions as to the measures which were the foundation of the Resolutions to which their Lordships in conjunction with the other House of Parliament had given their concurrence.—It would have been highly improper in him, or in any person to have presumed to make any such communication to his Royal Highness till they had first ascertained whether the House thought right to do so.—That right being now determined, they would of course adopt the most respectful mode of advising his Royal Highness of it, and of the steps to be taken in consequence of it.—He thought that those were no friends to their country, or to the Prince, who endeavoured to prejudice him against any set of men, on any other than public grounds, which alone ought to influence him in the choice of his political servants.

Lord King said a few words in support of the question for receiving the report, which was at length put and carried without a division, and at seven o'clock the House adjourned.

The following PROTEST was afterwards entered in the Journals:

DISSENTIENT,

1st. Because we adhere to the ancient principle recognized and declared by the act of the 13th of Charles the Second, that no act or ordinance with the force and virtue of a law can be made by either or both Houses of Parliament, without the King's assent, a principle standing as a bulwark to the people against the two Houses, as the two Houses are their security against the Crown.

2dly, Because this principle is tacitly admitted

mitted by the third Refolution, while it overthrows the practice by a ſimulate appearance of the Royal aſſent under a commiſſion to paſs bills, a commiſſion which would be inconſiſtent with the proviſions of an act of 33d Henry the Eighth, requiring that every commiſſion ſhall be ſigned by his Majeſty's hand. In our preſent unhappy ſituation that eſſential requiſite being unattainable, we cannot condeſcend to give a ſanction to a counterfeit repreſentation of the Royal ſignature, and we dare not aſſume a power to diſpenſe with the law which makes that ſignature eſſential to the validity of a commiſſion to paſs bills.

3dly Becauſe we conceive that the unqueſtionable rights of the people ſo fallaciouſly repreſented as being upheld by theſe Reſolutions, are violently infringed by an unneceſſary aſſumption on the part of the two Houſes of powers beyond thoſe which the nation has aſſigned them. Invariable practice in all good times, and poſitive laws eſtabliſhed by complete Parliaments, truly and conſtitutionally repreſenting the nation, have defined theſe powers. And we cannot but regard with the utmoſt apprehenſion any propoſal to overſtep thoſe boundaries, when the conſequence of ſuch uſurpation is ſo fatally marked in the hiſtory of our country.

4thly Becauſe it was confeſſed in the debate, that the powers of this Commiſſion were not to be confined ſolely to the act of appointing a Regent; to what other purpoſes they may extend were not explained. State neceſſity, the avowed ground of the meaſure, may ſerve as the pretext to any diminution of the juſt prerogative of the Crown, or of the liberties of the people, that beſt ſuits the deſigns of ambition. Fatal experience has ſhewn to our anceſtors the boundleſs miſchief of power thus aſſumed under plauſible appearances; and it is peculiarly the duty of the Houſe of Peers to check the renewal of the practice to aſſume the name, without the ſubſtance of the Royal Authority, by which this Houſe was once annihilated, the monarchy overthrown, and the liberties of the people ſubdued.

5thly Becauſe theſe dangerous and alarming conſequences of the meaſure adopted would have been obviated by the amendment rejected. It propoſed to ſubſtitute a meaſure conformable to the practice of our anceſtors at the glorious æra of the Revolution. They ſeized not upon public neceſſity as a convenience for the uſurpation of new power, but proceeded in a plain and explicit form to the revival of the Royal Authority with full efficacy, before they entered upon the exerciſe of their legiſlative functions. Purſuing a ſimilar courſe, the [illegible] propoſed the immediate acquieſcence of the natural repreſentative of the King, the Heir Apparent of the Crown, to whom alone it was univerſally admitted the eyes and hearts of all men, during the preſent unhappy conjuncture, were turned; that with a perfect and efficient legiſlature, ſuch future proviſions might be enacted as the preſervation of the full and undiminiſhed authority of the Crown and the Liberties of the People muſt require.

Tuesday, Dec. 30.

On account of a non-aſſemblage of the Houſe of Commons, in conſequence of the indiſpoſition of the Speaker, their Lordſhips adjourned without proceeding to ſend back the Propoſitions which had been brought up from the Commons, and agreed to by their Lordſhips.

THURSDAY, JAN. 1.

In conſequence of the Speaker's being unable to attend the Houſe of Commons, a motion was made to adjourn to Monday.

The Duke of Norfolk wiſhed to know, if that Hon. Gentleman's indiſpoſition ſhould continue, whether another adjournment would be thought neceſſary, or whether Miniſters would come forward with their propoſed plan in the preſent exigency of affairs, and not ſuffer the public buſineſs to remain unneceſſarily at a ſtand.

Lord Sydney was in hopes the Hon. Gentleman's indiſpoſition, of which he had juſt been told, would not be of that conſequence as to render any further delay neceſſary.

Lord Thurlow aſſured the noble Duke, that as far as related to himſelf, he could promiſe againſt leaſt unneceſſary delay ſhould take place, but at the ſame time, it was impoſſible fully to anſwer the noble Duke's interrogatory, becauſe other buſineſs might poſſibly become neceſſary, ſuch, for inſtance, as the neceſſity of chooſing a new Speaker it was neceſſary their Lordſhips having agreed with them Reſolutions ſhould be made known, forms required it, and it muſt be done. He thought the ſooner an end was put to the buſineſs the better; and if it was intended to bring forward any farther debate, he was ready to meet it, becauſe ſeveral points might be cleared up, which, by accident once or more occaſion, ſeemed not to be underſtood The earlieſt moment he could promiſe the noble Duke, as far as he knew, was intended to be taken; for although he had received accounts from another quarter of a very favourable kind, yet they did not come up to his wiſhes, nor was he able to pronounce an early period as likely to bring forward the ardently prayed for recovery Thus he thought he had given the noble Duke the required information; at leaſt, he had done it, as far as was in his power.

The Duke of Norfolk had no other motive for putting his queſtion than to hint it as his opinion, that all unneceſſary delays ought to be avoided, and that that Houſe and the public were entitled to a knowledge of the intentions of Adminiſtration

The Houſe then adjourned to

MONDAY, Jan 5

Their Lordſhips diſpatched two Maſters in Chancery with a meſſage to the Houſe of Commons, intimating that they wiſhed to have a conference with that Houſe in the Painted Chamber, on the ſame ſubject which had been the baſis of the conference holden between the two Houſes on Tueſday the 23d of December laſt

The meſſengers returned with an anſwer, that the Commons had agreed to the conference.

The Houſe then proceeded to appoint the following noble Lords as a Committee to confer with the Commons: Earl Camden, Lord Preſident—Marquis of Stafford, Lord Privy Seal—The Duke of Richmond—The Marquis of Carmarthen—The Biſhop of London—The Marquis Townſhend—Earl Bathurſt—Earl Morton—Lord Howard de Walden—Lord Sydney—Lord Hawkeſbury—Lord Cheſterfield.

Sir Francis Molyneux came to the Bar, and informed the Houſe that the Commons were waiting in the Painted Chamber Upon which the Lords of the Committee withdrew; and after the uſual ceremony, the Lord Preſident informed the Commons, that they had agreed to the three Reſolutions reſpecting his Majeſty's ſtate of health, and the means of ſupplying the executive power

Lord Camden and the other Lords then returned into the Houſe; and the Lord Chancellor put the queſtion of adjournment till Monday, which was agreed to.

At four the Chancellor took his ſeat, and prayers were read by the Biſhop of Cheſter. About 20 Peers were preſent

Earl Suffolk called the attention of their Lordſhips to a ſubject of the higheſt importance It was at this time generally underſtood, that by an examination which exiſted at the preſent moment, before a Committee of another Houſe, a variety of particulars had tranſpired reſpecting his Majeſty's preſent ſtate of health, which were highly intereſting to the public His Lordſhip therefore came down with intention to move, that the phyſicians might be re examined at the bar of the Houſe, but as there was not ſo full an attendance as might have been expected, he would not attempt to take the Houſe by ſurprize, but give notice, that he ſhould on Wedneſday next move, that the phyſicians might be again examined before the whole Houſe at the bar, and all ſtrangers to be excluded

The Lord Chancellor obſerved, that he could not at preſent ſee any particular objection to the motion It was certainly neceſſary that noble Lords ſhould be fully ſatisfied, before they made up their minds upon the important ſteps which muſt ſpeedily be taken The better way would be, to adjourn to Wedneſday next, and order the Houſe to be ſummoned The queſtion was put to adjourn to Wedneſday Ordered—Adjourned

WEDNESDAY, Jan 14

The Earl of Suffolk, who gave notice on Monday laſt that he would this day move for the examination of his Majeſty's phyſicians at their Lordſhips bar, roſe and obſerved, that as he underſtood his intended motion would be objected to by ſome noble Lords, he would deſiſt from the idea of making it

The Houſe then adjourned to

TUESDAY, Jan 20

The Houſe met purſuant to their laſt adjournment

A meſſage from the Commons was delivered at their Lordſhips' bar by Mr Wilberforce, attended by ſeveral Members, demanding a conference, this was agreed to by their Lordſhips, and the Committee appointed met in the Painted Chamber, conſiſting of the ſame noble Lords who had managed the former conferences

The Committee being returned, the Lord Preſident of the Council, as Chairman of the Committee,

Committee, acquainted their Lordſhips, that the Commons had preſented certain Reſolutions as paſſed by them, for the Regulation of the Regency, and moved that the ſame be taken into conſideration on Thurſday next.

Lord Rawdon expreſſed his diſapprobation of the delay of even one day on a ſubject which, from its magnitude, did not warrant that of one hour more, eſpecially as from the length of time elapſed ſince it had been firſt ſtarted, not only their Lordſhips, but the world at large, had ſufficient time to make up their minds

Lord Camden agreed, that ſuch of their Lordſhips as had attended its diſcuſſion in another Houſe might have made up their minds; but as many of their Lordſhips certainly did not, if they ſhould demand two days inſtead of one to deliberate with themſelves, he did not know how he could object to their requeſt

The Lord Chancellor wiſhed to know whether Lord Rawdon objected to the motion or not, and, if he did, what amendment he ſhould propoſe.

Lord Rawdon declared he did not mean to oppoſe the motion, but to expreſs his diſapprobation of the delay

The motion was then put and carried It was then reſolved, that their Lordſhips do on Thurſday reſolve themſelves into a Committee on the State of the Nation; and that the Reſolutions from the Commons be referred to the ſaid Committee It was alſo ordered, that their Lordſhips be ſummoned for that day

Lord Pomfret took the oaths and his ſeat

The order of the day being read for their Lordſhips reſolving themſelves into a Committee on the State of the Nation, the Houſe immediately reſolved itſelf into a Committee, Lord Walſingham in the chair

The Lord Preſident (Camden) then roſe to open the buſineſs on which their Lordſhips had met He lamented that ſo heavy and important a taſk ſhould have fallen on Miniſters, and that he was choſen to open the buſineſs to their Lordſhips.——As it had however, ſo fallen, he would, though he felt himſelf inadequate to the taſk, proceed to open as plainly as he poſſibly could, the Reſolutions that were to be ſubmitted to their Lordſhips —His Lordſhip then ſhortly noticed his Majeſty's incapacity, and the undoubted Right which had been decided on, reſting with the two Houſes of Parliament to ſupply the deficiency, by appointing whom they thought proper, how many they thought proper, and with what power they thought proper, as the exerciſe of the preſent dormant power of the executive branch of the Legiſlature.—His Lordſhip ſtated the caſe of his Majeſty's illneſs, according to the laſt opinion, but temporary; that they were therefore to provide the temporary means of ſupplying that deficiency by providing for the neceſſary exerciſe of the Royal authority, and for the ſafety of his Majeſty on his throne. The Reſolutions that were to be offered to their Lordſhips, he ſaid, were calculated for thoſe two purpoſes; they would provide fully for the exerciſe of the executive power withreſpect, as well as for the ſafety and reſpect that was juſtly due to the Sovereign

His Lordſhip ſaid, he would not trouble their Lordſhips on that part of the Reſolutions which gave the care of the King's perſon to her Majeſty, not conceiving that any noble Lord would make the leaſt objection to ſuch a meaſure He had heard elſewhere, reports of the impropriety of ſuch a truſt, and had heard reflections thrown on that great perſonage; but as he was convinced every noble Lord would feel, with him, that thoſe reflections were illiberal, indecent, and unnatural, he would ſay nothing on the ſubject The Reſolutions that he expected to be oppoſed were, the one for limiting his Royal Highneſs in the exerciſe of the prerogative of creating Peers, and that of the continuance of the houſehold offices under the direction of her Majeſty. His Lordſhip entered into the propriety of thoſe Reſolutions, ſtating the danger of entruſting the power of creating Peers to any but the Sovereign, who had a life intereſt in the government, which it could not be expected he would injure by beſtowing ſuch too lavish a hand thoſe honours. There could, he ſaid, no danger ariſe from the ſuſpenſion, for a ſhort time, of that power, as no merit need be deſpaired for during the Regency, if any one was ſo diſtinguiſhed by his merits in any department, as to be a worthy object of ſuch honour, he could be made a Peer by an Act of Parliament, ſigned by the Regent, as Sir John Cromwell was created in the reign of Hen. VI After arguing ſhortly on the propriety of the Houſehold completely reſting in the governance of her Majeſty, to enable her to diſcharge the duties of her truſt; he ſaid, the only argument that turned againſt it was, that it would create an oppoſite influence, and that the new Government would be unable to proceed in public buſineſs without having the patronage of thoſe officers, the Lords of the Bedchamber, &c This argument his Lordſhip ſaid was truly abſurd and ridiculous, for would any noble Lord ſeriouſly contend, that without ſuch an inſignificant number of votes an administration could not proceed in public business. Would they say that the patronage of the Navy, of the Army, of the Church of the Law, of the Customs, and of the Excise, and other considerable patronage that would be annexed to the Regency, would not be sufficient to enable a new Administration to carry on the government, unless they also had the addition of a paltry twelve or fourteen votes? If their administration were conducted for good and beneficial principles to the country, no such votes would be necessary; but if on the contrary, they pursued prejudicial and bad measures, not ten times the number, would protect them from the voice and influence of the people.

He deprecated any change in the management of any part of the household, not only as highly disrespectful to his Majesty, but dangerous, for, said his Lordship, if those whom his Majesty has appointed as the heads of different departments in his household should be removed, to make room for others whose faces he had never seen, or never wished to see, it might be the means of invading his royal chamber, of indirectly taking possession of his person, and they might strip his palace of every thing valuable, and every thing held dear. Another argument he read had been used against substituting the patronage of these offices in the household with her Majesty, fearing it would be exercised in favour of an Opposition. This he said was not likely, for no one would believe that that great and amiable personage would permit the use of her power against the good government of her son. It was also unlikely from another reason, the improbability of those with whom he read entering into an opposition to the interests of that country they had exerted themselves in support of; they would not degrade themselves by forming an unprincipled and vindictive Opposition, they had not, while in office, done any act to create a want of popularity; they had had in all their measures the voice of the people, they had exerted themselves successfully for their interests, they had been crowned with their plaudits; and in their last act were they exerting themselves for the rights of the people. It was then very improbable, that after having been so long in possession of the peoples love of the people, they would destroy it by an opposition, shewing that they acted upon other motives than those of the public good. His Lordship after a few more observations upon the propriety of the Resolutions, concluded by moving the Resolutions to be read, which being read accordingly, the first Resolution was put,

"That it is the opinion of the Committee, "to agree with the Resolution, That for the "purpose of providing for the exercise of "the King's Royal Authority during the "continuance of his Majesty's illness in such "manner, and to such extent as the present "circumstances of the urgent concerns of the "Nation appear to require, it is expedient "that his Royal Highness the Prince of "Wales, being resident within the Realm, "shall be empowered to exercise and administer the Royal Authority according to "the Laws and Constitution of Great Britain, in the name, and on the behalf of his "Majesty, under the style and title of REGENT of the Kingdom: and to use, exercise, and perform in the name, and on "the behalf of his Majesty, all authorities, "prerogatives, acts of government, and administration of the same which belong to "the King of this Realm to use, execute, "and perform according to the law thereof, "subject to such limitations and exceptions "as shall be provided."

Lord Hawkesbury rose with some warmth to expostulate upon those words fallen from the noble and learned Lord, who had said that the votes of the Lords of the Bedchamber were insignificant, and unworthy consideration. He was a Lord of the Bedchamber, he considered his vote as worth, consideration, and as worthy respect as any noble Lord's in that House, he had given his support to the present Administration, but he had given them that support from principle and honour, and in no other manner would he ever give his vote.

The Lord President was extremely concerned that the noble Lord had taken offence at any thing that had fallen from him, he meant no disrespect to the noble Lord, he knew both his Lordship and his noble colleagues possessed too much honour for a moment to be influenced in their votes by the offices they held.

The Bishop of Landaff next rose, and in a speech of some length stated his objections to the Resolutions in the whole, being against all restrictions on the executive power.

The subject now under their consideration was confessedly of the greatest importance, and when he spoke upon any philosophical or political questions, he wished rather to be diffident than dogmatical.—He by no means thought that their proceedings in appointing a Regent, had been regular or constitutional. The only proper way, he conceived, of filling up the third branch of the Legislature was, not by clothing his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with the whole of the regal power, but by first giving him the power of Legislation, and then those Restrictions ſtrictions which they had heard of, might have been propoſed. This his Lordſhip conceived to be the method the two Houſes of Parliament ought to have followed, in appointing a Regent. He ſaid, he ſhould begleave to ſtate a propoſition, in which he hoped all their Lordſhips would concur. The propoſition was this,—That the power of the King was originally delegated from the people, and when the King was unable to exerciſe the power, it returned back to the people again, ſo that they had it in their own hand, and might give it to any perſon they pleaſed. Upon ſuch a general principle he ſaid, the determination of the Houſe of Commons, that the Prince of Wales had no better right to the Regency than any other perſon, might be juſtified. But he begged leave to ſay, that this principle was not true, with reſpect to our government, becauſe the Law and the conſtitution ſay, when the King dies, his power does not revert back to the people, but goes to the next heir—he has a right to ſucceed to it. Although a great deal had been ſaid about the word 'Right,' in theſe proceedings, yet he did not recollect that any noble Lord had given a definition of it. He ſaid, he ſhould mention that of Coke, who defined "Right to be the morally poſſeſſing a thing in conformity to law." There was another definition of this word, by an author of no leſs authority than that of Grotius, which was, that "Right" was the morally poſſeſſing a thing not inconſiſtent with law. His Lordſhip ſaid, he ſhould be glad to hear of any law that was inconſiſtent with the Prince of Wales being Regent, or that would be violated by ſuch an appointment.

Lord Sandwich ſpoke particularly againſt the reſtricting the Prince making Peers, which he ſaid was damping merit by drying up the fountain of honour. He propoſed by way of amendment, that the words "for a time to be limited" be added to the reſtrictions.

The firſt Reſolution was then agreed to, and the ſecond being read, "that his Royal Highneſs ſhould not have the power of creating any Peers, except the ſons of his Majeſty having attained the full age of twenty-one years," the queſtion was put on Lord Sandwich's amendment, "for a time to be limited."

Lord Sydney oppoſed the amendment upon the ground of the impoſſibility of fixing any time.

Lord Carliſle was againſt the whole of the reſtrictions, which went, he ſaid, to create a weak Government and a ſtrong Oppoſition. He ſupported the amendment, wiſhing that part of the evil of the reſtrictions might be done away by their being limited. He ſpoke ſharply on the impriſtice of ſuſpending the prerogative of creating Peers; and noticing what had fallen from a noble and learned Lord (Camden) of the Parliament bringing in a Bill for creating a Peer, declared ſuch remedy to be worſe than the diſeaſe, and in his opinion very unconſtitutional. Such doctrine being held by ſo great a character as the noble and learned Lord, of the two Houſes having the power of creating Peers was ſo contrary to every thing he had underſtood of the principles of the Conſtitution, that he called on the noble and learned Lord for an explanation.

* The Lord Preſident ſaid, the noble Lord had miſconceived him; he did not ſay the two Houſes of Parliament could create a Peer, but that the Parliament could—the whole Legiſlature, conſiſting of the three branches.

Lord Carliſle was ſtill diſſatisfied, he conſidered the explanation to be equally unconſtitutional.

Lord Fitzwilliam ſaid, by the doctrine of the noble and learned Lord (Preſident) he could not know whether he was not ſpeaking in a Republic.

* The Lord Preſident again roſe to explain; he was as much averſe to republican principles as his Lordſhip.

Lord Portcheſter ſaid, he trembled at ſuch unconſtitutional doctrine, and at the effects that might be expected from ſuch meaſures. He condemned the conduct of Miniſters, if they could call themſelves Miniſters; he did not conceive them ſuch; he conſidered them as uſurping the power of Miniſters.—Here he was called to order by

* The Marquis of Carmarthen, who ſaid that ſuch words were diſorderly; Miniſters had not uſurped authority, they were placed in office by their Sovereign, and were diſcharging their truſts.

Lord Portcheſter explained his meaning of their having uſurped, and again inſiſted that they had uſurped authority, acting at the moment of the incompetency of him from whom they had received their authority.

The Lord Preſident roſe again, and declared, that as he had been ſo unfortunate as not to have made himſelf intelligible by his explanations, he begged to declare at once, that the unconſtitutional doctrines he had been ſaid to have advanced, he wholly diſavowed, and retracted every thing bearing the leaſt reſemblance to what he had been conceived.

Lord Loughborough ſaid a few words againſt the reſtriction from creating Peers, denying the poſſibility of bringing a ſingle precedent in ſupport of the ſuſpenſion of that prerogative.

The Lord Chancellor declared that the whole Legislature had created Peers, and that there were various instances where Peers had been made by Parliament. His Lordship said, it would not fit still under the charge of unpatriotic. He called on that noble Lord, if he had a charge to make, to come forward and make it boldly, and like a man he would be met.

Lord Stormont's speech went to prove the unconstitutional doctrine of fettering the Regency—and the impropriety of denying the right of granting Peerage.—He made a calculation of those granted by the present King, and thence deduced, that according to Lord Camden's doctrine, his Majesty on an average had compleated his number.

Lord Stormont then took up his argument again, and went on for some considerable time, travelling through the history of England, and now and then introducing the Duke of Grafton, and other persons, whose situations were not inapplicable to the support of his Lordship's argument.

The Lord Chancellor replied in a manly speech, taking up the business as it arose. He defended the principles laid down by Lord Camden, and was peculiarly happy in several of his remarks. Among other matters, he said, the honour of Peerage was indeed often forgot, in the gratitude that was due to the donor—for the opinion when the wax was warm that sealed the patent, often changed before its coldness in the next session of Parliament. There was a hear, hear on this echoed from the members of Opposition, to which his Lordship facetiously said "that applause was as obnoxious to him as interruption" (alluding to Lord Porchester's having before improperly called him to order).—The learned Lord asserted, that the Prince of Wales and the Queen were on the best of terms, and that it was only those who wished differences that published the contrary—nay, he would go further, and give it as his opinion, that whatever influence her Majesty possessed would naturally be given to her son, in forwarding all such measures as tended to the benefit of the empire. The learned Lord then seconded the amendment, and pointed out its incongruity.

The question was at length put by the Chairman on the amendment, "That the words be added to the question," when the Committee divided,

The Committee then adjourned the further consideration of the two remaining Resolutions, and rose at twelve o'clock.

FRIDAY, Jan. 23.

The order of the day being read, for their Lordships going into a Committee on the adjourned consideration of the Resolutions from the Commons, Lord Walsingham took the chair.

The third Resolution was then read, restraining his Royal Highness from the power of alienating, by grant, reversion, patent place, annuity for life, &c.

Lord Stormont rose for the purpose of supporting an amendment similar to that moved by a noble Lord (Sandwich) the night, and moved that the words be added "for a time to be limited."

Lord Camden spoke against the amendment, on the conviction of its impropriety.—He entered into the necessity of limitations upon the Regent on the ground of the Regent not being entitled to the rights of the Sovereign.

Lord Rawdon said, that their Lordships were called upon to come forward with provisions for the executive authority, which was unfortunately suspended, they were in duty, he conceived, bound to act lest the executive authority, if they conceived the royal authority too confined for the public benefit, they ought to come forward with a distinct Resolution, leading to a decision on that subject, and not to take the advantage of the moment to fetter with the royal authority. The power of the executive branch of the legislature, his Lordship said, was essential to act against the powers of the two Houses, and thereby to form an equilibrium, which equilibrium was sacred to the Constitution. He defied the noble Lord to shew a good reason for the abridgement of the powers or prerogative which with common propriety be invariably vested with the executive authority; they might not, they could not make such alteration without being as solemn, as strong, and as decided an opinion by the mass of the people, as was had at the time of the Revolution. The absolute question that his Lordship conceived to be before the House was, whether the executive power should or should not be changed? He was against not only the present limitations proposed, but against every limitation, being convinced that they were unwise in policy and indecent to an individual.—His Lordship said it was ridiculous to argue that all the present restrictions must go that the king, action to be throne would be invaded, for, said his Lordship, was a vote of that, or of the other House, which could prevent the Sovereign, who worthily reigned in the hearts of his people, from assuming his throne whenever God should again give him the capacity? No, if the two Houses should adopt such a measure the public would step in, and correct such determination. His Lordship, speaking of the last Resolution to be proposed, said, that as it contained three distinct propositions, it ought to be separated, that each proposition might be fully and fairly decided upon. The latter part he said provided a Council, and before he conceived their Lordships ought to agree to that proposition, it ought to be stated to their Lordships of whom that Council was to be composed. . .

The Marquis of Carmarthen agreed that the Kingly powers were vested in the Sovereign for the benefit of the people, but from that it did not follow by any means that when the King was, by a temporary infirmity, rendered incapable of the exercise of his sovereign powers, that they should devolve to another, and that the person appointed to the exercise of the sovereign authority should be vested with every degree of that splendor which belonged to the King, and to the King alone. His Lordship could not agree with the assertion that the constitution was injured by the restriction, on the contrary, he considered them not only strictly proper, and beneficial to the country, but constitutional.

The Marquis Townshend was against the Resolution as tending to cause division.

The Duke of Chandos spoke in support of the Resolution, and against the amendment. He assured their Lordships that he would much rather deliver up his office, which he was ready to do, than be suspected of being influenced by it in his vote, he had never connected himself with any Administration from the time he had first come into that House to the present moment. He had supported the present Administration from principle, an Administration that had rendered the greatest services to their country, an Administration which could boast of an heaven-born Minister.

The question was put upon the amendment, which being rejected, the original question was carried without a division.

The fourth Resolution was next put, preventing the power of the Prince of Wales over the real or personal property of the King.

Lord Loughborough opposed it upon the ground of conveying an indecent and unjust suspicion of the Prince of Wales, which ought not to be suffered to go forth to the public.

Lord Kenyon spoke in support of the Resolution; the King, he said, had a right to transfer forfeited estates, his copyholds, &c. and it would not be fit that that power should be given to any other.

Lord Loughborough asked whether there was any noble Lord that would suggest the probability of his Royal Highness, without the limitation, attempting to sell any of his father's possessions? And if no such probability existed, where was the necessity for the restriction?

The Lord Chancellor said, he could not consider the restrictions as reflections on the Prince of Wales. If he considered them on the ground of the necessity of providing against the Prince of Wales, he should give his vote against them all, for he was so convinced of the goodness of his heart, that were he to be entrusted with the most unlimited power, no degree of danger of an ill use of it might be expected.

Lord Loughborough was still of opinion that it was unnecessary, that it tended to no-thing but a reflection upon the Prince, affirming that unless he was restricted he would dispose of his father's property.

The Lord Chancellor said the Resolution was not to be admitted as a personal restriction, but as a general provision.

The question was then put upon the Resolution, and carried without a division.

The 5th and last Resolution was next put, giving her Majesty the care of the King's person, giving her the power over the Household, and for providing her with a Council.

Lord Rawdon remarked, that the two first propositions contained in the Resolution, ought in discussion to be separately considered. He would therefore move, to have them separately taken into consideration; but the mode proposed was combated by the Chancellor, as not being either formal or proper.

Lord Loughborough, on the contrary, contended, that a Resolution sent from the Commons in a complex form, ought, for the sake of perspicuity of discussion, to be divided.

The Lord Chancellor reprobated the attempt made to separate the propositions, which ought on every point of view to be united. Could it be supposed that their Lordships, who consented to the Q. having the custody of the K.'s person, would wish that her M. should not have command of his household? Was it the wish, that his Majesty in his present calamitous situation, should be completely abandoned, and bereaved of those comforts which the dignity of his station entitled him to enjoy? If her Majesty jesty was not authorized to controul the Household, what provision was to be made for her superintendance of the King's person? Was the Monarch to be put upon board wages? Was he to be consigned to obscurity? or placed in an asylum where those unfortunately afflicted with a similar malady were to be found?

Lord Rawdon declared great veneration for the King, as well as extreme regret at his Majesty's present situation, and positively denied that he intended, by dividing the Resolution, that the Sovereign should be left without proper support and dignity.

The Lord Chancellor maintained what he would never retract, that the Second Proposition was a counterpart to the First, and that they could not be distinctly considered, without leaving the King in that lowest, abandoned, and wretched state, in which no loyal subject of the realm would suffer him for a moment to remain.

Lord Stormont argued the question at great length; and contended the establishment of the Household, under the direction of the Queen, was a dangerous and unprecedented attempt to divide the executive authority.

The Lord Chancellor concluded for the necessity of this establishment remaining with the Queen, and said the powers with which the Regent was to be invested, were adequate to every purpose of the Executive Government.

After Lord Amherst had spoke a few words against the Resolution, the House divided,

The following Protest was afterwards entered on the Journals.

Dissentient,

1st. Because we firmly adhere to the principles and arguments on which we disapproved the Resolutions formerly passed by this House, especially when the legislative power of the two Houses of Parliament, unconstitutionally assumed by those Resolutions, is meant to be employed to restrict or suspend many important and essential branches of the Royal power, at the moment of the declared incapacity of the King.

2dly, Because we think the power of conferring the rank and privileges of the Peerage, as a reward to merit, is necessary to the Royal authority, in order to afford an incitement to vigorous exertions in the service of the State, and is more peculiarly necessary (like all other parts of the prerogative) when the Regal power is to be exercised by a substitute, with an authority uncertain and precarious in its duration; but especially on the present occasion, when it is the only branch of the prerogative sufficiently powerful to afford a remedy against such a combination in this House, as other parts of this system of restriction and mutilation have a natural and obvious tendency to produce.

And because we conceive that this restriction may create an interest in the Members of this House, to withhold their assent to restore the ancient power of the Crown in this respect.

3dly Because we conceive, that by the subsisting law of the land his Majesty's property is sufficiently secured from any undue disposition and alienation, and the resolution on that subject can have no other effect but to convey to the public injurious suspicions and unjust imputation on the character and intentions of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

4thly Because we are of opinion, that in order to maintain the proper dignity of the crown, and preserve the due influence and respect which arises from the Great Officers of State, it is necessary that the person exercising the Royal authority in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, should be attended by those distinguished servants whose functions have been established for the purpose of adding weight and splendour to the regal office. We cannot agree to a division of the Royal power to the creation of a fourth estate, unknown to the constitution of the country.

PRAYERS were read at the uſual time; but, as no buſineſs was expected to be done in the Houſe before the Lords had agreed to the report of the three Reſolutions*, very few Members came down At four o'clock the Speaker could reckon only twenty-two Members preſent; in conſequence of which he adjourned the Houſe till

TUESDAY, DEC 30

As ſoon as forty Members had aſſembled (which was about four o'clock) Mr Hatſell, the Clerk, gave them notice, that he had juſt received a letter from the Speaker, intimating, that he was ſo much indiſpoſed as to be unable to come down to the Houſe this day, but hoped that he ſhould be ſufficiently recovered by to-morrow, as to be capable of attending in his place.

Mr Steele then roſe, and adverting to the Speaker's indiſpoſition, remarked, that it was hardly probable, from what he had heard of the matter, that he would be able to attend, with convenience to himſelf or regard to his health, before Thurſday He would therefore move, that the Houſe do now adjourn to Thurſday next, which was inſtantly agreed to

The Speaker's indiſpoſition ſtill continuing, a ſufficient number of Members did not come down to form a Houſe The laſt adjournment, therefore, ſtand over to the day following.

FRIDAY, JAN 2.

At four o'clock, upwards of 150 members had taken their places

Mr. Hatſell, the Clerk, then addreſſed the Houſe in theſe words, viz "It is with extreme concern that I inform you of a melancholy event which happened this morning—I mean the death of Mr Speaker"

He then deſired the Serjeant at Arms to bring in the mace

Mr Roſe expreſſed his hopes, that after the unpleaſing intelligence which they had juſt received, no gentleman would object to an adjournment till Monday next

Mr Vyner wiſhed that precedents might be conſulted, as he doubted whether the Clerk had power to adjourn the Houſe for more than one day

Mr Hatſell immediately read an extract from the Journals, ſpecifying that, on the 15th of December, 1783, the Clerk, in the abſence of the Speaker, had adjourned the Houſe for two days

Mr Roſe was again on his legs, to ſuggeſt the propriety of taking into conſideration, on Monday next, the appointment of a new Speaker

The queſtion was then put by the Clerk, on the motion of Mr Roſe, that this Houſe do now adjourn till Monday; which was readily agreed to.

The Miniſter having made his appearance in the Houſe about four o'clock, Mr. Hatſell, the Clerk, directed the Serjeant at Arms to bring in the mace, and place it under the table, as is the cuſtom when there is no Speaker in the chair

The Earl of Euſton immediately roſe, and expreſſed his regret for the unexpected death of Mr Cornwall, the late Speaker He ſaid he ſhould not detain the Houſe long with the remarks he ſhould make in recommendation of an Hon Gentleman whom he would now propoſe to fill the vacant chair The gentleman he alluded to was Mr William W. Grenville, who, he ſaid, was poſſeſſed of ſuch ſhining abilities, ſuch ſtrength of mind and conſtitution, ſuch a fund of legal as well as parliamentary knowledge, ſo great a degree of aſſiduity and attention to buſineſs, and in particular, of ſuch an acquaintance with, and attachment to, the principles of our excellent conſtitution, that there could be no doubt of his being fully competent to the diſcharge of all the duties of the high office which was now to be filled; an office always weighty and arduous, but which was now rendered particularly ſo by the very intereſting predicament in which public affairs now ſtood He would therefore preſume to offer this gentleman to the Houſe as a proper object of their choice, not only on account of his public character, but alſo of his private one, which was of ſuch a deſcription as to add more merit to his general reputation He concluded with moving, "That the Right Hon W Wyndham Grenville be appointed to fill the Speaker's chair"

Mr Pultney had great ſatisfaction in ſeconding the noble Lord's motion for the nomination of Mr Grenville He had long regarded that gentleman with eſteem—he had remarked his good ſenſe and abilities, his accuracy of argumentation, his conſiderable knowledge of the laws of the kingdom, his hereditary attachment to thoſe conſtitutional principles which ought to influence every member of the Houſe, his great candour and moderation and his converſance with the uſages and forms of Parliament. His amendments to the bill brought in by his father (the late Mr. George Grenville) for the determination of controverted elections, formed an early proof of great talents, and application. For these reasons, he hoped the House would concur in the appointment of Mr Grenville.

Mr Welbore Ellis was disposed to lament the peculiar situation of the House, arising from two events, the deficiency of a regular opening, and the death of their late worthy Speaker: he lamented the time that had been lost in unnecessary debates, instead of proceeding with the dispatch necessary to fill up the government. Under the present circumstances he agreed that the usual forms in electing a Speaker, could not be adopted: they were, therefore, justified in proceeding immediately to a choice.—He joined in every tribute of applause offered to the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr Grenville), and was ready to pay him every respect, he meant, therefore, no offence to that gentleman, by the amendment he meant to propose to the motion, by offering his friend Sir Gilbert Elliot to the House, as a proper person to fill the important office of Speaker: to his abilities and eloquence the whole House could bear testimony, he had known him from his boyish days; he knew his zeal for the constitution, and for the privileges of that House; he knew his great legal knowledge, his eloquence, his ability, his modesty, and his general merit; and considering him in every degree qualified for the office of Speaker, he moved, by way of amendment, that the words "the Right Hon William Wyndham Grenville" be omitted, and the words "Sir Gilbert Elliot" inserted.

Mr Frederic Montagu seconded the amendment proposed by the Hon. Gentleman who spoke last. He entered into a panegyric very similar as to the merit and qualifications of Sir Gilbert Elliot, of whose talents, learning, eloquence, and acquaintance with the customs of Parliament, and the laws of the realm, he spoke in high terms.

Mr Grenville next rose, and remarked, that, whatever might be the decision of the House, he should ever consider himself as having been highly honoured by having been thought fit to fill the chair by persons of such high character as the noble Lord and the Hon. Gentleman who seconded the motion.—He considered the importance of the office, which was greatly increased in the present moment, when subjects of such delicacy and great weight was to be discussed. He trembled for his inexperience, and his inability to discharge the duties of that high office: he hoped therefore the House would turn their eyes to the Hon. Baronet, opposite him, (Sir Gilbert Elliot) or to some other Gentleman more qualified to fill the chair than he felt himself to be, by which, he assured them, they would relieve his mind from much anxiety and embarrassment.

Sir Gilbert Elliot felt himself highly honoured by the flattering marks of respect he had received from his two honourable friends (Messrs Ellis and Montagu). He felt the great importance of the office to which he had been nominated, the duty of the person filling the chair, was not merely to preserve decency and order, and to observe the proceedings of the House, there was a much higher duty, the duty of asserting the privileges of that House there and elsewhere, as necessity might serve, privileges of the greatest importance to Parliament, and to the liberties and happiness of the people.—He felt his inadequacy to the office, when he considered its duties, and important trusts, and turned his eyes upon himself, he was convinced of the great disproportion of his abilities to the discharge of the office: while there were men of such great legal knowledge, and superior abilities in the House, he could not think of taking the office; if none of those to whom he alluded, should be named, he begged to assure the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr Grenville) that he should have his most hearty suffrage.

The House then divided, when there appeared for Mr Grenville,

Ayes	—	215

Mr Grenville was accordingly seated in the chair.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer now moved, that the House should to-morrow resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the nation. If that motion should be agreed to, he would in that Committee propose measures for providing for the exercise of the executive Government. The motion was agreed to nem. con.

New writs were ordered to be issued for the county of Surry, in the room of the Hon. William Norton, now Lord Grantley, for Dover, vacated by the death of the Hon. James Luttrell, for Rye, vacated by the Right Hon. Charles Wolfran Cornwall, Esq the Speaker, deceased, and for the county of Banff, vacated by Sir James Duff's having accepted the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.

TUESDAY, JAN 6.

The new Speaker took the chair about four o'clock.

The question being put, that the order of the day, for a Committee on the state of the nation, be read,

Mr Loveden rose, and, after prefacing his speech with declarations of his perfect independence, observed, that he was not perfectly satisfied with the idea of proceeding to the establishment of the Regency, without a previous inquiry into the present state of his Majesty's health. The report of the Physicians had been delivered about a month ago; and it was possible, that from what had occurred in the time which had since elapsed, a better decision might be formed respecting the probability of the King's recovery. He would therefore propose, that the Royal Physicians be again examined, before any further steps should be taken in the restoration of the government. With regard to the limitation of the Regent's authority, it was not improbable that the plan which might be proposed by the Right Hon. Gentleman in for that purpose would greatly depend on this alternative, whether it was, in his opinion, likely that the King would shortly recover, or might not be restored to sanity of intellect for a long time. This circumstance gave additional force to the motion he would now make, for another examination of the Physicians.

The Speaker intimated to him, that the motion for reading the order of the day must first be put.

Mr Hussey asked, whether any gentleman had moved the order of the day, to which the Speaker replied in the affirmative.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was very unwilling that any further delay should be made in the settlement of the Regency, unless there were strong and evident grounds for it. For his part, he did not see any necessity for making any further enquiry into the state of his Majesty's health. It had been sufficiently proved, that the King was incapable of attending to public business, and that datum alone was an adequate ground for the two Houses to proceed without delay in taking measures for restoring energy and effect to the government. He felt the pressure of the present exigency in its full force, and was sensible of the misfortune of being in an official situation at this moment. He therefore wished that no time might be lost, in supplying the deficiency in the government, till his Majesty, of whose recovery he was now more fully confirmed in his hopes, should be restored to the prayers of his people. For these reasons, he was not inclined to agree to the motion of the Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Loveden).

Mr Fox was equally desirous with the Right Hon. Gentleman, of avoiding all unnecessary delay. He was, however, of opinion, that there was good reason for another examination of the physicians. Otherwise, he said, the House, in their future deliberations, must ground their conclusions solely on the report of the physicians given four weeks ago, and must shut their ears to every rumour, whether true or false, respecting the variations which had taken place in his Majesty's health, either for the better or worse, since that period. While that report was to form the ground-work of their proceedings, they must consider the King's health as if it had been wholly unaltered from that time to the present moment; and in this case, they were not to trust to sanguine prophecies of his speedy recovery, even if delivered by persons of high authority (alluding to the flattering prospects of the King's convalescence, mentioned a few days ago in the upper House by the Lord Chancellor). The restrictions intended to be proposed would take their colour, in some measure, from the greater or less probability of the restoration of his Majesty's health; for which reason, it was proper to institute another enquiry before they should take into consideration the Right Hon. Gentleman's plan of limitation. The motion for a further examination was consequently entitled to his support, which he would heartily give to it.

Mr Edwards gave his assent to Mr Loveden's motion, on account of the variations which must have been observed in his Majesty's disorder since the examination of the physicians by a Committee of the House.

Mr Burke hoped the Right Hon. Gentleman would be as speedy as possible in restoring to the government that energy and effect which he so feelingly talked of. He proceeded to observe, that it had been stated by Dr Warren in his examination before a Committee of the House of Lords, that the probability of his Majesty's cure diminished in proportion to the longer continuance of the disorder. According to his opinion, the probability of such an event was now less than it was at the time of examination. The question now was, whether the probability was really greater or less, as the plan of limitation would depend on that circumstance. Another enquiry would facilitate conclusions on this point.

Mr Vansittart wished to know, whether the other physicians agreed with Dr Warren in the opinion above stated.

Mr Burke, imagining that some doubts were entertained of Dr Warren's skill, or integrity, from the manner in which this question was asked, as well as from the cry of hear! hear! from the Treasury-bench, rose in great warmth, and reprobated the idea of disputing the abilities or honesty of so very able and respectable a physician as Dr Warren. It is to be supposed, said he, that this gentleman would, upon oath, ſtate a falſehood, or attempt to delude and impoſe upon his examiners? He was now more ready than before to forward the propoſed additional enquiry, that all doubts might be removed on the ſubject.

Sir James Johnſtone ſaid, that there ought to be no interruption given to ſo glorious a taſk, as that of a free people ſupplying the vacancy of the executive government.

Lord North roſe to obviate any doubts which might be raiſed relative to Dr Warren's medical talents or integrity of character He paid that phyſician ſome high compliments

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not diſpute the aſſertions in favour of Dr Warren, but that gentleman had himſelf acknowledged, that his experience in caſes of inſanity had been comparatively ſmall He then adverted to what Mr Burke had ſaid of the King's illneſs; and inſinuated, that the wiſhes of that gentleman, perhaps, prompted him to ſupport the opinion of the ſmaller probability of his Majeſty's recovery He made ſeveral other obſervations, in the courſe of which he mentioned, that from what had fallen in the debate, his ſentiments were altered with regard to the propoſition for examining the Phyſicians another time It now became adviſeable to take that ſtep, in conſequence of doubts which had been ſuggeſted, and wiſhes that had been ſtated for being better informed of the probability of cure He was now deſirous that the motion for going into the order of the day ſhould be withdrawn, and that a ſelect Committee ſhould be appointed to examine the Phyſicians

Mr Burke replied to the Miniſter, and vindicated himſelf from the malignant inſinuations he had thrown out againſt him, as if he wiſhed that the King might be long before he recovered

Mr Rolle ſaid a few words reſpecting the introduction of Dr. Warren's name

Mr Pultney was very averſe to any further delay, and oppoſed the withdrawing the order of the day

Mr Fox vindicated Dr Warren from any unfriendly ſuſpicions, and repreſented him as the moſt able phyſician that this kingdom could at preſent boaſt He then cautioned the Houſe againſt being deluded by any ſanguine declarations of the Miniſter, with regard to the likelihood of the King's ſpeedy recovery, into a form of government running to the country, and which could only originate in the miſchievous deſigns of a party.

Mr Sheridan agreed in the expediency of a further enquiry

Mr Vyner hoped that the examination of the phyſicians might be at the bar of the Houſe, and not in a private Committee.

Sir Peter Burrell oppoſed the propoſition for carrying on the examination in a corner, and recommended public evidence at the bar.

Mr Sumner alſo ſpoke; after which the gallery was cleared, but no diviſion took place for ſome time

Mr. Pultney having relinquiſhed his oppoſition to the withdrawing of the order of the day, it was poſtponed till Thurſday next

A diviſion then enſued on the mode of examining the phyſicians, whether by a ſpecial Committee, or at the bar of the Houſe. The numbers were,

At half paſt eight, the Houſe adjourned.

The Speaker not having been able at four o'clock to get forty Members within the walls of the Houſe, the Speaker and thoſe preſent retired

The Committee appointed to examine the phyſicians, touching his Majeſty's health, met at a little paſt ten o'clock in one of the Committee-rooms adjoining to the Houſe of Commons, and continued ſitting until ſix o'clock, at which time they adjourned for two hours, having examined Sir Lucas Pepys and Dr. Willis in part only

The Committee met again at eight o'clock, and continued to ſit till twelve

Gabriel Steward, Eſq. took the oaths and his ſeat for Weymouth.

The queſtion being put, that the order of the day be read, for a Committee of the whole Houſe to conſider of the ſtate of the nation,

Mr. Dundas roſe, and intimated that the Committee appointed to re-examine the phyſicians would not be able to make their report to the Houſe before to-morrow, and then it would not be adviſeable to proceed to buſineſs without a due conſideration of the circumſtances ſtated in the report He would therefore move, that the order of the day be deferred to Monday next

To this motion the Houſe agreed without heſitation, and immediately afterwards adjourned,

FRIDAY, Jan 9.

A Houſe having been with ſome difficulty formed,

The Maſter of the Rolls moved for an adjournment till to-morrow, the report of their Committee not being yet finiſhed.

Upon that intimation, the Houſe immediately agreed to the motion.

SATURDAY, Jan 10.

Mr Dundas rose and said, that the Committee not being ready to report, it was necessary that the order of the day should be discharged; and as he believed the Committee would be enabled to report on Monday, and the report be printed by Wednesday, he should move that the order of the day be discharged, and that the House should on Wednesday resolve itself into a Committee on the state of the nation

This being agreed to, the House adjourned

A new writ was ordered to be issued for the election of a Citizen to serve in Parliament for the city of Gloucester, in the stead of Sir Charles Barrow, deceased

Sir Robert Smith had a petition from Colchester to present to the House in favour of Mr. Turner; but seeing the House thin, and wishing it to be brought forward upon a fuller attendance, as it contained matter that he conceived would occasion much discussion, he waived bringing it forward at that time, and gave notice that he would present it on Wednesday

Mr Dempster declared himself to be one of those who did not consider the House, in its present situation, capable even of issuing a writ, the majority of the House had however thought otherwise, he hoped, however, that no petitions, nor any other business, would be entered upon until the Legislature should be rendered complete he sincerely wished that the Hon Baronet would postpone presenting the petition until the Regency should be settled.

Mr Vyner said, it was with much concern he had to acquaint the House, that notwithstanding the Committee above stairs had proceeded with every possible dispatch, and with every desire to expedite the report, it was found impossible to make their report, from more matter of great importance having come before the Committee than had been expected He considered making part of a report to be irregular, and hoped therefore that there would be no objection to the House adjourning until to-morrow, when he hoped and believed the Committee would be enabled to put the House in possession of the complete report

The question of adjournment was immediately put and carried, but previous to the Members leaving the House,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice, that as the report could not be made until to-morrow, he should to-morrow move that the Order of the Day for Wednesday, for the House going into a Committee on the state of the Nation, should be discharged, and that the House should on Thursday resolve itself into a Committee on the State of the Nation.

THURSDAY, Jan. 15.

The Speaker took the chair between three and four o'clock, and at half past five the Minister appeared at the bar with the report of the select Committee.

This report being brought up, and the question put, that it be now read a first time, Mr Burke rose, and objected to the reading of it. He was of opinion that the Committee had not perfectly done their duty in the examination with which they had been entrusted. They had narrowed their enquiries too much, and had conducted the business, as he thought, in a manner which could not be satisfactory to the House. With regard to the exclusion of his Majesty's Surgeons and Apothecaries, though he did not think it very proper that they should have been examined as well as the Physicians, the Committee, he knew, were not empowered by the House to examine them. But, in other respects, they had not performed all that might have been expected from them. His principal ground of complaint was, that, in the examination of two of the Physicians (Doctors Willis and Warren), though great pains had been taken to discover their opinions, no endeavours had been used to find out the sentiments of the other Physicians concerning the respective merits of the systems adopted by those two Gentlemen. This was a point that ought to have been taken into consideration These two Physicians had been equalized, as it were, and left upon a par, without any attempt having been made to ascertain a superiority in either. Thus contradictory opinions and litigated facts, which might have been in some measure settled if a proper line of enquiry had been pursued, were left wholly undecided. He proceeded to remark, that his Majesty's life was not safe, while such difference of opinion prevailed among his Physicians As the settlement of the government depended greatly on the supposed probability or improbability of the King's recovery, the presumptions of either of those contingencies ought to be fully enquired into, before any decisive steps were taken for the establishment of a Regency. For these reasons, he would, in the proper stage, move for the recommitment of the report. At present he would oppose its being read.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer vindicated the conduct of the select Committee. Even from prima facie evidence, the House would not be inclined to think that they had narrowed their enquiries, as the length of time employed in the Committee, and the size of the report, gave reasons for a contrary every supposition They had gone as fully into every particular as they had power to do It was not to be supposed that they were to appreciate the merits of the systems pursued by the different Physicians, that was certainly beyond the line of their duty Even in this point, however, something had collaterally come out, which would contribute towards forming an opinion upon the subject As to the Right Hon Gentleman's assertion, that the King's life was not safe, he believed he alluded to the circumstance of Dr Willis having trusted his Majesty with a razor about a month ago. But this fact had been sufficiently justified by the Doctor himself,

Mr Wyndham supported the objections of Mr Burke. There were good grounds, he said, for an approbation of the system followed by the Physicians in their treatment of the King's disorder, as such a mode of procedure would ultimately be of service, in forming an estimate of the greater or less probability of cure

Mr Burke replied to the Minister He also defended his own conduct in the Committee

The Solicitor-General justified the report of the Committee, as containing an exact account of the present state of the King's health. They had proceeded, he said, as far in their enquiries as they were authorised to do by the House

The question being now put for reading the report, it was decided in the affirmative, and the Clerk having read the title of it, it was ordered to be printed

Mr Burke then moved, that this report be recommitted, but his motion was rejected without a division, and the report was ordered to be referred to the Committee on the state of the nation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was of opinion, that, as the report could not conveniently be delivered in print before Thursday, the House would not be prepared for taking it into consideration till the day following. He therefore moved, that the Committee on the state of the nation be deferred till Friday next which was agreed to, and the House then adjourned till that day.

The Speaker took the chair at twenty minutes after four

Sir Robert Smith read the Colchester petition in favour of Mr Tierney, which was received, and the discussion referred to Monday next.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the nation; which being agreed to, the Speaker then left the chair, and Mr. Brook Watson was called to it

The Chancellor of the Exchequer got up, and after taking a slight view of the great importance of the present question, began with the Report of the Physicians The first Report sufficiently stated, that his Majesty was not in a capacity to attend public business, that his recovery was probable, but that the time of that recovery could not be precisely stated that the majority of those afflicted with the malady under which his Majesty at present labours, had recovered; that the longest time did not exceed two years and that many had regained the possession of their faculties in six weeks and two months The present Report did not contradict these assertions; and notwithstanding the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Fox) had grounded the principal part of his argument on one position, viz that an interval of a month had taken place betwixt the first examination and the motion for the second—yet in that space of time the probability of his Majesty's recovery was not the less favourable. In this all the Physicians had agreed, however they might have differed in points of less importance; notwithstanding the assertion of one of those Physicians, that the probability of recovery grew less in proportion to the continuance of the disease To confirm this assertion he referred to certain passages in the Report As this point was agreed to by the Physicians, on which he congratulated the House, he entered into a short account of the disposition which prevailed in the Committee, some of whom, from the complexion of the questions which they had proposed, were anxious for a favourable Report; others seemed anxious to propose such questions as might entrap Dr. Willis, so as to subject him to a contradiction, but in which they were disappointed On this he passed a very high encomium on Dr Willis, with respect to his private and professional character as a Physician in the line he adopted, to which many families in the neighbourhood in which he lived had borne, and could bear testimony; declaring, that from the consistency and rationality of his answers to the Committee and his experience in general, he was firmly of opinion, that he might rely on him beyond any of the rest of the Physicians; and that in the present case, in consequence of his constant attendance on his Majesty, he ought to be relied on, in preference to the rest, particularly Sir George Baker and Dr Warren, whose visits were not above an hour each every other day The three other Physicians, Sir Lucas Pepys, Dr Reynolds, and Dr. Gisborne, who daily attended his Majesty from four o'clock in the afternoon to the hour of eleven the next day, concurred in one material point with Dr Willis, viz that notwithstanding the time which had elapsed since the first examination took place, the hopes and probability of recovery were not the less favourable He then adverted to that passage in the Report which tended to represent that undue influence had been exercised in representing a favourable change in his Majesty's health If Gentlemen intended to ground any argument on this point, he hoped that they would be explicit, and rise superior to any insinuation with respect to a great character, who had resided near thirty years among us, and on whose character not even Faction dared attempt to fix a stain On this head Mr Pitt entered into a defence of that exalted personage, and insisted that Dr Warren's objection to the favourable report of that day was not entitled to all the weight that it apparently carried In fine, the tenor of Mr. Pitt's arguments was, that from the Report on the table * there were sanguine hopes of his Majesty's speedy recovery; that his Majesty's indisposition therefore should be only looked on as temporary, and that it became the House

* The following is an ABSTRACT of the SECOND REPORT from the COMMITTEE appointed to examine the PHYSICIANS who have attended His MAJESTY during his Illness, touching the present State of his Health.

Sir Lucas Pepys was first examined, and after having declared his Majesty's incapacity of coming to Parliament, and of attending to public business, proceeded to state, that his hopes of his Majesty's recovery were the same as he had before founded his opinion upon;—that he could form no probable conjecture of the time that his Majesty's disease was likely to last,—that on the 27th of December he saw his Majesty in such a calm, and approaching to a rational state, that he had hopes, had it continued, signs of convalescence would soon have appeared, those good symptoms appeared only for an hour, since which he had seen no signs of approaching convalescence,—his Majesty was more easily controuled, and therefore he hoped he was advancing to a recovery, though no actual symptoms appeared,—he considered those persons who had made his Majesty's situation their study, to be better judges of the disorder than Physicians who had not made it their particular study,—there were two Surgeons and two Apothecaries who attended upon his Majesty, besides the Physicians,—they gave no regular account, but were frequently asked,—he could trust to their judgement and integrity in relating facts,—they had not the same opportunity of observing his Majesty as Dr Willis, but the same as the other Physicians;—Dr Willis was frequently for a long time with his Majesty, when no other person was present;—when Dr Willis took rest, one of his men, and a Page, attended on the King, and at such time there was a positive order written up in the outer-room, that nobody should go into his Majesty's room without Dr Willis's leave,—it was his opinion that a majority of persons in his Majesty's situation recover,—from the circumstances which he saw on the 27th of December, he thought he could speak with more certainty when he said that he concluded his Majesty would recover, than he did when he was last examined,—on that day his Majesty spoke of his having been delirious at Windsor, but was surprized on being told his delirium had continued for three weeks,—no attempt had ever been made directly or indirectly to influence his account of his Majesty,—his Majesty's irritation had subsided more since the last examination than previous to it, and he thought he could speak with greater certainty of his Majesty's recovery than when last examined

The Rev Dr F Willis was next examined;—he stated that he had such hopes of his Majesty's recovery, that if a patient under the same indisposition was in his house he should not have the least doubt,—he could hazard no opinion on the time his Majesty's indisposition was likely to last —Upon the question being asked whether he saw any present signs of convalescence? he answered, 'about a fortnight ago his Majesty would take up books and 'could not read a line of them, he now will read several pages together, and make, in my 'opinion, very good remarks upon the subject. I think in the main, his Majesty does every thing 'in a more rational way than he did, and some things extremely rational'—He had once or twice refused to sign the certificate of his Majesty's health, thinking him better than it implied, and had refused to sign it till altered, but latterly he had scarcely read it over, not minding whether it was exactly agreeable to his opinion or not, rather than have any words,—he never used any other means to persuade the Physicians to alter their accounts, than mere argument, he would not be sure whether, on the 2d of January, he had not told that the alteration sent down by a certain Great Personage was not worth while disputing, and at the same time that he thought it never the truth,—the alterations were not suggested by him—they were brought down by two Lords;—he believed they were not adopted,— to adopt such measures as should stop any the least indisposition, on which he grounded the propositions which he should afterwards submit to the House. He said, that it was the duty of that House to adopt such measures only as necessity required, and which might bear with the necessity, without any danger or inconvenience to the resumption of executive power in all its plenitude by the King, as soon as the wished for period of his recovery should arrive In order to prepare the House for the reception of his Propositions,

His Majesty was yesterday [Jan 7,] better than he had ever seen him; there was a greater appearance of rational interval than at any other time; there was a great deal less irritation; his Majesty read, and attended to reading for an hour together;—he considered the subsiding of the irritability as a prelude to symptoms of convalescence, his Majesty was not so irritable as he had been, nor did the consequences continue a tenth part so long.

Dr. Warren was next examined.—He saw no signs of convalescence, nor, as far as he could judge, any cessation of the King's disorder at any time since its commencement,—there was one evening, less than a fortnight since, that Sir Lucas Pepys had said, that he had observed his Majesty to talk more like a reasonable man, but such appearance was so totally gone a few hours afterwards, that he had no doubt of its being a misapprehension of Sir Lucas's, arising from his zeal;—He said Dr. Willis had written letters to the Prince of Wales, expressing his Majesty to be much better than he apprehended his Majesty to be, declaring progress in cure that he could not discover;—he said he had been informed, that Dr. Willis had written a letter of the same description to Mr Pitt, at twelve o'clock at night, the day of the debate in the House of Commons; he spoke to Dr Willis on the subject the next morning, and told him that he did wrong to write such an account, when it was not true, he afterwards enquired, and could not find that the Doctor had written such a letter, and told Dr. Willis that he had done him an injury in charging him with it, as he could not prove it,—he could not recollect from whom he heard it;—when he spoke to Dr Willis on the subject, he told him that he considered it as a political letter, and wrong for a physician to send; he had an opportunity of seeing the original letters written to Mr. Pitt on the day of the debate, and the following day,—there was one from Dr Willis's son, dated at half an hour after five o'clock of the same day of the debate, containing a favourable account;—he could not tell whether it contained a just account or no, not knowing how his Majesty was at that time,—he had thought it necessary to acknowledge to Dr Willis that he had done him an injury, because the Doctor had complained that he had charged him with a fact that was not true;—he had made every enquiry, but could not find that any letter had been written at twelve o'clock, and consequently concluded there had been an error,—the Lord Chancellor had sent to Mr Pitt for all the letters he had received from Dr Willis on that day, which were sent, and which, with Mr Pitt's answer, he had seen;—he could not say of whom he had the information, that such letter had been written,—he could not recollect ever having seen a paper purporting to be a copy of such letter, nor had he ever heard any person, whose name he could mention, say, he had a copy of any such supposed letter.—On the question being put to Dr Warren, whether any attempt had ever been made directly or indirectly to influence his account of the King's situation? he said, 'Dr 'Willis on Friday last made a very unwarrantable use of the name of a Great Person, I call 'it unwarrantable, because I cannot believe he could have the authority to use it to influence 'me while the Report to be sent to St. James's was composing—The Report proposed to 'be sent was written thus "His Majesty passed yesterday quietly, has had a very good 'night, and is calm this morning" Dr. Willis desired that some expression might be 'made use of, indicating that his Majesty was advanced since the day before in his cure, I 'objected to this, because I had ample reason from my conversation with his Majesty, to 'think the contrary true Dr Willis then said, "A certain Great Person will not suffer it to 'go so, and it will fall upon you."—Dr Reynolds was present when the words were spoken 'I made no observation to Dr Willis on those words, but after talking with him a little 'more on the subject of his Majesty, composed, together with Dr Reynolds, the following 'Report, "His Majesty passed yesterday much in the same manner as he did the day be-'fore, has had a very good night, and is this morning as he was yesterday" Dr Reynolds, 'Dr. Willis, and Dr. Warren signed this Report; it was sent up there, and was returned 'with an order to change the words, "as he was yesterday," into "continues to mend" 'Dr. Warren desired the honour of an audience, and upon stating his reasons why no 'amendment had taken place, the words, "continues to mend," were given up, and 'the sentence, "is this morning in a comfortable way," was substituted in their place'

The

propositions, he took a review of [illegible] preparatory steps which had been [illegible] in this business. He insisted that the delegate ought not to possess the full powers of the principal, and in order to support [illegible] law, he entered into a short history of the [illegible]

The Second Day, Jan. 8, was begun by the [illegible] Sir Lucas Pepys, which went principally to [illegible] and to the general endeavours of the Physicians to [illegible] favourable as possible, consistent with truth.

Sir George Baker was next examined;—he [illegible] that a majority of persons afflicted with his Majesty's malady, at the time of [illegible] did not recover;—he considered his Majesty's remaining nearly the same as at the last examination, to make no difference in the hopes of a recovery;—he stated, that while his Majesty had slept one night but four or five hours, Dr. Willis had [illegible] that during it [illegible] ported that he had "passed a very great night," he would not [illegible] the report, [illegible] refused to sign, [illegible] the words a "good night," and did not sign till his request [illegible] plied with;—he knew not by whose authority the order [illegible] excluding [illegible] entering, as they were used to do, the King's apartment, [illegible] with the permission [illegible] Willis or his son, but was told by Dr Willis that he had [illegible] the order;—he knew of no probable cause for such order,—no attempt had ever been made to [illegible] him to [illegible] report of the King's situation.

Dr Henry Revell Reynolds was next examined; he stated his Majesty to be more quiet, more observant of the admonitions of his medical attendants, and in [illegible] a still better state of general health, which were favourable circumstances, and which he hoped led to amendment, but he could not say that there was any actual amendment at present in his Majesty's principal complaint,—his Majesty's recovery was not [illegible] retarded by the present duration of his complaint, few recovering so soon from such maladies;—his Majesty was more easily controuled than he was a fortnight since;—he considered it a favourable circumstance towards a recovery,—his Majesty's bodily health has not declined, he appears to be alert and active;—his Majesty's general health has improved within the last month;—he considered the improvement of bodily health, without any proportionate improvement of mental sanity, a probable symptom of mental convalescence;—he was present, he said, when the discussion took place between Dr Warren and Dr Willis, on the 3d of January, respecting the account to be sent to St. James's; that they had related what passed in a similar manner as related before by Dr Warren;—he had heard of the prohibition to enter the King's apartment without the permission of Dr. Willis, but knew of nothing that had rendered such a prohibition necessary;—he knew not by whose authority the order had been put up, but had heard Dr. Willis say it was by order of the Lord Chancellor.

On the Third Day, Jan. 9,

Dr Thomas Gisborne was examined,—he considered his Majesty's bodily state of health to be better than it had been three weeks ago, that he was [illegible] quiet, and that it might be hoped these signs were a prelude to [illegible] amendment;—he knew of the order, but [illegible] no necessity for it;—he understood [illegible] Dr. Willis, on the advice of the Lord Chancellor, who had been [illegible] the [illegible] apartment into the King's [illegible] —he knew not of any person [illegible] [illegible] former times, or that his Majesty had ever been prevented from [illegible] difference having happened between [illegible] Dr. Warren;—he knew of no medicines administered to the King under the prescription of Dr. Willis unknown to [illegible] sicians;—none of the medicines administering by his Majesty's Physicians had [illegible] be wished;—he considered his Majesty's [illegible] recovery as good at present [illegible] was examined before the last Committee.

Dr. F. Willis being again called in and [illegible] stated his Majesty's [illegible] recovery to be much greater than when he [illegible] before the former Committee,—he considered his Majesty being able to take up books, and make observations upon the subject, as a [illegible] of hope of a recovery, than any that had happened previous to the last Committee;—he founded his hope upon the effect of [illegible] years experience;—Dr. Willis here [illegible] reports of the opinions [illegible]

ſaid, that in each of thoſe Regencies the whole of the executive power was delegated This was a point he was not diſpoſed to deny; but in return, he was determined that whatever powers ſhould be delegated on the preſent occaſion, ſhould be put into the hands of one alone; and not divided amongſt a Council, as was the caſe in the Regencies he alluded to But though this might be done for the wiſeſt purpoſe, yet as he had already ſaid, he ſhould not follow it He meant to purſue a more eligible alternative; which was, to give the whole adminiſtered to his Majeſty, which were the bark, ſaline medicines, and alterative pills, with a very trifling part of calomel,—he very rarely miſſed radically curing any who came under his care within three months of their being attacked,—he had hopes of a more ſpeedy recovery than when he was before the laſt Committee, becauſe every bad ſymptom was abated, and his Majeſty would attend to any ſubject in a much better manner than he had ever hoped he would have done within ſo ſhort a period of time,—his Majeſty's progreſs towards convaleſcence was greater than what was generally made within the ſame time in ſimilar caſes,—he was confirmed in his former opinion that his Majeſty's diſorder was occaſioned by the weight of buſineſs, by ſevere exerciſe, by too great abſtemiouſneſs, and by little reſt

Dr. Warren was again examined, and ſpoke more particularly to the letter ſuppoſed to have been written by Dr Willis to Mr Pitt, the firſt account of which he had learnt from rumour, the ſecond by a meſſage delivered by Sir Lucas Pepys from the Prince of Wales, deſiring him to enquire into the ſtate of his Majeſty's health at a particular time, becauſe the Prince had been informed that a letter had been written by Dr Willis, ſtating that the King was in a very good way at that time, when the Prince underſtood he really was not ſo,—he had ſeen his Majeſty reading two or three times, but not more than a line or two at a time, and always in a manner giving ſtrong proof of his malady,—he had ſeen his Majeſty yeſterday (January 8), and he was no better than ſince the commencement of his diſorder —no difference of opinion had exiſted with reſpect to his Majeſty's medicines and diet.

On the FOURTH DAY, Jan 10,

Dr F Willis was again examined, the firſt part of his examination went to ſtrengthen what he had before ſaid of the favourable proſpect of a recovery, the latter to ſhew that his Majeſty had been diſturbed by perſons going improperly into his apartment, once in particular he was prevented from going to ſleep by Dr Warren's entering,—he told Dr Warren at that time, that it was improper to go in, becauſe his Majeſty had had a bad night, that he had juſt had half an hour's ſleep, and that the Pages thought he was falling to ſleep again,—he ſaw no particular neceſſity for Dr. Warren's going in,—when Dr Warren went into the Pages' room, Mr Braund or Mr Compton, the Pages, deſired Dr Warren would not go in, in his preſence, he ſaid to them, as he had before ſaid to him (Dr Willis) that he muſt go in, for he was a ſpy upon them all,—he had, ſince that time, ſigned a paper, at the deſire of Sir Lucas Pepys and Dr Warren that Dr Warren had not by going into the room waked his Majeſty, but had not ſigned any paper intimating that Dr. Warren had not gone in when it was thought he might have prevented his Majeſty from ſleeping,—his making uſe of the mention of a certain Great Perſon not ſuffering a particular report to go, was becauſe he preſumed the Perſonage knew from the Pages that his Majeſty had paſſed a better night, and was in a better way than the report ſignified,—the order for prohibiting perſons entering into his Majeſty's apartment, without his or his ſon's leave, he wrote and got up by order of the Lord Chancellor;—his Majeſty had frequently been diſturbed by the ſurgeons and apothecaries entering at improper times;—ſpeaking again of his Majeſty's reading, he ſaid the books were of the King's ſelection, and that he had read many times in a day, more than one day in the laſt ſix;—his Majeſty was better yeſterday, and continued to ſhew ſigns of attention and power of reflection to the time of his going to bed;—his Majeſty frequently converſes on what he has read ſeveral hours afterwards, and gives as good an account of any book he has read, either ſince or before his illneſs, as moſt people can,—he conſidered his Majeſty's ſo attending to reading to be very deſirable at the time, and a certain ſign of his recovery;—he ſurely entertained a doubt of recovery

On the FIFTH DAY, Jan 12,

Dr Willis's examination was continued,—her Majeſty had a report of the King's health every hour, which report muſt neceſſarily frequently be more favourable than the St James's account, which is taken in a morning, when his Majeſty's ſymptoms appear always the worſt;—he conſidered the St. James's account to be leſs favourable than ſtrictly true.

whole of the power to One under certain limitations and restrictions, and in doing this he conceived that he consulted the dignity of the Regent As to the distribution of Parliament, he was not disposed to lay any restriction on that: he thought it but reasonable, if it was deemed necessary, that the people should be recurred to. He declared that he did not intend to impose any restrictions that should quench on the exercise of executive government in any one thing that could tend to the safety and welfare of the kingdom:

Dr Gisborne was again called in;—he said he had seen his Majesty on Friday evening, between eight and ten o'clock; that he played at piquet with the King;—that there were material changes in his Majesty for the better

Dr Warren was again called in and examined, and after having declared his Majesty's being that morning in a very irritated state, proceeded to lay before the Committee an account of the consultation the Physicians had had with Dr. Willis, and of the Doctor's subsequent conduct —Dr Warren said, "The day that I introduced Dr Willis to the King, I summoned the rest of his Majesty's Physicians to a consultation at my house —It was there first settled as a principle, that quiet of body and mind were to be endeavoured to be obtained by every means possible, and that every thing should be carefully kept from his Majesty that might tend to prevent this desirable acquisition It was settled that a regular coercion should be made use of—that every thing should be kept from his Majesty that was likely to excite any emotion—that though his Majesty had not shewn any signs of an intention to injure himself, yet that it was absolutely necessary, considering the sudden impulses to which his distemper subjects people, to put every thing out of the way that could do any mischief —To all this Dr Willis assented— yet the very next day he put a razor into his Majesty's hand, and a penknife —When I saw the Doctor next, I asked him how he could venture to do such a thing—he said, he shuddered at what he had done. As he made use of this expression, I did not think it necessary to say much to him upon the subject.—On the 12th of December, as I apprehend, after I had taken a walk in the garden, and some of the Royal Children were shewn to him—this produced a considerable emotion, which was accompanied with acts demonstrating that emotion, I was informed, to the best of my memory, by Mr Keate —Notwithstanding this effect of seeing the children, Dr Willis, the next day, introduced that person whose great and amiable qualities we all know must necessarily make her the dearest and tenderest object of his Majesty's thoughts —the interview was short His Majesty was soon after wards in a greater state of irritation, and the strait coercion was, I believe, for the first time, actually applied that night—the blisters were put on that night likewise The next time that I saw Dr Willis, I spoke to him upon this subject with some degree of firmness, because it was contrary to my opinion and contrary to what had been settled in consultation, for it had been settled, that whatever could be done by deliberation should be referred to consultation; that the conduct of his Majesty, in the interior room, should be left to Dr Willis's discretion, because it did not admit of deliberation —I do not know that I convinced the Doctor that his opinion was wrong, but that the act was contrary to what was laid down in consultation could not be denied —I was always considered by the highest authority as the first Physician, and therefore though myself particularly responsible I thought myself obliged to look into it, and to enquire after every thing that related to his Majesty I did not suppose myself in a different situation upon the arrival of Dr Willis, and therefore took the liberty of speaking to him with some degree of authority —I remember, when his three attendants arrived, I sent for them into the Physicians room, examined them very carefully, particularly as to the temper with which they conducted themselves towards those whom they attended, and spoke to them, as they were strangers to me, in such a manner as to let them know that their conduct would be strictly observed. My being first Physician made me talk to Dr Willis about every thing that I heard of, that did not appear to be quite accurate, and sometimes led to disputes. I informed the Doctor, that he was there in a double capacity, as Physician, and attendant on his Majesty in the interior room—that I must take my share in directing whatever related to him in the capacity of Physician, though I should not interfere with respect to the conduct of his Majesty in the interior room Not many days after this transaction, I observed a book in his Majesty's hand, which affected me much, and I immediately determined me to bring a charge against Dr Willis, for what I thought bad practice I do not mean to bring the story of the book as a fault, because I believe there was no intention to convey such a book to his Majesty, it was the play of King Lear, not in a volume of Shakespeare, but it was a corrected Lear, by Colman, and mixed with his plays I can have no reason to think that Dr Willis could suspect that such a play was in that volume His Majesty told me

dom, which he had consulted in every step he had taken in this momentous proceeding; hoping that gentlemen would keep it in their minds, that the propositions he was about to submit were only intended to supply the temporary incapacity of the King; and if it should be found that that incapacity was protracted, he did not doubt but the wisdom of the two Houses would provide a proper remedy, but until that period arrived, he did not think himself authorised to anticipate it.—Those restrictions might be then taken off, or qualified

'that Dr Willis brought him the book, and Dr Willis did not deny it when I spoke to 'him on the subject. I do not bring this as a fault, but it was the circumstance that determined me to put in execution what I had been thinking of before, with respect to Dr 'Willis; for his Majesty's observations on the book affected me strangely. I carried in 'account of this to the Prince of Wales, and he desired me, as he had done in every case 'of difficulty that had happened, from the beginning of the illness, to lay the affair before 'the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor went to Kew, I believe, and the result was, 'when I saw the Lord Chancellor, that the rules of the consultation should be strictly obeyed 'Dr Willis's, a second time, introduced the same great and amiable person. I was informed, that some degree of agitation came on in the night, but having collected, as I 'thought, from several circumstances, that the power of introducing persons to his Majesty 'was to be left entirely to Dr Willis, I did not make any complaint about it.' He remembered the conversation on his calling himself a spy upon them all. 'I went upon a certain morning, immediately after my arrival at Kew, into the anti chamber, and asked the 'Page how his Majesty did? He replied that he had had a very bad night, was just then fallen 'asleep and you must not go in. You know, said I, that I am a spy, and must see the King; '—I did not mean then; and went immediately to the Physicians room. This was spoken 'in a very good-natured manner, and meant no more than that I, from my situation, was 'an inspector.—Will the Committee please to consider, whether any man, who ever meant 'to be a spy, ever told it of himself.'—The concluding part of his evidence went merely to Doctor Willis's acquiescence in the use of blisters, and that there was not less probability of his Majesty's recovery at present than when he was examined before the last Committee.

Sir George Baker was again called in, and examined, he never observed his Majesty since his indisposition, capable of reading with any attention and observation, for any length of time together,—he observed symptoms of his Majesty's disorder on the 22d of October, and then communicated his apprehensions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by note,—he had not mentioned his apprehensions to any other person near his Majesty from that time to the time of his next attack,—he saw at present no signs of convalescence,—as far as he knew by experience, and from the experience of Dr Batty, the calculation of nine out of ten recovering, was incredible;—he considered his Majesty's chance of a recovery to be equally good as at the time when he was examined before the last Committee.

Sir Lucas Popys was again examined, he knew of no instance of his Majesty's being prevented from going to sleep by any improper interruption,—he produced a paper written by himself, and signed by Dr Willis on the 25th of December, certifying that Dr Warren had never disturbed his Majesty out of his sleep.

On the SIXTH DAY, Jan. 13.

Dr. Willis was again examined; he remembered the consultation, which was concerning medicines in particular,—he remembered his having put a razor and penknife into the hands of his Majesty the day after the consultation, for which he assigned the following reasons, —'His Majesty had not been shaved for a long while, perhaps a fortnight or three weeks, 'and the person that had been used to shave him, could not complete the parts of his upper 'and under lips; and being confident, from the professions and demeanour of his Majesty at 'that moment, I ordered his Majesty to shave his lips himself, and then he desired that he 'might have his whole face lathered, that he might just run it over with a razor, and he 'did so in a very calm manner. His nails also wanted cutting very much; and upon his 'assurance, and upon my confidence in his looks, I suffered him to cut his own nails with 'a penknife, while I stood by him.—It is necessary for a Physician, especially in such cases, 'to be able to judge at the moment whether he can confide in the professions of his patient; 'and I was never disappointed in my opinion, whether the professions of the patient were 'to be relied on or no.'—He remembered saying, in a conversation with Dr. Warren on the subject, no such thing as his having shuddered at what he had done, he said he was sure those instruments were safe in his Majesty's hands.—Speaking upon the charge of having improperly lified in proportion to the neceſſity preſcribed. M next ſubmitted his Reſolutions, after having dwelt for a ſhort time on the neceſſity and propriety of each—the heads of which are as follow

"That in the perſonal exerciſe of the Crown is regarded by the illneſs of his Majeſty, the Prince of Wales be requeſted to take upon himſelf, during the continuance of his Majeſty's illneſs, and in his name, (as Regent) the execution of all the royalties, functions, and conſtitutional authorities of the King, under ſuch reſtrictions as ſhall be hereafter mentioned"

The firſt of theſe was, "That the Regent ſhall be prevented from conferring any honours or additional marks of Royal favour by grants of Peerage to any perſon, except to thoſe of his Majeſty's iſſue who ſhall obtain the age of 21

"That he ſhall be prevented from granting any patent place for life, or any reverſionary grant of any patent place, other than ſuch as required by law to be for life, and not during pleaſure

"That the care of his Majeſty being to be repoſed in her Majeſty, the officers of his Majeſty's houſehold are to be under the direction of her Majeſty, and not ſubject to the controul of the Regent.

"That the care of his Majeſty be repoſed in the Queen, to be aſſiſted with a Council"

As ſoon as the Reſolutions were ſubmitted, he begged to be heard in ſupport of each. Having ſtated the arguments which he conceived might be urged againſt the firſt—the deprivation of the power of the creation of peers—he was ready to acknowledge, that this was one of the cleareſt prerogatives of the Crown; that it had been laudably exerciſed in the reward of merit; but as it might be ſaid to be one of the perſonal prerogatives of Majeſty, he wiſhed on that very account to preſerve it, ſo as to be found entire on the reſtoration of his Majeſty This reſtriction might be imputed to motives leſs pure; as tending to nouriſh a cabal in the Lords, who had hitherto ſupported the conſtitutional meaſures which he had the honour of bringing forward, and who, from that diſpoſition, improperly ſuffered his Majeſty to have ſeveral interviews with ſome of the Royal Family, he ſaid, 'I am very ſure that ſuch occurrences can ſcarce be too frequent, as it comforts 'the patient to think he is with his family, and that they are affectionate to him, and upon 'enquiries of patients who have been cured of the ſame indiſpoſition, they have always 'mentioned thoſe occurrences having given them the greateſt comfort, and, as they thought, 'helped very much towards a recovery ——The meeting of his Majeſty with the Queen, and the youngeſt Princeſs, was moving and affectionate, he ſhewed the greateſt marks of parental affection for the Princeſs, and of attention to the Queen, with whom he converſed for the ſpace of a quarter of an hour,—he was preſent, but was not a judge whether his Majeſty's converſation was diſordered at the end or not, as his Majeſty ſpoke ſeveral ſentences in German, but at the concluſion of the interview, the King took leave of the Queen and Princeſs very properly—Upon what had been ſaid by Dr Warren relative to his Majeſty's having the play of King Lear put into his hands, he declared as follows: 'His Ma'jeſty aſked me to give him the tragedy of King Lear I told him it was improper He 'then deſired to have Foote's play, and Colman's I did not know that Colman had put 'out an edition of King Lear; indeed I had never read Colman's works; and when I told 'it to the Chancellor, he told me he was as ignorant of it as I was; and when I was 'charged by Dr Warren for giving his Majeſty it, I thought I had not done it, and poſi'tively ſaid I had not, and it being the ſame day that Dr. Warren had charged me, in a 'moſt extraordinary manner, for writing what I had not, and doing with a political view 'what I did not, I really thought the Doctor had charged me as fully with the one as 'the other, and was very much ſurpriſed, when I went into the Pages room, to ſee that 'King Lear was, I think, in the third volume of Colman's works.—But be it as it may, 'it was of no conſequence, for at that time his Majeſty could not read theſe words in any 'book'—The concluding part of this examination went to ſhew that his Majeſty being at times ſenſible of his being King, and of his being confined in a room, was ſubject to ſudden guſts of paſſion, upon any trifling contradiction, and required a more delicate behaviour than he had for ſome time required

The laſt part of the Report is a ſhort examination of Dr. Willis, ſen and Dr John Willis, relative to the latter being a Phyſician, and by whoſe authority he had been called in, and whether he was to be conſidered as a Phyſician, or as an aſſiſtant to his father The examination relative to this ſubject was taken on the third day (Jan 9,) but the Committee conſidering Dr Willis, ſen fully informed of every particular neceſſary to the object of their enquiry, which could have been ſtated by Dr J Willis, they forbore to examine the latter to his Majeſty's ſituation, conceiving that it was of the utmoſt importance that their Report ſhould not be any longer deferred might not be thought to look favourable on those who were to succeed him.—This he denied, declaring that he was certain it would not oppugn any measures that were brought forward for the benefit of the nation—let the Minister be whom he might—as to the real estate of his Majesty, that was rendered unalienable, by an act in the reign of Queen Anne; and as to his personal estate, he believed it was expressed in our statute books by the title of Jura Coronæ.—This latter article he believed would bear no contest. As to the household, and those who had the care of his Majesty's person, a difficulty arose which he was at a loss to get over—as the chief of the former had the nomination of the rest.

Mr. Watson then read the Resolutions.

Mr. Powys next got up. He said he neither liked the Resolutions, nor the ground on which they were raised. From the beginning, the entire system on which that monstrous superstructure was to be raised, had met with his disapprobation. The Hon. Gentleman then adduced many arguments to shew that the Regency should be entire—that the powers and prerogatives of each of the estates were in the beginning granted for the wisest and the best purposes—and that the experience of ages had confirmed this beyond contradiction. The powers of the King especially were coeval with the constitution, created by the people, from whom the three estates derived their power. The interest of the three were different the one from the others. In order that one might be a check upon the other, a separate interest was annexed to each, that each might preserve itself entire, for the mutual benefit of the whole. Judge Blackstone supported those sentiments—our Parliaments bore testimony to the propriety of them—and our statute books confirmed them, particularly in the preambles, where the rights and privileges of the crown were always regarded as the very cornerstone of the Constitution. He then shewed, from the spirit of the constitution, and several acts of parliament, that the crown was hereditary, and that the Prince of Wales had a right to all the powers of executive government; which was tacitly acknowledged even by those who asserted that he had no right to the Regency beyond any other subject; for these very gentlemen had acknowledged that he had a preferable and irresistible claim, which could not be disputed, except on the grounds of a total exclusion. What had the Prince done? Had he raised himself above the laws? Had he attempted to wrest the sceptre from his father? Had he acted as a disobedient son? After all, he could not be persuaded that the object of these Resolutions was intended to counteract the inconveniences which might arise on the recovery of his Majesty. With respect to the resumption of the Government, specious as this appeared, it could not but be seen through. But if it really was the object, it certainly defeated itself for, provided such a thing should happen, did any man in his senses imagine that any restriction with respect to the House of Peers, or by dividing the House of Commons, in case any violent measures should take place, would be of any avail, as long as the Regent had the command of the navy and the army? He thought the business calculated to create party feuds, not only amongst the people, but in a family but too much already afflicted—to set the mother against the son, and the son against the mother. He observed, that Mr. Pitt said that the Regent should have the choice of his political servants. What was meant by this? It was notorious, that several members of that and the Upper House composed that household, and of course it must have great influence in the political scale. The influence of one of these officers, he believed, was recent in the mind of every gentleman present.

Mr. Powys then proposed an amendment, the purport of which was,

"That the Prince of Wales should be invested with all the executive authority of the Sovereign, without any limitations."

This amendment being read by the chairman,

Lord North reprobated the Resolutions, and the entire system which gave birth to them.—His Lordship insisted that they tended in every part to a violation of the constitution, and that it was the interest of the House to guard the rights of the Crown, which the Resolution in question evidently went to diminish in the article which restricted the creation of Peers. He observed, that in the reign of George I. a bill was brought into the House for limiting the Peerage.—That bill was brought in by the Ministry on seeing that Monarch sink into years, and conceiving that the Prince of Wales was not disposed to favour them very much. Even those Lords who were in opposition to that Ministry supported it, because they conceived that it would contribute to their importance. But the Commons perceiving that it would have that effect, and that it would preclude such of them, body as might be entitled to that dignity, spurned it with becoming indignation: this was evinced in the majority, for it was thrown out by 269.

His Lordship then warned the House of the danger that might accrue, in sending this Resolution up to the House of Peers without any limitation in point of time, for most certain it was, that their Lordships would not consent to the repeal of a bill, which was plainly calculated to increase their importance.

His

His Lordship conjured the House to weigh the subject well before they came to a determination which might involve themselves and their posterity in the worst of evils. The maxims of the constitution should not be changed on every slight occasion. His Lordship then shewed that this desire to alter the fixed principles of the constitution had operated to the destruction of the Spanish Cortes, and the grandeur and stability of the Roman Empire, which he proved from the examples of Sertorius, Julius Cæsar, and others. He therefore hoped, that the apprehension of a change of Ministers would not influence them to change the constitution.

Mr Vane followed Lord North. His arguments were particularly pointed against the limitations, they tended, he said, to annihilate the executive branch of the Government.

Colonel Fullarton spoke in favour of Mr Powys's amendment, and introduced a very pertinent as well as striking precedent from the history of France in the time of Charles the Victorious, in support of his opinion.

Lord Belgrave congratulated the House on the manner in which this business had been conducted. His Lordship made a number of observations on the last report of the physicians. He did not mean to criminate Dr Warren as an improper or unfit person to attend his Majesty, nor to approve of Dr Willis as a fit and proper person. He did not take upon him to decide the comparative merits of the different physicians, but conceived from the whole report, that there was a very high probability of his Majesty's recovery. He paid many compliments to his Right Honourable Friend (Mr Pitt). He conceived that this business would make an important æra in the history of this country, and that immortal honour would redound to the Minister, for preserving the rights and liberties of the nation, upon this important crisis.

Mr Grenville proceeded to observe, that the proposed restrictions he considered as absolutely necessary for the intestine tranquility of the country. In arguing the point, he thought it proper that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's name should be made use of as little as possible; whatever was done by Parliament could not be from any disgust to the Prince, but as a barrier against those who might advise him ill. Respecting the King's personal property, it surely could not be decent to deprive him of it on the very first moment of his malady. The nation should be given to understand, that Parliament was not going to depose the King on the throne, but only to fill up those functions necessary for the conduct of Government. On all these considerations, he should give his vote for the restrictions.

Mr. Sheridan entered into a brilliant defence of the party Mr. Pitt had almost likely to form a cabal, and retorted on the opposite side of the House.—He made several remarks upon the Report, and upon the random speaking of Dr Willis. He considered the restrictions to spring from the supposition of the Prince being likely to give his confidence to those persons who were not at present in office; and that they were intended as a chastisement to the Prince for his choice.—He deprecated the Resolutions as very dangerous, as unconstitutional, and as tending to create jealousy between the Representatives of the People, and the Representative of the King, as forming a weak and crippled Government, and as arming a mother against a son.

Mr Fox opposed the system of the Right Hon Gentleman in warm terms. He particularly spoke against that part of the limitations which prevented the Regent from giving away patent places. The restriction of Peerage he also condemned as very impolitic and unconstitutional.

Mr Drake, Mr Martin, Mr. Edwards, and several other gentlemen, also spoke.

On a division, the numbers were,

For Mr Powys's amendment	154
Against it — — —	227
Majority for the Minister ——	73

Another amendment was afterwards made, purporting that, in the Resolution respecting the Peerage, there be inserted these words, viz "for a time to be limited."

This amendment produced a division, when there appeared,

For it — — —	160
Against it — —	216
Majority — — ——	57

All the Resolutions were then put and agreed to, and they were ordered to be reported on Monday, to which day the House adjourned.

Monday, Jan 19.

STATE OF THE NATION.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer called the attention of the Committee to that Resolution which he had submitted to them on Friday last, respecting the care of his Majesty's Person, and the nomination of the officers of the Royal Household. It was one consolation, amidst the universal regret for the King's indisposition, that there was a great personage in whose hands the care of the Sovereign could be trusted with peculiar safety. If this charge should be committed to her Majesty, it was proper to grant such powers as were incident to the charge, that the Royal dignity might not be in the smallest degree impaired during the illness of the Sovereign. They ought not to forget that his his Majesty was still a King, and that it would argue a great want of loyalty and respect to deprive him while he remained in so helpless a state, of any share of his accustomed pomp or external dignity. For this reason, all the officers of the Household ought still to continue in the immediate service of his Majesty, without any one of them being transferred to the Regent. It had been said, that the conferring of the patronage of the Household on the Queen would create a degree of influence, which might in no inconsiderable degree retard and counteract the government of the future Regent. But he did not foresee any such disagreeable prospect. Patronage in general, he was ready to acknowledge, was a political evil, and to separate any considerable portion of it from the executive power was also to be considered as an evil But in this case there was nothing to apprehend, as his Majesty could not be suspected of any wish to raise a factious opposition against the political measures of his own Son He would not, he said, enter minutely into the discussion of the objection raised against the conferring any degree of patronage on the Queen, till he should have heard a more exact statement of arguments adduced against it

The Chairman then read the Resolution above referred to, which was to the following purport, viz That the care of the person of the King, during this midisposition, shall be vested in the Queen, that her Majesty shall also have power to remove from, and appoint to, any of the offices of the Royal Household; and that to enable her Majesty the better to discharge such trust, a Council shall be nominated to advise her in all matters relating thereto, and that this Council shall be empowered to examine the King's physicians from time to time, as they may see occasion, with regard to the state of his Majesty's health, and shall make a report to Parliament of the result of such examination

Lord Maitland, after reprobating the Rt. Hon. Gentleman's whole system as an enthusiasm and invasion of all constitutional principles, more particularly combated the present Resolution. He would say, and he dared to say it, that the care of his Majesty's person ought not to be committed to the Queen. As a subject and a man he would say, that he entertained the highest opinion of her Majesty's virtues; but the tender regard and solicitude of her Majesty for the recovery of the King, was one objection that would bar her against committing the care of his Majesty's person to the Queen. In the next place, the continuance of his Majesty in his present situation might be to the interest of the Queen He did not say that this would be the case, nor did he expect that gentlemen would do so much injustice to his feelings, as to place an illiberal construction on his expressions, but he would say, that novelty was fascinating, and in this instance he believed it could not be denied, that the Resolution, if adopted, would place a power in the hands of the Queen beyond that which the constitution was acquainted with power was fascinating His Lordship, in order to bring the situation of the Prince and the Queen into a clearer point of view in the manner this mode is adopted, alluded to a case what has lately happened Let us, said he, for a moment suppose that a noble Lord had disposed of his affairs in this manner My son shall possess my estate, clear the mortgages, provide the most laborious and the most arduous part of the family, but my wife shall enjoy the luxuries of it, she shall have power of nominating all the servants, the disposition and elegancies of the table In the moment, he presumed, it would be thought that the father had not imparted a very pleasing task to the son this Lordship enlarged on this point But we are told, continued he, that this establishment is to be but for a short time, and on this ground we are directed to go But anxious as he was for the recovery of his Majesty, he was candid enough to confess that his hopes were not so sanguine. In an hospital, built in the vicinity of this metropolis, for the reception of unhappy people afflicted in the manner of his Majesty it was found on enquiry that in the course of the last ten years not more than one out of four had been restored to the perfect possession of their faculties.

Mr Pulteney said, if it could be made out that by the Resolution of giving the powers to the Queen, there was any reason that could be advanced of the probability of her concealing the recovery of the King, he should consider such reason a good objection to the Resolution. Objection had been made to the patronage of the power proposed to be given to her Majesty. He wished to ask, whether the throne was so weak, that any person with the power of distributing eighty or an hundred thousand pounds could shake it? The throne stood on no such grounds, it was far more established, he was old enough to remember the days when it had been reſolved that the power of the Crown was too great, and ought to be diminiſhed He wiſhed to aſk, Whether any one would contend, that in the preſent ſituation of Europe Government could not go on without the Houſehold influence? If the Miniſters of the Regent, whoever they might be, would act with uprightneſs and honour, they would find influence enough to govern, the people were eaſily governed when upright and virtuous men bore ſway, of which there had been a ſtrong inſtance for ſome time, the people were always ready to give every juſt tribute of applauſe. Thoſe gentlemen who were likely to come into office on the Regency, he contended to reflect upon themſelves when they ſaid that they could not govern without the patronage of the Houſehold the patronage of every baker and butcher, if they acted uprightly they would find no need of ſuch patronage. The Hon Gentleman, after a few other obſervations, concluded by ſaying, that he ſaw no objection either to the Queen's having the care of the King's perſon, or to the full exerciſe of ſuch powers as ſhould enable her to diſcharge ſuch truſt.

Mr Bouverie agreed to the care of the King's perſon being entruſted with the Queen, and to the latter part of the Reſolution, propoſing to appoint her a Council, but objected to the powers propoſed to be granted, and moved ſo amendment, that the words "granting her powers," be omitted.

Lord North obſerved, that the Reſolutions contained three propoſitions, the firſt appointing the care of the King's perſon to the Queen, the ſecond, granting her the power of the Houſehold, and the third, appointing her a Council. The propoſitions appeared to him to be totally ſeparate, and he hoped that the Right Hon Gentleman [Mr Pitt] would agree to their ſeparation, that they might be fairly and freely diſcuſſed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, not, he ſaid, content to the ſeparation of the motion, as he could not agree to the giving in name, and in words, to her Majeſty, the care of the King's perſon, without at the ſame time giving her the neceſſary powers to execute ſuch truſt. The not dividing the queſtion, he ſaid, could not be productive of any embarraſſment, as thoſe who could not approve the whole of it, might propoſe what amendments they thought neceſſary.

Mr Bouverie again ſpoke, and the queſtion on his amendment being put,

Mr Grey roſe to ſupport it. He conſidered the Queen competent to the care of his Majeſty without the powers propoſed, but with them totally unqualified. He agreed with the Right Hon. Gentleman [Mr Pitt], that it was the duty of the Committee to look to the duty they owed to themſelves, and to the duty they owed to their Sovereign, and in looking to themſelves they would reject ſuch a ſtatute upon the conſtitution with becoming indignation.—In taking care of their Sovereign, they were not to neglect the duty to their country, for whom all power was granted. The Reſolution before the Committee was ridiculous, as tending to preſerve the right of the King; it would be weak and ineffectual againſt an ambitious Prince, who, by poſſeſſing the power of the army and navy, might, if he chuſe to adopt ſo monſtrous a meaſure, dethrone the Sovereign, in ſpite of all the reſtrictions that had been propoſed; it was known, however, that the Prince of Wales poſſeſſed no arbitrary, nor ambitious ſpirit, and that the reſtrictions propoſed would operate upon him as checks, chucks of ſuch a nature as to render it impoſſible for any Adminiſtration the Regent might think proper to adopt, to carry on the Government. He wiſhed to aſk what power there was neceſſary for a King, that was not alſo neceſſary for a Regent, to carry on the Government? The Government would not be ſhaken, as mentioned by an Hon Gentleman [Mr Pulteney] by a butcher or a baker, but it might be by a faction that might be created in the Lords, to ſupport meaſures of the Right Hon. Gentleman, who muſt always be virtuous. He fully agreed with every panegyric on her Majeſty, he loved her virtues, and what he loved her for particularly, and what the country loved her for, was that ſhe had never joined any party, any cabal, or intereſted in politics, upon ſuch a character he did not think her Majeſty would be very ready to loſe. He agreed to provide againſt what might happen, and in providing, proviſion muſt be made with reſpect to perſons.—the Prince was virtuous, but he might have bad adviſers.—the Queen was virtuous, but ſhe might have bad adviſers.—He wiſhed to know the intended Councillors of her Majeſty named, he wiſhed Gentlemen to conſider the patronage they would be poſſeſſed of, not leſs than the fourth of the Civil Liſt. The queſtion he ſaid was againſt any power being veſted without reſponſibility, the Reſolution went to give ſuch power without reſponſibility, a power peared to him to be prejudicial to ſound policy, to good government, and the conſtitution, and as ſuch he ſhould give it his negative

Mr Fox, in a maſterly ſpeech of conſiderable length, oppoſed the reſtrictions He ſaid, in the diſcuſſion of ſuch a queſtion, gentlemen were not to act from any perſonal conſiderations, and to introduce perſonal praiſe they were to ſpeak of a King, and not the King, of a Prince, and not the Prince; of a Queen, and not the Queen This was the only method of enabling them to diſcuſs the ſubject impartially Eighteen months were the limits of the term in which it was probable that his Majeſty's cure would be effected, but caſting our eye to that period, the reſtrictions were more likely to be dangerous than uſeful The creation of Peers, the Right Hon Gentleman had ſaid, would be uſed to make a confederacy in the Houſe of Lords againſt the intereſt of the Regent, becauſe they were too much attached to the Crown Why ill effect then could ariſe from the Prince's making Peers? Who, it had been aſked, will conceive that a member was likely to combine againſt his ſon? But the gentleman who put the queſtion had at the ſame time remarked, that the Heir-apparent had oppoſed the crown If ſuch facts occur in political hiſtory, why may not a mother be ſuppoſed to combine againſt her ſon? Is our Queen leſs likely to be influenced by bad adviſers than others, and does not a competition for power diſſolve the tendereſt ties of human kindneſs? The Right Hon Gentleman [Mr. Pitt] had ſaid, could it be ſuppoſed, that he would join in a factious Oppoſition? That he was not obliged to determine An Oppoſition might be earneſt, but not factious Let the Right Hon Gentleman join in Oppoſition, but let him not uſe any diſhonourable meaſures againſt the new Miniſtry If this country ſhould be afflicted with the loſs of the King, not an atom of power beyond what was neceſſary for the public good ought to be granted to the Regent.

Mr Fox ſaid, that he had been accuſed of wiſhing for the government of the country in order to have the patronage of places and emoluments To this accuſation he would fully anſwer, that he would not accept of office in government, without at the ſame time enjoying thoſe powers which the conſtitution granted. Mr. Pitt had done ſome ſervices to his country, but had he done them without the uſe of that patronage and thoſe emoluments? It had been ſaid, Will you ſuſpect giving away a few places to influence the Queen? He ſuſpected it certainly would influence a Queen. He allowed that it was right to give the Queen the care of his Majeſty's perſon, but not the diſpoſal of the Houſehold France was in a ſtate of debility in its form of government, and the Right Hon Gentleman had generally attempted to rival us with France in many It had been ſaid, that a proviſion was to be made for the Prince of Wales It might, perhaps, be a matter of delicacy, to ſtate the opinion of his Royal Highneſs, but he knew it to be the ſentiments of his Royal Highneſs, that it would be highly inkſome to him, to add any burthen to the country, in the preſent melancholy and calamitous ſtate, for the purpoſe of increaſing the ſtate and dignity of his rank as Regent

Mr Drake expreſſed a wiſh that the two great political characters [Mr Pitt and Mr Fox] ſhould act in concert, and thought that the Houſehold ſervants of the crown might be retrenched, as his Majeſty in his preſent ſituation did not want them

Mr. Pitt declared, that the eſtabliſhment of the Houſehold ought not to be new modelled He commended the Prince's magnanimity with regard to his intention of not ſuffering the people to bear any burthen on his account, and declared that he would be the firſt to propoſe ſuch a burthen, from a conviction of its neceſſity, however odious the meaſure, and however favoured he had been by the Public

Mr Montague roſe to ſpeak, but the call for the queſtion being loud he ſat down, when the Houſe divided on the queſtion that the words objected to ſtand part of the queſtion, in order to let in Mr Bouverie's amendment was read, and the Reſolutions received the aſſent of the Houſe.

A very intereſting converſation now took place, which we only give from the communication of a very intelligent Member, as all ſtrangers were excluded the gallery after the firſt diviſion. It was in ſubſtance as follows —

Mr Rolle ſaid, that not having an opportunity of declaring his ſentiments on a former occaſion, he had given his ſilent vote for the Prince of Wales being appointed Regent He had done it, however, under the aſſurance of a Right Hon. Gentleman (alluding to what Mr Fox declared laſt year) that his Highneſs was not married to Mrs Fitzherbert, as had been aſſerted in a pamphlet which he had read He ſhould, however, move to a clauſe relating to this ſubject whenever the Regency Bill was regularly brought before the Houſe

THURSDAY, JAN 29.

Mr Wilberforce, attended by the Miniſter and ſeveral other Members, repaired to the Upper Houſe, with a meſſage from the Commons, deſiring a conference.

They ſoon returned, and Mr Wilberforce reported, at the bar, that the Lords had agreed to a conference in the Painted Chamber

At the concluſion of this conference, Mr Wilberforce reported, that the conference on the Reſolutions paſſed by the Houſe had terminated in the conſent of their Lordſhips to debate the ſubject of them The Houſe then adjourned till Monday the 26th.

STATE PAPERS.

To His ROYAL HIGHNESS the PRINCE of WALES

SIR,

THE proceedings in Parliament being now brought to a point, which will render it neceſſary to propoſe to the Houſe of Commons the particular meaſures to be taken for ſupplying the defect of the Perſonal Exerciſe of the Royal Authority during the preſent interval, and your Royal Highneſs having ſome time ſince ſignified your pleaſure, that any communication on this ſubject ſhould be in writing, I take the liberty of reſpectfully entreating your Royal Highneſs's permiſſion to ſubmit to your conſideration the outline of the plan which his Majeſty's Confidential Servants humbly conceive (according to the beſt judgment which they are able to form) to be proper to be propoſed in the preſent circumſtances

It is their humble opinion, that your Royal Highneſs ſhould be empowered to exerciſe the Royal Authority in the name and on the behalf of his Majeſty, during his Majeſty's illneſs, and to do all Acts which might legally be done by his Majeſty, with proviſions, nevertheleſs, that the care of his Majeſty's Royal perſon, and the management of his Houſehold, and the direction and appointment of the Officers and Servants thereto, ſhould be in the Queen, under ſuch regulations as may be thought neceſſary That the power to be exerciſed by your Royal Highneſs ſhould not extend to the granting the real or perſonal property of the King (except as far as relates to the Renewal of Leaſes), to the granting any Office in reverſion, or to the granting, for any other term than during his Majeſty's pleaſure, any Penſion, or any Office whatever, except ſuch as muſt by Law be granted for Life, or during good behaviour, nor to the granting any rank or dignity of the Peerage of this realm, to any perſon, except his Majeſty's iſſue who ſhall have attained the age of 21 years

Theſe are the principal points which have occurred to his Majeſty's Miniſters.

I beg leave to add, that their ideas are formed on the ſuppoſition that his Majeſty's illneſs is only temporary, and may be of no long duration It may be difficult to fix before-hand the preciſe period for which theſe proviſions ought to laſt, but if unfortunately his Majeſty's recovery ſhould be protracted to a more diſtant period, then there is reaſon to imagine, it will be open to the wiſdom of Parliament, to re-conſider theſe proviſions, whenever the circumſtances appear to call for it

If your Royal Highneſs ſhould be pleaſed to require any further explanation on the ſubject, and ſhould condeſcend to ſignify your orders, that I ſhould have the honour of attending your Royal Highneſs for that purpoſe, or to intimate any other mode in which your Royal Highneſs may wiſh to receive ſuch explanation, I ſhall reſpectfully wait your Royal Highneſs's commands. I have the honour to be,

With the higheſt deference and ſubmiſſion,

Your Royal Highneſs's

Moſt dutiful

And devoted Servant,

W PITT.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES's ANSWER.

Carlton House, Jan.

"The Prince of Wales learns from Mr. Pitt, that the proceedings in Parliament are now in a train which enables Mr. Pitt, according to the intimation in his former letter, to communicate to the Prince, the outlines of the plan which his Majesty's confidential servants conceive proper to be proposed in the present circumstances.

"Concerning the steps already taken by Mr Pitt, the Prince is silent—Nothing done by the two Houses of Parliament can be a proper subject of his animadversion, but when previously to any discussion in Parliament, the outlines of a scheme of government are sent for his consideration, in which it is proposed that he shall be personally and principally concerned, and by which the Royal authority, and the public welfare, may be deeply affected, the Prince would be unjustifiable were he to withhold an explicit declaration of his sentiments. This silence might be construed into a previous approbation of a plan, the accomplishment of which every motive of duty to his Father and Sovereign, as well as of regard for the public interest, obliges him to consider as injurious to both. In the state of deep distress, in which the Prince and the whole Royal family were involved, by the heavy calamity which has fallen upon the King, and at a moment when government, deprived of its chief energy and support, seemed peculiarly to need the cordial and united aid of all descriptions of good subjects, it was not expected by the Prince, that a plan should be offered to his consideration, by which government was to be rendered difficult, if not impracticable, in the hands of any person intended to represent the King's authority,—much less in the hands of his eldest son, the Heir Apparent of his kingdoms, and the person most bound to the maintenance of his Majesty's just prerogative and authority, as well as most interested in the happiness, the prosperity, and the glory of the people.

"The Prince forbears to remark on the several parts of the [illegible] plan [illegible] have been framed with [illegible] tion to preclude the possibility of [illegible] gument of his principles, attachment [illegible] resentment in the projectors of it. But he trusts, with confidence, to the wisdom and justice of Parliament, when the whole of the subject, and the circumstances connected with it, shall come under their deliberation.

"He observes therefore only generally on the heads communicated by Mr. Pitt, and it is with deep regret the Prince makes the observation that he sees, in the contents of that paper, a pretext for producing weakness, disorder, and insecurity in every branch of the Administration of affairs, a project for dividing the Royal Family from each other, for separating the Court from the State, and thereby disarming Government from its natural and constitutional support: a scheme disconnecting the authority to command service from the power of animating it by reward, and for allotting to the Prince all the invidious duties of Government, without the means of softening them to the public, by any one act of grace, favour or benignity.

"The Prince's feelings on contemplating this plan, are also rendered still more painful to him, by observing that it is not founded on any general principle, but is calculated to infuse jealousies and distrust (wholly groundless he trusts) in that quarter, whose confidence it will ever be the first pride of his life to merit and obtain. With regard to the motive and object of the limitations and restrictions proposed, the Prince can have but little to observe. No light or information is afforded him by his Majesty's Ministers on those points. They have informed him what the powers are, which they mean to resume him, not why they are withheld.

"The Prince, however, holding as he does, that position undoubted and fundamental principle of this constitution, that the powers and prerogatives of the Crown are vested there, as a trust for the benefit of the people, and that they are lodged only as they are necessary to the preservation of that power and balance of the constitution, which experience has proved to be the true security of the liberty of the subject, must be allowed to observe, that the plea of public utility ought to be strong, manifest, and urgent, which calls for the extinction or suspension of any one of those essential rights in the supreme power or its representative, or which can justify the Prince in consenting, that in his person, an experiment shall be made to ascertain with how small a portion of the Kingly power, the executive government of this country may be carried on

"The Prince has only to add, that if happy for his Majesty's re poſſeſſing his [illegible] go[illegible]nment, wherever it ſhall pleaſe Providence [illegible] the [illegible]ty to remove [illegible] with which he is afflicted, [illegible] this plan [illegible] vinced, [illegible] even conſidering [illegible] to urge his [illegible] conſideration [illegible] he could [illegible]

"If [illegible] what [illegible] his Majeſty's feelings [illegible] happy day of his recovery [illegible] the Prince conſiders his [illegible] that no event ſhould be more [illegible] to the feelings of his Royal Father, or the knowledge that the greateſt part of his full and repreſentative bulwark [illegible] Sovereign power of the realm in a ſtate of degradation, of [illegible] authority and diminiſhed energy—a ſtate, hurtful in practice to the proſperity and good government of his people, and injurious in its precedent to the ſecurity of the Monarch, and the rights of his family.

"Upon that part of the plan which regards the King's real and perſonal property, the Prince feels himſelf compelled to remark, that it was not neceſſary for Mr Pitt, nor yet proper, to ſuggeſt to the Prince the reſtraint he propoſes againſt the Prince's granting away the King's real or perſonal property.

"The Prince [illegible] that during the King's [illegible] he is, by law, entitled to make any [illegible] grant; and he [illegible]

"The [illegible] penſion, [illegible] upon the [illegible] ſideration.

"His [illegible] may ariſe to the King [illegible] the peace and happineſs of the Royal Family, and to the ſafety and welfare of the nation, from the government of the country remaining longer in its preſent mangled and debilitated ſtate, convince him, in the Prince's mind, every other conſideration, and will determine him to undertake the painful truſt impoſed upon him by the preſent melancholy neceſſity (which of all the King's ſubjects he deplores the moſt), in full confidence, that the affection and loyalty to the King, the experienced attachment to the Houſe of Brunſwick, and the generoſity which has always diſtinguiſhed this nation, will carry him into the many difficulties inſeparable from this moſt critical ſituation, with comfort to himſelf, with honour to the King, and with advantage to the public."

KIRKSTALL ABBEY.

[With a View of It.]

IT is ſituated three miles North-Weſt of Leeds, and was built by Henry Lacey, who placed an abbot and 12 monks, with 10 lay brothers, who had been removed by him from Pontefract Abbey to Bernoldſwick, now tranſlated hither. This abbey afterwards found many benefactors, and became richly endowed. However, through miſmanagement they at length became indebted for the ſum of 3000l. an immenſe ſum at that time, and this obliged them to beg the protection of ſeveral princes, and to retrench their expences, by which means they in the year 1501, reduced their debt to 160l. At the time of the diſſolution, the revenue of this abbey was valued by Dugdale at [illegible] 1oſ. 4d. a year, and by Speed at [illegible] Part of the walls are ſtanding, from which it appears to have been a very ſpacious and beautiful building. There are ſtill were the remains of the chapels on the ſide of the great aiſle at the Weſt end of the church, and the tower built of free-ſtone was lately in good. The roof has been taken down ever ſince the diſſolution, but the dormitory and ſome other parts remain in tolerable repair. There are mills for grinding corn and fulling cloth, an iron forge, with a fulling mill, and a ſtone bridge over the river Aire. The Duke of [illegible] and [illegible] were [illegible] ſupplied with [illegible]

LIFE.

In Imitation of Doctor HAWKESWORTH's Ode, but written in somewhat a better humour with the ſubject.

LIFE! thou dear delicious gift!
Fraught with joy, but oh! too ſwift;
Well I know thy charms ſo ſuch,
Never art thou priz'd too much.
What is there the ſoul purſues,
Which it would not gladly loſe,
So to thee it ſtill might cling,
As its beſt and deareſt thing?
Let me trace thy fleeting ſcene —
See, the firſt, of artleſs mien,
A lovely gentle nymph appear,
With blooming features, ſoft and clear.
Her hair with ſimple flowrets dreſs'd,
Wantons o'er a ſnowy veſt,
Emblem of her ſpotleſs mind,
From all impurity refin'd
With placid ſteps ſhe moves along,
Serene, and ignorant of wrong.
By the hand I ſee her bring
A cherub fair as balmy ſpring
Mark its ſmiling, ſparkling eyes,
Playful tricks, and liſping voice,
Ruddy cheeks, where dimples play,
Ever beauteous, ever gay
Well I know the blooming pair
INNOCENCE and CHILDHOOD are.
Next a glowing boy comes nigh,
With panting breaſt and wanton eye,
Round whoſe poliſh'd brow divine
Fragrant roſes careleſs twine
Oer his ſhoulder graceful flung,
Is a golden quiver hung,
And his fare unerring hand
Doth a fatal bow command
Yet his ſhafts, tho' keen and bright,
Are ſteep'd in pleaſure and delight,
And the warmeſt bliſs is found
In their deepeſt, deadlieſt wound,
With him link'd in cloſe embrace,
Comes a youth replete with grace,
In whoſe hand a glaſs I ſpy,
Where he views with eager eye
Scenes of near accompliſh'd joy,
Rapture thron'd upon his cheek,
All his words and looks befpeak
Captive YOUTH, by LOVE poſſeſs'd,
LOVE, the tyrant of the bleſs'd.
Who art thou I next deſcry,
With ſober pace, and ſerious eye;
In a manly ſteady form I trace
Majeſty, and heavenly grace?
Tell me, ah! who is he
So like thyſelf that follows thee?
His firm expreſſive looks appear
The index of a judgement clear,
In all its various powers mature,
United to a mind as pure.
Sure thou art REASON, heavenly guide,
And this is MANHOOD by thy ſide.
Laſt, a venerable ſage
Doth my anxious view engage;
Time hath chang'd his locks to ſnow,
And planted wrinkles on his brow;
Hath chac'd each gay and youthful charm,
And bent his venerable form;
Yet tho' of youth and grace bereft,
All that claims reſpect is left.
Content, calm, pious, and reſign'd,
Religion fills his holy mind,
Bids him uncomplaining bear
Pain diſeaſe, or grief, or care,
Bids him view without a ſigh,
Life's laſt cloſing hour draw nigh
What ſpectre now, alas! appears?
Spare my heart its boding fears!
See! it lifts a deadly dart,
While I gaze it chills my heart —
Can'ſt thou view with ſtedfaſt eye?
Fly! oh hapleſs victim fly!
See! a ſmile adorns his cheek —
From his lips loud praiſes break —
See! he bares his willing breaſt,
And meekly ſinks to endleſs reſt
If my fancy tell me true,
This is VIRTUOUS AGE I view
And to ſuch, unſtain'd by error,
DEATH approaches, void of terror
Let me here the proſpect cloſe;
Aught beyond no mortal knows
Yet the fair tho' fleeting ſcene,
Which my anxious eye hath ſeen,
Bids me hope, when life is o'er,
For joy and bliſs unknown before

Why is this ſtrange language ſhown?
Know, raſh is in fair Cytherea,

THE HORSE,

A PARAPHRASE ON JOB XXXIX. 19, &c.

HAST thou, vain Man! array'd the generous Horse
With all his terror, and with all his force?
Hast thou inform'd his warrior head to shake,
Or hurl'd the thunder from his brawny neck?
Could it thou e'er make his stedfast soul afraid,
Or start at winds, or tremble at a shade?
See rage and valour unappall'd arise,
Leap in his breast, and roll within his eyes!
See him, provok'd, collect his store of fire,
And from his nostrils snort terrifick fire!
By fear untouch'd, he mocks his boundless way,
Tyrant to him who rules from sea to sea
Amidst War's horrid front he nobly bears,
Thro' iron harvest and thro' woods of spears,
Where all the battle storms, with loosen'd rage,
Helms clash with helms, and shields with shields engage,
With human light augment the solar ray,
Blaze blend with blaze, and triumph o'er the day
Whilst drum and trumpets join the various sound,
Cars chariots, horses rattle o'er the ground;
Whilst darts, stones, arrows, mingle as they fly,
And with hoarse hissings whiz along the sky,
Whilst shouts triumphant, and lamenting cries,
And all the terror of the battle rise,
See him thro' clouds of deaths undaunted dare,
And break thro' all the whirlwind of the war
Lo! foaming spumes now whiten o'er his chest,
Now horrors nod along his haughty crest,
Now all he treads, then spurns the wounded mead,
And the Earth groans beneath the furious steed
If, yet the fight but distant tubes declare,
And to faint murmors form th' uncertain air,
Mad with suspence, he chides the dubious sound,
And paws the winds, and swallows up the ground,
High he curvets, and o'er the champain flies,
As shoots a Rainbow thro' the Eoan skies.
Each wish, a truth he forms within his mind,
Sees bolts in clouds, hears trumpets in the wind,
Spear, flags, and javelins, flame before his sight,
And all the fancied engines of fight.
But when shrill clangors rend th' affrighted sky,
And certain thoughts proclaim the battle nigh;
The thick'ning sounds he drinks from his ear,
Or in his nostrils snuffs the coming war;
Now champs the bit, and now he chides aloud,
Now digs the sand, now spurns the yellow cloud;
Fierce by restraint, demands the long'ning fight,
Spreads all his soul, and glories in the might;
Approach'd, exults to meet the fainting foes,
The roar of cannons, and the vulgar throat;
Above the spheres promiscuous tumults hurl'd,
And thunders rolling to a distant world.

Tune — GILDEROY.

I.

I TOLD my charmer, that of wealth
Who little was my store,
I still would strive, while blest with health,
To make that little more
Content should thro' my labour smile,
And every care remove,
If she, the solace of my toil,
Would bless me with her love.

II

Her lilly hand I softly prest,
And kiss'd the flowing tear
A sigh of pity heav'd her breast,
Which spoke the soul sincere.
That spotless shrine where virtue lies,
May pity ever move!
But in her lustre-streaming eyes
I found expressive love.

ELEGY

On the DEATH of JOSEPH, PRINCE of BRAZIL, who died of the Small-Pox on the 11th of September, 1788, aged 27 years and 12 days.

Written on board a VESSEL in the RIVER TAGUS

I

COME, Elegy, with all thy sable train,
Sad Goddess, in funereal pomp appear;
Let distant nations hear the loss with pain,
And pity drop her sympathetic tear.

II

No venal muse the solemn dirge inspires,
Thy virtues, Joseph, animate the theme;
True worth, not titles, all my bosom fires;
Say, Death, why crush'st sweet Hope's delusive dream?

III. Who

III

Who can unfold the dark decrees of fate,
The mystic will of Jove, to us unknown?
Let contemplation dwell on life's short date,
But grant that Heaven may resume her own!

IV

Nor mad ambition rankled in his breast,
Though purple tides of blood he fought not fame;
Bland peace he courted, saw the people blest,
And future times shall venerate his name

In regal mansions Truth is seldom found,
Those flattery hovers with her painted wings,
And like a syren sends the pleasing sound
To charm, but yet delude, the ear of kings

VI

Illustrious Prince! thy candour gain'd a friend;
The greatest blessing monarchs can enjoy
Keen anguish now his noble breast will rend,
Thy loss his future peace of mind destroy

A cypress wreath now shades the royal brow,
Nor gem with studded gems is seen,
The honours regal, on her deep sorrows grow
The first of mothers, and a matchless Queen!

VIII

See Melpomene, with her down-cast eye,
From whence no tears to calm the passions spring,
Her bosom, bosom scarce emits a sigh,
In silent woe she bears the latest sting

IX

Fated Princess, what can charms avail!
Thy dimpled cheeks were once the seat of love,
The blush of beauty fades, and lilies pale
Succeed, thy truth and constancy to prove

X

Admetus, when his vital thread was spun,
Just took a form for protracted life
A willing victim claim'd, that he might shun
The fruit of death, none offer'd but his wife

XI

Thy love, Alcestes, triumph'd over death,
Again let Heaven reverse her sad decree,
Another Princess would resign her breath
And seek the tomb, great Prince, for love and thee.

XII

A mournful silence reigns throughout the land,
And every face the cloud of sorrow wears,
The sons of Albion form a drooping band,
And with the native sons Britannia tears

XIII

If pitying sighs departed spirits please,
Thy lingering shade shall hear the world complain,
Catch the soft murmurs floating on each breeze,
And from ethereal mansions long remain

SIR,

THE inclosed Epitaph among a variety of poetical trifles in the possession of one Abraham Hare, late an Excise Officer at Bridgnorth, in Shropshire, an untutored votary of Apollo, whose harmony of numbers and strength of imagination far excels that of most of the disciples of the polished muse. The person whom the subject of this little poetical effusion, was the daughter of Hue, a young woman, who died a few years ago, and lies buried in Tonge Church yard, in Shropshire. If you should deem the inclosed worthy a place in your entertaining Miscellany, I shall follow it with some other of the poor man's productions.

* The fable of Admetus

When Apollo was expelled from Heaven he became the shepherd of Admetus, and in return for the hospitable reception he met with, the god obtained from fate a prolongation of his life on his favourite King but on this condition that some self-devoted victim should die in his stead: all his subjects refused, and then his wife, Alcestes, died to save the life which was dearer to her than her own. But Hercules, the invincible son of Jupiter, conquered Death, and compelled him to give up the lovely prize — Adm[illegible] again possessed his wife

MONTHLY CHRONICLE.

Dec 27, 1788

YESTERDAY evening at half paſt ten o clock, about half the Eaſtern Terrace at Somerſet Place fell to the ground, it had given way ſome days before, and in conſequence, carriages have been prevented driving over it ever ſince Thurſday morning

Laſt week at Guildhall was tried before Mr Juſtice Heath, and a ſpecial jury, a cauſe of great conſequence to trade in general, and manufacturers in particular The action was brought by Meſſrs Quintin, of London, glaſs manufacturers, againſt Meſſrs V and Co for inticing away three of their apprentices and a journeyman, when a verdict was given for the plaintiffs for 300l damages —It was agreed and admitted, that the hiring of a journeyman, whilſt in the ſervice of another maſter without the latter's conſent, though only engaged from week to week, was an inticing away, and therefore actionable, and that the ſame law extended to ſervants of all denominations

The Prince of Wales has already diſtributed above 500 guineas, in relief of induſtrious poor, during the hard weather

The weather in Holland is the moſt ſevere and intenſe ever known travellers have been found frozen to death on horſeback; cattle have died in great numbers, and many perſons who ſhut themſelves up in their bakehouſes have not eſcaped

Three carriages full of company have been loſt, by the breaking of the ice on the Meuſe, near Rotterdam, they all periſhed, and neither carriages, horſes, nor people, have been found

31 The year 1788 has produced no leſs than ſeven hundred and nine bankrupts The year 1778 comes neareſt to this, but the difference is one hundred and forty two—the difference in value, we are aſſured, is many millions In 19 years, from 1740 to 1758, the number was four thouſand two hundred and fifty—from 1759 to 1777, the number was five thouſand three hundred and thirty-one and from that time to this day, leſs than eleven years, the number is 5489!!

JAN 1, 1789

Seaſonable thoughts —Thouſands who have beheld the dawn of this year, will never ſee another If even, with the ordinary comforts of life, we are pierced with the preſent ſeverity of cold, ſhould it not draw our feelings with quick compaſſion for the miſerable and deſtitute?

General deaſt for 1789.—People will eat, drink, and ſleep in the uſual way, unleſs (what no one expects) ſome genius will invent a butter Many ſuppoſe that a comet will appear, and there are thoſe who are bold enough to affirm, that quarter-day will. Many who love matrimony firſt year, will hate it laſt. Will the alteration of the year make any alteration in the conſumption of tea, porter, gin, and tobacco?

3 This morning at two o'clock, a poor woman, with her throat cut, was found by the watchmen at the gate of General Conway's. Though her windpipe was nearly divided, and ſhe had loſt much blood, yet ſhe appeared deprived of life more from the bitter ſharpneſs of the night, than from the effects of her wound, for by the time ſhe was ten minutes in the houſe, her languid pulſe and breathing returned. She afterwards declared, that from poverty ſhe herſelf did the deed with a razor, which was found near the place, but that ſhe was ſorry for what ſhe had done. The wound was ſewed up, and ſome warm wine given her, when ſhe was taken to St George's hoſpital, where ſhe has ſince recovered.

Letters from Oxford of this date ſay, "Tueſday laſt the mercury in a thermometer expoſed to the North eaſt aſpect in the open air, in this city, was obſerved to be ſo low as 13° of Fahrenheit's ſcale, at ſeven in the morning, which is the loweſt degree it has been ſeen here at this ſeaſon, and is exactly the ſame as the greateſt cold obſerved in the hard froſt of 1739, 40, but the thermometer has been noticed lower than in England at different periods ſince that time.

"Laſt Sunday quickſilver was reduced here to the ſtate of a perfect ſolid metal, by the uſual mean for generating artificial cold, which is preſumed to be the firſt inſtance of this kind upon record in Britain.—And on Tueſday following ſome quickſilver was again completely frozen (which is ſtill more extraordinary) in a frigorific mixture compoſed of powdered ſalts (inſtead of ſnow) diſſolved in a diluted mixture of mineral acids."

A ſmall graſs farm, on the banks of the Luggen, about four miles from Dumbarton, Scotland, was ſold, a few days ago, by public auction at nearly double the yearly rent of the laſt tenant!

Copy of a letter from his Royal Highneſs the PRINCE of WALES's Treaſurer to the CHAMBERLAIN of LONDON.

Golden ſquare, June 6, 1789.

SIR,

HIS Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, apprehending that the poor of the city of London may be put to ſome hardſhip and inconvenience in this inclement ſeaſon, from the delay of the King's Annual Bounty, (ariſing from the preſent unfortunate ſtate of his Majeſty's health) has commanded me to pay 1000l into the Chamber of London, to be applied to the relief of the poor, in the ſame manner that his Majeſty's bounty has uſually been. I have the honour to be,

Your moſt obedient humble ſervant,

To the Chamberlain of the City of London H LYTE, Lord Gaſs

Jacob Canter, alias Richter, alias Rhode, alias Benjamin, the perſon advertiſed for paſſing forged notes to a great amount on Biddulph and Co. and Meſſ. Lanefords, was apprehended at Wippingon Wedneſday, and is committed for trial.

A grey horſe died laſt week at Mancheſter, at the uncommon age of 43 years. He was brought from Scotland in 1745.

10 The Thames at Iſlington to the oppoſite ſhore is frozen over, numbers of perſons having walked acroſs yeſterday. At Shadwell, the Thames is likewiſe frozen quite over, ſeveral booths are fixed on the ice, and yeſterday an ox was roaſted whole, and ſold to the people who were ſkating and ſliding.

The ice extends at Graveſend from ſhore to ſhore, from one end of the Reach to the other, ſo that no boat can move, the navigation being entirely ſtopped.

The ſcene on the Thames is really entertaining from Putney-bridge upwards the river is completely frozen over, and people walk to and from the different villages on the face of the deep. Of late to Windſor-ſtreet, booths have been erected, and a fair is kept on the river. Multitudes of people are conſtantly paſſing and repaſſing. A ſheep was roaſted whole on Friday, and ſold for 8d. a pound to the populace.

Tueſday

Tuesday last a fore quarter of mutton was roasted on the ice, on Shepperton Deep, where about 100 people attended to eat it; after which they drank and smoked, and were very merry

No sooner had the Thames acquired a sufficient consistency, than booths, turnabouts, &c &c were erected, the puppet-shows, wild beasts, &c were transported from every adjacent village, while the watermen, that they might draw their usual resources from the water, broke the ice close to the shore, and erected bridges, with toll bars, to make every passenger pay a halfpenny for getting to the ice One of the suttling booths had for its sign, "Beer, wine, and spirituous liquors, without a licence" A man who sells hot gingerbread had a board, on which was written, "No shop tax nor window duty" All the adventure consisted in these short attractive sentences for the preference of the company

A curious gentleman at Turnham-Green made the following experiment with a twelve pounder, viz The piece was during the severity of the frost filled with water, the mouth was then securely screwed up, and in the middle of the night it burst asunder with a prodigious explosion

13 Among the many circumstances recorded during the present frost, the following is worth attention four men belonging to Whitstable went out yesterday sennight, to collect some scattered pieces of wreck that were floating on the surface of the sea, on their return they were completely hemmed in by a prodigious body of ice, of near two miles in length, and were so circumstanced that they could neither extricate themselves, nor could any person lend them assistance In this situation they remained till Friday afternoon, when the wind having carried the ice to sea, they with great difficulty landed being nearly exhausted with hunger and fatigue

In the hard frost 1739 40, the Thermometer never fell two degrees below the freezing point; and the greater part of the time the wind was W. and W. by S. but seldom in the E or N. In the present season the quicksilver has been concentrated entirely, and the Wind generally at E N. N. by W and but seldom from thence for seven weeks past.

17 Perhaps the breaking up of the ice upon the Thames last Tuesday night below the bridge, exceeded every idea that could be formed of it, as it was not till after the dusk of the evening, that the busy crowd were persuaded of the approach of a thaw. This however with the cracking of some ice about eight o clock, made the whole a scene of the most perfect confusion, as men, beasts, booths, turnabouts, puppet-shows, &c. &c. were all in motion, and pouring towards the shore on each side The confluence here was so sudden and impetuous, that the watermen who had formed the toll bars over the sides of the river, where they had broken the ice for that purpose, not being able to maintain their stand from the crowd, &c. pulled up the boards, by which a number of persons who could not leap, or were borne down by the press, were souted up to the middle, happily, very little damage besides was sustained, except the loss of a few hats, handkerchiefs, &c by the light-fingered gentry, who wailed themselves of the confusion. The difficulty of landing at the stairs about Tower-hill, however, was in the extreme till near ten o clock, occasioned by the crowding of people from the shore, who were attracted by the confusion on the water.

Tuesday about three o clock as some people were drinking in a tent on the ice, a little below London bridge, that part of the ice the tent was upon broke from the main body, and floated with the tide almost to one of the arches of London bridge, where the people were taken out in boats.

June 1, 1789 The Right Hon Thomas Norton, Lord Grantley He was born June 23, 1716, and married May 31, 1742, Grace, eldest daughter of Sir Wm. Chapple, Knt. one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench In 1763 he was appointed Solicitor General, upon the resignation of Charles Yorke, esq and knighted In 1765 he was advanced to be Attorney General. In 1769 he was constituted Chief Justice in Eyre, South of Trent In the eleventh Parliament of Great Britain he represented the borough of Appleby, in Westmoreland, and at the next General Election was chosen for Wigan, in Lancashire; at those of 1774 and 1780 he was elected for Guildford, in Surry, and upon the resignation of Sir John Cust, in 1769, was elected Speaker of the House of Commons On the 9th of April 1782 he was created Lord Grantley. He was also a Privy Councillor, Recorder of Guildford, and Doctor of Laws. Lord Grantley, in many points of view, deserved much praise He was a good father, a good husband, and a good son On his becoming successful in business he sent his mother a new carriage, with every thing belonging to it, which she returned to him as too magnificent for her use He was remarkable for the pains he took for his clients, whose causes he never deserted as long as there was a chance of success Another excellence he possessed, which was, that he always knew when he had evidence sufficient to establish his case, and went no further; perhaps remembering the well-known maxim, "He who proves too much proves nothing" While in practice he used to be charged with too much attention to fees This, however, was not well founded, as the following anecdote will attest On the prosecution of Justice Gillam, in 1788, he retained Lord Grantley with a 50l. Banknote, but on the trial, being acquitted without the aid of counsel or the examination of a witness, his Lordship, at the next Sessions at Guildford, placed himself next the clerk, and returned the identical note he had received

ANECDOTES of Dr MESSENGER MONSEY.

IT has been obſerved, that characters of ſingularity, whim, and eccentricity, abound more in this iſland than in any other country, and this has been commonly ſuppoſed to ariſe from the pure and perfect ſtate of liberty which we enjoy in a degree greatly ſuperior to every foreign nation. The juſtice of the remark cannot be denied, and from hence foreigners have derived that particular turn for humour which is in vain to be ſought for in other countries. An Engliſhman ſeems to conſider himſelf as exempt from all rules of behaviour. Reſtraining himſelf only within the bounds of the municipal laws, he deems himſelf at liberty to indulge, and even to riot in any oddity or extravagance by which he may chuſe to diſtinguiſh himſelf from his neighbours. Theſe deviations (though they frequently violate the laws of good-breeding) are generally harmleſs, often uſeful, and ſometimes laudable. The ſubject of our preſent conſideration had many peculiarities, ſome follies, and ſome virtues. The firſt, however, prevailed in a very great degree, though not enough to obſcure or extinguiſh either of the latter.

Dr MESSENGER MONSEY was born in the year 1693, at a village in Norfolk, of which his father (who forfeited his preferment at the Revolution on account of the oaths then impoſed) was rector. He received a good education, ſuperintended by his father, and at a proper time was ſent to Cambridge, and was entered of Pembroke College, where he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts in 1714. As no other degree was conferred on him at the univerſity, it is probable he left it early. It is ſaid that he afterwards ſtudied phyſic ſome time under Sir Benjamin Wrench, at Norwich, from whence he removed to Bury, and practiſed there as a phyſician.

From this outſet in life it ſeemed probable that his deſtiny would have fixed him within the narrow limits of a country town, and the diſtrict around it, but accident, which frequently determines more important matters than the fate of a country phyſician, ordered it otherwiſe. By one of thoſe lucky incidents which chance alone could bring about, he had the good fortune to be introduced to the notice of the late Earl of Godolphin, who took him under his protection, patronized him, and provided for him.

The incident which introduced him to that nobleman is ſaid to be as follows. The Earl, being in his way to Newmarket, was ſeized with a fit while by himſelf, but his ſervant hearing him fall, came time enough to prevent the conſequences that might have attended the accident. The neareſt phyſician was ſent for, who happened to be Dr Monſey. The Earl's ſituation requiring much care and attention, the Doctor continued with him until he entirely recovered, and during the term of his attendance rendered himſelf ſo acceptable to his future patron, that when he had completed the cure, he received a propoſal from the Earl to become his domeſtic phyſician, with a ſalary of 500 l a year. After ſome ſhort deliberation the offer was accepted, the Doctor removed to the Earl's houſe in London, where he was introduced to all those who were eminent for rank, talents, or literature

From this period his character as a man, as a physician, and as a humourist, became more extensively known, and the knowledge of it produced the usual returns which eminence in any way generally occasions For his skill and humanity he was applauded, for his caprices censured It has been said by one who was no inattentive observer of mankind, that it was at this time much the fashion for those who affected manners different from the rest of the world, to copy those of Mr Quin, who, with many excellent qualities, mixed too much austerity, if not savageness, in his deportment His eminence as an actor, and a degree of independence which he asserted, gave him much weight with the young and those who desired to depart from the fashion of the day By his means, it has been suggested, much artificial brutality was propagated, and in some of his old companions it is hardly worn out at present Be this conjecture however as it may, certain it is that our Doctor, if he had it not naturally, soon adopted a rude ill-bred system of manners, which acquired strength by age, and deprived him, as it naturally must be expected, of much of the respect he would otherwise have received Though he was intimate with Lord Chesterfield, he had none of the politeness, and tho' in the daily conversation of wit and beauty, he wore off but little of the motoseness which clouded his deportment by their example As from his extravagancies much of his reputation is derived, we shall now proceed to exhibit some instances of it

——nec
Parcere cultibus scenatis
Obliviosa lævia Massico
Cæcuba templo —— HOR.

A FOREIGNER of an intelligent and speculative mind arriving in the metropolis of this country, will readily imagine, from that contempt of œconomy so visible in its public buildings, and the splendour of equipages whirling past him in rapid succession, that we are an opulent and luxurious people

Should his introduction to its inhabitants be at the table of some eminent merchant or capitalist in the centre of the side-board, the numerous attendants, variety of wines, and delicacy of the viands, seen by no means calculated to weaken that opinion But when at this sumptuous board he finds the conversation turn entirely on bad times, heavy taxes, and scarcity of money, he will certainly suppose himself in the house of an undone Timon, who had collected the shattered remains of his once splendid fortune to furnish forth to his friends a farewell entertainment

I am an elderly man, and by forty years close attention to business in the line of a broker, have acquired a decent competency, during the latter part of which time I have had leisure to observe (with concern I confess) the rapid change in City manners, and as I have sat at the table of Mr Deputy Sugarcane, neither the fumet of the venison, nor the fragrance of the dessert, could erase the pleasing remembrance of the plain joint and marrow pudding once smoaking on the Sunday board of his worthy father, whose plum, acquired by unremitting industry, was preserved by decent frugality, although now reduced by the taste and elegance of his son to something less than twenty thousand pounds But while I lamented the progress of luxury in the capital, I did not conceive it's enervating influence was so widely diffused over the provinces, till necessity compelling me, for the first time, to take a journey into the North of England, I was convinced it lost little by travel

During my stay in the country, I received a card of invitation to dine with an old correspondent, Mr Jeremiah Huckaback, a person who from the smallest beginnings would have shortly realized the sum of ten thousand pounds in the double capacity of linen draper and grocer, had he not unfortunately been seized with a disorder too prevalent in this country called the Pot tumultus, or, in other words the ambition of making a genteel appearance

After dreſſing myſelf as well as a traveller could, at three o clock I proceeded to the houſe of my friend, who, after a cordial reception, conducted me into a large room he had converted from a warehouſe into what he called a ſaloon, where we joined a numerous aſſemblage of his friends After the uſual compliments and introductory converſation had paſſed, I ventured to caſt my eyes round the apartment, whoſe ſtuccoed walls were covered with portraits at full length, moſt of them in armour Had I not been tolerably well acquainted with my friend's pedigree, I ſhould have venerated them as the warlike forms of his anceſtors, but a portly gentleman called Mr Sago, obſerving my attention, took me aſide, and after ſeveral ſly hints of fools and their money, informed me, they were painted by one Vandyke, who lived in the reign of William the Conqueror, that Mr Huckaback had purchaſed them at the extravagant price of half-a-guinea a head at the ſale of Sir John Hazard's effects, a gentleman of ſpirit and family, who, notwithſtanding he had kept the very beſt of company, had lately condeſcended to accept an invitation to ſpend a fortnight with the governor of the county gaol I could hardly preſerve my gravity at the ambitious introduction of my friend into this good company Between two whiſkered viſages hung the ſmiling reſemblance of Captain Huckaback, for you muſt know that this town being within fifty miles of the ſea, my friend, who had been a lieutenant in raiſing, was complimented with the command of a martial phalanx, bound by the tie of honour alone to defend their wives and property from the depredations of thoſe unprincipled renegadoes Paul Jones and Luke Ryan

His head, tho' not caſed in an helmet, looked very reſpectable in a large white wig in full buckle, his legs, that bore no ſlender reſemblance to two upright beer barrels ſupporting an hogſhead in the ſame poſition, were partly enveloped in ſhining gaiters Beneath his double chin depended the glittering gorget a crimſon ſaſh begirt his ample waiſt, and the judicious painter, to avoid all appearance of ſtiffneſs, had placed him in that poſition called by military men ſtanding eaſy In about an hour a boy in livery came and announced dinner On our entrance into the dining-room we were received with great ſtate by Madam Huckaback, dreſſed to the very height of the mode She was ſupported by her youngeſt daughter Euphraſia (Clementina the eldeſt having run off with her papa's book-keeper), and Maſter Marc Anthony Huckaback, a boy of fifteen years of age, her only ſon. This young gentleman had been named Anthony, with the dignified addition of Marc, in compliment to his paternal grandpapa, an eminent dealer in linen, who ſo religiouſly adhered to the good old maxim of keep your ſhop and your ſhop will keep you, that he never had borne his counter back through every county in England

On the birth of her youngeſt daughter, Mrs Huckaback inſiſted on a ſimilar compliment being paid to her family, but her inclinations were unfortunately happening to be Margery, which name was incapable of a poetical termination, Euphraſia was mutually agreed on, altho not with all the eclat expected The neighbours, whenever they had occaſion to mention the lady, pickt ſlightly over Mrs Euphraſia, but were ſure to compenſate for it by the firſt they laid upon Huckaback

The dinner was ſumptuous and well-ſerved, but ill-cooked, for Madam was too much du bon ton to look into her kitchen On the removal of the deſert, the company began to ſing before converſation, and as moſt of them had been in trade, I fully expected a diſſertation on the Exciſe, or a diſcuſſion of the Commercial Treaty, in which I ſhould have ventured I hould make ſome figure But to my ſurprize not a word paſſed, I heard a catch ſung, I fairly confeſs, on the price of oats, the exciſe only excepted, of Roaſt beef of old England then followed by a glee, and the chairman Mr Oldacre Quadrum muſt feel on being huſhed at the whiſt club held at the Bell in Pluſter This converſation was indeed a little relieved by the remarks of the lady of the houſe, and the ſprightly ſallies of her ſon, who ſeemed to have left the pueritia ſe merte in his maternal poſſeſſion. His father deſigned him for the law, not for that reaſon which he ſhould be made a ſolicitor, but his mamma, who ſhrewdly ſuſpected the boy, though but a child of his ſpirit ought to employ his talons in the ſervice of his country indeed by his front he ſeemed equally qualified to ſhine at the bar, or at the head of a company of militia

This difference of opinion occaſioned a little diſpute, in which Mr Huckaback apprehending a defeat, was obliged to riſe his voice and declare, that no man could be properly noticed by his ſuperiors without underſtanding Latin, but Mr

Knaveſ-

Knavesmire asserting that Jack Sweepstakes, who was the knowingest fellow in the world, understood Latin no more than the Pope of Rome, the army remained masters of the field of battle, and Mrs. Huckaback retired with her daughter to tiffle at whist for only half-crown points till evening, when both ladies were engaged to attend Mrs Dripping the tallow-chandler's ball and supper.

The gentlemen, according to an indubitable English custom, were left to entertain themselves Champaign, Madeira, [illegible], flowed rapidly round, the company resumed their former topic, exit Marc Anthony, who hearing I was from London, chose to attach himself to me, and I soon found his mamma had not overrated his spirit and accomplishments. He could speak French sufficiently to puzzle an Englishman who did not understand it, played a little on the violin, without submitting to the drudgery of learning the gamut, and informed me that after he and a party of his schoolfellows had done the usher over at the alehouse, he had rode a match with one of them for five guineas. Here he was interrupted in his story by his papa's calling upon him for a sentiment, but after he had given 'A Friend and a Bottle,' the rising sage had the assurance to make me his confidant in an intrigue he had with his mother's maid. By this time, to use Mr Marc Anthony's phrase, I was nearly done over, and took the first opportunity of leaving this very genteel company and returning to my inn, where being alone, I could not forbear reflecting on the absurdity of a man in a middle line of life complaining of hard times, and at the same time entertaining his friends with all the extravagant luxury of a Lucullus —Was a common tradesman content to live as well and no better than an opulent merchant did fifty years [illegible], would his wife and daughters [illegible] female in the kingdom, health, competence, and peace of mind would ensue. But what is generally the result of an attachment to present manners? The father drops payment, his creditors, exasperated at his prevarication, refuse to sign his certificate, and consign him over unavailing regret to the King's-Bench, his wife left dependant on the precarious bounty of her former friends, his son either adds to the prefatory alarming list of forgeries, or, if he is a man of spirit, exercises his gallantry on the road; the daughter, already infected by the poison of modern novels, falls an easy prey to the first seducer that promises to maintain her in her former affluence. It is with reluctance I trace her to the fatal day, when being abandoned by her lover, she is left by an unpitying world to feel and deplore the ruinous consequences of a modern education.

For the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE,

SOME ACCOUNT of Mr THOMAS RENNELL,

OF DARTMOUTH, IN DEVONSHIRE

THOMAS RENNELL was born of a good family near Chudleigh, in the county of Devon, in the year 1718. After remaining a sufficient time at a grammar-school at Exeter, he was put an apprentice in London to a linen-draper. How long he remained at that place after the expiration of his apprenticeship we are not told, and as we are not sufficiently informed shall not enter into a minute narrative of his life. At his return into the country he settled at Exeter, with a wife and family, but in process of time he entirely left them and went to Plymouth, where he resided many years, and drew several pictures, which were so much admired by the gentry of the neighbourhood, that the Duke and Duchess of Kingston, then at that place, were introduced to him, and were so much struck with his performances, that they endeavoured to draw him from his obscurity by a promise of their house at London, and their interest being exerted in his favour, but the offer had no effect on him. From Plymouth he went to Dartmouth, where he lived, or rather existed, for near twenty years, the most part of which time he spent in great poverty, and we are credibly informed, that he has sometimes lain in bed for a whole week, in very cold weather, without any other subsistence than a cake and water, being in want of almost every necessary of life. Although at times he would paint, yet he was generally negligent and improvident. His art had only its turn with his other amusements, and if a picture was completed in twelve months, it was thought very expeditious. This man, like many other great geniuses, was an entire stranger to frugality. No sooner was he in possession of a few pounds, but every strange object that presented itself within the compaſs of his pocket was immediately bought. Generous at theſe times to extreme, he was very ſoon reduced to his uſual diſtricts. A man of ſuch diſpoſition, it may be ſuppoſed, got but little eſteem or pity with mankind in general. But what chiefly rendered him unpleaſing to the rich and powerful, were the ſeverity of his ſature, and a bluntneſs which by many will be called a too ſtrict adherence to truth. He never flattered any man, and too freely told them their faults, pointing out at the ſame time the road for improvement. Such a character in the preſent æra of folly and diſſipation met but with few admirers. However, he ended his days much more comfortably than was expected, for near two years before he was taken ill, a decent lodging and ſufficient of the neceſſaries of life were furniſhed him by J. Seale, Eſq. of Dartmouth, where he died, after a lingering illneſs, which he bore with aſtoniſhing coolneſs and reſolution, the 19th of Oct. 1788, aged 70. Such was the philoſophic ſerenity of his ſoul, that in the agonies of death being aſked whether his pains were exceeding great, he replied, No, they were ſuch feelings as he could not deſcribe, having never felt any thing that bore the leaſt reſemblance to them; ſaid, it ſeemed a ſtrange infatuation; wiſhed his friend a good night, and expired.

Altho' this man enjoyed few of the bleſſings of this life, yet his mind was perfectly free, and he employed it with diligence, as appeared by his writings, models, plans, &c., but to the irreparable loſs of the community they were all deſtroyed, except the few poetical pieces herewith tranſmitted *. It is ſuppoſed they were thrown away as rubbiſh, or made uſe of to light fires, as they were loſt ſome time before his death, at which he expreſſed a great deal of concern. His knowledge was univerſal, and what ſeems moſt extraordinary, his taſte for the arts and ſciences was nearly alike, and "if not firſt in all, was in the very firſt line," as will appear by his works that remain.

As a painter, he is allowed to have had conſiderable excellence. His portraits, where he was not idle, are ſtriking and brilliant. His drapery is at leaſt equal to any artiſt's whatever. His landſcapes are excellent, perhaps not to be excelled. They are few, and rarely to be met with out of the neighbourhood of Dartmouth.

If he had a favourite among the arts it was chemiſtry, in which he employed the greateſt part of his time. Moſt of his operations, which he prepared himſelf, went through that operation. He found the means of making many of the moſt fixing to ſtand, and other diſcoveries that might have been of the utmoſt importance to mankind, had his papers been handed down to us.

Of muſic he was paſſionately fond: he was no very conſiderable performer, but a fine compoſer, in proof of which, a few pieces by him remain. As a laſting monument of his ſkill in muſic as a ſcience, he has left an inſtrument which is in the poſſeſſion of Mr Tolcher, of Plymouth. We have enquired of thoſe who have heard him perform on it, who all allow it to be a moſt complete and ſweet-toned inſtrument; in faſt, all who have heard it ſpeak of it with rapture. As we have not had a particular account, we cannot deſcribe it, but have been informed it is pretty large, and has a fine appearance—contains ſixty ſtrings, which are ſtruck with a bow moved by the foot, and is moderated by keys.

We come now to ſpeak of him as a poet; but here we will leave the reader to form his own judgment of him. He had once enough to make one large volume. The incloſed are the only entire pieces that are left. There were a few fragments, among which were a number of unconnected lines, which we found to be corrections of the defective parts of a long poem, in blank verſe. The ſubject ſeemed to be on death. The lines that were intelligible were highly poetical.

He had alſo invented many curious mechanical machines, and had an excellent taſte for architecture. He had penetrated into the deepeſt philoſophy, on which he would converſe with the greateſt perſpicuity and clearneſs. Such was his memory, that by once reading an author, he would for many years after repeat the principal paſſages, which, with his other accompliſhments, made him an agreeable and inſtructive companion.

Had we not thus far given the world the particulars of this extraordinary perſonage who died amongſt us, we ſhould have thought ourſelves deficient in reſpect to him, and to the community in general.

EXTRACTS of LETTERS from Dr. CONYERS MIDDLETON to Lord HARVEY, communicated by his Lordship's Brother to the Rev Mr WILLIAM TALBOT, of HANLOW, WARWICKSHIRE

July 1, 1733

IT is my misfortune to have had so early a taste of Pagan Sense, as to make me very squeamish in my Christian studies

Aug 25, 1733 I had pleased myself with the thoughts of spending one day philosophically with Chubb

Sept 15, 1733 The orthodox think to tame me, as they would do wild beasts, by suffering them to take no rest, but I shall have the grace still to follow my own reason, in spite of all their nonsense and am more thankful to God for what I do not believe, than for what I do In the one I may possibly be biassed by custom, authority, and interest, but the other is the triumph of my reason over prejudice that involve the greatest part of mankind If I am so happy as to please by my actions, &c. I can only say, Ecce opus manuum tuarum

An inviolable attachment to her Majesty and her family, is the only merit and virtue I pretend to

Oct 21, 1733 Dr Berriman's Preface, void of all candour and good sense

Dr. Waterland's importance of the Trinity, a surprizing piece of nonsense and prejudice

Aug 10, 1734 Sunday is my only day of rest, but not of liberty, for I am bound to a double attendance at church, to wipe off the stain of infidelity When I have recovered my credit, in which I make daily progress, I may use more freedom, but at present, the subjection I am under of keeping all forms, obliges me to put an end to your Lordship's trouble

July 27, 1735 [Speaking of the bishop of Winchester's Plain Account] I like both the design and the doctrine, as I do every design of reconciling religion with reason, or, where that cannot be, of bringing them as near together as possible His enemies will insult him with the charge of lessening Christian piety; but the candid will see, that he seeks only to destroy a superstitious devotion, by establishing a rational one in its place But as, by throwing down the shrines and altars of the church, he will raise no gain from the men of craft, so I rejoice much with your Lordship, that he has secured the good Castle of Farnham for his retreat

Feb 5, 1736 You would advise him [the author of the Plain Account] to write no more of his time in controversy, which, generally speaking, means no more at the best than to make plausible to weak men what is contemptible to men of sense

March 30, 1736 [On Mr Fox's (now Lord Holland) marriage to a great heiress]—This happy event will convince him, that, whatever else is transacted there, matches, at least, are made in heaven

Sept 13, 1736 These slumberers in stalls suspect me very unjustly of ill designs against their peace; for tho there are many things in the church that I wholly dislike, yet, whilst I am content to acquiesce in the ill, I should be glad to taste a little of the good, and to have some amends for that ugly assent and consent, which a man of sense can approve of We read of some of the earliest disciples of Christ, who followed him, not for his works, but for his loaves These are certainly blameable, because they saw his miracles, but to us, who had not the happiness to see the one, it may be allowed to have some inclination to the other Your Lordship knows a certain prelate, who, with a very low notion of the church's most sacred bread, has a very high relish for, and a very large share of, the temporal My appetite to each is equally moderate, and would be satisfied almost with any thing but mere emptiness I have no pretensions to riot in the feast of the elect, but, with the sinner in the gospel, to gather up the crumbs that fall from the table.

LETTER VII.

SIR, Paris, 9° Aug 77.

WHEN I doe not heare from my freinds in a long time, I presently conclude that either their is some letter hath miscarried, and soe betake my self to the known remedy of writeing again I have been now here above these two months, and though you that could doe all your markets here your self for two or three crowns, will not, 'tis likely, much need a factor, and soe I can hope for noe imployment from you, yet you must consider that I need to heare from you and having lost lately two very considerable freinds in England, Sir John King and Dr Barrow, you will not blame me if I enquire a little earnestly what is become of the rest The place you have given me in your freindship, and the great concernment it is to me to preserve that advantage, allow me to be inquisitive You must therefor excuse my importunity I who love my ease, even to a great degree of lasynesse, cannot take it amisse that you should be indulgent to yours But since you have charity enough sometimes to have your rest broken for the releife of others, permit me also to apply my self to you for a paine which you only can remedy, and let me know by the first that you are well, and preserve me in your memory I understand, both from him self and others, that our good freind Dr Sydenham hath of late been very ill of more then one maladye I hope he is by this time well recovered, and returned again to his old thoughts and practice of physique I am very much concerned for it, both for the publique and my owne particular interest Pray remember me very kindely to him, and in your next doe me the favour to let me know how he also does

LETTER VIII.

DEAR SIR,

I HAD noe sooner don my letter on the other side but I found it answered by yours of Jul, 25 And though it hath satisfied me that you are very well, and given me new proofs that you are very much my freind, yet it hath put new doubts into me, and methinks I see you going to loose your self I will say noe worse of it, not knowing how far the matter is gon, else I would aske you whether she were young, old, or middle-aged, each of which is sure to meet you with the horns of a dilemma I see you are, what ever you think, hot upon the scent, and if you have nothing else to defend you but those maxims you build on, I feare the close will lead you where you your self will be caught for be as grave and steady as you please, resolve as much as you will never to goe out of your way nor pace for never they nony nony whatsoever, you are not one iott the fairer for all this sturdyness For believe it, Sir, this sort of game haveing a designe to be caught, will hunt just at the pursuers rate, and will goe noe farther before then will just serve to make you follow and let me assure you upon good authority as honest Tom Bignall, that curae videnti pereo, is the unerrable ditty of many an honest gent But if you or the fates have determined (for the fates are still to be accused in the case) if your mettle be up and is bold as Sir Fr Drake you will shoote the desperate gulph yet consider that though the riches of Peru lie that way, how well you can endure the wearie navigation of the Mare de Zur, which all travellers assure us is nick-named Pacificum But hold, I goe to fast this perhaps, notwithstanding your ancient good principles, will be benefit to you by that time it comes to England, and therefor I conjure you by our friendship to burne this as soon as you have read it, that it may never rise up in judgment against me I see one is never sure of one's self, and the time may come when I may resigne my self up to the empire of the most fee, and abominate my self for these miserable errors However, as the matter now stands, I have discharged my conscience, and pray doe not let me suffer for it For I know you lodge are a sort of people that are bought to sacrifice all to your mistrisses But if the devill take you, if your heart does hang that way I wish you good luck. May Hymen be as kinde to you as ever he was to any body, and then I'm sure you will be much happier then any forlorne batchelor can be If it be like so be, I beg you to continue your care of my interest in the case, and remember it is for one that knows how to value the quiet and retirement you are going to quit You have noe more to doe for me then what lovers use to doe upon their owne accounte, viz keepe the matter as secret and private as you can, and then, when it is ripe and resolvd, give me but notice, and I shall quickly be with you, for 'tis by your directions I shall better governe my motions then by the flight of thrushes and field-mice Some remains of my cough, and something like a charge is fallen into my hands lately here, will, if nothing else happen, keepe me out probably longer then the time you mention But not knowing whether the aire of France will ever quite remove my old consumption or noe, I shall neglect that uncertainty upon the consideration of soe comfortable an importance, and for the other affaire I have here, if you please to let me heare from you some times how matters are like to go, I shall be able to order that well enough to come at the time you shall thinke seasonable Whatever happens, I wish you all the happinesse of one or tother condition, for I am, very perfectly,

Deare Sir,
Your most humble

LETTER VIII

Mr LOCKE to Dr MAPLETOFT.

DEARE SIR, (Date torn off)

I AM exceeding glad you have paid me my letter. Not that I think I put you in my debt by mine, but yet I tell you 'tis still a satisfaction to have to doe with people that goe (——) one's reach, nor doe not run their country I am therfor pleased to finde you still at Gresham Colledg ( ) count a much better lodging, not only than the next church yard in London, but even than the best house in Montpelier, and I should have taken it mighty ill of your lungs to have sent you of an errant thither, especially at a time when I had patched up mine soe well as to hope they would hold your strong London air, and allow me again the happynesse of your conversation after another fashion than this nigardly way of letter You obleige me by the promise you give me that I shall finde you plump at my returne I define it may not be interpreted by comparing yourselfe with me, for I doubt whether all the oatlans in France be able to communicate to me one grain of their fat, and I shall be well enough at my ease if when I returne I can but maintaine this poore tenement of mine in the same repaire it is at present, without hope ever to finde it much better For I expect not that Dr Time should be half soe favourable to my crazy body as it has been to you in your late disease 'Tis a good marke, but may have other dangers in it, for usually those whom that old winged gentleman helps up the hill, are not yet got out of the reach of the winged boy who does such mischief with his bow and arrows You see I conclude you keep your word, and that you are by this time not only well but in good plight I intend very speedily to come and see, so that if you have any more commissions for me here, I beseech you send them by the first opportunity, which I hope to give you a good account of without the convoy of 5000 to guard me home and, to tell you truly, I have such an esteeme for the rest on this side the water, and their country that I would not have them give themselves the trouble to come and see me in our villanous country of England, but stay at home and enjoy the paradise they have chez eux Dr Bugden is very well all but his old maladie, which he has some little but not violent fits of some times He presents you his service, The ——— you have with you, may be, for aught I know, a very able man But this is certaine he is modest too, and does not over-value himself, since he would pass for another, for he is one I never yet saw in my life, and therfore you may believe 'tis not he that was treated with for Dr. Bugden He is here in town, and I saw him him but yesterday, and here inclosed I have sent you his address which he gave me himself. My service to our good friend, when you see him, I writ to him since I came to Paris, but have not heard from him. My service also to our friend in Southampton fields. I am perfectly,

Sir,

Your most affectionate
Humble servant,

LETTER III

Mr Robert Nelson to Dr Mapletoft

London, the 3d May, 1684

Dear Sir,

I COULD not possibly resist so fair an opportunity, as Mr Taylor, the bearer hereof, gives me of writing to you. The true friendship I have for you makes me interest myself in all your concerns, and I cannot but rejoice that you are fixed to your satisfaction, though I suffer for the want of your good company, and I have that concern for the welfare of the public, as patiently to submit when I am sure such sensible advantages will accrue to it. Mr Taylor, Sir, desired me to recommend him to your acquaintance, and he being to settle at Ipswich, is not ignorant of the advantages of your friendship. I have known him ever since I have had the happiness to be related to my Lord Berkley's family, and have always found him a man of a very good temper, and to have given sufficient proofs of his good conduct, which good qualities being joined with sobriety and learning, as they make him in a great measure fit for the great character he bears of being one of God's immediate servants, so I am sure they will entitle him to your respect, and if I have the vanity to think that your esteem of him will not be lessened by my recommendation, your pardon is due to the presumption of one that sincerely loves you. Pray be so kind as to let me know the state of my aunt Applewhite's condition, not as if you enquired from me, but from yourself, one of her sons I have provided, and in the last hard weather sent her 5l. I shall do much as you shall advise me. My humble service to Mrs Mapletoft. We were [illegible] and happiness there.

Your most obliged friend
and servant,

R NELSON.

To my worthy friend Dr Mapletoft, at Ipswich

LETTER IV.

Mr. Robert Nelson to Dr Mapletoft.

THOUGH, Sir, I have not yet answered your letter, yet I took care to satisfy the contents of them, and have paid to Mr. Firmin 15l 10s which pays all the debts and includes the quarteridge besides: for the time to come if you will be pleased to give me credit every quarter-day, I will be sure to repay it here to Mr Firmin; which I desire to be put in mind of, not only as it may prove an help to my memory, but also as it may secure me your correspondence four times a year. I am sorry any reason has prevailed with my aunt to neglect her duty to God in the public worship. Pray satisfie yourself of her amendment in that particular, or else she will incurr my displeasure, and if you please let her know that except I have a good account of her attendance at Church, I shall be discouraged in my kindness to her. The character I have had of her makes me think her very unfit for keeping a school, but if she cannot employ herself otherwayes 'tis better then being idle. The Court is come to be my neighbour at St. James, where 'twill continue till Easter Munday, before which time 'tis expected the Queen-Dowager will be removed to Somerset house. Two days ago arrived the Duke of Ormond, and was received by the King with all possible demonstrations of kindness and civility. The common topicks of discourse at Court are the business of the Convention and the Election of Parliament men, neither of which subjects can afford you any news, unless you would be diverted by the ridiculous claims that are made by several that hold lands of the Crown. My humble service to Mrs Mapletoft. I am, Sir,

Your most affectionate
Humble servant,

R NELSON.

London, 4th April, 1685

To Dr Mapletoft, at Ipswich, in Suffolk.

An ACCOUNT of JESSE RAMSDEN

JESSE RAMSDEN was born at Halifax, in the county of York, the 6th of October 1730. His earlier studies excited in him an extreme desire of dedicating himself to the pursuit of literature, and the favourite objects which first struck his youthful mind were history and antiquities. Mathematics and chemistry next engaged his attention, but his father, who was a clothier, pressing him to follow some trade, he continued at home, in an employment not too well suited to him, till he was one-and-twenty.

At this period young Ramsden came to London in quest of some occupation more worthy his genius. Among other things, he applied himself to engraving, under the tuition of Burton. In this situation a fortunate circumstance led him to the object to which Nature seems to have designed him—the improvement of astronomical instruments, for the invention and construction of which he undoubtedly ranks the first in Europe. In the course of his employment, mathematical instruments were frequently brought to him to be engraved. The more he examined them the more he noticed their defects, and a secret instinct prompted him to wish to remove them. This wish was followed by a resolution to attempt it. He soon made himself master of the file and the lathe, and even of working glasses, and in 1763 made instruments for Sisson, Dollond, Nairne, Adams, and others. About 1768 he opened a shop for himself in the Haymarket *. At this period he formed the design of examining every astronomical instrument in use, in order to correct those which, founded on good principles, were faulty only in their construction, and to proscribe those which were defective in both points.

The reflecting quadrant, or sextant of Hadley, so much used by English seamen, appeared to Mr. Ramsden the most useful instrument of its kind, but it was at this time extremely imperfect. The essential parts of it had not a sufficient degree of solidity, the friction at the centre was too great, and in general the index might be moved several minutes without any change in the position of the mirror, the divisions were commonly very inaccurate, and Mr Ramsden found that Abbé de la Caille did not exceed the truth in estimating at five minutes the error to which an observer is liable in taking the distance between the moon and a star, an error capable of producing a mistake of fifty ... Ramsden ... On this account Mr. Ramsden changed the principle of ... made the ... to give an error of more than half a minute, and he has now brought them to such a degree of perfection as to warrant it not more than six seconds in a sextant of fifteen inches. Since the time of his improving them, Mr. Ramsden has already † constructed 983, and in several which have been carried to the East Indies and America, the deficiency has been found no greater at their return than it had been determined by examination before their being taken out. Mr. Ramsden has made them from fifteen inches to an inch and a half, in the latter of which the minutes are easily distinguishable, but he prefers for general use those of ten inches, as being more easily handled than the greater, and at the same time capable of equal accuracy.

The invention of a machine for dividing mathematical instruments was requisite, and to this Mr. Ramsden turned his thoughts with success. Those hitherto in use were very inaccurate. Graham and Bird used the dividers. The latter made a secret of his method; but before the Board of Longitude had purchased it, to make it public, Mr. Ramsden had invented for himself a method, and surpassed Bird in accuracy. For great works he still uses the dividers, but for common instruments they require too much time. He was ten years in bringing to perfection his engine, which unites the two properties of speed and facility, and is no small proof of the superior talents of its inventor. With it a sextant may be divided in the space of twenty minutes, and for those who may not choose to procure themselves the engine, Mr. Ramsden engages to divide any sextant for three shillings. This engine was laid before the Board of Longitude by Dr. Shepherd. A premium of six hundred guineas was given to the inventor by the Board, and a description of the engine, with a plate of it, was published in 1777. This edition was burnt by accident, and we are informed that M. de la Lande intends to have it reprinted, and a plate of the machine engraved, at Paris. The Board has frequently given greater premiums for inventions of less merit and utility; but the greatest men do not always meet the greatest rewards. Newton indeed was appointed Master of the Mint, but it is said, that he was not indebted for this solely to his merit. Mr. Ramsden has also made an inſtrument for dividing right lines, a deſcription of which has been publiſhed

Whilſt Mr Ramſden was employed on this engine for dividing mathematical inſtruments, he alſo turned his attention to the improvement of various inſtruments which were in uſe. The theodolite was formerly nothing but a glaſs turning on a circle, divided into ſpaces of three minutes, but in the hands of Mr Ramſden it is become a new and accurate inſtrument, equally uſeful for meaſuring heights and taking plans. The moſt admirable theodolite that has ever been conſtructed was made by him for Major-General Roy, for the purpoſe of meaſuring the ſeries of triangles in England, which were to form a connection with thoſe meaſured in France. Though this is only of eighteen inches radius, its accuracy is ſo great as not to admit an error of a ſingle ſecond. It has two glaſſes turning on an horizontal axis, with which may conſequently be meaſured the angles between objects of greater or leſs degrees of elevation, being brought to the horizon. The General has juſt meaſured the angle which the pole ſtar forms with the ſides of his triangles, in order to obtain the convergence of each as it ſtudly is on the oblate ſpheroid of the earth. From theſe operations it is already ſhewn that the difference of meridians between the two obſervatories of Paris and Greenwich is 9 20

Mr Ramſden has brought to remarkable perfection the barometer for meaſuring the heights of mountains. He has ſhewn M de Luc, that it was the ſummit of the column of mercury, not the part in contact with the tube, the height of which ſhould be obſerved. This in his barometer may be aſcertained to the hundredth part of a line, and the elevation of a mountain determined to a foot nearly. He has engraved a table to accompany his barometers, which gives the height of a place from that of the inſtrument without the trouble of a calculation, and this for all the different degrees of temperature. He has alſo, in a moſt ingenious manner, reduced to the greateſt ſimplicity the apparatus for the conveyance and ſupport of this portable barometer.

Various inſtruments for philoſophical purpoſes have been executed by Mr Ramſden, and all with ſome improvements. For inſtance an electrical machine, an inſtrument for meaſuring the denſity of the air, an inſtrument for meaſuring an inacceſſible diſtance, which does not require the meaſuring a baſe; micrometers, which turn with the ten thouſandth part of the weight uſed, levels of extraordinary ſenſibility, the dynameter, with which he meaſures the magnifying power of a lens; and to theſe might be added others, any one of which a common artiſt would think ſufficient to eſtabliſh his reputation, but of ſeveral of which Mr Ramſden thinks ſo little as ſcarcely to ſeem conſcious that they deſerve notice.

The pyrometer for meaſuring the dilatation of bodies by heat was alſo employed the talents of Mr Ramſden, as may be ſeen in the Philoſophical Tranſactions for 1785, and in the deſcription printed at Paris on account of the baſe meaſured for the triangles of Major General Roy. That gentleman obſerved a grand defect in the pyrometers in uſe, that of the bodies employed in the experiment nothing ſufficiently ſeparate. He has diſcovered a method of compaſſing, by means of his microſcopic pyrometer, a body expoſed to any degree of heat or cold with the ſame body in its natural ſtate, and by a micrometer adapted to the microſcope he meaſures the variations with a degree of accuracy hitherto unknown, and which has given the meaſure of a baſe with ten times as much preciſion as in any one that had before been meaſured. On this occaſion, as on all others, his Mr Ramſden diſplayed that ſingular talent of diſcovering the eſſential defects of an inſtrument, and correcting them by the moſt certain and ſimple means, which nature muſt give, art can never acquire.

The ſcience of optics is not leſs indebted to him. He has acquired a new and accurate method of correcting the aberration of ſphericity and refrangibility in compound eye-glaſſes, applicable to all kinds of aſtronomical inſtruments. Opticians had imagined this purpoſe might be effected by making the image of the object fall between the two eye-glaſſes, but this was attended with great inconvenience, as the eye-glaſſes could not be touched without affecting the value of the parts of the micrometer. To remedy this inconvenience, Mr Ramſden ſet out with a very ſimple experiment, namely, that the borders of an image ſeen through a priſm are more faintly coloured in proportion as the image is nearer it. This led him to attempt placing the two eye-glaſſes between the eye and the image of the object, without omitting to correct the two aberrations, which he has accompliſhed plished by placing the glaſſes in a manner altogether different from the common one, and altering the radii of the curves

Mr Ramſden has alſo invented a reflecting objective micrometer, which is deſcribed in the Tranſactions of the Royal Society for 1779 In this are pointed out the inconveniencies and inaccuracy of that firſt invented by Bouguer in 1748, in which the different poſitions of the eye with reſpect to the pencil of light, cauſe the two images to appear ſometimes to touch, at others to recede from each other, or both alternately by a kind of oscillatory motion He perceived alſo, that the aberration of the rays, which rendered the objects ill-defined, increaſed the inconvenience of that inſtrument He thought it advisable therefore to ſubſtitute the principle of reflection to that of refraction This inſtrument, not leſs ſimple than ingenious, conſiſts in a mirror of glaſs but three neceſſary to the telescope, and the ſeparation of the two images depends ſolely on the inclination of the mirrors, not on the focus.

He has, however, turned his attention to the improvement of the refracting micrometer, and the fortunate idea of placing this micrometer precisely in the conjugate focus of the firſt eye-glaſs, inſtead of on the ſide of the object glaſs, ſuggeſted itſelf to his mind By this means the contrary refractions of the two ſemi-lenſes, and of the whole lens, correct the error that takes place in the objective micrometer, in which the image depends only on the focus of the two ſemi-lenſes, and, the image being already contracted by magnified before it falls on the micrometer, the refraction and imperfection of the glaſſes can occaſion no ſenſible error in the meaſure of the angle It is true that the field of the micrometer muſt be leſs in this poſition than if it were in the object glaſs, but Mr Ramſden has contrived to throw an uniform degree of light on the images in every part of the field With this micrometer the diameters of planets may be meaſured to every direction it may be fitted to all kinds of aſtronomic glaſſes, it may be brought nearer to the object-glaſs, or carried further from it, ſo as to render viſion diſtinct; and it may be withdrawn from the tube containing the eye glaſſes, ſo as to uſe the telescope without the micrometer. All theſe advantages make Mr Ramſden's micrometers highly valued, and the aſtronomer who has one of them may eſteem himſelf fortunate

In 1786, Mr Ramſden was choſen a Fellow of the Royal Society, an honour by no means unmerited, nor has it abated his ardour for his favourite purſuits

The objects hitherto mentioned are not been the moſt important of Mr Ramſden's works The tranſit inſtrument and equadrant have received conſiderable improvements in his hands The equatorial, firſt made by Siſſon and a little improved by Short, has been greatly improved by Mr Ramſden In the firſt place, he has reſtored the endleſs ſcrew, which preſſing on the centre deſtroyed its accuracy, he has made the centre of the baſe the centre of gravity, he has contrived all the movements to take place in all directions, he has pointed out the means of rectifying the inſtrument in all its parts, and he has added to it a very ingenious little inſtrument for aſcertaining or correcting the effect of refraction This invention was conſiderably prior to that which Mr Dollond has given in the Philoſophical Tranſactions Mr Ramſden has procured a patent for his equatorial but the beſt method of preventing others from imitating it would be to ſupply the demand for them by making a greater number himſelf Mr Mackenzie, brother to the Earl of Bute, a particular friend to Mr Ramſden, has publiſhed a deſcription of this machine, but the inventive genius of Mr Ramſden does not often ſuffer him to execute the ſame inſtrument many times in the ſame manner and very frequently has he broken to pieces inſtruments, which, after having coſt a conſiderable ſum, have not ſucceeded to his wiſh

The greateſt equatorial ever yet attempted is that which he is at preſent making for Sir William Shuckburgh, on which he has been employed theſe nine years The circle of declinations is four feet in diameter, ſo that they may be obſerved nearly to a ſecond. The glaſs is placed between ſix pillars, which form the axis of the machine, and turn round by two pivots placed on two blocks of ſtone

The tranſit inſtrument is uſed in all the great obſervatories of Europe, but Mr. Ramſden has made many improvements in it He has invented a method of throwing light on the threads, by making it paſs along the axis of the inſtrument The reflector is placed interiorly and obliquely in the middle, it takes nothing from the opening of the object-glaſs, and, as the light paſſes through a coloured priſm, which may be moved at will, it may be increaſed or diminiſhed

For the verification of this eſſential inſtrument, Mr Ramſden does not employ the ſpirit-level, which he does not very highly highly esteem, as incapable of the accuracy he always aims at. His method is to suspend a plumb line before the glass placed vertically. This line passes through two points marked on two pieces fixed at the top and bottom of the glass, one of which is moveable in a small degree. The line is quite detached from the glass, and when it answers to the same points in the two different situations of the glass, it is evident, that the axis is horizontal, as has been remarked by Mr de la Lande, in his astronomy. But what is most new and ingenious in this method is, that the line sometimes passes only through the images of the points, formed in the focus of a small lens, because he is occasionally obliged to place the dial at some distance from the instrument, but its accuracy is not diminished, nor is there any parallax. "It is not the point I shall make use of," said he once jocularly, "but its ghost."

The meridian glasses of Mr Ramsden, such as he has made for Blenheim, Mannheim and Dublin, and such as he is making for Paris and Gotha, are remarkable for the excellence of their object glasses. With that at Dublin, Mr Ussher observed stars of the fourth magnitude at mid-day, and those of the third very nearly in conjunction with the sun. Those glasses are eight feet in length.

The mural quadrant is the most important instrument used in astronomy, and in this Mr Ramsden has distinguished himself by the accuracy of his divisions, and by the manner in which he finishes the planes by working them in a vertical position. He places the plumb-line behind the instrument, that there may be no necessity for removing it when we take an observation near the zenith. His manner of suspending the glass, and that of throwing light on the object-glass and on the divisions at the same time, are new, and improvements that deserve to be noticed. Those of eight feet which he has made for the observatories of Padua and Vilna, have been examined by Mr Maskelyne: the greatest error does not exceed two seconds and a half. That of the same size for the observatory of Milan is in a very advanced state.

The mural quadrant, of six feet, at Blenheim is a most admirable instrument. It is fixed to four pillars, which turn on two pivots, so that it may be put to the north and to the south in one minute. No one could be more worthy of possessing so beautiful and perfect an instrument than the Duke of Marlborough, whom no astronomer by profession excels in zeal, affability, or accuracy. Known for this instrument Mr Ramsden invented a method of rectifying the arc of ninety degrees, on which an able Astronomer had started some difficulties; but by means of an horizontal line and a plumb-line, forming a kind of cross, without touching the circle, he shewed him, that there was not an error of a single second in the ninety degrees, and that the difference was occasioned by a mural quadrant of Bird's, in which the arc of ninety degrees was too great by several seconds, and which had never been rectified by so nice a method as that of Mr Ramsden.

But the quadrant is not the instrument which stands highest in Mr Ramsden's opinion, it is the complete circle and he has demonstrated to M de la Lande, that the former must be laid aside, if we would arrive at the utmost exactness of which an observation is capable. His principal reasons are 1st, The least variation in the centre is perceived by the two diametrically opposite points. 2dly, The circle being worked on the turn, the surface is always of the greatest accuracy, whichat is impossible to obtain in the quadrant. 3dly, We may always have two measures of the same arc, which will serve for the verification of each other. 4thly, The first point of the division may be verified every day with the utmost facility. 5thly, The dilatation of the metal is uniform, and cannot produce any error. 6thly, This instrument is a meridian glass at the same time. 7thly, It also becomes a moveable azimuth circle by adding an horizontal circle beneath its axis, and then gives the refractions independent of the mensuration of time.

Mr Ramsden is just finishing a circle of five feet for the Observatory at Palermo. He then designs to execute one for the Observatory at Paris, for which he has received the most pressing solicitations from M de la Lande. He then hopes to finish that for Dublin, which is already very forward, and is of twelve feet. One of seven or eight feet, however, is sufficient to obtain an exactness to half a second, as in the zenith sector used for the nicest observations of the figure of the earth.

Every one who has seen it must have remarked with great satisfaction the ingenious manner in which the axis is supported, preventing the friction of the pivots, and particularly the new invention of Mr Ramsden for rendering the

axis perfectly horizontal, by means of a plumb-line which is situated without the machine his inventive genius has exercised itself on this new problem, and solved it in the completest manner

That every part of his instruments may be fabricated under his own inspection, Mr Ramsden has in his workshops men of every branch of trade necessary for completing them Each man is constantly employed on the same work, and thus arrives at the greatest nicety in executing it, yet, notwithstanding its perfection, which ought to enhance the profits of the artist, Mr Ramsden sells his instruments at a less price than any other person in London, sometimes even one-third lower. Though he has near sixty men constantly employed in his workshops, it is not possible for him to supply readily the demands he has from all parts of the world It is many foreigners have experienced the difficulty of procuring his instruments

No one can be more diligent, or less eager in the pursuit of wealth or pleasure, than Mr Ramsden He is extremely frugal, and, unless vexed, civil, complaisant, and affable, in a high degree. Loved and esteemed amongst his intimates at home, his talents have not failed to procure him abroad that reputation which he so justly deserves

ORIGINAL LETTER from Mr JAMES HERVEY, AUTHOR OF THE MEDITATIONS.

[NOW FIRST PUBLISHED.]

DEAR MR T———,

YOUR laſt gave me hopes of the ſpeedy receipt of another letter It was ſhort, and you ſeemed to promiſe a ſupplement, in pleaſing expectation of which I have waited thus long But now my pen refuſes to be reſtrained, it will be denied a very pleaſing employ no longer, and therefore writes to the friend whom its maſter honours and loves from his very ſoul

I preſume this ticket will find you at Brynſworthy, that agreeable ſeat, where, three years ago, I paſſed ſeveral delightful weeks O! when ſhall I ſpend my hours of converſation ſo much to my improvement!—Methinks amidſt kind and edifying conference we experience what the Poet ſo beautifully expreſſes,

Gratior it dies,
Et ſoles melius nitent

How great, then, will be the bliſs; how divine the enjoyments, when through Jeſus the living way we are introduced into the heavenly Jeruſalem, join the innumerable company of Angels, and take ſome humble place among the ſpirits of juſt men,—juſt men, no longer frail and imperfect, but arrived to the conſummation of holineſs, and made perfect even as he which has called them is perfect! My dear friend, I don't doubt, is looking for the bleſſed day with a joyful faith, and labouring to bring many ſouls to a participation of that unknown felicity May rich and great ſucceſs attend your endeavours; ſucceſs great as your wiſhes, I had almoſt ſaid great as the prize of your high calling

I very much want to know ſomething relating to the condition and conduct of my old acquaintance When was you at the Abbey*? What face of affairs in that family? When did you favour Bideford with your company? How goes on the good cauſe among the people lately committed to my care? How are your lectures proſpered at your own and Mr. B——'s churches? Have you heard of Mr S——? Where is he ſettled, and how does he proceed? Has he learnt what that ſcripture meaneth, and from what it is intended to deter men, The wicked borroweth not and payeth not again? Is Mr W——'s abode in your parts? I hope his manner of life anſwers your expectations of him; I hope your acts of kindneſs and words of exhortation have not been in vain. Have you received any tidings of, or from, Mr. Walker*? One more question permit me to ask, and I have done with my interrogatories. Did not a certain Cornish clergyman take a journey to Exeter some time ago on a very particular occasion†? Was he not summoned to appear before the Bishop of the diocese in order to give an account of his behaviour and zeal? If you have any knowledge of this extraordinary affair (and I believe it will be impossible to apply to one who knows it more perfectly) be pleased to favour me with a narrative of its occasion, its circumstances, and its issue. I engage an answer to these enquiries will furnish materials for a volume. Direct

We had the most awful heavy storm of rain, attended with a tremendous darkness, awful thunder and fierce lightning. We celebrated an event which was held upon a previous occasion in the neighbourhood of several persons were struck down with the flashes, and one poor man with two horses killed upon the spot. This terrible accident damped the general spirit of the place, if not for a little the circulation of conversation, and the festivity into which [illegible] believer, I think, should rather receive comfort from these alarming phenomena, than be overwhelmed with horror. All such wonderful and portentous appearances of nature may be turned to prove both the Gospel to a believing mind, they tend both to convince him and to comfort him. Convince him that he is prodigiously corrupt and excessively guilty, so guilty that nothing less than the humiliation and sufferings of that mighty Being who commandeth the waters, nothing less than the incarnation and death of the Lord our God who maketh the thunder, could expiate his transgressions. An amazing consideration, more effectual to humble the enlightened soul than the largest and blackest catalogue of sins! Comfort him, because they tell of the glories of the Saviour, they declare the majesty of the Redeemer, the thunders are events frequent of his excellency, and the lightnings display his sovereignty; consequently they shew in a most emphatical manner how unutterably precious his blood, how infinitely meritorious his righteousness, and how perfectly his people are!

I congratulate you, dear Sir, and my country in general, on the late most important and happy victory obtained by the gallant Duke of Cumberland we cannot be sufficiently thankful to the God of the armies of Israel for turning the scale of war in our favour at that eventful single engagement. O what a dismal scene of desolation and bloodshed! What a fight of Aceldama had our country in all probability been, if the Lord, in his mercy had not been pleased to [illegible] we may date the enjoyment of [illegible] from that critical, [illegible] O that we may also date [illegible] the beginning of the reformation, and of an universal [illegible] our Almighty Deliverer!

Mr. [illegible] Price entitled Meditations and Devotions, or Reflections on a Dying Bed, has been published [illegible] I have taken the liberty to desire it to Miss R—— l——, [illegible] or had I opportunity of [illegible], would the Miss C—— l—— [illegible] of the books [illegible] most cordial acceptance with her Papa, greater indeed than I

* The late Rev Samuel Walker, A B Curate of Truro, author of several pious tracts and sermons, he was a very exemplary character.

† The circumstance of which Mr H[illegible] correspondence, was briefly this A Clergyman (we believe the Rev Mr W[illegible]ey) having called on to visit a Gentleman, his parishioner, who lay at the point of death, found him profane, as his life had always proved him to be a practical, and [illegible] Minister's pathetic exhortations and earnest remonstrances prevail to the rectifying his perverted mind; but to his grief he saw him breathe his last unconvinced of the truth of religion, the existence of a God, and a future state. Having been a witness to so melancholy a spectacle, when the Clergyman came to read the burial service over the unhappy man's reliques, he omitted those passages which mention the death of the deceased in happy change, and as an evident mark of the peculiar favor of God. The consequence of this omission was an information against the Minister to the Bishop (Lavington) of Exeter, on the part of the friends of the deceased. But on account of the Clergyman known good character, and his own representation of the case, he suffered no other trouble than that of a journey to Exeter, and the abuse of the evil-minded.

dust expect. Mr Richardson, the author of Pamela, is my printer; 750 copies are struck off, the Printer and Writer are joint adventurers with regard to pecuniary advantages, if any such should accrue from the sale. If at some very idle moment you should happen to cast a glance upon the lines, mark dear Sir, their blemishes, correct their impropieties, and improve them into a greater meetness for public use, in case a second edition should be demanded. O may they tend in some small degree to awaken my readers into a serious concern for their eternal state, and lead their mind to the work of grace, the hope of all the ends of the earth, Jesus Christ! May they, under the propitious influences of grace, answer this glorious end, or else let them share the fate of literary rubbish, and be swept away into utter oblivion!

Be pleased to make my most respectful and affectionate compliments acceptable to Mrs T—— I wish Miss T—— may be a living picture of that amiable and virtuous woman, whose price is above rubies. If your family friend Mr B—— is with you, pray tell him I love him, because he loves Mr T—— I hope Mrs F—— has a more confirmed state of health, and great joy in God her Saviour. Should you enquire after my state, you will find a description of it Judges viii 4. "Faint, yet pursuing." Cease not, dear Sir, to pray that the hands which hang down may be lifted up, and the feeble knees strengthened, to walk in the way everlasting.

Let it not be long before dear Mr T—— with a letter delights, animates, and comforts his most obliged and affectionate friend,

JAMES HERVEY.

Weston, June 28, 1746.

P. S. In your last you enquired after a very holy woman, whose name is Mary. I have asked Dr Doddridge about her; he declined giving me a particular account of her intercourses with Heaven, and only said that she was a very sincere and devout soul, but somewhat addicted to chimerical and extravagant imaginations. The Doctor desired to transmit his cordial good wishes and service to yourself and spouse.

The author of the aforegoing letter was certainly a very worthy man, exemplary divine, and ingenious writer. If, through bodily infirmities, he was at times tinctured with a little too much melancholy enthusiasm, yet no one can charge extravagance upon his name or writings. Though he was one of the first Methodists, as they were called, at Oxford, he never gave into the wild follies of those who afterwards engrossed that appellation. The Doctors Blair and Johnson have, in particular, disapproved of his works, but the Public have not regarded their judgment, and I have generally found the Public, after all, to be the best critics. John Wesley and his followers have virulently attacked him with the charge of Antinomianism on account of his controversial writings, but the shame only rebounded upon themselves, and the name of Hervey is still revered, and his works will continue to be read.

ANECDOTES of Mrs FRANCES BROOKE.

THIS lady, whose maiden name was Moore, was the daughter of a clergyman, and the wife of the Rev John Brooke, Rector of Colney, in Norfolk, of St Augustine, in the city of Norwich, and Chaplain to the Garrison of Quebec. She was as remarkable for her gentleness and suavity of manners as for her literary talents. Her husband died on the 21st of January last, and she herself expired on the 26th of the same month, at Sleaford, where she had retired to the house of her son, who has preferment in that country. Her disorder was a spasmodic complaint.

The first literary performance we know of her writing, was, "The Old Maid," a periodical work, begun in November 1, 1755, and continued every Saturday until about the end of July 1756. These papers have since been collected into one volume twelves. In the same year (1756) she published "Virginia," a tragedy, with Odes, Pastorals, and Translations, octavo. In the preface to this publication she assigns as a reason for its appearance, "that she was precluded from all hopes of ever seeing the tragedy brought upon the stage by there having been two * so lately on the same subject." "If her's," she adds, "should be found to have any greater reſemblance to the two repreſented, than the ſameneſs of the ſtory made unavoidable, of which ſhe is not conſcious, it muſt have been accidental on her ſide, as there are many perſons of very diſtinguiſhed rank and unqueſtionable veracity, who ſaw her ſuch manuſcript before the others appeared, and will witneſs for her that ſhe has taken no advantage of having ſeen them She muſt here do Mr Criſp the juſtice to ſay, that any reſemblance muſt have been equally accidental on his part, as he neither did, nor could ſee her Virginia before his own was played, Mr Garrick having declined reading hers till Mr Criſp's was publiſhed" Prefixed to this publication were propoſals for printing by ſubſcription a poetical tranſlation, with notes, of Il Paſtor Fido, a work which probably was never compleated

In 1763 ſhe publiſhed a novel, intitled, "The Hiſtory of Lady Julia Mandeville" concerning the plan of which there were various opinions, though of the execution there ſeems to have been but one It was read with much avidity and general approbation It has been often, however, wiſhed that the cataſtrophe had been leſs melancholy, and of the propriety of this opinion the authoreſs herſelf is ſaid to have been ſatisfied, but did not chuſe to make the alteration In the ſame year ſhe publiſhed "Letters from Juliet Lady Catesby to her friend Lady Henrietta Campley," tranſlated from the French, 12mo

She ſoon afterwards * went to Canada with her huſband, who was Chaplain to the Garriſon at Quebec, and there ſaw thoſe romantic ſcenes ſo admirably painted in her next work, intitled "The Hiſtory of Emily Montague," 4 vols 12mo. 1769 The next year ſhe publiſhed "Memoirs of the Marquis of St. Forlaix," in 4 vols 12mo On her return to England accidents brought her acquainted with Mrs. Yates, and an intimacy was formed between them which laſted as long as that lady lived; and when ſhe died, Mrs Brooke did honour to her memory by a eulogium printed in the Gentleman's Magazine If we are not miſtaken, Mrs Brooke had with Mrs. Yates for a time ſome ſhare in the Opera Houſe She certainly had ſome ſhare of the libellous abuſe which the management of that theatre during the above period gave birth to.

We have already ſeen that her firſt play had been refuſed by Mr Garrick After the laple of ſeveral years ſhe was willing once more to try her fortune at the theatre, and probably relying on the influence of Mrs Yates to obtain its repreſentation, produced a tragedy which had not the good fortune to pleaſe the Manager He therefore rejected it, and by that means excited the reſentment of the authoreſs ſo much that ſhe took a ſevere revenge on him in a novel publiſhed in 1777, intitled "The Excurſion," in 2 vols 12mo It is not certainly known whether this rejected tragedy is or is not the ſame as was afterwards acted at Covent garden If it was, it will furniſh no impeachment of Mr Garrick's judgment ſ. ought, however, to be added, that our authoreſs, as is ſaid, thought her invective too ſevere, lamented and retracted it

In 1771 ſhe tranſlated "Elements of the Hiſtory of England, from the Invaſion of the Romans to the Reign of George II" from the Abbé Millot, in 4 vols 12mo In January 1781, the "Siege of Sinope," a tragedy, was acted at Covent garden This piece added but little to her reputation, though the principal characters were well ſupported by Mr Henderſon and Mrs Yates It went nine nights, but never became popular, it wanted energy, and had not much originality; there was little to diſapprove, but nothing to admire

Her next and moſt popular performance was "Rofina," acted at Covent garden in December 1782 This ſhe preſented to Mr Harris, and few pieces have been equally ſucceſsful The ſimplicity of the ſtory, the elegance of the words, and the excellence of the muſic, promiſe a long duration to this drama Her concluding work was "Marian," acted laſt year at

* The following anecdote has only newſpaper authority for its truth —The evening before her departure to Canada, ſome friends met at her apartments to take their farewell Miſs Hannah Moore, Miſs Seward, Mr Keate, Dr Johnſon, and Mr Boſwell, were amongſt her viſitors As Dr Johnſon was obliged to leave the company early, he roſe, and, wiſhing her health and happineſs, went ſeemingly away. In a few minutes a ſervant came to acquaint Mrs Brooke that a gentleman in the parlour wiſhed to ſpeak with her. She accordingly went down ſtairs, where ſhe found the Doctor, who ſaid to her, "Madam, I ſent for you down ſtairs that I might kiſs you, which I did not chuſe to do before ſo much company."

Covent-garden with ſome ſucceſs, but very much inferior to Roſina

Mrs Brooke is thus celebrated in Mr Duncombe's FEMINEAD:

What magic powers in Celia's numbers dwell,
Whilſt thus th' unpractis'd breaſt with ardour ſwell

To emulate her ſtrains, and tune that lyre,
Which yet no bard was able to inſpire!
With tears her ſuffering Virgin we attend,
And ſympathize with father, lover, friend!
What ſacred rapture in our boſoms glows,
When at the ſhrine ſhe offers up her vows!
Mild Majeſty and Virtue's lawful power
Adorn her fall and grace her lateſt hour.

CHARACTERS of Dr. LELAND and Dr JORTIN,

SAID TO BE BY DR PARR

[From "Tracts by Dr WARBURTON, and a WARBURTONIAN."]

OF Leland my opinion is not, like the Letter-writer's founded upon hearſay evidence, nor is it determined ſolely by the great authority of Dr Johnſon, who always mentioned Dr Leland with cordial regard and with marked reſpect It might, perhaps, be invidious for me to hazard a favourable deciſion upon his Hiſtory of Ireland, becauſe the merits of that work have been diſputed by Critics, ſome of whom are, I think, warped in their judgments by literary, others by national, and more, I have reaſon to believe, by perſonal prejudices But I may with confidence appeal to writings, which have long contributed to public amuſement, and have often been honoured by public approbation—to the Life of Philip, and to the Tranſlation of Demoſthenes, which the Letter-writer profeſſes to have not read—to the judicious Diſſertation upon Eloquence, which the Letter-writer did vouchſafe to read, before he anſwered it—to the ſpirited Defence of that Diſſertation, which the Letter writer, probably, has read, but never attempted to anſwer The Life of Philip contains many curious reſearches into the principles of government eſtabliſhed among the leading States of Greece, many ſagacious remarks on their inteſtine diſcords, many exact deſcriptions of their moſt celebrated characters, together with an extenſive and correct view of thoſe ſubtle intrigues, and thoſe ambitious projects, by which Philip, at a favourable criſis, gradually obtained an unexampled and fatal maſtery over the Grecian Republicks In the Tranſlation of Demoſthenes, Leland unites the man of taſte with the man of learning, and ſhews himſelf to have poſſeſſed, not only a competent knowledge of the Greek language, but that clearneſs in his own conceptions, and that animation in his feelings, which enabled him to catch the real meaning, and to preſerve the genuine ſpirit of the moſt perfect orator that Athens ever produced Through the Diſſertation upon Eloquence, and the Defence of it, we ſee great accuracy of erudition, great perſpicuity and ſtrength of ſtyle, and, above all, a ſtoutneſs of judgment, which, in traverſing the open and ſpacious walks of literature, diſdained to be led captive, either by the ſorceries of a ſelf deluded viſionary, or the decrees of a ſelf-created deſpot

As to Jortin, whether I look back to his verſe, to his proſe, to his critical, or to his theological works, there are few Authors to whom I am ſo much indebted for rational entertainment, or for ſolid inſtruction Learned he was, without pedantry He was ingenious, without the affectation of ſingularity He was a lover of truth, without hovering over the gloomy abyſs of ſcepticiſm, and a friend to free-enquiry, without roving into the dreary and pathleſs wilds of latitudinarianiſm. He had a heart, which never diſgraced the powers of his underſtanding. With a lively imagination, an elegant taſte, and a judgement moſt maſculine and moſt correct, he united the artleſs and amiable negligence of a ſchool-boy Wit without ill-nature, and ſenſe without effort, he could, at will, ſcatter upon every ſubject, and in every book, the writer preſents us with a near and diſtinct view of the real man.

Vita Senis ——Hor Sat 1 Lib. 2.

His ſtyle, though unartificial, is ſometimes elevated, though familiar, it is never mean, and though employed upon various topics of theology, ethics, and criticiſm, it is not arrayed in any deluſive reſemblance, either of ſolemnity, from fanatical cant, of profoundneſs, from ſcholaſtic jargon, of preciſion, from the crabbed formalities of cloudy philologiſts,

or

or of refinement, from the technical babble of frivolous Connoiſſeurs

At the ſhadowy and ſtrong reputation which is ſometimes gained by the petty ſtrifes of literary vanity, or the miſchievous ſtruggles of controverſial rage, Jortin never grasped Truth, which ſome men are ambitious of ſeizing by ſurprize in the trackleſs and dark recels, he was content to overtake in the broad and beaten path and in the purſuit of it, if he does not excite our aſtoniſhment by the rapidity of his ſtrides, he, at leaſt, ſecures our confidence by the firmneſs of his ſtep To the examination of poſitions only urged by other men, he always brought a mind, which neither the paſſion nor paſſion had ſeduced, nor malevolence polluted. He impoſed not his own conjectures as infallible and irreſiſtible truths, nor endeavoured to give an air of importance to trifles, by dogmatical vehemence He could ſupport his more ſerious opinions, without the verſatility of a ſophiſt, the ſicrceneſs of a diſputant, or the impertinence of a buffoon —more than this— he could relinquish or correct them, with the calm and ſteady dignity of a writer, who, while he yielded ſomething to the arguments of his antagoniſts, was conſcious of returning enough to command their reſpect He had too much diſcernment to confound difference of opinion with malignity or dullneſs, and too much candour to doubt where he could not perſuade I mourn to ſubſcribe with reſpect to confeſſion, however ſe empoſition of the ſeveral documents, there I know neither [illegible] wardneſs, which [illegible] leſs at home [illegible] ſtanted with [illegible] he was preſent, at every [illegible] he expected [illegible] which could [illegible] the moſt nice [illegible] endure in equal with [illegible] ſhe ſhared name of friend [illegible] of commendation, [illegible] bellows as to [illegible] eſtimated not only [illegible] deſpeaks, and, therefore, he [illegible] wantonly wiſhed it, nor withheld it [illegible] Bur invective he neither provoked nor feared, and, as to the ſeverity of contempt, he reſerved them for occaſions when alone they could be employed with propriety, and where, by himſelf, they [illegible] were employed with effect—for the baſeſt part of arrogant dunces, of [illegible] ſcholiaſts, of intolerant bigots in every life, and unprincipled impoſtors in every profeſſion Diſtinguiſhed in various form of literary compoſition, engaged in various ſcene of his ecclehaſtical profeſſion, and [illegible] with a long and honourable life, he nobly exemplified that [illegible] and [illegible] virtue or charity, which [illegible] in his letter to the Letter-writer [illegible] quietly ſcatter. "CHARITY never miſrepreſents, never miſcribes no principles or miſtaken opinions to an opponent, which he himſelf diſavows, nor to the intereſt in ſtating, or to fancy poſitions never aſſerted, and to extend its cenſure to opinions, which will properly be delivered CHARITY utterly ſwerves to SOPHISTRY, the moſt deceitful ſpecies of ridicule, the moſt deſpicable ſubterfuge of impotent objects CHARITY never ſuppoſes, that all ſenſe and knowledge are confined to a particular circle, to a diſtrict, or to a COUNTRY CHARITY never confounds and embraces principles in the ſame breath, never ſacrifices to confute what it acknowledges to be juſt, never preſumes to beat down its adverſary with confident aſſertions CHARITY does not call diſſenters, or the want of [illegible] common [illegible]

FULOGIUM on PERCIVAL POTT

"He was a man, take him for all in all, we never ſhall look on his like again"

If we ſcarch through nature, into the vegetable kingdom, as well as into the animal, we ſhall find a plan, a form, or a tree, that diſplays a ſuperior invention to any of the reſt The foreſt will contain a taller tree, the garden den a most fragrant rose; or, as St Paul emphatically expresses it, in the planetary system, "one star differeth from another star in glory."

True genius is not of common growth, nor does true genius avail its possessor, unless it be upheld by assiduity and perseverance, so that the exalted effect of it shall be strongly brought forward in the service of the publick.

For it is publick gratitude alone that has adorned with never-fading wreaths, the names of a Shakspeare, a Milton, a Newton, and a Locke.

If the present brief essay hath aspired to an eminence in the profession of Surgery unknown to his predecessors, it was because to the most active mind he joined the most unremitting attention. A conjunction of these qualities could not fail of producing, to the world, such marks of true genius in the writings of Mr Pott, such improved doctrines in the system of surgery, and such salutary effects, throughout a most extensive practice, for a series of years, as will make his name live in the heart of his countrymen, when the letters that tell it on marble will be effaced.

Man never approaches so near to the image of his Maker, as when he unfeignedly continues to do good, as when, by the precepts of his works, he is usefully alive to future ages, as when the labour of his mind is delegated to promote salutary comfort to posterity, after the body, which possessed it, is mouldering in the dust.

Mr Pott arrived to the summit of his profession alone by superior excellence, without any particular patronage, without any further notice than that which is attached to active aims. Mr Pott's have now and then been attempted to be clogged by jealous opponents, which in the end served to push him forward in his career, instead of checking him, for every explanation in surgical opinions he has ever engaged in, turned to confirm the new truths which he has adopted and impress them seen in a stronger point of view.

He was a man of the strictest professional integrity, and learned to despise the riseries of mankind when he could not serve, he withdrew his attendance, and when he could not convince, he would not flatter.

He was remarkably quick and decisive in his opinions, insomuch that he has been thought by some to be abrupt. But if he decided with more active judgment, if he possessed more rapid intuition into the nature of diseases than men in common, it is not to be wondered at that he did not choose to submit to be in waiting upon his prolixity.

His long experience, and his deep intellectual knowledge of Surgery made the rarest cases familiar to him.

There are some whose flattery of his fame hath been lavishly bestowed, merely to aggrandize themselves, since then objects of envy is no more. They had better be silent. The praises after death always come with more warmth, as they are more sincere. He who can give deep impressions of gratitude, must have first experienced the solid comforts of friendship. The post funera virtus will be but a cold conceit, in comparison to the former heart-felt emotion.

Since they were niggards in their praise of him when he was alive, they might as well have been dumb, now that he must be deaf to it. If his system of Surgery was not the best before, it cannot be so after. They were better to pursue their own opinions, and leave those who approved of the precepts of my friend, to follow them up from a confidence in him who taught them.

He turned an oft vigorous mind to the last, although he was far advanced in years, for he was a subject (as it was his usual expression) of Queen Anne.

The writer of this attended his last course of lectures, which he gave to a crowded theatre during the latter winter. And he may truly say, that he did not know which to prefer, as he was as much absorbed in admiration of his close reasoning, [illegible] as to technical exposition, by his thorough surgical information.

He was ill when I left the country during the latter end of [illegible], and returned in a post-chaise cold and [illegible] which in a few days brought on his death. He was buried in the city the 29th of December 1788, [illegible] attended his hearse of five mourning coaches, with many of the Faculty in their private carriages, and more would have joined in that last solemn farewell, had they known when it would have been. Mr Pott received his rudiments in surgery from Mr Nourse, who was Surgeon to St Bartholomew's Hospital. Of this hospital Mr Pott was Surgeon nearly forty years.

A Journey through the Crimea to Conſtantinople In a Series of Letters from the Right Honourable Elizabeth Lady Craven, to his Serene Highneſs the Margrave of Brandebourg, Anſpach, and Bareith Written in the Year 1786. 4to 1l. 1s. Robinſons

THE laudable ambition of Lady Craven to attain pre-eminence in the republic of letters has already been diſplayed in the variety of productions which have flowed from her pen in the ſhape of Novels, Poetry, and Plays; but fame has hitherto ungratefully refuſed to beſtow upon the pruriency of youthful vanity the LAUREL which belongs to merit alone. The hope, however, of acquiring future praiſe ſeems to have ſubdued thoſe pangs with which diſappointment always diſturbs the female breaſt, and the noble authoreſs, with all the confidence of conſcious genius, now comes forward in the more elevated and conſpicuous character of an Epiſtolary Traveller; giving permiſſion to the Public to doze over her ſheets, and expoſing them to the malice of her enemies without reſerve, merely to oblige many of her friends, who, knowing ſhe had taken a long and extraordinary journey, had deſired her to give them ſome account of it. "But beſides curioſity," ſays her ladyſhip, "my friends will ſee theſe letters, at leaſt for ſome time, but not the real Lady Lady Craven has been, and where she is to be found—it having been a practice for some years past for a Birmingham coin of myself to pass in most of the inns in France, Switzerland, and England, for the wife of my husband—my ARMS and CORONET sometimes supporting in some measure this insolent deception, by which probably I may have been seen to behave very improperly."

This desire to rescue her name and person from the ill effects of misrepresentation is addressed to her delightful brother and correspondent the present MARGRAVE of BRANDENBOURG, &c. with whom her Ladyship appears to have formed one of those delightful attachments distinguished by the name of PLATONIC LOVE and "if I had possessed," says she, "the invaluable blessing of having him for my real brother, this curious and unheard-of fiction to my birth and character would long since have been punished in the person who could only countenance the deceit." But these allusions rather lead to the discussion of her Ladyship's private history as a woman, with which neither we nor the Public have any concern, than to the consideration of her merits as an authoress, into which alone it is our province to enquire. We shall therefore proceed to detail those parts of her Ladyship's Journey which appear to us the most interesting and important, and in the sequel offer such observations on the style and composition of the work as it may appear to us to deserve.

"At the post beyond Blois, while the horses were changing, (an operation not performed in one minute, as in England) one of my servants came up to the door and said, ces maudits postillons ne veulent point laisser monter cet enfant derriere la voiture. The word enfant always strikes to my very heart among the many reasons I had before, I have now an additional one for feeling about an enfant of any sort—

"I am at this moment above a hundred miles distant from the most affectionate, the most engaging, and the most beautiful child that ever mother had—and for the first time I have ever left him—

"Madame," says I, "le Maitre de poste à Blois m'a conseillé de monter derriere votre Berline, comme il n'y avait point de malle—à present les postillons ne veulent pas m'y laisser—

"Comment vous appellez vous?

"Caffius

"Caffius—voila un beau nom—"Oui Madame, said the child; who had never heard of any other Caffius but himself—mon pere etait gentilhomme,—and he gave me a pocket-book which contained letters. One of these was from a lady of quality to the child's distant relations at la Rochelle, desiring them to place him on board a ship.

"Comment—says I, vous voudriez servir?—

"Oui Madame, je ne saurais être domestique, parce que mes peres étaient gentilhommes—and among a variety of questions which I asked him—and to which he answered modestly and pertinently—whenever he recollected that circumstance, it was a painful idea—He had a brother and sister at Paris, who had sent him to go from thence to la Rochelle on foot, with five livres, and his letters of recommendation, for his support and protection. What unfeeling people! Avez vous dîné aujourd'hui? It was then about six o'clock.

"Oui Madame, le maitre de poste à Blois n'a donné a dîner—ce sont les postillons d'ici qui ne veulent pas que je monte derriere votre voiture. The postillions by this time were listening to my conversation with the child, and one of them with a gruff voice said—si ce petit monsieur veut payer un cinquieme cheval, il montera—Et si j'avais une grande malle, comme de coûtume? says I. Montez, montez, mon enfant; and turning to the postillion, vous aurez de quoi boire a sa santé, for he was pleased, and the boy delighted: but as in France more than in any other country in the world, the value of every thing is—"so much money as 'twill bring"—my maid was surprized at my bonté d'ame——As I never eat but once a day in travelling, and that at the end of my journey—I shall never forget my supper last night—I had got into my bed fatigued, and ordered my maid to bring me a soup. I had lain half an hour, the room was dark, and when the door opened, the first thing I saw was

"QUEL ENFANT! says I, looking out on the left towards the hind wheel of my Berline—I saw a boy, seemingly about ten years old, decently dressed in mourning—a crape round his hat, and black buckles in his shoes.

* Servir in French conversation always means serve in a military capacity, and not as a servant.

Caſſius holding two wax lights, preceding my maid. He ſaid Mademoiſelle might go to her ſupper, and he would wait upon me, and his countenance had a mixture of comfort, joy, and gratitude in it, ſcarcely to be ſeen but in the candour of youth This morning I had ſettled with the miſtreſs of the inn that ſhe ſhould agree with a waggoner to take Caſſius ſafe to la Rochelle—I had given him ſome money (too little for charity to name—perhaps what the avaricious would think too much), and a recommendation ſigned with my name, and my ſeal upon it, when the poſtillions I had ordered to take me to —— came to inform me, that as it was a croſs-country road, they expected three times the ſum uſually paid —As I might juſt as effectually argue with a horſe as with a French poſtillion, I aſked where the poſt-houſe was?—

"Only two doors off ——

"I went there, the maſter was out, but his wife was at home, and while I was ſettling matters with her, one of the old-faſhioned French poſt chaiſes ſtopt at the door, with an officer in it, ſeemingly encumbered by ſickneſs, and his head wrapped up very much —Caſſius was at my elbow Madame, Madame, ſays he, ce monſieur a peut de malle (in fact all the luggage was before) Je vous prie en grace de la Rochelle, ſi vous voulez avoir la bonté de me laiſſer monter ſur ſa voiture —I went up to the chaiſe and curtſied very low, the officer bowed ſlightly, I ſtept back, but Caſſius pulled me by the ſleeve,—ſo I once again advanced and curſied—Monſieur —

"Madame—

"I brought Caſſius forward—Voici un pauvre orphelin qui va a la Rochelle—Il eſt venu depuis blois ſur ma Berline, ſi vous voulez bien lui permettre de monter derriere votre voiture, ce ſera moi qui vous en aurai l'obligation—Moi—I repeated in a higher tone of voice —The officer had begun by ſtaring at me from head to foot, and before I finiſhed my ſpeech he had endeavoured, but in vain, to draw off his night-cap——Tout ce que vous ordonnez—tout ce qu'il vous plaira, Madame—

"And I had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the little orphan comfortably ſeated, and flying towards la Rochelle, certain that he would neither be robbed nor beaten on the road—

"I am ſetting out for , from whence I will write you an account of any thing I ſhall obſerve worthy of being related" ——

From Blois her Ladyſhip paſſes through bad croſs country roads to Touraine, but obſerves nothing to juſtify the idea that this province is le Jardin de la France From Touraine her Ladyſhip gallops all the way on horſeback, along a delightful meadow, to Tours, and wonders to find that the trees of the Mail have eſcaped the ciseau of the tondeur, obſerving that ſhearing the trees in a French garden is a cuſtom as ancient, and thought as neceſſary, as ſhaving the beard, the tondeurs being paid for it by the year as barbers are by the Turkiſh Faſhion. From Tours her Ladyſhip paſſes to Amboiſe, looks with great indifference on the Taurobalum, ſees a beautiful ſarcophagus in a Lawyer's yard, that ſerved as a ciſtern, meets with an old acquaintance in the perſon of Pierre encriſe, which ſhe deſcribes as a place where the affectionate parents of France, by means of Lettres de Cachet, uſually confine their extravagant children, to prevent them from ſpending more money than they can afford, and proceeds by water to Marſeilles, from which place ſhe gives the following account of her viſit to the much-famed Fontaine de Vaucluſe

"I ſet out from Avignon in the middle of the day, and arrived at a town called Lille, where I took a French poſt-chaiſe, and went in it by the ſide of the Sourgue's clear ſtream, till the road was too narrow for the carriage to proceed, I then walked in a narrow path winding round the immenſe rocky mountains to the left, with the ſtream rapidly flying by me to the right about a mile, till a cavern, pretty much in the ſhape of thoſe which lions come out of in an opera, preſented itſelf to my view, and from that flows the river I am told it is an unfathomable abyſs Why it is called a Fontaine, I am at a loſs to gueſs

"Monſtrous rocks riſe over and on each ſide of this craggy arch, theſe ſeem to bend forward to meet or cruſh the curious —Whichever way I turned my eyes, I ſaw gigantic and fantaſtic ſhapes, which nature ſeems to have placed there to aſtoniſh the gazer with a mixture of the melancholy, terrible, and chearful, for the clearneſs and rapidity of the river makes it a lively object, and where there is a flat place on the banks, though not above a few feet in circumference, the peaſants have planted vines or ſowed gardens—You lift up your eyes, and ſee the moſt perfect contraſts to them—the birds, which hovered towards the upper part of the rocks, were ſcarcely perceptible In looking looking into the cavern, it appears horrible and gloomy, I could almoſt have fancied the river ran thus faſt, rejoiced to quit the manſion from whence it ſprung. No wonder Petrarch's ſong was plaintive, if he courted his muſe with this ſcene perpetually before his eyes; Love and all his laughing train muſt fly the human imagination, where nature diſplays her features in the majeſtic and terrible ſtile, and I was very glad to find ſo good an excuſe as this ſituation for Petrarch's eternal complaints.—I'll not, I was puzzled to gueſs, how a man of his ſenſe could paſs the greateſt part of his life in etemizing a lady's contempt of a faithful paſſion—but I now believe there was no Laura—or if there exiſted one, he found in either caſe his imagination particularly turned to poetry, and that of the melancholy kind In this, probably his ſummer's reſidence, I who you know ——, and have as playful a muſe as ever ſmiled upon mortal, ſat examining the aſtoniſhing picture before me with a ſilent reverential ſort of admiration—and ſhould have remained there till night, if I had not been informed that it grew very late, and I muſt ſee the pictures of Petrarch and Laura in the Chateau of the Marquis de Chamont, which is a miſerable houſe a few ſteps from the Fontaine Theſe pictures are very modern—probably as like you as the perſons they were drawn for—I returned to Lille, and eat crawfiſh and trout, the moſt excellent that I ever taſted, which abound in the Sorgue—I paſſed through Aix, to come to this place, I did not ſtop, as I expected a letter at Marſeilles, the contents of which intereſted me very much: for — — —

"I ſaw many plantations of canes, which I wonder we do not cultivate in our water-meadows in England——and I bought very excellent melons out of the fields for five ſols a piece

"A country flowing with wine and oil, and where figs are [illegible] gathered on each ſide the public road, may be a very fine thing; but a want of verdure and fine trees gives it a moſt uncomfortable and ungentleman-like appearance. When I compared England and the ſcene before me together, I could almoſt have fancied I had the mal du pays upon me—ſo much did I wiſh to ſee a green carpet under my feet, and ſome of our beautiful foliage over my head——

"Adieu, dear Sir, how often I wiſh to be with you I leave the juſtice of your heart to determine I remain yours moſt affectionately——

"P S I forgot to tell you, that while I was changing horſes at Lille, I talked to Captain B——, a ſailor, who lives with his wife and two children in that neighbourhood—He very civilly invited me to paſs the evening at his houſe, talked about my brother G——, and informed me that the ſource of the Sorgue was at this time remarkably low; and I found by the marks the torrent had left on the rocks when at its height, that it muſt be at leaſt forty feet lower now than when it takes its winter-courſe as I ſaw it, it creeps humbly from the cavern under part of the rock, and becomes rapid as it finds its level and forms a river, whereas, when it is in all its glory, it tumbles over the rock a wild caſcade, which muſt add conſiderably to its terrific beauties — — —

"I was informed by the inhabitants of Vaucluſe, that people, who are tired of life, fling themſelves into the cavern, where, as I told you before, the water is unfathomable upon this information, I aſked if bodies were often found there, I was anſwered in the affirmative, and that they were chiefly the bodies of prieſts —Adieu—

"P S I never felt any hurt like that which I experience here —"

Memoirs of the War in Aſia, from 1780 to 1784, including a Narrative of the Impriſonment and Sufferings of our Officers and Soldiers By an Officer of Colonel Baillie's Detachment The Second Edition. 8vo 7s 6d Sewell

AMONG the new particulars introduced into this edition of the Memoirs are, the fates and fortunes of ſeveral officers detained after the peace, in the dominions of Tippo Sultan, a ſpeech of Hyder Ally's to his army, on the repulſe of the Engliſh at Chillumbrum; ſome new circumſtances relative to the retreat of General Goddard's army from the Mahratta country to Bombay, intereſting and affecting circumſtances relative to the family of Surdar Crown, on the raiſing of the ſiege of Tellicherry; a ſcheme of Lord Macartney's for eſtabliſhing the Engliſh nation in Ceylon; an accurate narrative of the reduction of Bednore, by General Mathews; the accidental circumſtances by which this was effected, and, particularly, the ſingular patriotiſm and heroic virtue of Captain Donald Campbell. An account is alſo given of the peace with Tippo Saib, and the newly adopted ſyſtem of the Eaſt India Company for the ſecurity and government of their poſſeſſions in India. Several new and diſtinguiſhed characters, alſo, are brought into action, as by Sir John Macpherſon (to whom it appears that the Eaſt India Company are indebted for an immenſe ſaving in their annual expenditure), Mr. Sullivan, &c. &c. Certain new and very ſtriking arguments are alſo introduced in favour of Mr. Haſtings, of whom the Author of the Memoirs ſeems to be as enthuſiaſtic an admirer, as the celebrated Hiſtorian Mr. Orme was of Lord Clive. He has however in ſome meaſure moderated his admiration of that gentleman, for whereas in the firſt edition he affirms, after deſcribing the dangers that threatened the Britiſh intereſts in the Eaſt, "but the genius of "one man contending againſt fluctuating "Councils at home and the oppoſition "and errors of his colleagues in office "abroad," &c. in the preſent Edition he ſays, "but the ſpirit of our Civil "Rulers and Military Commanders in "India, particularly the genius of ONE "MAN, &c. &c." In the preſent Edition of the Memoirs the Author has corrected ſome miſtakes into which he had been led in the firſt, (which was compoſed, as we ſuſpect, with precipitation) reſpecting the conduct of certain meritorious officers of high rank. He has received various and important communications which encourage him to attempt an Hiſtory of Britiſh affairs in India, from 1763 to 1783, and he hopes that the reſpect which he ſhews to truth will invite ſtill further information. In this new Edition of the Memoirs, there are ſome alterations in the form as well as the matter of the Memoirs, which, as they are now improved, poſſeſs greater unity of deſign as well as proportion of parts, approach nearer to the nature of regular hiſtory, which has always a beginning, a middle, and an end, and are more worthy of the pen of the continuator of Principal Watſon's Hiſtory of Spain, and the Author of the Introduction to Cunningham's Hiſtory of Great Britain, to whom on pretty good grounds they are generally aſcribed.

Neither capacity, nor candour, nor taſte ſeem wanting to this Author. He is neither inſenſible, as appears from his preface, of his defects, nor backward to acknowledge them. Why then does he not remedy them before publication? His precipitation we ſuſpect, ariſes from circumſtances not very honourable to the

The narrative of Impriſonments and Sufferings, &c. is not, in the preſent Edition, given in an appendix, but, for the ſake of unity of deſign, by way of epiſode. This epiſode, however, is highly diſproportioned to the body of the work. For this exceſcence (for it really is ſuch) our author apologizes thus: "The preſſing "demands of thoſe who are anxious to "know, and to have a record of the fate "of their relations and friends, have in-"duced the writer of theſe Memoirs to "introduce, after the fatal battle of Ta-"callum, an abridged account on the "whole, though containing ſome new "and very intereſting particulars, of the "narrative of the impriſonment and ſuf-"ferings of our officers and ſoldiers. If "this melancholy epiſode ſhould be "thought diſproportionate in too high a "degree to the body of the work, the "compiler muſt take ſhelter from the ri-"gour of criticiſm in the ſame moral "feelings which have given circulation "to the Memoirs, with all their imper-"fections. But it may be proper to "mention, that it is not intended either "to interſect or to annex this narra-"tive to the Hiſtory which he has been "encouraged to announce to the Public."

We ſincerely wiſh this author ſucceſs in his literary undertakings, and if he takes more time, and uſes more deliberation, we doubt not but he will obtain it.

An Addreſs to the Public on the Polygraphic Art, or the Copying or Multiplying Pictures, in Oil Colours, by a Chymical and Mechanical Proceſs, the Invention of Mr. Joſeph Booth, Portrait Painter. 8vo. 6d. Cadell and Sewell.

THE nature and probable effects of this invention are ſet forth in this little tract with clearneſs, elegance, and comprehenſion of views worthy of an important diſcovery. Mechanical invention, ſays the author of the Addreſs, is one of the great pillars that ſupport the grandeur of the Britiſh empire. Though there are various manufactures and arts in which other nations, eſpecially the Germans, equal us in reſpect of excellence, with regard to expedition we are unrivalled.—

Hence,

Hence, notwithſtanding the high expence of living, and accumulated taxes, in articles of iron, ſteel, wool, cotton, turnery, earthen ware, and others, we are able to underſell nations where labour is twice as cheap as in England, the expence of living twice as low, and taxes twice as moderate. Theſe obſervations are juſt, and form a very natural introduction to the account that is here given of the Polygraphic Art.

This Art, we are informed, without any injury whatever to the original painting, produces ſuch an exact likeneſs as cannot, without great nicety, be diſtinguiſhed from the archetype, at the diſtance from which every good picture ought to be viewed, while the price at which it can be delivered to the Public is a mere trifle, commonly under, but never exceeding the tenth part of the value of the original.—The experience of twelve years, we are aſſured, renders it almoſt certain that theſe pictures, being done in oil colours, will, at leaſt, equal their originals in point of duration. The writers or writers of the Addreſs conſider the Polygraphic Art under three different views.—Firſt, as an ingenious art, ſecondly, as influencing morals, and, thirdly, as an object of policy, and an article of commerce. Having ſhewn the mutual connection that ſubſiſts among all the arts and ſciences, how much the improvement of one leads to the advancement of another, and the happy influence of the whole on morals, they ſay,

"But it is in a political and commercial light, which was the third view, as was obſerved, in which painting might be conſidered, that this multiplying art is of the higheſt importance. It muſt appear obvious to every perſon of diſcernment, that painting, as an art, contributes in an eminent degree to the grandeur and conſequence of a nation. It tends to raiſe a national character, and to invite to the countries in which it flouriſhes, travellers of diſtinction from other kingdoms. The invention of Polygraphy encourages a genius for painting, and, by reducing the prices of the ornamental branches of that art, it will give a ſpirit of elegance and magnificence to our houſes in the eye of foreigners, who will be tempted to carry into their own countries thoſe articles of ſplendid furniture which are purchaſed at ſo eaſy a rate in this. And thus this invention, it is to be hoped, will prove no inconſiderable ſource of national wealth. But on the important head of its utility it will be proper to ſpeak at greater length.

"Real grandeur does not conſiſt in a profuſion of gold and tinſel ſhew, which dazzles the ſight by the vividneſs and richneſs of colour, but neither amuſes the fancy nor engages the heart. The eye is never ſo much pleaſed, as when the object of perception gives exerciſe to the fancy, and calls into action the various energies of the mind; a purpoſe for which allegorical and hiſtorical paintings are particularly adapted.

"There is no method now in uſe, of producing an expreſſive, intereſting, and highly-finiſhed picture, that is not attended with the moſt exquiſite pains and trouble. As pieces of this kind are to be produced only by the cloſeſt labour and application, they are neceſſarily advanced to ſo great a price that very few can afford to purchaſe them. Indeed highly finiſhed pictures are ſeldom to be met with at all. By this new method of drawing and colouring, however, all the effect of the finiſhed graces and perfections will be introduced, of which paintings are ſuſceptible. The prices now given for the finiſhed paintings of the Flemiſh and Italian maſters ſufficiently evince the value of the copies that are made, with ſuch exactneſs, by the Polygraphic Art. And, from this circumſtance, the author, and patrons and proprietors of this invention, are encouraged to hope for the public countenance and protection, as they will produce pictures for a mere trifle, poſſeſſed of a degree of elegance, and perfection of colouring and varniſhing, as cannot be equalled but by an immenſity of labour in a firſt rate artiſt.

"Copies of good originals, diffuſed through the country at a cheap rate, will induce many gentlemen to purchaſe them who never would have thought of giving the value of high prized original pictures, but though beginning with ſuch a trifle, they may imbibe a taſte for painting, be induced to enlarge the collection, and, by degrees, gain ſuch a taſte and knowledge of the art, as not to be contented with copies alone, but, in the end, will be urged on to beſpeak originals, of the beſt maſters, and thus become patrons and encouragers of the art. This has generally happened with moſt gentlemen who have made capital collections of paintings. It has often been from a ſmall beginning, perhaps from a ſingle picture, that they have been led to form thoſe collections, which are now the admiration of every perſon of taſte.

"It is well known that very conſiderable ſums of money are annually carried out of this this kingdom, for the purchase of foreign paintings, both copies and originals, and that in this traffic many impositions have been made, and frauds committed. The invention of Polygraphy evidently tends to remedy these disadvantages and abuses, while, at the same time, it does not oppose itself to the honest industry and ingenuity of the collector and dealer in pictures, who has the same market as usual, nor is there is no doubt of the Polygraphic copies becoming hereafter a good object of speculation, from their excellence and value, as the Society mean to adhere to the mode of striking off only a certain number of copies of each subject, which, when finished, the apparatus is destroyed, and no more done of such subject by means of the Polygraphic Art. In consequence, when that number is sold and distributed, such of them as may by eventual circumstances come to sale, will open as extensive a field for advantageous traffic as originals. These productions must likewise become a safe and entire fort foreign markets, in every country where the polite arts are encouraged.

"It is unnecessary to display more fully the utility of the Polygraphic Art. Other advantages, besides those that have been here enumerated, will be discovered by time and experience, which not only unfold the mysteries of nature, but also new purposes to which these discoveries may be applied.

"In the mean time it may be safely affirmed, that the Polygraphic Invention, instead of injuring, will promote the art of painting, by encreasing the demand for pictures, by preserving the style and the masterly colouring of the greatest artists in an genuine and natural taste, handing them down triumphant to the latest posterity, displaying their peculiar excellencies, and tracing their analogies to each other. In one word, this invention may be considered, in every respect, as being that to painting, which engraving is to design, and which the art of printing is to that of writing."

The Proprietors of this invention and liberal Patrons of Mr Booth, on whose authority these facts and sentiments are stated in the Address to the public, are gentlemen, as we are well informed, who, from their private characters, as well as circumstances and situation in life, are worthy of all credit and confidence.

Arundel. A Novel. 2 vols. 12mo. 5s. Dilly.

SIR John Hawkins, in his Life of Dr Johnson, has hurled his anathema against Novels in general, as tending to corrupt the understanding and deprave the heart, but his feeble vengeance, like the enervated arm of the aged Priam, hurls a harmless dart, telum imbelle sine ictu. To amuse the fancy by means of an ingenious and well-constructed tale is certainly the readiest way to reach the heart. Writers of the preceptive kind, by assuming the tone of superior knowledge, always give a silent disgust to the natural pride and vanity of the human mind, and thereby frequently impede the good they intend to promote, but the Novelist, if he discharges his duty with fidelity, unites while he instructs, and imperceptibly leads his readers by the silken bands of pleasure into the paths of morality and virtue.

It is to Novels alone that we can look for just representations of life and manners, for lessons founded in the unadulterated feelings of nature, and if by a story of real woe the bosom can be made to feel one compassionate sensation for real misery, the Novelist atchieves what perhaps the Divine has frequently strived in vain. But unhappily the office of novel writing is generally undertaken by those who are entirely disqualified to perform the important task, and productions of this denomination have thereby fallen into a degree of contempt and discredit from which they will not very easily be relieved. If there be any truth in these preliminary observations, the public curiosity must be considerably excited when we announce that Mr Cumberland, the author of the Observer, is also the author of the present Novel. We cannot, however, pay an equal tribute of praise to both performances, and justice compels us to acknowledge, that in perusing Arundel our expectations have been disappointed. The hero of the tale is unnaturally perfect. From the churchyard of a reclusive hermit, he is made to start at once into the great world, completely possessed of every fashionable and seducing charm, and he is every competent to the accomplishments which it is well known time and opportunity can alone acquire. Lady Louisa, the object of his love, is lively, versatile, and sometimes violent, but she wants a portion of that fine susceptibility and softness which distinguishes and adorn "the most amiable of the sex." Her mother, Lady G. possesses a temperneſs of heart unnatural to her advanced period of life, which betrays her into an abſurd and indelicate fondneſs for the lover of her daughter. The characters of Lord G. an artful and plotting ſtateſman of Sir George Revel, an inſolent and abandoned young man of family and faſhion, and of Sir Joſeph Arundel, an ambitious and ſycophantic clergyman; are drawn with the pencil of a maſter, and deſerve great praiſe. The portrait alſo of a lively and vivacious mind, tempered by reflection, and guided by delicacy, in the character of Lady Jane F. may be placed in the ſame rank.

The ſtyle in which theſe letters are preſented to the Public, though Mr. Cumberland acknowledges he has taken ſome pains with them, is by no means equal to that of his other productions. It is ſometimes confuſed by circumlocution, and frequently rendered tedious and languid by an extenſion of the periods beyond their natural length. The firſt volume is in every reſpect ſuperior to the ſecond, but both of them contain doctrines which may miſlead weak minds from the paths of morality and virtue. The pernicious practice of dueling is powerfully ſupported, and many ſpecious obſervations are made to juſtify, under certain circumſtances, the crime of conjugal infidelity. Religion alſo does no recommendation from the tenets appropriated to the character of its diſciple, Dr. Arundel. Several little pieces of poetry are interſperſed through the work, and we ſhall take our leave of it by ſubmitting the following ſpecimen to the judgment of our readers—

"Faſt by the Mediwav's ſilver tide,
Beneath the woodbine's fragrant ſhade,
Love's roving god by chance eſpied
A ruſtic grot, and thus he ſaid—

"Hail, Grot! ſo ſilent and ſo ſweet,
"Impending o'er this glaſſy ſtream,
"Be henceforth thou my favour'd ſeat,
"Propitious to the lover's theme!

"Here if the modeſt youth aſſays
"With faultering lips to move the fair,
"In the cold damſel's heart I'll raiſe
"A pity that ſhall grant his prayer.

"Here if the ſtubborn maid ſhall ſpy
"The melting tear his cheek bedew,
"I'll launch in arrow from his eye
"Shall pierce her proud heart thro' and thro'

"Then wild and raging all amain
"With her tormented boſom's ſmart,
"Save me, ſhe'll cry, oh, eaſe my pain,
"And draw this arrow from my heart!

"He with fond arms encircling round
"Shall preſs her to his faithful breaſt,
"And the ſame hand that gave the wound
"Shall lull its agonies to reſt."

A true Eſtimate of the Light of Inſpiration and the Light of Human Learning, before and ſince the Apoſtolic Age. 4to. 1s. 6d. Faulder.

THIS writer profeſſedly enters the liſts againſt the truly learned and reſpectable Biſhop of St. Davids, who, in a ſermon preached at an ordination in the Cathedral Church of Gloucester, and ſince printed, aſſerted the abſolute neceſſity of human learning as a qualification for the Chriſtian Miniſtry, and his Lordſhip further attempted to prove (and for aught his preſent antagoniſt hath ſaid to the contrary, it was proved effectually) that this was ſanctioned by God, inſtead of that ſupernatural gift of the ſpirit, which was the portion of the Apoſtles and their immediate ſucceſſors. This was evidently a home-thruſt at thoſe Enthuſiaſts with which our land abounds, but while it was deſigned to check their arrogant pretenſions to the Goſpel Miniſtry, it conveyed a very important and uſeful charge to thoſe who were, or intended to be, engaged in that high calling.

Now the character of Dr. Horſley, as a Miniſter and a writer, being ſuch as to give celebrity to every thing he publiſhes, no wonder the ſpirit of Fanaticiſm trembled for her ſons, and accordingly the reverend Author of the preſent pamphlet is enliſted under her influence, to aſſert her cauſe. But, alas! while he affects to run down Human Learning in order to exalt the notion of Divine Inſpiration, his own performance ſhews that he is equally a ſtranger to both.

He makes a parade, indeed, in Hebrew, Greek and Latin, but if we are to judge from what appears before us, he is not qualified to decry Human Learning except from his own want of it, and as to Inſpiration, his claim can go no higher than to that of Fanatic Dullneſs.

A Diſcourſe on the Government of the Thoughts By George Tullie, Sub-Dean of York A New Edition 12mo 2s Robinſons

THOUGH this little tract hath eſcaped our notice till now, yet we do not think it too late to give it that recommendation which it ſo juſtly deſerves The author has anatomiſed the human heart with an accuracy and minuteneſs above any other moral or theological writer we ever read And as he was careful in making his obſervations, ſo he appears to have had a ſtrong judgment to improve them The ſtile is plain, but not inelegant, tho' the author wrote above a century ago

We ſincerely, for ourſelves, thank the publiſhers for reſcuing ſo valuable a piece from the jaws of oblivion, and we take a pleaſure in recommending it to the peruſal of all thoſe who wiſh to be at peace with themſelves in the eſteem of the world, and in the favour of Him whoſe favour is better than it W

TO what an infamous degree of licentiouſneſs may not the beſt of bleſſings be extended! The liberty of the preſs is one of the moſt eſtimable privileges we enjoy; and yet ſome miſcreants are continually aiming under its influence to foment ſedition, propagate ſcandal, and deſtroy the peace of their neighbours If the author of this pamphlet was himſelf endowed with that common-ſenſe mentioned in the title-page, we think he ought to be ſeverely puniſhed for the daring impudence he has here ſhewn to high and reſpectable characters But his folly is his ſafeguard, he is in a proper capacity for Bedlam, and not for the pillory, and we would recommend it to his friends, if friends he has, to place him as a companion with Margaret Nicholſon. Tales, "Entertaining and Sympathetic," inſcribed to the Heart 2 vols 12mo. 6s.

THESE Tales are written in a ſtyle very ſuperior to thoſe romantic and baneful publications which are commonly, though not always avowedly, inſcribed to the heart The old and young of both ſexes may receive inſtruction and amuſement from the peruſal of them, without diſgracing their underſtandings, or corrupting their virtue They are profeſſedly calculated to beguile that "idle hour," the tædium and ennui of which the moſt alert and active mind will ſometimes feel, and find it arduous to remove. The Author ſeems to have had in view the celebrated work of Marmontel, but it will be very difficult to equal, and perhaps impoſſible to excel the merit of His Contes Moraux He has, however, produced a collection of entertaining tales, founded on nature, related with elegance, and varied with ingenuity Many of them are deeply affecting, and ſenſibility will find it difficult to reſtrain the ſympathetic tear, while it laments the misfortunes into which the intemperance of youthful paſſion and miſguided judgment are made to betray ſeveral of the characters Every tale is introduced by moral reflections ſuited to the ſubject of it, and the mind is thereby prevented from being improperly biaſſed by the ſubſequent feelings of the heart

Frederick, or, the Libertine A Novel 2 vols 12mo 6s

THE author of this novel has not flattered himſelf in vain that he has merited the favour of mankind by endeavouring to fix the minds of his readers to the contemplation of human manners, and the intereſting ſcenes of common life, for in aiming to amuſe the fancy, approach the heart, and engage the paſſions, he has, to uſe his own words, been ſtudiouſly attentive to bring his obſervations home to the buſineſs and boſoms of ſocial beings, and we truſt they will tend, as he wiſhes, to baniſh the influence of temptation, to reſtore the power of conſcience, and to rectify the underſtanding He has certainly entorced the firſt principle of moral rectitude, "that in the purſuit of pleaſure we ſhould never depart from the paths of virtue and honour" As a moraliſt, therefore, we think that his readers may fully gratify his expectations, and diſmiſs the Libertine not only with reſpect, but applauſe.

OBSERVA-

IT appears a little extraordinary, that two cuckoos egg should ever be deposited in the same nest, as the young one produced from one of them must inevitably perish yet I have known two instances of this kind, one of which I shall relate.

June 10, 1787, one cuckoo and a hedge sparrow were hatched in the same nest this morning; one hedge sparrow's egg remained unhatched. In a few hours after, a contest began between the cuckoos for the possession of the nest, which continued until determined by the following morning, when one of them, which was somewhat superior in size, turned out the other, together with the young hedge sparrow and the unhatched egg. This contest was very remarkable. The combatants alternately supposed to have the nest, as each continued the other several times especially to the top of the nest, and then fairly down again, oppressed by the weight of its burden, till at length, after various efforts, the larger prevailed, and was afterwards brought up by the hedge-sparrows.

I come now to consider the principal matter that has agitated the mind of the naturalist respecting the cuckoo; why, like other birds, it should not build a nest, and hatch its eggs, and rear its own young?

There certainly is no reason to be assigned from the formation of this bird's body, in common with others, why it should not perform these several offices, for it is even well-adapted perfectly for the collecting materials and building a nest. Neither is there any thing in the shape or internal structure, to prevent it from incubation, nor is it by any means supposed that it derives from birds food to its young. It would be needless to enumerate the various opinions of authors on this subject from Aristotle to the present time. Those of the ancients appear to be either visionary, or erroneous, and the attempts of the moderns towards investigation have been confined within very narrow limits, for they have gone but little farther in their researches than to examine the conformation and structure of the bird, and having found it possessed of a capacious stomach, with a thin external covering, concluded that the pressure upon this part, in a sitting posture, prevented incubation. They have not considered that many of the birds which incubate have stomachs analogous to those of cuckoos; the stomach of the owl, for example, is disproportionably capacious, and is almost entirely covered with external integuments. Nor have they considered, that the stomachs of nestlings are always much distended with food; and that this very part, during the whole time of their confinement to the nest, supports, in a great degree, the weight of the whole body, which is, in a sitting bird, at once nearly as much pressed upon, for the breast in that case fills up chiefly the cavity of the nest, for which purpose, from its natural convexity, it is admirably well fitted.

This observation I presume, may be sufficient to show what the cuckoo is not rendered incapable of doing, through a peculiarity in the conformation of the body; but, if more desired, I shall have more you the following fact.

In the summer of 1787, I saw, in the nest of a hedge sparrow, a cuckoo, which, from its superior magnitude, appeared to be nearly a fortnight old. On inverting it upon its back, I observed two hedge sparrow's eggs under it. As it lay upon them part of their bodies were covered by the cuckoo's rump, and as they had become addled, as birds frequently suffer by attempting to remain in their nests without young, but one bird came to the nest and continued a living source, for none of course the eggs must have been hatched, the cuckoo after the cuckoo was hatched, the latter covered and filled up the nest by which to obtain nature performing another part of office.

At the same time I was satisfied with the fact, that the young cuckoo turned out the eggs of the hedge sparrow, but it remained to be ascertained, whether the deposition of the cuckoo's egg was the deposited in the nest.

Having observed, as mentioned in another hedge sparrow's nest, a young cuckoo, about the same size as the former, I procured two wood-larks eggs, which I placed in it about a few days, and had the pleasure to see the cuckoo to the spot, and find the cuckoo. On the next day the eggs had been in the situation, the position appointed to support the nest, but a little distance from the place of my settling, came to inform me that the eggs were hatched. On going going to the place, and examining the neft, I found nothing in it but the cuckoo and the fhells of the wagtail's eggs. The fact, therefore, of the birds being hatched, I do not give you as coming immediately under my own eye, but the teftimony of the perfon appointed to watch the neft was corroborated by that of another witnefs

To what caufe then may we attribute the fingularities of the cuckoo? May they not be owing to the following circumftances? the fhort refidence this bird is allowed to make in the country where it is deftined to propagate its fpecies, and the call that nature has upon it, during that fhort refidence, to produce a numerous progeny The cuckoo's firft appearance here is about the middle of April Its egg is not ready for incubation till fome weeks after its arrival, feldom before the middle of May A fortnight is taken up by the fitting bird in hatching the egg. The young bird generally continues three weeks in the neft before it flies, and the fofter-parents feed it more than five weeks after this period, fo that, if a cuckoo fhould be ready with an egg much fooner than the time pointed out, not a fingle reftling, even one of the earlieft, would be fit to provide for itfelf before its parent would be inftinctively directed to feek a new refidence, and be thus compelled to abandon its young one; for old cuckoos take their final leave of this country the firft week in July

Had nature allowed the cuckoo to have ftaid here as long as fome other migrating birds, which produce a fingle fet of young ones (as the fwift or nightingale, for example) and had allowed her to have reared as large a number as any bird is capable of bringing up at one time, thefe might not have been fufficient to have anfwered her purpofe, but by fending the cuckoo from one neft to another, fhe is reduced to the fame ftate as the bird whofe neft we daily rob of an egg, in which cafe the ftimulus for incubation is fufpended Of this we have a familiar example in the common domeftic fowl That the cuckoo actually lays a great number of eggs, diffection feems to prove very decifively Upon a comparifon I had an opportunity of making between the ovarium, or racemus ovi'lorum, of a female cuckoo, killed juft as fhe had begun to lay, and of a pullet killed in the fame ftate, no eſſential difference appeared The uterus of each contained an egg perfectly formed, and ready for exclufion, and the ovarium exhibited a large cluſter of eggs gradually advanced from a very diminutive fize, to the greateft the yolk acquires before it is received into the oviduct The appearance of one killed on the third of July was very different In this I could diftinctly trace a great number of the membranes which had difcharged yolks into the oviduct, and one of them appeared as if it had parted with a yolk the preceding day The ovarium ſtill exhibited a cluſter of enlarged eggs, but the moſt forward of them was ſcarcely larger than a muſtard-ſeed

I would not be underſtood to advance that every egg which ſwells in the ovarium at the approach or commencement of the propagating ſeaſon is brought to perfection but it appears clearly, that a bird, in obedience to the dictates of her own will, to ſome hidden cauſe in the animal œconomy, can either retard or bring forward her eggs Beſide the example of the common fowl above alluded to, many others occur If you deſtroy the neſt of a blackbird, a robin, or almoſt any ſmall bird, in the ſpring, when ſhe has laid her uſual number of eggs, it is well known to every one, who has paid any attention to enquiries of this kind, in how ſhort a ſpace of time ſhe will produce a freſh ſet Now, had the bird been ſuffered to have proceeded without interruption in her natural courſe, the eggs would have been hatched, and the young ones brought to a ſtate capable of providing for themſelves, before ſhe would have been induced to make another neſt, and excited to produce another ſet of eggs from the ovarium If the bird had been deſtroyed at the time ſhe was ſitting on her firſt laying of eggs, diſſection would have ſhewn the ovarium containing a great number in an enlarged ſtate, and advancing in the uſual progreſſive order. Hence it plainly appears, that birds can keep back or bring forward, under certain limitations, their eggs at any time during the ſeaſon appointed for them to lay, but the cuckoo, not being ſubject to the common interruptions, goes on laying from the time ſhe begins, till the eve of her departure from this country for although old cuckoos in general take their leave the firſt week in July, and I never could ſee one after the 5th day of that month, yet I have known an inſtance of an egg being hatched in the neſt of a hedge ſparrow ſo late as the 15th And a farther proof of their continuing to lay till the time of their leaving us may, I think, be fairly deduced from the appearances on diſſection of the female cuckoo above mentioned, killed on the 3d of July

Among the many peculiarities of the young cuckoo, there is one that ſhews itſelf very early Long before it leaves the neſt, it frequently, when irritated, aſſumes the manner of a bird of prey, looks ferocious, throws itſelf back, and pecks at any thing preſented preſented to it with great vehemence, often at the ſame time making a chuckling noiſe like a young hawk Sometimes, when diſturbed in a ſmaller degree, it makes a kind of hiſſing noiſe, accompanied with a heaving motion of the whole body The growth of the young cuckoo is uncommonly rapid

The chirp is plaintive, like that of the hedge ſparrow, but the ſound is not acquired from the foſter parent, as it is the ſame whether it be reared by the hedge-ſparrow, or any other bird It never acquires the adult note during its ſtay in this country

The ſtomach of young cuckoos contain a great variety of food On diſſecting one that was brought up by wagtails, and fed by them at the time it was ſhot, though it was nearly of the ſize and fulneſs of plumage of the parent-bird, I found in its ſtomach the following ſubſtances flies and beetles of various kinds, ſmall ſnails, with their ſhells unbroken, graſhoppers; caterpillars, part of a horſe bean, a vegetable ſubſtance reſembling bits of tough graſs, rolled into a ball, the ſeed of a vegetable that reſembled thoſe of the gooſe-graſs

In the ſtomach of one fed by hedge-ſparrow, the contents were almoſt entirely vegetable, ſuch as wheat, ſmall vetches, &c But this was the only inſtance of the kind I had ever ſeen, as theſe birds, in general, feed the young cuckoo with ſcarcely any thing but animal food However, it ſerved to clear up a point which before had ſomewhat puzzled me, for having found the cuckoo's egg in the neſt of a green linnet, which begins very early to feed its young with vegetable food, I was apprehenſive, till I ſaw this fact, that this bird would have been an unfit foſter-parent for the young cuckoo

The titlark, I obſerve, feeds it principally with graſhoppers

But the moſt ſingular ſubſtance, ſo often met with in the ſtomachs of young cuckoos, is a ball of hair curiouſly wound up I have found it of various ſizes, from that of a pea to that of a ſmall nutmeg It ſeems to be compoſed chiefly of [illegible], and from the reſemblance it bears to the lining of the neſt, I conceive the bird ſwallows it while a neſtling In the ſtomachs of old cuckoos I have often ſeen maſſes of hair; but theſe had evidently once formed a part of the hairy caterpillar, which the cuckoo often takes for its food

There ſeems to be no preciſe time aſſigned for the departure of young cuckoos. I believe they go off in ſucceſſion, probably as ſoon as they are capable of taking care of themſelves; for although they ſtay here till they become nearly equal in ſize and growth of plumage to the old cuckoo, yet in this very ſtate the foſtering care of the hedge ſparrow is not withdrawn from them. I have frequently ſeen the young cuckoo of ſuch a ſize that the hedge-ſparrow has perched on its back, or half expanded wing, in order to gain ſufficient elevation to put the food into its mouth At this advanced ſtage, I believe that young cuckoos procure ſome food for themſelves; like the young rook, for inſtance, which in part feeds itſelf, and is partly fed by the old ones till the approach of the pairing ſeaſon If they did not go off in ſucceſſion, it is probable we ſhould ſee them in large numbers by the middle of Auguſt; for as they are to be found in great plenty, when in a neſtling ſtate, they muſt now appear very numerous, ſince all of them muſt have quitted the neſt before this time But this is not the caſe; for they are not more numerous at any ſeaſon than the parent-birds are in the months of May and June

The ſame inſtinctive impulſe which directs the cuckoo to depoſit her eggs in the neſts of other birds, directs her young one to throw out the eggs and young of the owner of the neſt The ſcheme of nature would be extremely difficult, if not impoſſible, for the little birds, deſtined to find ſuccour for the cuckoo, to find it alſo for their own young ones, after a certain period, nor would there be room for the whole to inhabit the neſt

JOURNAL of the PROCEEDINGS of the SIXTEENTH PARLIAMENT of GREAT BRITAIN.

HOUSE of LORDS.

MONDAY, JAN. 26

EARL Camden moved, that a meſſage might be ſent to the Commons, deſiring a conference.—Ordered —Two Maſters in Chancery carried the meſſage

The Houſe waited a quarter of an hour, when Mr. Quarme informed the Houſe that the Commons were in waiting ready to hold a conference with their Lordſhips in the Painted Chamber

The following Noble Lords were then choſen a Committee to confer with the Commons

Earl Camden, Lord Preſident.

Marquis of Stafford, Lord Privy Seal.
Duke of Chandos, Lord Steward
Earl of Darlington
Viscount Wentworth.
Bishop of St. David's.
Bishop of Salisbury.
Lord Osborne, Marquis of Carmarthen
Lord Sydney
Lord Hawkesbury.

The Lords of the Committee withdrew, and having taken their seats at the head of the table, in the Painted Chamber, the Lord President communicated to the Commons, that they had agreed to the Resolutions for the settlement of the Regency, which were brought up by the Commons, without any amendment. The conference then broke up.

The Committee withdrew into the House and reported.

Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, Jan 28

Lord Belgrave appeared at the bar, attended by ten Members, and desired a conference with their Lordships. The Commons being withdrawn, the Lord Chancellor put the question, when it was resolved to confer with the Commons immediately in the Painted Chamber. The following Lords were chosen a Committee for that purpose

Earl Camden, Lord President
Marquis of Stafford, Lord Privy Seal
Lord Osborne, Marquis of Carmarthen
Viscount Wentworth
Bishop of Salisbury
Bishop of St. David's
Lord Sydney
Lord Hawkesbury

The Committee withdrew into the Painted Chamber, and took their seats, when Lord Belgrave, the Manager for the Commons, informed their Lordships, that in pursuance of the joint Resolutions of the two Houses, the Commons had entered into certain Resolutions respecting the Regency, and the care of his Majesty's person and Household, to which they desired their Lordships concurrence. The conference then broke up, and their Lordships returned to the House, when the Lord President reported the effect of the conference.

The two following Resolutions of the House of Commons were then read

"That a Committee be appointed to communicate to his Royal Highness the Prince "of Wales, the Resolution which the House "of Lords and Commons have agreed to, "for providing the means of supplying the "defect in the Royal Person, during the Royal "authority under such regulations as the "present circumstances may require, and "that the Committee be directed to inform "his Royal Highness, that the

"Commons express their hope that his "Royal Highness will accept the said charge, "as soon as an Act of Parliament can be "passed for carrying into effect the said pur-"pose

"That the Resolution which relates to the "care of his Majesty's person, and the ma-"nagement of his Majesty's Household "being in the Queen, should be communi-"cated to her Majesty, with an address, "humbly desiring her Majesty, in the name "of the Commons, to take under "her care those important trusts, as soon as "an Act of Parliament can be passed for "that purpose

The Lord Chancellor from the woolsack put the question upon the first Resolution, for addressing the Prince of Wales to take the Regency under certain restrictions and limitations when

The Lord President moved, that the words in the Resolutions from the Commons, might be filled up with the words, "Lords Spiritual and Temporal"

The question was put, and ordered

The Lord Chancellor then put the question, that the Resolution so amended, do pass, when

The Duke of Northumberland rose.—His Grace observed, that before a Resolution of such importance was passed, it was necessary for the safety of the Constitution, and the honour of the Prince, that the terms of the Resolution should be properly defined.—The limitations were entered into in consequence of the (hope'd) well formed expectations that his Majesty would speedily recover, otherwise it would be preposterous, unconstitutional and unnatural, to deprive the Regent, who must sustain all the invidious duties of a King, from participating any of those prerogatives which tended to soften the arduous task. The words which his Grace should have the honour to propose, were in their very nature so moderate and explanatory, that he sincerely hoped they would not be objected to by any noble Lord, for what could be more desirable to the House, to the Prince Regent, and to the nation, than that blessings and prosperity, which would of itself insure harmony to every part of the Government. The Duke certainly could not entertain a desire to involve his Royal Highness in any difficulty much less could they wish that there might remain the least doubt in his mind, that there was any intentional obscurity thrown into the Resolution, which might hereafter create doubts or difficulties. He should not attempt to enter into a question, every part of which had been so repeatedly and so fully discussed, but immediately submit the following amendment to the judgment and candour of the House—"And "we beg leave to add, that this Resolution "is formed upon a well grounded hope, that "his Majesty's illness will be only tempo-"rary, and of no long duration."

Lord Stormont rose to second the amendment. His Lordship said, the weight and consequence in the state of the Noble Duke, together with his amiable character, and great personal qualities, would, he hoped, induce the House to accept the amendment.

No answer being given, a dead silence of a minute took place.—The Lord Chancellor put the question, that the Resolution with the amendment, (Earl Camden's) do pass. His Lordship declared the contents had carried the question. The subject not being well understood, Lord Portchester said he apprehended by that determination, the Noble Duke's amendment was carried. The Earl of Carlisle expressed the same opinion. The Lord Chancellor left the woolsack. He thought the determination had been perfectly understood. It was always the rule to put the first amendment to the vote, and if that was rejected to put the second amendment, by the adoption of the first the second was of course rejected. A short conversation ensued, after which the second Resolution was read, "Humbly to address her Majesty, to take "into her care his Majesty's person, and the "care of his Majesty's Household."

Upon this Resolution the most extraordinary conversation (for it by no means merits the title of a debate) took place, that ever was heard in the House of Lord. It was wide and diffusive in its objects, and dilatory in its nature to the extreme. All the former arguments were again urged, which have been so often repeated in both Houses, but in such an irregular and disconnected manner, that it is impossible to repeat them in detail, and they would be useless to our readers, if we had time or talents to recapitulate them. And of this variety of heterogeneous matter we will endeavour to collect the little that was new or interesting.

The Earl of Carlisle complained of the cool unprincipled conduct observed by his Majesty's Ministers, who had not deigned to favour the House with a single word of explanation on the subject of the question. Such treatment, he said, was unworthy the persons who held the high offices of State, and he doubted not would be felt as a species of disdainful neglect, if they were so treated when out of office, on subjects of such magnitude and importance as those under consideration. His Lordship adverted to the speech of a noble and learned Lord, (the Lord Chancellor) in the last debate. That noble and learned Lord, he said, it was well known had ability to catch at any argument that came within his reach. When therefore they found that noble and learned Lord confine himself to a harsh invective against that side of the House, and deal in declamation solely, it was fairly to conclude that he would not have recourse to an appeal to the passions, if he had not found himself divested of argument, and that the cause which he rose to support could not be attempted to be upheld by sober reason. His Lordship argued upon the danger of pledging the House by the Resolution, and precluding them from the free exercise of their deliberative functions. He said, a hint had been given in that as well as the other House, that the Prince of Wales was to have a Household established, in lieu of the patronage taken from him, what that Household was to consist of, ought to make a part of the communication then proposed to be made to his Royal Highness.

The Duke of Richmond assured the noble Earl, that it was not from any contempt for any noble Lord, who like the noble Earl had objected to the Resolutions, that he had forborne to rise before and say a word or two in favour of the Motion under consideration. It was merely from the impression, that both Houses having proceeded to fix to vote Resolutions containing the general principles on which the bill to be brought in was to contain the detail the natural step to be taken, as well out of respect to his Royal Highness as to the regularity of their proceedings, was to go up with the Resolutions to the Prince, and learn from his Royal Highness whether he was willing to accept the Regency on those conditions or not. With regard to the Resolutions having been debated as temporary in their nature, and that therefore there ought to be some words of limitation in the motion, he admitted that the Resolution had been all along stated to contain restrictions if only to be applied in a case of a temporary nature, and the reason why any words of special limitation were not necessary in the motion was, it did already specifically refer to such restriction as the circumstances of the case appeared at present to require. His Grace reasoned largely and deeply on the propriety of the measure then under consideration, declaring that it appeared to him highly respectful to his Royal Highness, as the House might, if they thought proper, proceed with out taking such a step, and when the Bill had passed into a law, his Royal Highness would not have an opportunity of objecting should any part of the bill be found to contain clauses not agreeable to him.

Lord Stormont confessed his obligations to the noble Duke for having broken silence, since had it not been for the condescension of his Grace, his Majesty's Ministers seemed all determined to have imitated the eloquence of Ajax, which, although it might be becoming that surly character, was not, in his opinion, a proper conduct to be observed by his Majesty's Ministers in a House of Parliament, when a great and important measure was under consideration. He said he would not detain their Lordships long, but would, as shortly as possible, offer a few observations that struck him on the moment in what he was going to state, if he should be wrong the noble Duke would set him right. On Monday last, it had been understood, that the question then before the House was to have been moved, but as it had been apprehended that there might be a difference of opinion on the subject, the intention was given up, lest there should be any ground for a charge of taking the House by surprize. Undoubtedly the idea was a fair one, but he for one had been a good deal mortified at the delay, because by that means the subject had been first agitated by their good and gracious Instructors the House of Commons, whose obedient and very humble servants they were, as had been sufficiently manifested ever since the House of Commons had kindly taken on themselves the office of directing that House in their duty. His Lordship said, it seldom happened that he troubled their Lordships with any motion, but he remembered that he had proposed one, when the Commercial Treaty was under discussion, declaring, that nothing contained in an address then moved, should be held to pledge that House so as to preclude the freedom of debate in the discussion of any of the steps to be subsequently taken in that business. A noble Lord, who was not then in the kingdom, had declared his proposition to be a truism, and had moved the previous question upon it, which had been carried, under the death that it was unnecessary to vote a truism. He hoped, therefore, that the same doctrine which had been then established, would prevail in the present instance, and that if the motion for carrying up the Resolutions should pass, it would not be considered that the House was precluded from the right to object to any part of the bill, which they all understood was grounded on those Resolutions. His Lordship charged Ministers with having deserted the plain road to the object in view, and pursued a bye-way, which had caused much inconvenience and much delay. He expatiated on the evil consequences of that delay, and particularly enforced its mischievous effect on foreign affairs. He said, in all matters of communication, he took it to be a general rule, that if a communication had been made privately, and it was afterwards thought that such communication ought for special reasons to be publicly made, the terms of the public communication ought to be the same as those in which the private communication had been made. This rule, however, was departed from in the present instance. he held in his hand, his Lordship said, the letter which was stated to be the letter of the Minister to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, communicating the Restrictions that were at the time they were sent proposed to be submitted to the two Houses, and which had since been voted. In the letter were these words, "that the Restriction were formed on the "supposition, that his Majesty's illness was "only temporary, and might be of no long "duration." These words, his Lordship said, were written in the name of the Minister himself and his colleagues, and expressly stated to have been the whole foundation of the plan of proceedings that had been adopted in consequence of his Majesty's illness. He asked, why those words had not made a part of the Resolutions, unless it was that the Minister, however he might have derived advantage in debate from repeatedly using such language, in fact meant a perpetual regulation; which he contended he must have meant, since the propriety of revising the limitations and restrictions imposed on the Regent, was to depend upon a circumstance which could never happen, viz. whenever his Majesty's Physicians should be so totally ignorant of their profession as to admit, what no man at any time could with certainty pronounce, namely, that his Majesty's disorder was incurable.

The Lord Chancellor left the woolsack and declared, he thought it somewhat hard to have it thrown out at every turn, that every thing that had been said, and had not been answered, shewed disrespect to the speaker. His Lordship said, he well knew they were dust and ashes in comparison with the noble Lords who had chosen to call themselves one side of the House, and that when they addressed the House, they were subject to animadversion, and to have it imputed to them that they were not capable of arguing. His Lordship reasoned upon the Resolutions and Motion, observing, that as to any limitation, the whole plan obviously formed a regulation meant to cease when the occasion ceased, and when a new occasion offered, a new regulation would be to be made. With regard to the whole being a meditated plan, to throw a check in the way of a new Government, he did not in truth, believe that it was so felt. Certain he was, that if it was a meditated plan, he was a perfect stranger to it, and no party to that concert. He looked upon the amount of the restrictions in a very different point of view, and conceived them to be so much more salutary, that if he had been to advise those who were supposed to be in the confidence of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, he would have advised them, at the peril of his life, to have met them more than half way with a view to provide for the safe return of his Majesty to his Government on his recovery. His Lordship said, he could have invented a plan, that would firmly fix an authority, which planted in so kindly a soil, could not have failed to have proved prosperous and flourishing. He could, he said, have chalked out in his own mind a plan that would have better pleased his judgment, than that which had been adopted, but that, considering that other men's opinions were to be consulted, and different matters attended to, was, allowing for the clash of the times, the best that under all the circumstances of the case could be brought forward. His Lordship said, the Household of the Prince of Wales was not then under consideration. Whatever it might be, he took it for granted, that from its nature, it must be something to be settled subsequent to the appointment of a Regent. He knew nothing of it, "sufficient to the day was the evil thereof." At present, the sole consideration before the House, was the motion to carry up the Resolutions to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. With regard to that measure, he deemed that there was any want of respect to the Prince in going up with the Resolutions, on the contrary, the mode of proceeding was, in his mind, the most respectful that could be followed. He stated why he thought so, and took notice, that some strictures had been laid in the course of the debate on the amendment having been moved by a most puissant Prince. That sort of distinction, he said, was what could not be endured in that House. There it was customary for all the Peers to be considered as equal, and though they well knew the difference made by elevated rank, high station, ancient families, splendid fortunes, and exalted virtues, yet, in a parliamentary point of view, a motion was equally entitled to be respectfully entertained, whether it came from a Right Hon. Baron or a noble Duke, who in his title was styled a most puissant Prince.

The Earl of Carlisle rose to justify himself for what he had said, in his former speech. His Lordship said, when a Lord of the noble and learned Lord's abilities addressed himself to the passions, he had a right to say he had no argument, and when they were told, in language of great force and eloquence, and consequently that could not fail to make a great impression on the noble and learned Lord's audience, that if they attempted to divide a motion, existing on the sure basis of the King's person, and to separate the patronage and controul of the Household, they were deserting the King, like Darius, in his utmost need, did the noble and learned Lord think that it was to pass without any animadversion? His Lordship said, that charging them with having abandoned their King, and left him

"Deserted in his utmost need
"By those his former bounty fed," was treating them rather like Lazarus who was fed by crumbs from the rich man's table, than like British Noblemen. His Lordship took notice of what the noble and learned Lord had said, of the advice he would have given at the peril of his life, and argued as if the Lord Chancellor had questioned the propriety of the Prince's conduct.

The Lord Chancellor rose to explain, declaring that he had never let a word about the conduct of his Royal Highness, which he did not presume to question, but had related of the advice which he would have given those who were supposed to be his Royal Highness's Counsellors.

Lord Sturmont rose shortly to animadvert on the noble and learned Lord having said, "sufficient to the day was the evil thereof," and declared that he knew nothing of the establishment for the Prince of Wales. His Lordship said, the Minister in another House had held triumphant language on the subject, and had declared, when all his Ministerial functions were relinquished, he would take upon himself the odium of proposing that establishment. His Lordship referred the noble and learned Lord to a former debate in that House, when it had been expressly declared, that it was intended to give the Prince of Wales an establishment suitable to the dignity of the Regent. He asked, had the noble and learned Lord been so occupied since by his various duties, that he had buried in the river of oblivion what he formerly knew? All he found, who knew the Prince of Wales's sentiments, knew that it was repugnant to his mind, to form an establishment by an unnecessary expence to the country. His Lordship added other arguments of a similar tendency.

The Lord Chancellor said a few words in reply.

The Marquis Townshend, Lord Portchester, and Lord Fitzwilliam severally spoke against the motion, as calculated to carry up imperfect and incomplete Resolutions to the Prince of Wales.

Lord Rodnor asked if voting the motion would preclude him or any other noble Lord from freely discussing and objecting to any part part of the bill that they might disapprove of when it should come under consideration?

Lord Sydney said, undoubtedly every noble Lord would be at liberty to give a free opinion, and vote as he should think proper on any future measure relative to the subject.

The Duke of Richmond justified his former arguments, which had been questioned by Lord Portchester and Lord Fitzwilliam. His Grace complained of Lord Stormont having produced a mutilated publication of the letters that had passed between the Minister and the Prince of Wales, and argued upon it. He asked, why were not two other letters that had made a part of that correspondence produced? the letter preceding that of the Minister, and the letter succeeding that of his Royal Highness. He defended the Lord Chancellor's speech of Friday, and observed, that noble and learned Lord had been far to have appealed to the passions. But it was to be remembered that the noble and learned Lord had first offered arguments, and those of the strongest nature, and how then had it these arguments with him, I'll not appeal to the passions, but to the feelings of the House? The Duke asked, what could be more powerful appeal than to the feelings of their Lordships. He argued this very ably, and pointed out that a different reason was stated in the Protest from that relied on in debate, in objection to the resolution relative to making Regency. In debate, it had been contended that the power was necessary to the Regent, to enable him to reward merit. In the Protest, the argument was, that the power of creating Peers was the only bond of the Prerogative sufficiently powerful to afford a remedy against a combination in that House. The secret, therefore, was out.

Lord Hay defended the Protest which he had signed.

Lord Fitzwilliam did the same.

Lord Hawkesbury stated, that such of their Lordships who had acted for the Resolutions, were bound in point of honour and conscience not to vote against measures grounded on those Resolutions on a slight reason, nor unless new matter was introduced into those measures.

At length after several of the noble speakers had been upon repeatedly, the question was called for and put, when the motion was agreed to without a division. The second motion was also agreed to, and a conference desired with the Commons to acquaint them therewith.

The House then upon motion, it being eight o'clock, was adjourned to

FRIDAY, JAN 30.

The Lord Chancellor came to the House at eleven.—At twelve the House was adjourned to next day.

His Lordship then, according to the order of the day, went to Westminster abbey, preceded by the officers of the House, and accompanied by ten Bishops.

The sermon was delivered by Dr Pretyman, Bishop of Lincoln, who took his text from the eighth chapter of St John, the thirty second verse, "And ye shall know the TRUTH, and the TRUTH shall make you free." From which he drew a plain and candid discourse upon the ground, that the tenets of the Church of England were the truth, and that political liberty was closely united to the tenets of the Gospel.—He touched with much temper and accuracy upon the disposition and tumultuousness of the times in which the event occurred they had to lament, but with a commendable forbearance dropped not a single allusion to the politics of the present day.

SATURDAY, JAN 31.

The Lord Chancellor being so much indisposed as not to be able to attend, Earl Bathurst sat on the woolsack in his stead.

The thanks of the House were ordered to the Bishop of Lincoln (Dr Pretyman) for his sermon preached yesterday before them.

The Lord Chancellor, one of the Council Lord Camden, Lord Chief Justice Kenyon, according to the orders of their Lordships, waited on His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with the Address, to which his Royal Highness was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I thank you for communicating to me the Resolutions agreed to by the two Houses, and I request you to assure them in my name, that my duty to the King, my Father, and my anxious concern for the safety and interests of the people, which must be endangered by a longer suspension of the exercise of the Royal Authority, together with my respect for the united desires of the two Houses, outweigh in my mind every other consideration, and will determine me to undertake the weighty and important trust proposed to me, in conformity to the Resolutions now communicated to me. I am sensible of the difficulties that must attend this trust in the peculiar circumstances in which it is committed to my charge, in which, as I am acquainted with no former example, my hopes of a successful administration cannot be founded on

"on any past experience; but confiding "that the limitations on the exercise of the "Royal Authority deemed neceſſary for the "preſent, have been approved only by the "two Houſes as a temporary meaſure, "founded on the loyal hope, in which I "ardently participate, that his Majeſty's "diſorder may not be of long duration, and "truſting in the mean while that I ſhall re-"ceive a zealous and united ſupport in the "two Houſes, and in the nation, proportioned to the difficulty attending the diſcharge of my truſt in this interval, I will "entertain the pleaſing hope that my faithful endeavours to preſerve the intereſts "of the King, the Crown, and People, "may be ſucceſsful."

Lord Waldegrave reported that he had, with Lord Aylesbury, waited upon her Majeſty with their Lordſhips Addreſs, to which ſhe had been pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"My duty and gratitude to the King, and "the ſenſe I muſt ever entertain of my great "obligations to this country, will certainly "engage my moſt earneſt attention to the "anxious and momentous truſt intended to "be repoſed in me by Parliament. It will "be a great conſolation to me to receive the "aid of a Council, of which I ſhall ſtand "ſo much in need, in diſcharge of a duty "wherein the happineſs of my future life is "indeed deeply intereſted, but which, a "higher object, the happineſs of a great, "loyal and affectionate people renders ſtill "more important."

Lord Southampton then roſe, and after expreſſing his ſincere wiſh that the anſwer and ſentiments of his Royal Highneſs might be known by the people, moved, "that the "meſſage to his Royal Highneſs the Prince "of Wales be printed, with his Royal "Highneſs's anſwer thereto."

Lord Radnor moved, "that the meſſage "to the Queen, and her Majeſty's anſwer "thereto, be printed."

The order of the day being read for the Houſe going into a Committee on the State of the Nation, Earl Bathurſt left the woolſack, Lord Walſingham was called to the table, and their Lordſhips immediately reſolved themſelves into a Committee of the whole Houſe on the State of the Nation.

The Lord Preſident then roſe and ſaid, their Lordſhips having received the aſſent of her Majeſty, and his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, in the manner the Houſe had juſt heard, it was incumbent on the Committee to proceed with all poſſible diſpatch in a buſineſs, where even the delays

[illegible] on [illegible] which appeared to [illegible] a formal Reſolution to [illegible] their two proceedings. They [illegible] ſent, it muſt be admitted merely a [illegible] tion, being incomplete and imperfect, [illegible] out the aſſiſtance of the third Eſtate, [illegible] two Houſes of Parliament in ſuch a [illegible] were an impotent, a maimed, and [illegible] trunk, without functions and without [illegible], and could do no one Legiſlative Act until they were crown'd and animated by the preſence, or aſſent of the Sovereign. A lamented calamity had rendered that preſence and that aſſent impoſſible to be received; B ing, therefore, deprived of the aſſiſtance of the King in his natural capacity, they were compelled to reſort to his political capacity. There was but one organ by which this aſſiſtance could be derived, or by which they could be reſtored to their natural functions, and this organ was the Great Seal. This was in fact the mouth of the King, it was the inſtrument by which he declared his will, and was therefore the only one by which the Courts below could be brought to recognize their proceedings formally and legally as an Act of Parliament!—This mode of proceeding had, however, been ridiculed as a phantom! It had been ſaid, that ſuch an act would be an emanation from, not an addition to, their authority. But would thoſe who were thus free in their ridicule, impart any other mode by which they could be extricated from their preſent difficulty? Would they ſay that the Prince of Wales could of his own authority proceed to open the Parliament in due form? No! That was impoſſible, for until an Act of Parliament created the Prince Regent, the Reſolutions of the two Houſes declared that he poſſeſſed no political authority, and conſequently the Parliament could not be opened by him, nor by any other, without the uſe of what had been ſo frequently termed a fiction. Did they require that the Lord Chancellor ſhould put himſelf into ſuch a ſituation of perſonal hazard, as of his own accord to put the Great Seal to any bill? They were compelled therefore by neceſſity to reſort to a Reſolution of the two Houſes, empowering the proper perſons to make uſe of the Great Seal—an inſtrument which his Lordſhip ſaid was of ſuch great and particular authority, that even if the Lord Chancellor committed a high miſdemeanor by affixing it to Letters Patent, thoſe inſtruments muſt be conſidered valid, they would have the full force of law, and could not be diſputed by any of the Judges. His Lordſhip, in ſupport of his doctrine, recurred to ſeveral precedents, but argued principally upon

[illegible] declaring all Acts the [illegible] that those precedents, his Lordship [illegible] had been rejected, had been declared by those persons not fit to be acted upon, and having been formed in times of barbarity. He would however take upon himself to say to such persons, that however superior we might be in the knowledge of arts, and in the accommodation and luxury of life, to our barbarous ancestors, it by no means followed that we were better acquainted with the forms of Parliament, or with the law of the Constitution. To those barbarous ancestors were their polite posterity obliged for some of the best Acts on the Statute Book, and for the most essential forms of Parliament and the Constitution. His Lordship quoted the conduct of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, whose character as a lawyer and a man of integrity he highly panegyrised, and who had affixed the Great Seal to an instrument in the manner he now proposed it to be used. Two Resolutions, he said, would be found necessary to be adopted, under their present circumstances, to complete the Legislature. The first which he meant to submit to their Lordships, was, to establish a Commission to open and hold the Parliament in due form; the second would follow up the first at a convenient time, for the purpose of empowering the Royal Assent to be given, in his Majesty's name, to the Bill of Regency, by the same, or by another Commission. His Lordship concluded by moving, "That it is expedient and necessary that "Letters Patent, under the Great Seal of "Great Britain, be empowered to be issued "by the authority of the two Houses of "Parliament, in the tenor and form following —

Lord Portchester said, that the whole of what he had now heard from the noble and learned Lord, only served to convince him, that they were now in that precise situation where they stood two months since,—with this difference only, that they were now going to do by a pretended Act of Parliament what should have been done by a declaration of both Houses. They had declared their right to dispose of the Supreme Authority, when its personal exercise was no longer possible in the Sovereign; but what use were they now about to make of the right thus asserted?—They were about to give a part of it to a creature set up by themselves, to give what must be afterwards termed the Royal Assent,—they were to give a part of it to the Queen;—and the mangled remnant they were to give to the Prince Regent!—They were about to send down to Westminster-hall, where the highest ideas were entertained of the political perfection of the Sovereign, not such a Deity as they had been accustomed to adore, but an Image crippled and defaced, stript of its finest proportions, and deformed by the hand of Distrust!—But the noble and learned Lord had said, that this fiction of the Great Seal was necessary, as otherwise the Act would not be of validity in the Courts below. It was necessary, however, to inform that noble Lord, that besides this fiction, another Forgery was necessary, as he held in his hand Abstracts from two Acts of Parliament, by both which the Sign Manual also was made essentially necessary to the validity of any Act. These were the Acts of the 33d of Henry VIII. and the 1st of Philip and Mary; the former declaring that no Act could be valid, unless signed by the Sovereign, or in his absence by the Custos Regni; and the latter, in deciding on the attainder of the Duke of Norfolk, speaking the same language, but in stronger terms, by reversing the whole of the proceedings, on the ground, as it was stated, that the signature of the late Sovereign did not appear on the face of the Act. His Lordship concluded with declaring that whenever the second Resolution came to be discussed, it should meet with his most earnest opposition.

Lord Camden replied, that a different meaning was to be attached to those Acts than that which had been inferred by the noble Lord. They were, he contended, Acts merely affirmative,—that is, they asserted that Acts so signed were legal, but they no where contained the assertion, that those Acts could not be legalized in any other form!—His Lordship added, that a precedent directly contradicting the inference of the noble Lord had been put into his hand. It stated, that in 28 Eliz. an Act had actually passed under the Great Seal only, and without the Sign Manual.

His Royal Highness the Duke of York said, that he felt himself called on, by hearing his name recited amongst those who were to be included in the Commission, He had already given his opinion on the present proceedings, which he could not but regard regard as illegal and unconſtitutional. That opinion appearing on the Records of this Houſe, he could not give his conſent, that his name, by appearing in the liſt of the Commiſſioners, ſhould ſeem to give a ſanction to meaſures of which he had ſo ſolemnly diſapproved! He was empowered to ſay the ſame for his Royal Relative who was preſent (the Duke of Cumberland); and though he was not preciſely authorized by his Royal Brother, the Prince, or by his Highneſs the Duke of Gloceſter, yet he could aſſure the Houſe, that their ſeelings were the ſame, and the ſentiments of them all were on this occaſion in the moſt perfect coincidence!

Lord Camden ſaid, that on ſuch information, and from ſuch authority, there could be no heſitation reſpecting the propriety of omitting the names of thoſe Royal Perſonages in the Commiſſion.

Lord Weſtmorland was then proceeding to omit their names, by putting the queſtion ſeverally on each, when he was interrupted by Lord Kinnaird, who ſaid, that the preſent was not the time for making the amendment, and by the Lord Chancellor and Earl Fitzwilliam, who remarked, that if the preſent mode of omitting the names, the tranſaction would appear on their Journals as a mark of diſreſpect.

Lord Derby remarked alſo on the dilemma to which the Houſe was thus reduced, but added, that it muſt ſpring from the informalities of their original proceedings, from which nothing could poſſibly ſpring but confuſion. The noble and learned Lord (Camden) he obſerved, had yeſterday an interview with his Royal Highneſs, when if a proper communication had been made of the mode intended to be purſued by his Majeſty's Miniſters, the Houſe could not poſſibly have been involved in a ſituation ſo aukward as the preſent.

Lord Camden in his vindication obſerved, that it had always been uſual, as a matter of courſe, to inſert the names of the Royal Family in every commiſſion. Had they therefore been omitted in the preſent, the charge of diſreſpect would have been brought againſt his Majeſty's Miniſters with much more juſtice. Such a charge he felt himſelf incapable of meriting, though it had been more than once inſinuated. It had been alledged, for inſtance, that when the Privy Council had been firſt ſummoned, for the purpoſe of examining the Phyſicians, he, as Lord Preſident, had been guilty of diſreſpect, by ſending to the Royal Highneſs a ſummons ſimilar to that of any other Member. The fact, on the contrary, was, that having found on enquiry, that the ſummons uſually ſent to [redacted] the Council, [redacted] but had ſent a letter [redacted] and enclosed to Lord [redacted] him delivered to his Royal [redacted] Lord Southampton delivered the [redacted] his Royal Highneſs, and on being [redacted] that was the moſt reſpectful mode of [redacted] veyance, declared it was.

Lord Portchester contended that this was by no means ſufficient. The diſreſpect [redacted] in the ſilence obſerved when the ballots were in contemplation, and when the Prince ſhould have been informed of the [redacted] he purſued.—The form of the ſummons was a matter beneath their conſideration.

Lord Stormont followed, and enforced the ſame idea. The feelings of his Royal Highneſs, he obſerved, were ſufficient, without the contumelious ſilence which had been there obſerved, reſpecting an inquiry where his deareſt intereſts were at ſtake.

Lord Radnor, after ſome converſation had paſſed on the difficulty of omitting the names of the Blood Royal without an implied diſreſpect, propoſed a mode, which was accepted. His propoſition was to ſtate, by a diſtinct Reſolution on the Journals, that the omiſſion had been made at the requiſition of thoſe Royal Perſonages themſelves.

Lord Stormont then returning to the general queſtion, ſaid, that of the Reſolution now before the Houſe, and that by which it was intended to be followed, his firm opinion was, that the firſt was informal, and the ſecond totally illegal. He did not mean to except to the Reſolution now before the Houſe, becauſe he was convinced that there was no meaſure which could be adopted to which the charge of informality would not in ſome degree apply. But if this Reſolution was deemed neceſſary at preſent, he ſhould object very ſtrongly to the delay which had taken place, and he felt the more from the delays which had taken place in this buſineſs, becauſe he was firmly convinced that more republican ideas had been diffuſed and impreſſed on their Lordſhips minds in the laſt three months, than had been during the whole of his political life. Thoſe ideas were more than ſufficiently inculcated by that ſyſtem of claſſical education, which was ſaid to ſtrengthen our early, to comfort our mature, and to ſolace our declining years. The ideas which impreſſed too forcibly the independence of the individual, were at all times dangerous, under the preſent circumſtances, the hazard reſulting from ſuch doctrines, received a very conſiderable increaſe; — and whilſt that Houſe was engendering political monſters, they could not be ſurpriſed if [illegible] the same description were to be brought forth elsewhere.

Lord Shelburne said, that the delay which had arisen in the present business, was not imputable to those with whom he acted, it sprung originally from that question which had been brought forward by others respecting the Rights, and on which it became therefore necessary in the first instance to determine. When that was disposed of, it made, in his opinion, no difference, whether the present Resolution preceded or followed those which had passed the House concerning the Restrictions. He professed himself to have no objection whatever respecting those republican ideas which had been spoken of with so much terror; he approved, on the contrary, of the present system of education, as he thought the more our youth were led to study the constitutions of other countries, the more they would be induced to admire their own.

Lord Fitzwilliam spoke against the Resolution.

The question on the first Resolution was then put and carried without a division.

Lord Radnor next moved his addition, by which it was to be specified on the Journals that the names of the Princes of the Blood Royal were withdrawn at their own desire.

This motion was agreed to without any objection.

The Commission was then read through, and this extraordinary proposition is at the conclusion: after the usual words inserted in all parliamentary Commissions, "by his Majesty's command," instead of the usual words "signed with his own hand," are inserted, "by order of the two Houses of Parliament."

This gave rise to a further debate, which, however, at last subsided, and the Commission passed the Committee. Adjourned to

MONDAY, FEB 2.

A message was sent to the Commons, desiring a conference on the subject matter of the last conference. The assent of the Commons being signified, the conference was immediately held in the Painted Chamber, when the Lord President, the Manager of the Lords Committee, delivered to the Manager of Commons, the Resolution agreed to by their Lordships. The Lord President reported the conference, and at five o'clock their Lordships adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEB 3.

Their Lordships, on receiving a message from the Commons, desiring a conference, agreed to hold it in the Painted Chamber. The Lord Privy Seal managed this conference on the part of their Lordships, and the Hon Dudley Ryder, on the part of the Commons.

The Manager of the Commons informed the Lord Privy Seal, that the House by which he was now delegated, had agreed to the Resolution passed by their Lordships on Saturday last.

The Lord Privy Seal reported to the House the result of the conference.

The Commission to which, in compliance with the above mentioned Resolution, the Great Seal had been affixed in his Majesty's name, was now read by Earl Bathurst, who presided in the indisposition of the Lord Chancellor. The Commissioners named in this instrument were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Chancellor, the Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Steward, the two Secretaries of State, and several other great officers. It empowered them, in his Majesty's name, to open the Parliament in form.

While it was read, the Speaker and many of the Members of the Lower House, who had been desired by the Lords Commissioners to attend their Lordships, were present.

Earl Bathurst made the following speech on the occasion.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"In pursuance of the authority given to me by his Majesty's Commission under the Great Seal, which has been read, amongst other things to declare the causes of your present meeting, we have only to call your attention to the melancholy circumstance of his Majesty's illness, in consequence of which it becomes necessary to provide for the care of his Majesty's Royal person, and for the administration of Royal authority during the continuance of the calamity, in such manner as the exigency of the case seems to require."

After this ceremony, the Commons returned to their own House, and their Lordships adjourned to

MONDAY FEB 9.

Lord Dover said he had a Petition in his hand from Warren Hastings, Esq which he presented, and desired it might be read by the Clerk.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled,

The Humble PETITION of WARREN HASTINGS, Esq late Governor-General of Fort William in Bengal,

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner was permitted by the Hon House of Commons to appear before their bar on the 24th of April 1786, to answer to certain Charges which had been preferred against him in that Honourable House.

House —That your Petitioner, on the [illegible] of May 178[illegible], was impeached by the Hon. House of Commons of Great Britain at the bar of your Lordships House of High Crimes and Misdemeanours—That your Lordships were pleased to grant your Petitioner a copy of the Articles of Impeachment, with leave to answer the same—That on the 25th of November 1787, in the following Session of Parliament, your Petitioner, according to your Lordships order, did deliver in his Answer to the said Articles, and the 13th of February 1788, was appointed for the commencement of his trial, and it was accordingly commenced and continued by various adjournments to June 15th of the same year—That your Petitioner conceived an abundant consolation, when he saw himself brought before a Court, which was held in universal estimation the most just, as it was the most respectable, from the high titles and dignities, and the noble characters of the Members composing it. And impressed at this time in an equal degree with the same sentiments, and assuring himself that your Lordships will favourably receive any representation which he may conceive himself under the necessity of making to your Lordships, of the hardships which he has sustained, and may yet have cause to apprehend, from the peculiar circumstances of the present trial, he humbly presumes in this stage of it to state the same to your Lordships, and to pray for such redress and relief in the future process of it, as your Lordships wisdom may be able to devise, and your justice prescribe

And your Petitioner humbly begs leave to observe, that one year has elapsed since the commencement of his trial, and in that interval seven noble Lords, his Judges, have yielded to the course of nature; some of the persons whose evidence was required for his defence have returned to their duty in India, and many of those who remain are detained, to the injury of their fortunes and prospects, and to some loss of the service to which they belong —That your Petitioner possesses no means of indemnifying them for their detention, nor does he presume to estimate his own rights at so high a price, as to exact from any man, that he should devote the prime season of his life to inaction —That of such of the witnesses whose conveniences may permit it, or whose inclinations may prompt them to remain, many must, by death, or the variable accidents of life, be taken from him before he time of his defence —That his health, which a long residence in an ungenial climate had impaired, has been precluded from receiving the only remedy which a foreign air could afford for its restoration; and the only palliature which a state of ease could afford it

[illegible] unavoidably [illegible] and his person [illegible] common feelings; [illegible] though most forcibly [illegible] be specified so as address to [illegible]

And your petitioner begs leave [illegible] observe to your Lordships, that [illegible] Prosecution has as yet been closed upon [illegible] Articles only of his Impeachment, twelve Articles were preferred against him by the Hon House of Commons; that those related in effect all the material transactions civil, political, military, revenue and [illegible] of a Government of thirteen years, [illegible] a considerable portion of this [illegible] period of great difficulty, danger and [illegible] ment, to every dependency of the British Empire, and more particularly to the extensive territories which were under the actual Government of your Petitioner, or which depended upon his fortunes for subsistence and relief that your petitioner was therefore under the necessity, through his Counsel and Solicitors, of collecting and collating from the voluminous records of the East India Company the whole history of his public life, in order to form a complete defence to every allegation which the Hon House of Commons has preferred against him; that your Petitioner had not, when your Lordships were pleased to grant him a copy of the Articles, neither has he now, any means of knowing whether any or what Articles, if any, were meant to be abandoned by the Hon House of Commons. That it was not possible for your Petitioner to be prepared with the necessary materials for such a defence, without incurring a very heavy and intolerable expence, the sums which have been actually paid, and for which your Petitioner stands indebted, amounting, according to the most accurate estimate which he could procure from the best authority, to upwards of thirty thousand pounds. That this is a subject of great and serious alarm to your Petitioner, who in the indefinite prospect before him, sees himself in danger of wanting the means of defence and even of subsistence, should his life, which is not probable, be continued to the close of a trial, in which so small a progress has yet been made. That your Lordships wisdom shall enable you to afford your Petitioner that relief which he humbly solicits, and confidently hopes to receive That your Petitioner, with all sincerity of heart, craves leave to assure your Lordships, that he does not presume to state his sense of the hardships to which he has been and is subjected by the past conduct of the trial, as matters of complaint, but [illegible] persuaded that they are unavoidably [illegible]

[illegible] nature of such a trial, and to [illegible] character and circumstances of [illegible] which was the subject of it. That [illegible] stated them with no other motive or view than to obtain from your Lordships a deliverance from the dreadful chance of his character being transmitted on the records of your Lordships high and august Court, blasted with unrefuted criminations, and an acceleration of the time in which he may be enabled to make his innocence, his integrity, and (may he be permitted in all humility to add) his services apparent to your Lordships.

Your Petitioner therefore most humbly prays, that your Lordships will be pleased to order that the Trial may proceed according to your Lordships order upon the last adjournment, and that it may be continued to its close (if it be possible) without interruption.

WARREN HASTINGS.

London, Feb. 9. 1789.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that as the House was thin, and as their Lordships were not generally informed that such a petition was to be presented, he would merely move for the present, that it should lie on the table, in order to be taken into consideration on a future day, when there might be a full attendance. He would further move, that the Trial should be adjourned to Monday, not meaning however that they could proceed on that day. Their Lordships would recollect, that in the last year they had adjourned the Trial during the term the Judges were upon their circuits, but whether the same mode should be observed at present, would be an object for their Lordships determination when they take the petition into consideration.

The order which stood for to-morrow, for the trial of Warren Hastings, Esq. was upon motion discharged, and the further consideration of the trial appointed for Monday, and a message was accordingly sent to acquaint the Commons therewith.

WEDNESDAY, Feb 11

A Petition was presented from Lord Viscount Dudley and Ward, stating, that his brother, the late John Lord Dudley, died on the [illegible] October last without issue; but the Viscountess Dudley, from motives of personal pique to him, refused to say whether she was or was not pregnant; by which he was deprived of his seat in Parliament. He therefore prayed their Lordships to grant a writ de Ventre inspiciendo, also a writ of ne exeat Regno, as he understood she was in the [illegible] of going out of the kingdom.

The Marquis of Stafford moved, "That [illegible] lie on the table." Ordered.

The Regency Bill was presented, at their Lordships bar, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

Lord Walsingham rose and moved, that the re commencement of the trial of Warren Hastings, Esq. be deferred from Monday next, for which day it then stood, to Monday the 6th of April, which was agreed to. Adjourned to

MONDAY, Feb 16.

Lord Sydney, after a very short preface, moved, "That the Bill for appointing a Regent, &c. be now read."

The Duke of Grafton rose, as he said, for the very purpose of avowing his perfect approbation of the measures which had been taken by Administration from the first introduction of the business, to the Bill now under their consideration, it was a plan that had been formed upon the principles of the Constitution, that Constitution he had ever admired, and to which he should for ever be attached, it had been produced by integrity, and supported by manliness and perseverance.—His principal reason for troubling their Lordships was, lest, by his giving a silent vote, he should be suspected of being luke-warm in a business that he admired and warmly approved from his soul.

Lord Southampton declared himself as warmly attached to his King, and the principles of the Constitution, as any noble Peer in that House, and therefore it was that he objected to the Bill before them, because he did not think it respectful to the one, or according to the other. He wished to know, if the noble Duke was himself of opinion, that, had the powers of the Crown been so torn and shackled when he was Prime Minister, he should have been able to carry his Bill for restricting the dividends of the East-India Company?

The Bill was then read a second time, and ordered to a Committee of the whole House next day, and their Lordships to be summoned. Adjourned to

TUESDAY, Feb 17.

Lord Grantley took the oaths and his seat. Previous to going into the order of the day, Earl Spencer presented a Petition from the inhabitants of Westminster against the Regency Bill. The Petition was read by the Clerk, and ordered to lie upon the table.

The order of the day was then read, when their Lordships resolved themselves into a Committee of the whole House on the Regency Bill, Lord Walsingham in the chair.

The Clerk next proceeded to read the several clauses of the Bill, which, as far as they went, received the concurrence of their their Lordſhips, with very few amendments.

In the firſt clauſe, appointing his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales Regent, Lord Carmarthen moved as an amendment, "till the King's recovery, and proclamation made thereof, and no longer," which was agreed to

On the clauſe for obliging the Regent to preſerve, unaltered, the eſtabliſhed Religion as ſettled by the Act of Uniformity, Lord Stanhope highly reprobated the penal Statutes reſpecting Religion that continued to diſgrace the laws of this country. He had been at the trouble of wading through the ſtatutes at large, and their Lordſhips would be aſtoniſhed when he told them there were above 100 exiſting laws, inflicting penalties on ſuppoſed religious offences His Lordſhip then entered into a review of thoſe laws, and conſidered this as a convenient opportunity for leaving the Regent at liberty to aſſent to whatever regulations the wiſdom of the two Houſes might think proper to enact. For this purpoſe his Lordſhip moved, that the adherence of the Regent to the Act of Uniformity be conſtrued to extend only ſo far as relates to the uſe of the Common-Prayer, the adminiſtration of the Holy Sacraments, and the conſecration to holy orders by Biſhops.

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in reply, feared the noble Lord had not ſufficiently conſidered the buſineſs he had taken in hand. He had himſelf been honoured by his communications on the ſubject, and a part of his preſent motion was conſequent to his ſuggeſtions He was ſtill of opinion, that it would be found neceſſary to enlarge ſtill more the object of his amendment.

Lord Stanhope explained that the ſole object of his preſent motion was merely not the agitation of the queſtion itſelf, but ſo to leave it open that they might not, by a previous vote, preclude its diſcuſſion

The Biſhop of Saliſbury expreſſed his diſapprobation of Lord Stanhope's motion as untimely His Lordſhip alſo took this opportunity of declaring his approbation of thoſe meaſures which his Lordſhip had hitherto ſupported only with his ſilent vote.

Some other Lords made a few obſervations on the buſineſs, when Lord Stanhope's motion was put and negatived without a diviſion,

In the clauſe reſtricting the execution of the powers of the Regent to his reſidence within the kingdom, Lord Portcheſter moved that the words "or Ireland" be added after Great Britain Thus was negatived alſo without a diviſion

In the clauſe for reſtricting the Peerage, with an exception in favour of ſuch of the Princes of the Blood [illegible] of 25, Lord Rawdon [illegible] reſtricting ſuch creations of Peers [illegible] ſhould be ſimply reſtored to the rank of their creation. His amendment, after ſome obſervations on the propriety of depriving thoſe [illegible] might be fighting the battles of their country by ſea or land, of their reward, was negatived on, Ayes 58, Noes 69.

Several other amendments, merely verbal, on different parts of the clauſes, [illegible] which their Lordſhips agreed, were propoſed, and but few of them met with oppoſition.

Having got ſo far as the clauſe veſting in her Majeſty the care of the King's perſon, and the patronage of his houſehold, the Committee agreed to report progreſs, and to ſit leave to ſit again, which was accordingly done, and their Lordſhips adjourned to

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 18.

The order of the day was read for reſuming the Committee on the further conſideration of the Regency Bill, and Lord Walſingham took the chair.

Lord Rawdon immediately roſe, and adverting to the cloſe of the preceding night's meeting, accorded with their Lordſhips on the propriety of deferring, at the hour at which their Lordſhips adjourned, the determination of the clauſe relative to the appointment of her Majeſty to the care of the King, and the patronage of the Houſehold. In ſupport of the latter part of this clauſe, namely, the veſting the Queen with the ſole direction and patronage of the Royal Houſehold, it had been ſtated, that a contrary mode would have been injurious to the dignity and ſplendour of his Majeſty, that his feelings would be affected and injured in the firſt ſtages of his recovery, and dangerous to the event of his re-aſſumption of his Crown. Theſe reaſons his Lordſhip combated with a variety of arguments, and explained his preſent purpoſe to be, to offer an amendment, ſubſtituting, inſtead of the general patronage propoſed to be veſted in her Majeſty by the original clauſe, ſuch words as ſhould reſtrict that patronage to ſuch extent as ſhould be deemed neceſſary. This, his Lordſhip gave notice, he meant, if approved of, to follow up by another, determining what offices of the Houſehold ſhould be deemed expedient, and what not, to be placed under her Majeſty's control His Lordſhip concluded with making his motion.

Lord Hopetoun defended the propriety and neceſſity of the meaſure as it ſtood in its original ſhape, and declared his averſion to any amendment

the object and extent of his motion, declared himself friendly to the principle upon which it was founded He had himself drawn up a Resolution, which he had meant to submit to their Lordships consideration. But he to have entered into the ideas of the noble Lord who had anticipated him, that he should forbear pursuing his own intentions, and give the motion proposed his support His Lordship stated the purport of the amendment intended to have been proposed by him to be, to vest in her Majesty the controul and guidance of the Household, but to leave the nomination of vacancies to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales

The amendment was opposed by the Duke of Richmond, Lord Hawkesbury, Lord Faucenberg, and Lord Sydney, and defended by Lord Stormont, Lord Carlisle, and Lord Rawdon.

At nine o'clock the question having been called for, a division ensued upon Lord Rawdon's amendment, when there appeared Ayes 66, Noes 89.

Lord Radnor's motion was then negatived without a division, and the original clause was put and carried.

Previous to entering into the consideration of the next clause, namely, the nomination of the Council to be appointed to assist her Majesty, it was proposed to the Committee, on account of the probability of its taking up some time in the discussion, to report progress, and ask leave to sit again. This was strongly opposed by Lord's Stormont and Carlisle, on account of the delay it would occasion, and after some conversation, the Committee agreed to the question of reporting progress, which was accordingly done, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB 19

The Lord Chancellor left the woolsack, and addressing the House, said, that it appeared a few days ago upon the report of the Physicians, that the King was in a state of convalescence, since which time he has uniformly improved; that intelligence was just arrived of his Majesty's recovery. This intelligence he was sure was agreeable to all parties, and to every man in that House the consequence of such happy circumstance would be felt by all. After a declaration of his Majesty's recovery, no further proceeding could take place upon the principle and foundation of the present Bill, but in order to mark the evident truth of the restoration to health, it would be prudent to have the experience of a few days, that the Physicians might be confirmed in their opinion upon the happy circumstance. He should therefore move, that the House do adjourn to Tuesday next.

Lord Stormont said, he never in the course of his life heard intelligence with more joy, nor could there happen to this country a circumstance of more public benefit, than the recovery of the King. An unhappy interruption in the Executive Government had been long and severely felt; but now every nerve of State would be reinvigorated and restored to strength; every channel would flow in its own course, from the proper fountain. There never perhaps happened to Great Britain a circumstance which could better justify its inhabitants in rejoicing, than the present restoration of his Majesty. our affairs, both at home and abroad, called aloud for his friendly aid, and happy indeed will all ranks and descriptions of persons be when they receive the intelligence. And first upon the loyal list, will be the illustrious Personage to whom the great charge of the Executive Power was to have been intrusted; he has still greater reason to rejoice, and with which his Lordship also in some degree participated, for his Royal Highness will be now exempted from the task with which he is to be burthened, a task which must have been very painful to his Royal Highness, under the contracted and feeble manner in which it was determined he should receive it. His Lordship had authority however to declare, his Royal Highness was resolved to accept it in such a way as the Parliament should think fit to direct, and had such an event happened, his Lordship had no doubt, but that the Prince would furnish the people with a specimen of abilities and principles, that would entitle him to be enrolled with the most illustrious Monarchs, when Nature in her due course should call him to the Throne. His Lordship concurred with all his heart with the noble and learned Lord, and cordially assented to the motion.

His Royal Highness the Duke of York said, it was impossible for any person to hear with more satisfaction and happiness, the information just given by the noble and learned Lord, nor could any one possibly assent more readily to the motion than himself, indeed, he would have made the motion, had he received the happy intelligence: that he went yesterday to Kew, and solicited the honour to see the King, but it was deemed advisable he should not, lest it might endanger his Majesty's health. His Royal Highness was convinced his Brother would receive this happy intelligence with the greatest joy; and had he been before informed of it, he would have commissioned me, said his Royal Highness, to make for him, in this House, a declaration of similar sentiments.

The House then immediately adjourned to Tuesday the 24th of February.

HOUSE

MONDAY, JAN 26

MR Burke ſaid, he had heard it rumoured, that the Houſe of Lords intended to addreſs the Prince of Wales, praying his Royal Highneſs to take upon himſelf the conduct of the executive power, ſubject to thoſe limitations and reſtrictions with which the Miniſter had thought proper to ſhackle it, he therefore wiſhed to be informed from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it was the intention of the Houſe of Lords to proceed in the manner alluded to?

Mr Pitt obſerved, he could not preſume, as a Member of that Houſe, to ſay what was the deſign of the Upper Houſe relative to the buſineſs in queſtion

Mr Burke charged Mr. Pitt with acting equivocally, and ſaid he had, ſtep by ſtep, led the Houſe into meaſures of the moſt unconſtitutional tendency

A Meſſage from the Lords, requiring the attendance of the Commons at a conference with the Peers in the Painted Chamber Several members attended, and returned with the Reſolutions relative to the Regency

Mr Pitt informed the Houſe, in conſequence of the Lords having agreed to the Reſolutions of the Commons, that it would be neceſſary to communicate them to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, and having obtained the anſwer of his Royal Highneſs, he ſhould move to have the ſtate of the nation conſidered on Wedneſday next

Mr Grey reprobated the mode of proceeding purſued by Mr Pitt; and declared the Reſolutions inadequate to the purpoſes they profeſſed to effect Much unneceſſary delay had alſo occurred in the adjuſtment of the Regency, which he imputed to the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer

Mr Pitt defended himſelf againſt the charge of delay, and ſaid, a moment's reflection on the conduct of thoſe perſons who had oppoſed him, would exculpate him from any ſuch intention

Mr Jolliffe ſaid, he was convinced, from the ſituation in which the Houſe ſtood, that the buſineſs of the Regency muſt be conſidered de novo.

Sir Joſeph Mawbey defended the conduct of Mr Pitt It was to his mind conſtitutional, and ſuch as he had from the commencement of the buſineſs entirely approved

Mr Sheridan conceived the Houſe to be in a ſingular ſituation, for they were about to carry up the Reſolutions, without knowing whether the Prince would accept the Regency with the limitations propoſed. The Reſolutions alſo were deficient, in not ſpecifying the time the reſtrictions [illegible] were to remain He wiſhed to be informed from Mr. Pitt, whether the Prince [illegible] be of the intermediate Committee, to conſider the proceedings of both Houſes, unleſs his Royal Highneſs was informed of the mode intended to be purſued, after conſenting to the Reſtrictions of both Houſes, he might be involved in [illegible] unexpected and diſagreeable predicament.

Mr Pitt conceived he could not with any ſort of propriety anſwer the queſtion that had been urged, until the Houſe formally and authentically had received the anſwer of the Prince on the ſubject of the Reſolutions. Adjourned

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the reſtrictions which had been agreed to by the Houſe be read

The Reſolutions having been read by the Clerk,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer again roſe He ſaid the propoſal he meant to offer to the Houſe, appeared to him wholly as a matter of courſe, flowing from the ſteps they had already taken, viz. To lay the Reſolutions they had come to before the Prince of Wales, in order to aſcertain whether his Royal Highneſs would accept of the Regency under the Reſolutions agreed to. Without, therefore taking up more of the time of the Houſe, he would only make his motion, reſerving a right to anſwer any objection that might be ſtated He then moved,

'That a Committee be appointed to communicate to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, the Reſolutions which the Houſe of Lords and Commons have agreed to, for providing the means of ſupplying the defect in the perſonal exerciſe of the Royal Authority, under ſuch regulations as the preſent circumſtances may ſeem to require, and, that the Committee be directed to inform his Royal Highneſs, that the Commons expreſs their hopes, that his Royal Highneſs will accept the ſaid charge, as ſoon as an Act of Parliament can be paſſed for carrying into effect the ſaid purpoſe.'

Sir Grey Cooper obſerved, that the propoſal now ſubmitted by the Right Hon. Gentleman was to ſerve as a ſort of interlude, to amuſe them before the final ſettlement of the Regency. For his part, he thought this ſtep unneceſſary: the public had already before them the ſentiments of the Prince on the buſineſs of the Regency, and the anſwer received from him by the Right Hon. Gentleman might be laid before the Houſe at the Hon Friend. He conceived that, if any public communication should be made by the House to his Royal Highness, the most proper time would be after the Regency bill should have passed through a Committee of the whole House—the bill itself might then be communicated to him. The present motion had too much the appearance of an attempt to preclude the deliberation of the House on the bill in question, in its progress through its several stages.

Lord Belgrave denied that the measure now proposed would preclude future deliberation on the Regency bill.

Sir John Swinburne thought this communication should have taken place at an earlier period.

The Hon Mr Ryder spoke in favour of the motion.

Colonel Phipps was of opinion, that the present period was the most proper stage for addressing the Prince, as a medium between the two extremes. He would therefore support the motion of the Right Hon Gentleman.

Mr Alderman Newnham conceived that the Resolutions communicated to the Prince ought to be accompanied with one stating the supposed time that the Restrictions were meant to continue.

Mr Grey renewed the charges he had made yesterday against the Minister, of want of system, and a wish for delay.

Mr Martin, Mr Fitzherbert, Mr Vyner, Mr Lovedin, and Mr Bouverie, said each a few words to the question.

Mr Sheridan, after a long speech, concluded with moving, by way of amendment, to add to the motion, "That the Restrictions "were formed on the supposition that his "Majesty's illness was only temporary, and "might be of no long duration." These words, he said, he had taken out of the Right Hon Gentleman's letter to the Prince of Wales, that was already before the public, and therefore he did not imagine that any objection could be made to his amendment by the Right Hon Gentleman, or any other Member, but that the amendment would be agreed to as a matter of course.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the Hon Gentleman had stated, that he had selected the words of his amendment from a certain publication, but if he would refer to the publication in question, he would find that he had selected words from one part of it, which were followed by another, in which the idea was fully explained. He could not therefore, avoid objecting to the amendment as containing a partial selection of [illegible] publication in which an explanation of that partial selection was to be found. The Hon Gentleman, it was clear, had not heard the Motion that he had delivered to the Chair with attention, or had forgot the words of it, since if it were examined, it would be found to contain words which expressly marked that the Restrictions were only temporary. The Chancellor of the Exchequer read the part of the motion to which he alluded, wherein it was stated, that the Restrictions in question were such as appeared to them proper to be adopted under the present circumstances of the case. He took notice of the charge of want of system, and want of method, and of intentional delay on the part of his Majesty's Ministers, that had been lightly and wantonly thrown out, but which, he said, had not been supported. He reminded them of the steps they had taken as the best refutation of that charge, and said, that after having ascertained the fact of the King's incapacity, they had proceeded immediately to the object in view, but their progress had been interrupted by the assertion of a right in the Prince of Wales to assume the exercise of the sovereign authority, an assertion which necessarily and unavoidably called for discussion and decision before they proceeded a single step.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, an Hon Gentleman had observed, that through out the measure there had been a manifest want of attention and respect to his Royal Highness.—But though he should be extremely sorry to be deficient in that exterior and ceremonious respect which was justly due to the Prince of Wales, yet what he owed to his Sovereign, to the Constitution, and to the people of England, was paramount to any personal respect due any where. Though it was paramount, however, to all degree of personal respect, it was not inconsistent with such a compliance with decorum. He ever had, and ever would pay the same respect to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales as to all the rest of the Royal Family, and to the Sovereign himself. That truest respect he could pay to all of them, was to cultivate the interest of that nation, which the ancestors of the present Royal Family were called upon to govern, and to watch over the safety of that constitution, which his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales would one day be called upon to protect.

Mr Grey rose as soon as the Chancellor of the Exchequer sat down, and said, the Right Hon Gentleman appeared to him to have shewn a manifest want of respect and attention to the Prince of Wales, in the first place, in the manner in which when the Privy Council was summoned to examine his Majesty's Physicians, the summation of its being being convened and the object of it was communicated to his Royal Highneſs, that, being done by the ſame ſort of ordinary ſummons as was ſent to the other Members of the Council This was, Mr Grey ſaid, either in the Right Hon Gentleman or the Lord Preſident of the Council a marked token of want of reſpect and attention to the Prince of Wales The next want of reſpect and attention to his Royal Highneſs, was the Right Hon Gentleman's not having ſubmitted the whole of his intended plan to his Royal Highneſs, before any of the proceedings of Parliament took place, and, indeed, previous to its public ſtatement in that Houſe, to which he conceived an Hon Bart who had ſpoken early in the debate had alluded, when he had ſaid, they had been guilty of an indecorum, in not ſtating the Reſolutions to his Royal Highneſs earlier Another inſtance he ſhould mention was chiefly grounded on public report, and that was the manner in which, when the propoſed Reſtrictions were communicated to the Prince of Wales, that communication had been made In that, as in the preceding inſtance, Mr Grey ſaid, he conceived there was a conſiderable portion of a reprehenſible want of reſpect and attention to his Royal Highneſs

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, he would only notice the charges of diſreſpect and want of attention manifeſted by him towards his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, and ſo far was he from complaining of the Honourable Gentleman for having made the charges, that he acknowledged he felt himſelf highly obliged to the Honourable Gentleman for having ſtated them ſo fairly and explicitly, as it afforded him an opportunity, which he could not otherwiſe have had of meeting them in the face of that Houſe, and of the public, which was the only way in which he could have noticed them conſiſtently with what was due to himſelf and to the country The firſt charge of diſreſpect was a failure of reſpect in the matter of ſending notice of the meeting of the Privy Council to the Prince of Wales, a charge which he might eaſily have got rid of by ſaying, that if it was proved in error, it was not his error, but that of the Lord Preſident of the Council He diſclaimed, however, to avoid taking his ſhare of the blame that might be thought imputable to any meaſure of that venerable and reſpectable perſonage, with whom it was the pride and happineſs of his life to act, and if he had wiſhed at any time to avoid ſuch a participation of blame, he was convinced from the degree of cordiality and confidence in which the noble and learned Lord and he lived, it would in point of fact, be utterly impoſſible for him to have an opportunity of [illegible] The ſecond part of the charge was, that his Majeſty's Miniſters had not previouſly conferred the Prince of Wales, whether they were to take in the difficulty in which they found themſelves involved in the execution of the truſt confided in them by the King. He owned the truth of this charge in that point; his Majeſty's Miniſters had not conceived it to be their duty to receive orders from the Prince of Wales, at a time that they were the ſervants of the Crown, and his Royal Highneſs was in no political capacity whatever, nor had any authority to give his Majeſty's Miniſters a ſingle order of any deſcription They felt that theirs was the reſponſibility for every ſtep that they took, and they knew that theirs ought of conſequence to be the diſcretion — The next charge, the Chancellor of the Exchequer obſerved, was perſonally againſt himſelf, it was the charge of not having acquainted his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales with the whole of his plan, previous to his opening it in that Houſe To the truth of the fact alledged he muſt alſo in this point ſubmit, but he begged gentlemen to recollect what had paſſed, and he believed it would be admitted that, the circumſtances conſidered, it was a little hard that it ſhould be made a matter of charge againſt him of want of reſpect and attention to the Prince of Wales He had reſolved as ſoon as ever a plan ſhould be adjuſted to communicate it to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, previous to his ſtating it in the Houſe, but in the courſe of the debate in that Houſe, when the queſtion of right was under preliminary diſcuſſion, gentlemen would remember, that he had been called upon, particularly by a Right Hon Gentleman not then in his place, to ſtate the general outlines of his plan, the Right Hon Gentleman declaring expreſſly, that it was equally a matter of information deſirable to him and his friends, to know in what manner he meant to proceed. In the moment that he was publickly called upon, it was impoſſible for him to ſuppreſs the outlines of the plan, without offence to the Houſe, he was under the neceſſity of giving them and they were communicated to the Prince according to his commands, the next day after the debate.

With regard to the diſreſpectful manner in which it was reported that the Reſtrictions were communicated to his Royal Highneſs, report had gone to an extravagant length, that he believed it had gained credit about town, and he was ſure it had been circulated in the country, not only that a meſſage had been ſent by a livery ſervant, but that the meſſage had been a verbal one. The truth, however, the public were now apprized, was, that the communication had been made reſpectfully in writing, and the latter had been ſent, not by a livery ſervant, but by a meſſenger, diſpatched for the eſpecial purpoſe —Perhaps, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, there might be a failure in point of reſpect in this mode of communication No man, he owned, was more ignorant of etiquette than he was, but he was conſcious of no intention to ſhew diſreſpect to his Royal Highneſs He had repeatedly made communications to his Royal Highneſs before in preciſely the ſame mode, without its having ever drawn on him the ſmalleſt animadverſion for a failure in etiquette, or having been conſidered as an inſtance of diſreſpect; and during the five years that he had been in adminiſtration, he had never communicated any of the numerous papers, diſpatches, &c that he had, from time to time, occaſion to tranſmit to his Majeſty in any other manner, and he was ſure, he had not intended to have ſhewn a diſreſpect to the Prince of Wales, in the inſtance alluded to, more than he ever intended to ſhew a diſreſpect to his Majeſty, during the period that he had been honoured with his royal confidence.

Mr Burke contended, that the reſult of the Right Hon. Gentleman's general behaviour was diſreſpectful to the Prince He inſiſted, that the Prince's not being conſulted relative to the Privy Council was an inſult, and that the deciding upon the Queſtion of Right without aſking whether ſuch a claim was or was not made, was a moſt atrocious act of indecency ——He ridiculed the profeſſed indifference of ſeveral great and noble Lords to the emoluments of their offices, and their being actuated merely by humanity. Many noble Lords would ſay, We care not three ſkips of a louſe for our ſalaries, but we will not reſign our honours, we are not influenced by our paſſions, but by our gratitude He indulged himſelf for a few minutes in ridiculing the ſuperiority of the honour and virtue of the Lords poſſeſſing places, to the Commoners in the ſame ſituation

Mr Sheridan then moved an addition to his own amendment, ſtating, "that it will be open hereafter to the wiſdom of Parliament to reconſider the Reſtrictions, whenever the circumſtances appear to call for it."

He afterwards agreed to withdraw the former part of his amendment, and moved that thoſe words only which he had juſt [illegible] ſhould be added to the Miniſter's motion

Mr Sheridan's new amendment was then put, and negatived without a diviſion

The Miniſter now moved that a Committee of the Commons be deputed to wait on the Queen with the firſt Reſolution, relative to the power which is to be veſted in her

This motion, after a few words from Mr Burke, was agreed to without a diviſion

At half paſt nine o clock, the Houſe adjourned to

WEDNESDAY, JAN 28

The Commons being met, a meſſage was ſent to the Lords, deſiring a conference, which being agreed to, Lord Belgrave, Mr Elliot, and others, were appointed a Committee to manage the ſame, who immediately went to the Painted Chamber, where they delivered to the Lord Preſident, who managed the conference on the part of their Lordſhips, the Reſolutions of the Commons to addreſs his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales and her Majeſty, on the ſubject of the Reſolutions agreed to by both Houſes

The order of the day for the Houſe going into a Committee on the State of the Nation was diſcharged, and the ſame ordered to be taken into conſideration on

A meſſage was received from the Lords, deſiring a conference on the ſubject matter of the laſt conference

The Houſe having agreed to this requeſt, a Committee of conference was appointed, conſiſting of the ſame Members who compoſed the laſt

On the return of the Committee from the Painted Chamber, Lord Belgrave reported, that their Lordſhips had concurred in the two Reſolutions for addreſſing the Prince of Wales and her Majeſty

Another meſſage was ſoon afterwards brought from the Lords, intimating that their Lordſhips had deputed the Lord Preſident of the Council and the Lord Privy Seal to wait upon the Prince of Wales with the Addreſs, and the Earls of Waldegrave and Aylesbury to preſent the Addreſs to her Majeſty, and that it was the wiſh of their Lordſhips, that the Commons would delegate ſome of the Members of their Houſe to accompany the noble Lords above-mentioned

The Chancellor of the Exchequer immediately roſe, and moved that four Gentlemen be named to accompany the ſaid Lords to the Prince of Wales, and the ſame number to the Queen, which was agreed to

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Maſter of the Rolls, Lord Frederick Campbell, and the Secretary at War, were then fixed upon to attend the Prince with the Addreſs, and the four following Gentlemen, viz the Earl of Courtown, Mr Comptroller of the Houſehold, the Hon Richard Howard, and Lieutenant Colonel Manners, were appointed to wait upon her Majeſty

The Miniſter now moved that the order

of the day, for a Committee of the whole Houſe to conſider of the State of the Nation, be deferred till Monday next

Mr Sheridan was ſurpriſed to find that the Right Hon Gentleman was ſo much inclined for delay, for though he had given the Houſe reaſon to expect that a motion would be made on Saturday reſpecting the Commiſſion for opening the Parliament, he now propoſed to adjourn the Committee on the State of the Nation till Monday

The Miniſter replied, that as the Houſe of Lords would on Saturday propoſe the next ſtep in ſettling the national buſineſs, it would not be adviſeable for the two Houſes to meet the ſame day on the ſame buſineſs It was on this account that he had propoſed Monday

Mr Sheridan ſaid, he ſtrongly ſuſpected that one of the organs was not yet quite in tune, notwithſtanding all that the Right Hon Gentleman had ſaid of the harmony and cordiality that ſubſiſted among his Majeſty's Miniſters When the hour came, their Lordſhips, in one of their whims, might chuſe to throw back this motion to the Common, ſo that there was no certainty this buſineſs would commence in the other Houſe on Saturday and therefore he wiſhed the Right Hon Gentleman would aſſure the Houſe, that this buſineſs would actually be brought forward on Saturday in the Houſe of Lords But as there was no great probability of this, he ſhould move, "That Saturday ſhould be ſubſtituted in place of Monday"

Mr Joliffe ſeconded this amendment, becauſe it was buſineſs of too much importance to be delayed

The Chancellor of the Exchequer perſiſted in his motion for Monday rather than Saturday

Mr Grey declared he would take the ſenſe of the Houſe on the occaſion

The queſtion being put, the Houſe proceeded to a diviſion, when the numbers were as follow For the amendment, 51—Againſt it, 70—Majority for the Miniſter, 19 Adjourned till

James Ferguſon, Eſq took the oaths and his ſeat for Bamffſhire, in the room of Sir James Duff, who accepted the Stewardſhip of the three Chiltern Hundreds

The Prince's anſwer * to the Addreſs and Reſolutions preſented to his Royal Highneſs by the Committee appointed by the two Houſes of Parliament, was read at the Bar by the Hon Chancellor of the Exchequer

The Queen's anſwer * to the Addreſs and Reſolution preſented to her Majeſty by the Committee appointed by the two Houſes was read by Lord Courtenay.

After this the Meſſengers from the Lords deſired a preſent conference in the Painted Chamber, on the ſubject of the laſt conference, which was agreed to.

When the Committee returned, Lord Graham informed the Houſe, that their Lordſhips had reſolved, that Letters Patent do iſſue under the Great Seal of Great Britain, for the purpoſe of empowering certain Commiſſioners to open the Parliament, and to do every other thing which it would have been lawful for the King himſelf to have done, had he been able to exerciſe Royal Authority in his own perſon.

It was moved and agreed, that this Reſolution of the Lords ſhould be referred to the Committee on the State of the Nation

The Houſe then entered into the Committee on the State of the Nation, Mr Alderman Watſon in the Chair

The Chancellor of the Exchequer took a view of the proceedings already adopted in the progreſs of the buſineſs relative to the Regency, in order to ſhew that the ſyſtem on which he had conducted himſelf, was regular, grounded on neceſſity, expedient, and conſonant to the ſpirit of the Conſtitution He dwelt on the powers and privileges annexed to the Great Seal, which was the only legal organ through which the King's will was conveyed; nay ſuch was the power annexed to this Seal that if even any Chancellor was ſo forgetful of the duty which he owed his King and country, as to apply it to an act without the knowledge of the King, the Judges were bound by that act This fiction, as Gentlemen affected to call it, was not a novelty in our Conſtitution The caſe of Lord Hardwicke in 1754, on the indiſpoſition of the King, was in the recollection, he ſuppoſed, of many Members in that Houſe He concluded by moving, "That it was expedient and neceſſary that a Commiſſion for opening the Parliament be iſſued under the Great Seal"

Mr Dempſter condemned the mode propoſed as unneceſſary and unconſtitutional; the mode pointed out by juſtice and the conſtitution, he conceived to be an Addreſs to the Prince to take upon himſelf the exerciſe of the regal authority, they ought, therefore, as a neceſſity exiſted to put the Great Seal to a Commiſſion to appoint by ſuch Commiſſion the Prince of Wales Regent, with the full powers of aſſent or diſſent

The Maſter of the Rolls conſidered, that if his Royal Highneſs were appointed to the exerciſe of the whole Royal authority, it would

would be doing no less than dethroning the King.

Lord North infifted, that if the powers of aſſent and diſſent were not given to the Repreſentative of the King, any act which paſſed could not be conſidered as an act of the three branches of the legiſlature, but as an act of the two Houſes the mode propoſed he deprecated, as giving the form of the Conſtitution for its ſubſtance. He ſpoke in high terms of the propriety of the Prince's conduct, and on the impropriety of the mode propoſed. He ſaid the anſwer of the Prince muſt diffuſe general ſatisfaction through the country, and do away thoſe falſe alarms, which had been induſtriouſly circulated, of a right having been aſſerted in the Prince to aſſume the Sovereign authority, independent of the two Houſes of Parliament. He was ſure that the country being convinced of that right having never been aſſerted, all who had ſent up Addreſſes for the refutation of that right, from the Burgeſſes of Edinburgh and Glaſgow, and from the Weſtern Towns and Counties of England, would be happy and rejoice in ſeeing the Prince's Anſwer, which fully refuted the falſe aſſertion of ſuch a right having ever been made.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied to what had fallen from the noble Lord in the blue ribband, (Lord North) relative to the addreſſes on the queſtion of right, aſſerting that the Prince's right had been aſſerted, and, that the perſons who had joined in thoſe addreſſes had not acted prematurely, nor yet under a falſe alarm.

Mr Burke ſaid, the Right Hon Gentleman took the opportunity of attacking his Right Hon friend Mr Fox, when he was abſent and ſick, he had with the ſame cunning attacked the prerogatives of the King. Mr Burke then obſerved, that the right of the Prince of Wales was as clear as the ſun, and that it was the duty of the Houſe to appoint him Regent with the full powers of Sovereignty: his Royal Highneſs had a right in law, in juſtice, and equity. After reprobating the Reſolutions, the mode of proceeding, and the delay, he ſaid, the plan now propoſed was to adopt what ſerved a worſe name than a phantom—they were going to create Milton's monſter of Death and Sin, Death to the Conſtitution, Sin to thoſe who were concerned in the meaſures carried on, who were creating innumerable barking monſters, hovering at and endeavouring to deſtroy every principle of the Conſtitution, they were going to ſteal the Great Seal, to commit a forgery and fraud to ſupport violence, and carry them on to their climax of villainy.

Mr Rolle took notice of what Lord North had ſaid reſpecting the addreſſes preſented to the Miniſter. He ſaid that the addreſs from the county of Devon was conducted in the moſt fair and open manner poſſible, that it was attended by moſt of the reſpectable people in the county, and paſſed unanimouſly. He was extremely happy to know that the Prince had agreed to accept the Regency under the limitations which Parliament had thought proper to impoſe, though he ſhould have liked the anſwer better, had it only aſſented to the Reſolutions in a few words, and without any other obſervation. He was ſorry likewiſe to find that the Prince of Wales had diſſented from having his name in the Commiſſion about to be appointed.

Mr Sheridan, in anſwer to Mr Rolle, ſaid, that it was a matter of no wonder to him, ſince the Right Honourable Gentleman oppoſite to him (Mr Pitt) had thought proper to inſert the names of the Royal Family in the Commiſſion without having firſt aſked their conſent, although a noble Lord (Lord Camden) had waited only the day before on his Royal Highneſs with the deſign, without mentioning a word on the ſubject.

Sir John Scott obſerved, that he ſhould only ſay a few words. He aſſerted, that no one perſon had yet taken upon him to ſay, that the act for appointing a Commiſſion was illegal, and he would ſay as a profeſſional man, that the preſent could not be appointed without a fiction, for no Act of Parliament could take place without ſuppoſing the Royal Authority alive, and making uſe of the King's name. All that remained for the Houſe to do, was to perform it in the moſt conſtitutional manner poſſible. After a variety of other arguments, he gave his vote to the Reſolution.

Mr Burke, Mr Wyndham, and ſeveral other gentlemen ſaid a few words, when the queſtion to agree with the Lords in their Reſolutions was put by Alderman Watſon, the Chairman, and carried without a diviſion.

A motion was then made, to deſire a conference with the Lords, to communicate the Reſolution of the Houſe.—Ordered.

PRIVILEGE.

The Speaker engaged the attention of the Houſe. His ſituation was peculiar.—It had been the cuſtom for the Speakers to lay in their claim to certain privileges which were the eſtabliſhed rights of the Commons.—There was to be a Commiſſion to-morrow.—He therefore deſired the advice and direction of the Houſe, in what manner he ſhould conduct himſelf when he appeared before the Commiſſion.—He recollected only two inſtances—the Reſtoration and the Revolution. But he ſubmitted himſelf entirely to the diſpoſition of the [redacted].—A loud call of hear!

After

After a few moments pause, Mr. Pitt rose and said, that the House certainly would rely upon the discretion of the Speaker.

Mr Burke said, he was not prepared for a question of such magnitude, in which the rights of all the Commons of England were involved A few responses were made from Mr Pitt and Mr Burke; after which it being the general opinion, that the Speaker's discretion ought to be the rule of his conduct at the opening of the session, the subject was dismissed, and the House adjourned to

TUESDAY, FEB 3

A message was sent to the Lords, to inform their Lordships, that the Commons demanded a present conference with their Lordships, on the subject matter of the last The Messengers brought back word, that the Lords had agreed to confer immediately with the Commons

The Committee that managed the last was appointed to manage this conference, and to carry back the Resolution which the Lords had sent down on Monday to the Commons.

On the return of the Committee, Mr Dudley Ryder, who acted as principal manager for the Commons, informed the House, that he had delivered the Resolution into the hands of the Lord Privy Seal, and informed his Lordship, at the same time, that it had met the concurrence of the House of Commons

Soon after this Sir Francis Molyneux, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, knocked at the door of the Commons House, and on being introduced, he informed the Speaker, that his Majesty's Commissioners commanded the immediate attendance of that Hon House in the House of Peers, to hear his Majesty's Commission read

The Speaker, followed by a great number of Members, attended the Black Rod; and on his return from the Lords, he informed the House that his Majesty's Commission for opening the Parliament had been read; and that Earl Bathurst, one of the Commissioners named in it, declared the causes for which the Parliament was thus opened without the personal attendance of his Majesty The Speaker said further, that he obtained a copy of the speech made by Lord Bathurst on the occasion, which he read to the House *.

All the standing orders of the House were then read and confirmed, according to the practice which always prevails at the beginning of a session, and the usual Committees of Privilege, Religion, &c were appointed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then rose, and said, that as the Parliament was now open, and that the House could proceed in their legislative capacity, he was going to move for leave to bring in a bill founded on the [illegible] time past had taken up the attention of both Houses As the subject of the last has already been [illegible] long and fully discussed, it could not be thought necessary for him to explain or defend the principle on which it was founded;—a principle which had already been several times debated, and received the approbation of the House; he therefore, without any further preface, he moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better security of his Majesty's person, and for supplying the defect in the personal exercise of the royal authority, occasioned by the present incapacity of his Majesty.

The motion met with no opposition; and the House having given Mr Pitt leave to bring in a bill, adjourned without proceeding to any other business

The Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the House, that the bill, for leave to bring in which he had moved the House and received their directions the preceding day, was not quite completed by those who had to draw it, but that he hoped to be able to bring it in the next, and if then read a first time, to have it read a second time on Friday, in which case they might go into the Committee upon it on Saturday

Lord Maitland objected to going into a Committee on Saturday, as that stage of the business would probably run into length, and they might not be able to get through the clauses by midnight.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, there was no necessity for the House sitting in a Committee after twelve o'clock next Saturday evening, as they might by that time have got through several of the clauses, report progress, and resume the consideration of the remaining clauses of the bill in a resumed Committee on Monday Adjourned

Mr Bramston presented a petition from his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Essex against the County Elections bill

The Master of the Rolls moved for the appointment of a Committee to take into consideration so much of an Act for regulating controverted elections, as related to recognizances, fees, &c to be demanded and taken.

And that it be referred to such Committee, as an instruction, to consider of rules to be adopted for taxing the costs of [illegible] and report their opinion to the House

The motions were agreed to.

Mr Duncombe presented a petition from the High Sheriff and Grand Jury of York against the Slave Trade.

It was ordered by the Houſe, that no petition, or private bill, ſhould be received after Friday the 13th day of March

The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought up and preſented the bill to provide for the care of his Majeſty's Royal Perſon, and for the adminiſtration of the Royal Authority during his Majeſty's illneſs

When the queſtion being put that this bill be read a firſt time,

Mr Powys roſe as ſoon as the bill was preſented, and deſired to know, before that or any other bill was read a firſt time, whether the Commiſſion, under the authority of which they ſat as a Parliament, had expired or not, that was, whether the Commiſſion were functi officio, or ſtill poſſeſſed their powers, and whether another Commiſſion would not be neceſſary to give the Royal Aſſent to any bill the two Houſes might paſs

The Attorney General ſaid, that he was clearly of opinion that the Commiſſion, under the authority of which the Parliament was opened, was ſtill in full force That Commiſſion contained words giving powers ſo broad, that it was apprehended by ſome perſons, that they would authorize the giving the Royal Aſſent to any bill that might paſs, but other perſons, who grounded their opinions upon the conduct of Lord Hardwicke in 1754, thought differently In 1754 Lord Hardwicke had put the Great Seal to a Commiſſion for opening the Parliament, and to a ſubſequent Commiſſion, when it was neceſſary to give the Royal Aſſent to a Naturalization bill, the only bill that paſſed in that Parliament, the Royal Aſſent to which was given under the joint authority of both Commiſſions

Mr Powys ſaid he was perfectly ſatisfied, but he thought it neceſſary to aſk the queſtion

The Attorney General begged to have it underſtood, that he had merely delivered the ſentiments of an individual, and he wiſhed other gentlemen to give their opinions likewiſe

Mr Sheridan obſerved, that it was uſual for all Commiſſions of the kind to contain words, giving a power to the Commiſſioners to adjourn and prorogue Parliament Thoſe words were expreſsly left out of the preſent Commiſſion, which he thought extraordinary

Mr Attorney General ſaid, if the Hon Gentleman would conſult the Roll of Parliament, he would find, that at different times different Commiſſions had been iſſued for opening Parliament At one time ſuch Commiſſions gave powers for giving the Royal Aſſent to bills, at others they gave powers to prorogue and adjourn, and at others, the powers given were merely thoſe of opening Parliament, and continuing it open On the preſent occaſion, it was only thought neceſſary to give powers to open the Parliament, and continue it open

Mr Sheridan ſaid a few words relative to the two Commiſſions iſſued by Lord Hardwicke in the year 1754

Mr Anſtruther agreed with his learned friend, that the Commiſſion was a good one, if not liable to any other objection, whether it contained powers general, or powers limited or ſpecific Mr Anſtruther reminded the Houſe, that the argument had generally run in the courſe of the debates that a Commiſſion was to iſſue, authorizing Commiſſioners to give the Royal Aſſent only to the Regency bill If no new Commiſſion iſſued, he conceived under the general words of the Commiſſion laſt iſſued, that the Commiſſioners were left to exerciſe their diſcretion, and give either the Royal Aſſent or Diſſent to the Bill

The Bill being read a firſt time,

Mr Sheridan roſe and expreſſed his ſurpriſe at its contents, by declaring that it was a much more extraordinary production than could have been expected by any one, and ought not to be read a ſecond time ſo early as to-morrow, as it ought to be printed, that gentlemen might have an opportunity of conſidering the ſeveral clauſes it contained

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid the bill could be printed before to-morrow, and every gentleman would then have an opportunity of peruſing it, he ſhould therefore to-morrow move that it be read a ſecond time

Mr Burke ſaid, the Bill was ſo crowded with clauſes the moſt abſurd, ſtrange, and dangerous, that it would be highly improper to proceed to the ſecond reading without giving ſufficient notice

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was as much averſe to proceed without ſufficient notice, or full time for deliberation, as he was againſt any unneceſſary delay The right Hon Gentleman had declared the clauſes of the Bill to be abſurd, ſtrange, and dangerous, before he had even ſeen thoſe clauſes, if they ſhould appear ſo to-morrow, when the Bill would be before the Houſe, Gentlemen would have an opportunity of ſtating their reaſons why they thought ſo, and of oppoſing the Houſe going into a Committee thereon on Saturday

Mr Burke in reply ſaid, that though he had not ſeen the clauſes of the Bill, he knew that it contained much matter entirely new to the Houſe, and which merited much diſcuſſion

Mr Sheridan conſidered it to be very unparliamentary and irregular, to bring in a bill full of new matter, which was ordered to have been brought in founded on the Reſolutions ſolutions of the two Houſes. He was moſt ſurprized at the clauſe introduced, empowering his Majeſty whenever the Queen and her Majeſty's Council ſhould think him recovered, to reſume his Royal Authority, by iſſuing his Proclamation, under his Sign Manual.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer again obſerved, that when gentlemen had the Bill before them they would be more competent to ſtate their opinions upon it, and their reaſons why they objected to particular clauſes, than they could poſſibly be at preſent, when they could not enter into the detail of the Bill. As, however, the Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sheridan) had ſtated an objection to a latter clauſe, which he (Mr. Pitt) conſidered one of the moſt material in the Bill, he begged to ſay a few words on that particular clauſe, which was to provide for his Majeſty's reſuming his government, whenever it ſhould pleaſe God to grant him a recovery. It was not introducing any new principle into the Bill to ſay that his Majeſty ſhould, on his recovery, reſume his government. The Reſolutions provided a Regency during his Majeſty's indiſpoſition, which Regency the Houſe had reſolved was to continue no longer than ſuch indiſpoſition. He was not then to be told that that was a new principle introduced in the Bill, which had been gone upon and agreed to by the Reſolutions of both Houſes,—a principle which he was confident no man in that Houſe would riſe and object to, to reſtore his Majeſty to his government, whenever it ſhould pleaſe God to render him competent. When gentlemen had the Bill before them, and ſaw the mode that was propoſed, they would be free to ſtate their objections to it, or ſuggeſt any other, to carry the principle into effect. The mode propoſed by the Bill was, in his opinion, the beſt calculated for the ſafety of his Majeſty's return to his government, and for the intereſts of the nation.

Mr. Grey ſaid, they were all agreed in the principle, but he and his friends were ſurprized at the way propoſed for his Majeſty to reſume his government. It was the firſt time they had entertained an idea that a reſumption of the government would have been propoſed without the knowledge or deciſion of Parliament on his Majeſty's recovery and competence. He would not however then entertain any further obſervation upon the ſubject, reſerving himſelf for the firſt time before the Houſe, when he could enter into detail of the clauſes which, upon the firſt ſight of it, appeared to him to be highly improper.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer roſe to do away the error into which gentlemen had fallen, when they conſidered that his Majeſty was to be empowered to reſume his authority by virtue of his Proclamation, under his Sign Manual alone. When the Bill ſhould come before them, they would find that the mode propoſed would be, that when the Queen, with a given number of the Members of her Council (for which number a blank was left in the Bill, to be filled up by the Houſe), ſhould conſider his Majeſty recovered, the Queen ſhould ſignify ſuch recovery to the Lord Preſident of the Council, or to one of the Secretaries of State for the time being, who ſhould immediately ſummon a Privy Council of thoſe who were and had been of the Privy Council, and on the majority of ſuch Council ſo aſſembled agreeing that his Majeſty was recovered, his Majeſty's Proclamation ſhould be iſſued, under his Sign Manual, counterſigned by the majority of the Privy Council, and the Parliament ſhould thereon meet forthwith.

The converſation here ending, the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, "that the Bill be printed," which was agreed to, and the Houſe adjourned.

FRIDAY, Feb. 6.

Mr. Grey preſented, on behalf of the diſſenting Miniſters of the county of Northumberland, a petition againſt the Slave Trade.

Mr. Burke ſaid, he underſtood the trial of Warren Haſtings, Eſq. ſtood adjourned from the laſt ſeſſion unto the firſt Tueſday after the opening of Parliament; conſequently now, Parliament having been opened, it muſt in its courſe ſtand in order for Tueſday next, he knew not what the Houſe of Lords intended doing, they ought to ſend a notice of their intention, but if they ſhould not, he begged it might be underſtood that the managers were ready to proceed, and that the charge they ſhould firſt take up, was that diſtinguiſhed by the title of Receiving Preſents.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day for the ſecond reading of the Regency bill,

* ABSTRACT of the material Parts of the REGENCY BILL, propoſed by Mr. PITT.

BE it enacted by the King's moſt Excellent Majeſty, by and with the advice and conſent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this preſent Parliament aſſembled and by the authority of the ſame, That his Royal Highneſs George Auguſtus Frederick Prince of Wales ſhall have full power and authority, in the name and on the behalf of His Majeſty, and under the ſtile and title of Regent of this kingdom, to exerciſe

Mr. Burke called the attention of the Houſe to the ſubject before them; its importance was ſo great, that he might ſay it was equal to any thing that ever came before Parliament ſince the Revolution; and although he knew he ſhould have an opportunity of delivering his ſentiments at large upon each of the clauſes, when they came before a Com-

Committee of the whole House, yet he could not resist an inclination to make a few observations upon this extraordinary measure in its present stage It was in its nature so singular, and he feared would, in its consequences, be so disgraceful to the nation, that at a future period gentlemen would wonder it ever was thought worthy of the least countenance.

He had heard much of an idea entertained of divine Right in the House of Stuart; this doctrine he thought had long since been exploded, but from what had been mentioned in another House, as he was informed, the doctrine is still by some high persons in part retained, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been called a heaven born Minister, (these were words used by the Duke of Chandos lately in the House of Peers) which was transferring the divine right from a King to a Minister

The present Bill went to the shameful length of stripping his Royal Highness of most valuable, essential, necessary powers, it was a total deprivation of all honours, he had none of the ornaments of the Crown, nor had he the inferior graces, it rendered his situation odious, doubtful, and difficult, while it tended to dignify and encrease the power of those who have been the authors of these shameful restraints These measures were perhaps concerted with a view to facilitate the return to power of those who had

[illegible] the Prince, [illegible] the whole House, [illegible] assented, one [illegible]

Mr. Pitt said he [illegible] sorry to interrupt the Right Hon. [illegible] man, but respect, as he conceived, [illegible] House justified a call to order; [illegible] warmth with which the Right Hon. [illegible] man inveighed against his opponents generally rendered it [illegible] much length, [illegible] of delivery generally [illegible] the wishes of those against whom the [illegible] was directed; the House however would have the goodness to recollect, that most of the substance of the Bill now before them, was taken from Resolutions to which the House had already assented, and therefore the Right Hon Gentleman was inveighing against the House

Mr Gamon attempted to follow in the [illegible] cusation of Mr. Burke, but was interrupted by the Speaker, who said, that if any complaint upon the point of order was to be urged, it should have been made while the Rt Hon. Gentleman was speaking, no right of preventing him to proceed now could possibly be vested in any Member of the House

Mr Burke then resumed his speech, and observed, that if he had expressed himself in the language of passion, it arose, not from a

Proper provision shall be made for the care of his Majesty's Royal Person, and for the direction of his Household, during the continuance of his illness: Be it therefore enacted, That the care of his Majesty's Royal Person, and also the direction of his Household, shall be vested in the Queen, and her said Majesty shall have power to nominate, appoint, or remove all the officers appointed in this Bill

And in order to assist and advise her said Majesty in the several matters aforesaid, there shall be a Council and if it should happen that any of them should die, then, and in such case, the Queen may nominate and appoint some one person, being or having been a Member of the Privy Council, to be a Member of the said Council

And the said Council shall have power and authority at all times to examine upon oath the Physicians attendant on his Majesty, touching the state of his health.

That if her Majesty shall depart this life during the time that the care of his Majesty's Royal person shall be committed to her care, the said Regent shall forthwith direct a proclamation, declaring the same, and, in case the Parliament then in being shall then be prorogued by any adjournment, directing that the said Parliament shall forthwith meet, and that the said Members so meeting, shall be deemed and taken to be the two Houses of Parliament, and that, until due provision shall in such case have been made by Parliament for the care of his Majesty's person, all the powers in this Act vested in her Majesty, shall be vested in the Council appointed by this Act

If his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales shall depart this life during the continuance of the Regency, the Lords of his Majesty's Privy Council shall cause a Proclamation to be issued under the Great Seal of Great Britain, declaring the same; and when it shall appear to her Majesty, and to the Council appointed by this Act, that his Majesty is restored to health, it shall be lawful for her Majesty to notify the same publickly

And if his Majesty shall signify his Royal pleasure to resume the personal exercise of his Royal authority, and to issue a proclamation declaring the same, all the powers and authorities given by this Act, shall from thenceforth cease and determine, and if the Parliament shall then be separated by adjournment or prorogation, the said Parliament shall forthwith meet and sit [illegible] but from a deep conviction of the subject; he was pursuing the game of ambition still, and therefore it was not unnatural to find it elevated. If the principles proposed in the clauses of the Bill be in their own nature to the last degree mischievous to the State, if they be unjustifiable in the jealousy they evince, if they are calculated to create distraction in the Royal Family (if they are likely to [illegible] the ambitious views of a faction [illegible] the House of Brunswick), then was he justified in saying the House of Brunswick is thereby excommunicated, outlawed, and attainted. He had a right to argue upon the motives of men from the means they use. He knew he might be told, he should have an opportunity of pointing out the mischiefs of this Bill separately in the Committee, but he chuse to touch upon its mischiefs now collectively. He had been told that he was, in opposing this Bill, opposing Resolutions already agreed to by the House; but he contended there was in the Bill a great deal of new matter; for by it we are to have a Prince acting instead of his father, and consequently under the necessity of supporting the splendour of regal dignity, and yet he is not allowed a privy purse—nothing allowed towards the patronage of men of science and [illegible]—nothing towards the elegancies which have hitherto distinguished the House of Brunswick upon the throne, and without which its dignity must be insupportable—nothing towards the exercise of that benevolence for which his Royal Highness was so highly distinguishable—No! not even a shilling for common charity.—The Prince was to have a high sounding title, and nothing to support it, but the cares, the difficulties, and the perplexities which a party thought fit to throw in his way; he was to be a mere Clerk of the Officers of State.

Mr. Burke then pointed out the absurdity of supposing any distrust being applicable to the Prince, and the injustice of loading him with responsibility without power, and of giving to the Queen so much power without responsibility, and although it might be proper to exclude the Prince of Wales from the care of the King's person, yet it was fair to ask why were the Dukes of York, Cumberland and Gloucester, Prince William Henry, Prince Edward, and, in fact, the whole family excluded? What reason could be given for this bill of exclusion of the House of Brunswick.

He then touched upon the alarming danger of our present situation. The King was by a Resolution of the two Houses declared incapable, but by this Bill they would have no power of ever making him capable again, this was now transferred to the Queen, and we must wait her pleasure and that of her Council to restore him: the Houses had no more power—they had had four Committees before they declared the King incapable—and his returning reason is now to be made public by obscure and perhaps fallacious report.—A blind inquiry was to be preferred to the mature and solemn deliberation of the two Houses. All his relatives were equally excluded from the power of communicating to the public the recovery of the King.

He then alluded to the manner in which the business had been conducted. We had been led on step by step, but he was convinced, that had the whole scheme been proposed altogether, no Gentleman in that House would for a moment have entertained an idea of consenting—but like Macbeth,

——I am in blood.
Stept in so far, that should I wade no more,
Returning were as tedious as go on.

Mr Burke said he had done his duty in stating the danger to which we must inevitably be exposed by the present Bill, which upon a fair perusal and cool reflection would appear to others as it did to him. He also reprobated highly the idea of giving to the Queen such immense patronage, without annexing to it any responsibility. This he illustrated by various forcible, clear, and ingenious positions. He stated a vast number of sums of money which would be under the sole dominion of the Queen, the whole amount would be prodigious, and as she was not accountable for its application, what security had the House upon which they might rely that none of this vast wealth would be employed for the purposes of venality? In such a situation, was it unnatural to suspect the effect of temptation? He recommended due caution in this momentous business.

Mr Gamon said a few words, but in a tone so low as to be inaudible to strangers in the gallery.

The question was then put, and carried without a division.

The Bill being read a second time, it was ordered to be committed.

It was also ordered that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House upon the Bill next day.

Mr Burke hoped the Committee would to-morrow proceed only on those clauses which were the least exceptionable.

Mr Pitt observed they could not now possibly prescribe to the Committee any rule.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, Feb 7.

The House, contrary to its usual practice of adjourning over Saturdays, met this day.

Soon after the House was formed, it resolved itself into a Committee on the Regency bill, and sat till eleven o'clock at night.

The

The Bill conſiſts of 32 clauſes, and the Committee had got no farther than the 10th, when the queſtion of adjournment was put and carried

As upon the nine clauſes there were ſo many debates, and as in each debate the ſame Members ſpoke ſeveral times (for when the Houſe is in a Committee, the Members are not bound by the order which reſtrains them from ſpeaking more than once to the Houſe on any one queſtion) it cannot be expected that we ſhould give a detailed account of all the arguments that were uſed on this occaſion. A ſummary of the whole will render it perhaps more intelligible to our readers, and certainly more entertaining, than a ſcrupulous report of all that paſſed in the courſe of the night, including debates on points of order, and perſonal, in which the ſpeakers loſt ſight of the Bill and clauſes that were, or ought to have been, the ſubjects of diſcuſſion.

When the clauſe was read by which it is enacted that the Regent ſhall bind himſelf by oath to take care of the perſonal ſafety of the King to the utmoſt of his power and ability, and to govern according to the ſtipulations and reſtriction contained in the Bill,

Mr Burke ſaid, that when he compared this clauſe with another in the ſame Bill, he felt a perſuaſion that the framers of it intended it not only as a mockery of the Prince of Wales, but as an inſult to common ſenſe for he found that the Prince, who was not to be entruſted with the cuſtody of the Royal Perſon, was to ſwear that he would protect it, whilſt thoſe who were in fact to have the care of his Majeſty, were not to be called upon to give any pledge whatever for the faithful diſcharge of the truſt committed to them He admitted that it was unlikely the perſon of the King ſhould be in any danger from the Queen, but it was juſt as unlikely that there ſhould be any cauſe for apprehenſion of danger to him from the Son, and therefore both or neither ſhould be bound to give the ſecurity of an oath for the protection of the Royal Perſon As the Bill then ſtood, common ſenſe muſt revolt at it, for the perſon who was actually to have the care of his Majeſty, was left free from all engagements relative to the ſafety of the King, and the Regent, who was to have no power what ever over his Majeſty's perſon, was to ſwear that he would take care of him! Nay, the very perſons who were to be appointed Counſellors to the Queen, were not to enter into any engagement of this nature, for the oath which they were to take, was totally fixed on the head, as appeared from the form of it, which he read, and was as follows

"I A B do ſolemnly promiſe and "ſwear, That I will truly and faith

"fully conſult [illegible]
"which Regency [illegible]
"to the beſt of my [illegible]
"taining inviolate the [illegible]
"eſty's Royal Perſon, and [illegible]
"poſing, ſuppreſſing, and [illegible]
"things whatſoever [illegible]

So help me [illegible]

In the [illegible] ſaved, there was one word [illegible] Royal Perſon [illegible] were to be [illegible] touching the [illegible] not bound by the oath to conſult the ſafety of his perſon in the advice that they ſhould give.

Col. Phipps ſaid, that it was impoſſible to what part of the Bill the oath ſhould refer, as it was not to be taken by the Prince until he ſhould have ſeen all the proviſions and clauſes of the Bill. Should his Royal Highneſs feel a repugnance to ſwear to any of them, the oath could not be forced upon him, and he might be at liberty to reject it, and with it the Regency, or to take both together, as they were not to be ſeparated

The Chancellor of the Exchequer deſired that a clauſe in the Regency Act paſſed in the preſent reign, might be read. From that it appeared, that ſuch an oath as was now propoſed, was impoſed upon the perſon who ſhould have acted under it as Regent. Mr. Pitt then ſaid, that he thought it would have been wrong in him to depart from the precedent of that Act, nor did he ſee that under all circumſtances, there was any thing in the nature of the truſt given to the Queen, that could render it abſurd to call upon the Prince to ſwear that he would conſult the ſafety of the Royal perſon It was true that in the laſt Regency Bill, the cuſtody of the King's perſon was to be given to the Regent and Council jointly, and the oath was to be adminiſtered to them all but though in the preſent caſe, the cuſtody of the Royal perſon was not jointly in the Regent and the Queen, it was not improper to propoſe to the Regent ſingly, to ſwear to the execution of ſuch power as might be ſingly in him, for the preſervation of the King At all events the engagement propoſed went no further than that he would, to the utmoſt of his power and ability, take care of the ſafety of the Royal perſon. If his power was little, he was bound to little, if much, he was bound to much, his care of his Majeſty was to be commenſurate and co-extenſive

Mr Burke contended, that the Regency Act, from which the oath had been read, at the deſire of the Right Hon. Gentleman, did not apply to the preſent caſe, for in the former the perſon of the King was to be in the power and cuſtody of the Regent and conſequently [illegible] the oath was extremely proper; but in the present case the oath was improper, because it was to be taken by a person, who was not to be intrusted with the care of the King's person. He wished Gentlemen would state to him any one possible case, in which the Regent could interfere, to protect the Royal person. He asked, supposing the Queen should be disturbed with so humble, modest, and diffident a character as Dr. Willis, and should attempt to put the King under the care of some desperate and daring man, who should put razors and penknives into his hand, whether in such a case the Regent could interfere and prevent so dangerous a proceeding? He certainly could not; for under this Bill, the custody of the Royal person was committed exclusively to the care of the Queen.

Mr Dundas said, that there were many ways in which the Regent might protect the person of the King, though he was in the custody of her Majesty. It was not to be supposed that all the laws which provided for the safety of the Royal person, by making it treason even to imagine the King's death, were to be suspended: the Regent, as possessing all the power of the Executive Government, could provide for the safety of his Majesty, by enforcing those laws, whenever an occasion should occur: this was in his power, and this therefore it could not be improper to call upon the Regent to swear that he would do.

Mr Burton contended that the Regent was not only to have powers that would enable him to provide for the personal safety of the King, but that no one but himself could possess those powers. It was possible that the country should be engaged in a war, it was possible that the kingdom should actually be invaded, it was possible that a civil war should break out, or that dangerous riots should take place, in which the personal safety of the King might be endangered. In any of these cases, to whom could the Queen or her Council resort for the protection of his Majesty but to him who had in his hands the Executive Government of the country, and who but that person could command the powers, both civil and military, to watch over the safety of his Majesty?

Sir Charles Gould was of opinion, that the clause containing the oath should be postponed, until the Committee should have got as far as the clause in which the custody of the person was given to the Queen, and he accordingly made a motion to that effect, which, after a long debate, chiefly with respect to order, was rejected, and then the Committee agreed to the clause.

This clause having been thus disposed of, the Chairman next read the clause by which the Regent is to be restrained from making any alteration in the Established Religion of England or Scotland, and from marrying a Papist.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it proper to observe to the Committee, that this clause had not been introduced into the Bill under any idea that there was in the present circumstances of the times any thing which peculiarly called for it; but our ancestors, he said, had judged it expedient to put such a clause in all Regency Bills, and though there was not the smallest ground for apprehending any danger to the Protestant religion at present, he was of opinion that it would not have been proper to have departed from the example of our ancestors; but in following that example he desired it might be understood that his object was merely to shew that the present generation was not indifferent about a subject which was deemed of great importance at former periods. This, and nothing else, was the ground on which this clause had been proposed. He observed, at the same time, that nothing in this clause would restrain the Regent from giving his assent to any thing that would not trench upon the church establishment, and therefore he might, for instance, assent to a Bill for repealing the Test, in favour of Protestant Dissenters, notwithstanding any thing in this clause.

After the Minister had given this explanation of the clause, which seemed to satisfy both sides of the House,

Mr Rolle begged leave to propose an amendment. He said, that he did not think that there was in the present circumstances of the Prince of Wales, or of the times, any thing which would render such an amendment as he intended to propose, more necessary than it might be at any other period. He declared that in what he was going to do, he was not influenced by disrespect for the Prince of Wales, or any motive which a Member of Parliament ought to be ashamed to avow. The safety of the Protestant Religion was his sole object, and though he was ready to admit that he did not know it to be in any danger at that moment, still he thought it wise and prudent to provide against even the possibility of danger to it hereafter ——The Royal Marriage Act, he understood, had occasioned some doubts, and there were not wanting gentlemen of great professional reputation, who doubted whether it was consistent with the Act of Settlement, by which the Crown had been entailed upon the issue of the Princess Sophia, being Protestants. For the purpose, therefore, of guarding against against any misconstruction of law, he moved, that to the restrictions by which the Prince was bound from marrying a Papist, be added the words, "or who is or shall be married in law or in fact to a Papist."

Lord Belgrave opposed the amendment, he was convinced, he said, of the purity of the Hon mover's intention, but at the same time he thought the amendment unnecessary The rumour upon which this amendment might be supposed to be founded, had, as he was informed, been declared in that House by very high authority, to be absolutely groundless he was not a Member at the time to which he alluded; but he understood, that the declaration made on this subject by a Right Hon Gentleman now absent (Mr Fox), had removed every apprehension, and given complete satisfaction to the House Nothing had occurred since to give the rumour new life, and therefore as it was only on the authority of such a rumour that the proposed amendment could be supposed to be founded, he must necessarily oppose it

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that though he had inserted in the Bill a clause for the security of the Protestant Establishment, he must oppose the amendment He had inserted this clause, because it would have appeared remarkable, if the present generation had been less anxious than the last for the preservation of the Protestant religion, but as he only wished to imitate, so it would be no less remarkable if he were to go beyond the example, and to introduce any guard which had not appeared necessary to our ancestors, and which was not called for by any thing in the present circumstances of affairs To introduce a new guard now, would give the world grounds for thinking, that there existed a necessity for it at this moment which had not existed before, and as the necessity could, at best, be only collected from vague rumours, unsupported by any evidence, and contradicted from high authority, he did not conceive that there were any grounds that would warrant the Committee in admitting the proposed amendment; for he would not admit that vague rumours were a sufficient ground for Parliament to proceed to make an Act, and therefore, all circumstances considered, he was of opinion, that the Committee could not be justified in admitting the amendment of his Honourable Friend

Mr Welbore Ellis desired that the Act of the 11th of the present reign might be read It was read accordingly, and it appeared from it, that no descendant of George II except those born of marriages with foreign Princes, was capable of contracting matri-

many [illegible] Mr Ellis said, that [illegible] fwer to all the [illegible] posed marriage. It was clear that no such marriage could exist, as the Prince, as well as all the other descendants of George II. born in this kingdom, were absolutely incapable of [illegible] the consent of the Lord North [illegible] Act which had just been [illegible] that the [illegible] futation of the [illegible] laid down in every [illegible] Any amendment which would have a tendency to give a colour to such doctrine ought to be resisted, because on the one hand it could not answer one good purpose, and on the other it might produce the most dangerous consequences, by instilling into the public mind an opinion that an Act of Parliament was of no force, and that a clause in another Act was necessary to give it efficacy. He would not say that the Hon mover's intention was bad, but the consequences of his conduct might prove highly mischievous to his country

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, with some warmth, charged Lord North with having used language which might have provoked a difference of opinion, where none existed before, by the language he used, and the doubts he seemed to entertain of the purity of the Hon mover's intention.

Mr Sheridan now called the attention of the House to the arguments that had been made use of by Mr Rolle—from the whole of which, he said, it was utterly impossible to collect whether he was satisfied or not—first he was, and then he was not—he had doubts in his mind, and then he had no doubts in his mind—at one moment he only wished to be satisfied, the next, he was willing to withdraw his motion without any justification at all He began with throwing out an absurd and mischievous insinuation; at the same time, however, declaring explicitly, that he asked for no support, that he wished for no proceeding to be adopted in consequence of it, and that he was willing to withdraw it He will not, however, though by his own confession he has no object to attain, conclude without by scruples doing all the ill he can, by propagating a jealousy without doors, and indeed it was but reasonable to presume, that if the public were alarmed, the real object of the Hon Gentleman was fully answered To read A was both uncandid and unmanly Who was it that could prevent the Hon Gentleman from pursuing this subject to a proper enquiry, if he held it right and expedient so to do? But to expect that the House of Commons should proceed on the miserable scur-

ability of law shuffles, and on such fastious trash as was to be found in a fantastical lamentation on the law rather than on the Prince (written by Mr Horne Tooke), was insulting to Parliament and to common sense. Mr Sheridan urged this with great effect, and then adverted to what had fallen from Sir William Dolben, who proceeded to make an appeal to the House, and to take a [illegible] review of the most prominent circumstances of the Prince's conduct and the Parliament's right, or had they not, to shuffle, that the Right Hon Gentleman was completely and sincerely satisfied on the subject of their present discussion? They undoubtedly had a right to assume it, for the Bill then under their consideration was a sufficient proof that he had not been peculiarly deficient in his apprehensions and jealousies of the Prince's government. He had dealt with no sparing or parsimonious hand in limitations and restrictions, in checks and guards of every shape and every possible description.

Mr Courtenay remarked, that it was singularly curious, those who wished to support the amendment, acknowledged they had no grounds for it, and applied to the other side of the House to learn if there were any. The safety of religion was a fine stalking-horse, and best calculated to disturb the public: he remembered to have read, that all London had once been thrown into the utmost confusion and trepidation for the security of the Protestant religion by a rumour, that the Pope had been seen in a grocer's shop at Wapping.

The Attorney General said he knew of no doubts that existed about the Act of Settlement, which was certainly in full force, notwithstanding the 12th of his present Majesty.—Rumours, he observed, whatever grounds they might afford for enquiry, could by no means warrant a proceeding, which went so far as to make an Act of Parliament, founded upon nothing but rumour.

Mr Grey treated Mr Rolle with much severity, and derided his amendment to the worst of motives.

He was interrupted by Mr Bouverie, who thought it was disorderly for gentlemen to argue upon the motives of any Member.

This produced a tedious debate, in which all order was confounded, in an attempt to establish it.

Mr Pulteney said he was as ready to oppose the amendment as any man, though perhaps on different grounds. The Royal Marriage Act was certainly a security to the nation, but not such an one as ought to make the House shut its ears to reports of marriages in violation of it. It was certain that no marriage against the letter and spirit of that Act could be a marriage in law, but should it appear that a King or heir to the Crown had been publicly and avowedly married to a Papist according to the rites of any church, but without the consent of the King, which was made necessary by that Act, he would not think the Royal Marriage Act a security for the Religion and Constitution of the country, but would call for a Parliamentary enquiry into it. With respect to the rumour to which gentlemen had alluded, it ought not to be made a ground for a serious debate: it was too light a subject, and ought only to excite mirth and good humour. He did not say all that he might wish to say on the occasion, because a lady was concerned, and he had always so much respect for the fair sex, that he would not willingly make one of that sex a subject for public discussion.

After some further conversation, the question was put on Mr Rolle's amendment, which was rejected without a division.

The next clause in the Bill was that which restrained the Regent from granting any honour of the Peerage.

Mr Jolliffe moved a clause for limiting the duration of this Restriction to the first of February 1790.

Mr Hawkins Browne was ready to admit that the Restriction ought to be limited in point of duration, but as he thought 15 months, too short a period, reckoning from October last, when the King's malady was first discovered, to the first of February 1790, he would vote against the clause proposed by the Hon Member had the limitations been for two or three years, he certainly would have given his support.

Lord North supported the motion, which he conceived to be highly necessary for the prevention of those effects, which might be apprehended from the formation of a factious party in the House of Lords, whose consequence, both individually and collectively, would be encreased by the Restriction, and less used by its limitation.

Mr Pitt observed, that he had heard nothing new on this head: the question had been before discussed in the Committee on the State of the Nation, where the noble Lord's arguments had been weighed, and on which the Committee had already decided.

Mr Jolliffe's clause being put and negatived, Lord North moved, that after the word whatever in the 10th clause, the words 'which on the 10th of November last was held during his Majesty's pleasure' should be inserted. This amendment being also negatived,

Lord North said, that he thought it one principle of the Resolutions, that the Prince

ſhould have the power of appointing his own ſervants, how then, he aſked, if the Prince had not the power of granting penſions or reverſions according to his own inclinations, was it poſſible for him to fill the higheſt ſituation in the law department, if a vacancy ſhould happen therein? Not a puiſne Judge, or even a Barriſter of tolerable buſineſs, would accept of the office of Lord High Chancellor, an office ſo extremely precarious in its nature, if the Prince had not a power to reward him for his ſervices in caſe of a diſmiſſal. He thought the Prince, in the capacity of Regent, ſhould have the power of granting out of the Civil Liſt, a floating penſion at leaſt of 2,700l per annum, in caſe of a Lord High Chancellor's reſignation or diſmiſſal, until any place granted in reverſion ſhould become vacant and ready for his acceptance. For this purpoſe, he would move another amendment, that, after the word at the end of the clauſe, the following ſhould be inſerted, "and that it alſo ſhall be lawful, if at any time deemed neceſſary by the Prince Regent, to grant any penſion or reverſion of place to the Lord Chancellor or Keeper of the Great Seal, or to grant the reverſion of any place to any perſon he may think proper to hold the ſame in truſt for him."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, he by no means meant to throw any obſtacle ultimately in the way of the propoſition for making a proviſion for the retirement of any perſon who may hereafter be called to ſucceed a great, an eminent, and an admired lawyer, he objected to the proviſion being made at preſent, which in his opinion was premature. He agreed that every poſſible power ought to be granted, for the purpoſe of providing a ſucceſſor to ſo great a character, when a vacancy ſhould happen, he ſaw no neceſſity, however, to anticipate ſuch a vacancy, by which, whenever it ſhould happen, the country would be deprived of the great ſervices, of the great integrity, and great abilities, of the preſent Lord Chancellor.

Lord North ſaid, by the mode propoſed by the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pitt) they would take to themſelves the diſpoſal of the Great Seal, as they kept the power of providing for the officer who might be called to that ſituation, on his retirement. By retaining that power, every compact made with his Royal Highneſs in the Reſolutions was broken. The Houſe, inſtead of relieving him from the already too heavy reſtrictions, were forging for him new fetters, the Parliament, not the Regent, would have the power of changing his ſervants.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſpoke in reply, he wiſhed the noble Lord would not advance what he could not prove; his Lordſhip had aſſerted that the Houſe were about to break the contract with the Prince, as entered into by the Reſolutions, he defied his Lordſhip, however, to prove a ſingle deviation from the principle of thoſe Reſolutions.

Mr. [illegible] in ſupport of the amendment, [illegible] the alarming conſequences [illegible] Right Hon. Gentleman, (Mr. Pitt) [illegible] likely to follow whenever the Lord Chancellor ſhould, from any circumſtance, occaſion a vacancy in the Seals. The Right Hon. Gentleman had however given that ſide of the Houſe ſome conſolation in intimating to them that the Lord Chancellor had not quite ſo great an apprehenſion of them, and of their motives, as the Right Hon. Gentleman had declared himſelf to entertain, when he announced his own departure.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, he had never either mentioned to the Houſe the probability of his own departure, or of a noble and learned Lord's continuance in office. He could not conceive it his duty to announce to the Houſe a circumſtance of which he was unacquainted. He never had announced his own departure. It was true that it had been announced to him, but by perſons who had no authority to do ſo, or could cauſe him to depart. Whenever that time ſhould come, when he ſhould have to take leave of the Houſe, he ſhould have much more reaſon to thank them for the honourable and independent ſupport of his arduous adminiſtration. He felt the high honour and diſtinction of ſuch a poſt, and hoped he ſhould never be ſhaken in his fidelity, but would leave it under no unfavourable impreſſions of his good intentions for the intereſt of the country, for the ſafety and dignity of the Crown, and for the preſervation of the rights of the people and the Conſtitution.—[The Right Hon. Gentleman's concluding obſervations were inaudible in the Gallery and in ſeveral parts of the Houſe.]

After ſome further converſation, Lord North's motion was negatived. The Committee having, ſo far as the clauſe which relates to the King's civil and perſonal eſtate, on finding it was eleven o'clock, agreed to report progreſs and adjourned to Monday. The Houſe was then reſumed, and adjourned to

A new writ was ordered to be iſſued for the borough of Aylesbury in the county of Bucks, vacated by the death of Sir Thomas Halliſax Knt.

The Houſe reſolved itſelf into a Committee of the whole House on the Regency Bill, Mr Alderman Watson in the Chair

The twelfth clause was moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, restraining the Regent from exercising any authority over the personal estate of his Majesty

This clause caused a short conversation between Mr. Anstruther, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Fox, and Mr Sheridan; after which the clause was agreed to without a division

The thirteenth clause was read, and carried without any observation

The fourteenth clause, providing for the payment of his Majesty's Household, under the direction of her Majesty, being read,

Mr Sheridan objected to the clause as wholly unnecessary, and as tending to create a double government of the Household, in the Queen and in the Treasury

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that there would be no double government, the Treasury having nothing more to do with the Household by the present clause, than to issue the sums ordered

Mr Burke objected to the clause, as tending to the subversion of the privileges of the Act of Establishment of the Civil List, as tending to the subversion of œconomy, and calculated only for the purpose of providing for a favourite and unnecessary corps

The Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated to the Committee, that messengers were attending from the Lords, and, for the purpose of receiving the message, moved that the Committee should report progress

This being immediately agreed to, the House was resumed, and the messengers called in

The Lords had commanded the messengers to acquaint the House of Commons, that they would proceed further in the Trial of Warren Hastings, Esq on Monday next

The messengers being withdrawn, Mr Burke thought it necessary to inform the House, that he understood a petition had been delivered by Mr Hastings to the Lords, setting forth, that he had expended already in the course of the trial 30,000l and praying their Lordships to proceed with all speed to his trial Mr Burke expressed his readiness to proceed as speedily as possible to the issue of that on which he considered his honour [illegible] He remarked that the sum expended by the public in the course of the trial was much less than that stated to have been expended by Mr Hastings, and concluded by observing, that he understood their Lordships only meant on Monday to open the trial pro forma, and not to go into it on that day.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee on the adjourned debate on the fourteenth clause, Brook Watson, Esq in the chair

A short conversation took place upon the clause, in which Mr Pitt, Mr Sloper, Mr Burke, Mr Sheridan, Mr Powys the Attorney General, Sir James Erskine, and Lord North, took part

Mr Powys moved that the clause be postponed, in which motion he was supported by Lord North, upon the ground of the propriety of deciding upon a subsequent clause first, which was the basis of the present

This motion being persisted in, the Committee divided,

Ayes	87
Noes	13

Majority 45 against its being postponed

The clause was then put, and carried without a division

The fifteenth clause was put and carried without any conversation

The sixteenth clause, relative to the privy purse of his Majesty, was next proposed, which was opposed by Mr Dempster, Sir William Cunyngham, Mr Burke, Sir William Molesworth, and Mr Sheridan; and supported by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Dundas, Sir James Johnstone, and Sir Benjamin Hammett

It was opposed upon the ground of the impropriety of refusing to his Royal Highness the Prince, who was to support the dignity of the Crown, the power over the privy purse, amounting to 60,000l per annum, out of which, by the clause, was to be taken 16,000l and given to her Majesty, for purposes unknown to Parliament, and the remainder to be improperly locked up from the Prince, and to be left, in case of his Majesty's indisposition continuing, to the disposition of Parliament

It was supported upon the propriety of continuing his Majesty's benefactions, and on the impropriety of seizing the moment of his Majesty's indisposition to strip him of his property The 16,000l which had been said to be given to her Majesty for purposes unknown to Parliament, was explained in the following manner 12,000l was given to pay an established list of charities, settled by his Majesty, and the remaining 4000l was to enable her Majesty to continue his Majesty's benefactions to those persons who were not on the list, but who she knew received charity of his Majesty to that amount

Sir William Molesworth was willing to agree to the sum proposed to be taken from the money of his Majesty's privy purse, that was

was appropriated to the charities mentioned, but not thinking it prop - that the remainder should be kept from the Prince, he moved as an amendment, to add the words, "and that "the remainder shall be paid over to the Treasurer of the privy purse of the Regent"

Upon this amendment the Committee divided,

Ayes	101
Noes	156
Majority	55 against the amendment

The Solicitor General proposed an amendment which was agreed to, and the clause was carried without any further objection

The seventeenth clause was next read, vesting in her Majesty the care of the King's person, and the government of the Household

Sir Peter Burrell spoke against the latter part of the clause, the patronage given by which he said was so loosely expressed that it was impossible to ascertain the amount of it, and of which he conceived the House ought to be acquainted previous to their adopting the clause

The Chancellor of the Exchequer acquainted the Hon Baronet, that the whole amount of the salaries of the Household, from the Great Officers at the head of the different departments down to the most menial servants in any of the palaces or the stables, was no more than 100,000l per annum, out of that sum there was not more than about thirty thousand pounds received from salaries by Members of the two Houses of Parliament!—There were seven in the House of Commons, whose salaries amounted to about 4000l and the salaries of several Lords in the other House, amounted to about 26,000l Such influence, he said, was not, in his opinion, likely hereafter to preclude any revision, or necessary alteration in the system proposed for the present emergency

Sir Peter Burrell replied

Lord North condemned the Resolution upon the old ground of objection to her Majesty's having the government His Lordship deprecated the measure of dividing that power from the Regent, as unconstitutional and dangerous, and expressed his fear of its operating as a pernicious precedent

Mr Keene spoke against the clause

Mr Sheridan proposed an amendment to separate the great Officers from the Household, upon which the Committee divided.

The House [illegible] progress was reported, and the Committee ordered to sit again on

Petitions were presented from the county of Berks, and from the Borough of Hertford, against the Chester Election Bill

Mr. [illegible] presented a petition from the Nobility, Gentry, Freeholders, and Gentry of Southampton, [illegible] much of the Bill before the House as related to the direction of Government, and to dissention in the Royal Family

REGENCY BILL

Committee, Alderman Watson in the Chair

Mr Pitt rose, on the clause being read for appointing her Majesty's Council, remarked the propriety of appointing to this office such persons as, from their high ecclesiastical or legal situations, or from the confidence which his Majesty was accustomed to repose in them, were most peculiarly suitable for assisting the Queen with their advice The orderly procedure required, that the sense of the Committee should be taken on each person separately, but he at the same time thought it would be agreeable, that he should first state the list of those persons whom he should nominate as in his opinion best calculated for the discharge of this office Those were—the two Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Lord Thurlow, the present Lord Chancellor, Lord Kenyon, the present Chief Justice of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench, and the four great Officers of State, namely, the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, the Master of the Horse, and the Groom of the Stole The first motion that he had to put was, that "John Lord Archbishop of Canterbury be one of her Majesty's Council"

Lord North rose, not to object to the Rev Prelate's being one of her Majesty's Council, but to give notice, that it was his intention to move others to be appointed as Councillors to her Majesty, in addition to those proposed by the Right Hon Gentleman [illegible] expressed his amazement that, in what related to the personal safety of his Majesty, the Princes of the Blood should have been omitted, and declared his intention to move the insertion of the names of all the Princes of the Blood, of full age, into the blank appointing the Councillors to advise her Majesty

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he should for the present refrain from stating his objections to the Noble Lord's proposition, when the motion should be made, he would be very ready to give his reasons why he conceived it improper.

Lord Maitland expreſſed much indignation at finding that the Right Hon Gentleman had made ſo partial a ſelection of Councillors He aſked why the Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas had not been thought of? The noble Lord who filled that high office had received it from his Majeſty

The Marquis of Graham replied, that it was not proper that all thoſe who had been honoured by the King ſhould be Members of the Queen's Council, which ought to be limited to a few The noble Lord in the blue ribband thought the Princes of the Blood ought to be of that Council, for his own part he thought otherwiſe, as her Majeſty could at all times procure their advice, and he was of opinion, that reſpect to the Princes ſhould not [illegible] the Committee from putting them in [illegible] which would render them reſponſible to Parliament, and might cauſe them to be brought to the Bar of the Houſe to anſwer for the diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in them

Mr Sheridan ſaid, thoſe who wiſhed not to have the names of the Princes of the Blood inſerted in the bill as Councillors to the Queen, urged, that they were her natural Councillors, perſons who in nature and diſcretion would point out to her Majeſty as the perſons moſt proper to adviſe her, and who would be moſt ready to aſſiſt her with their advice If through reſpect for the Princes, the Committee would not name them in the Bill, why had they named the Prince of Wales? If through reſpect for the Blood Royal, the perſons were not to be made reſponſible to Parliament, why was it declared in the very ſame Bill, that the Prince of Wales was to be reſponſible for the truſt repoſed by it in his Royal Highneſs?

Col Hippiſley, ſaid a very good reaſon for omitting the names of the Princes was, that the two Houſes had agreed that the Regent ſhould not have the power of the Royal Perſon, and they, therefore, ought not to be put in contact with the Queen, who might be ſuppoſed to touch the devotion of the Regent

Mr Alderman Wood (the Chairman) conſidered the conſideration of this buſineſs as a queſtion, and called the attention of the Committee to the queſtion before them, which was, whether Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be appointed a Councillor to her Majeſty

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, the Hon Alderman was correct in the point of order, but as the true object in order was to go the moſt eaſy way to a determination of the queſtion before the Houſe, and as it would ſhorten the debate to go into the whole ſubject at once, he ſaw no objection to it. He conceived that it would be ſtrictly orderly, if the Noble Lord thought proper, to propoſe at preſent the names of the Princes, and poſtpone the nature of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury

Lord Northfield, however, was willing immediately to propoſe the names of the Princes of the Blood, and ſhould move that the name of the Duke of York ſhould be inſerted, by which means the Committee could at once enter into the conſideration of the Council

Sir Lloyd Kenyon conceived it improper that the [illegible] of their Royal Highneſſes ſhould be propoſed without their being previouſly conſulted, eſpecially as they had acted together names being inſerted in the Commiſſion

Lord Northfield, however, ſhould have thought himſelf very much to blame if he had propoſed the name of their Royal Highneſſes without having previouſly communicated with them on the ſubject, to which they made no objection

Mr Sheridan ſuggeſted the propriety of Mr Pitt withdrawing his motion for appointing the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to make room for the noble Lord's motion

Mr Beaverſtone wiſhed to know whether the Council were to be reſponſible for their advice?

Mr M A Taylor ſaid, that as no learned Gentleman roſe to anſwer the queſtion of his Hon Friend, he would inform him, that according to the clauſe they were not reſponſible

Mr Addington ſaid they were clearly reſponſible, and if any ground of ſuſpicion exiſted of their having given her Majeſty improper advice, they would be liable to impeachment

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid the Council would be moſt certainly reſponſible for their advice

Mr Beaverſtone could ſee no way how the reſponſible could attach He oppoſed the word 'John,' in the motion, and moved to leave the Archbiſhop of Canterbury for the time being appointed

Mr Lowys called upon the Right Hon Gentleman (Mr Pitt) to explain in what manner the reſponſibility attached

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, there could be no doubt that according to every principle of the Conſtitution, every truſt inveſted under Government had reſponſibility to the country attached to it Whatever advice the Council ſhould give to her Majeſty they would be reſponſible for ſuch advice, and if the Houſe ſhould ſee ſufficient reaſon to think that by ſuch advice either of his Majeſty or the Conſtitution was in any danger, they had the ſame power to call

call her Majesty's Councillors to account as they had to call on the Officers of Government

The Attorney General maintained the same doctrine, and said the House might on any suspicion of ill advice, address her Majesty to name her advisers

Mr Anstruther agreed with Mr Pitt that there could be no Parliamentary trust without responsibility being attached to it His objection did not lie on that account against the clause, but he objected to the power given to the Queen of acting without her Council, in which case no responsibility could attach

Mr Burke agreed that no trust could be given without responsibility, in the present instance, however, the principle was recognized and protected, for though responsibility was avoided, there were no traces by which that responsibility was to be found No act could, according to the wisdom of the Right Hon Gentleman, be tried in consequence of that bill not the same from manual or The King is not responsible, of course the Right Hon Gentleman Pitt was fraught with duty and submission It was a shocking imputation on the House, for, like the witches in Macbeth, the Right Hon Gentleman could truly say to the Parliament,

"I'll keep the vow of promise to your ear,
"But break it to your hopes"

Here Mr Pitt recited what he called the triumph of the Minister with his usual success The Princes, he would not be astonished to hear himself, were immortal, and above the consideration of any thing in this world, and that like gods of the poets, they looked on the clouds, and were unconcerning with the circumstances below, and consequently regardless of the interest of a nation, or the infliction of a father! He would have the doctrine of responsibility, as laid down by Mr Pitt, extreme, when offered in argument against the including the Princes in her Majesty's Council The Princes of the Blood had often been in responsible situations, some of them even in employments In the reign of Charles II his brother the Duke of York was not only Lord High Admiral, but Post-Master General Prince George of Denmark, a naturalized subject, and husband of Queen Anne, was Lord High Admiral In the last reign the Duke of Cumberland was Commander in Chief of all his Majesty's forces, and as such was liable to be tried by a Court Martial, as his Royal Highness was responsible to the tribunal of martial law for his military conduct

After much extraneous though forceful elocution, he charged the Minister, for not having included the Princes of the blood in the nomination of the Queen's Council, with violating the laws of the land, the spirit of the Constitution, and the order of nature.

"Star after star goes out, and all is night."

Mr Powys was against any person being agreed to by name, considering those who occupied the offices for the time being, the proper persons to be of her Majesty's Council

Sir R Sutton supported the original motion

Mr Burke spoke in reply, as did Mr Lowndes

Chancellor of the Exchequer wished the Committee to come to a decision on the question before the House, and expressed his readiness to meet the motion of the Noble Lord

The question was then put upon the amendment rejected, that the word 'John', be inserted, which being negatived, the original motion, that Dr Archbishop of Canterbury &c &c &c Majesty's Council, was carried without division

The Chancellor of the Exchequer next moved that Edward Lord Thurlow be one of her Majesty's Council

Lord North rose and suggested the propriety of putting the names of the Princes before the question was on Thurlow's name.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to putting the Lord Chancellor's name

Lord North then moved for the purpose of moving the name of Edward Lord Thurlow to be added

Mr Burke also objected to the motion being put and supported the propriety of Lord Thurlow being specially named in the Council, by virtue of his office, but that it was the duty of her Majesty's Council to advise, and must be recorded as his opinion, and not as swearing a blind man with Westminster Hill plea to his situation Confiding in the ability, integrity, and honour of the Lord Chancellor, and in having put in the confidence of his sovereign, it was not the confidence of the people, he should vote that Edward Lord Thurlow be one of her Majesty's Council

Lord North replied, and said that he greatly esteemed the character and abilities of Lord Thurlow, and would, if the motion could be agreed to, support it, the Lord Chancellor for the time being, being a clause to continue Lord Thurlow of her Majesty's Council if he should be removed from his situation

Mr Dundas replied, but still objected to the motion being postponed

Lord North again spoke in reply

Mr.

[illegible] spoke in favour of [illegible] Lord Thurlow, and [illegible] the Lord Chancellor for the time being on the principle of not suffering any part of the Regent's appointment to be of her Majesty's Council.

Mr. Wyndham supported Lord North

The question for postponing being put, was negatived, and the motion for appointing Edward Lord Thurlow, was carried without a division

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then made all the other motions successively for the insertion of the names of

William, Lord Archbishop of York,
Lloyd, Lord Kenyon,
The Lord Chamberlain,
The Lord Steward,
The Master of the Horse, and
The Groom of the Stole

} Those four for the time being

The motions passed without any further debate or opposition

Lord North then rose and moved, "That his Royal Highness Frederick Duke of York and Albany be one other of her Majesty's Council"

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he would state to the Committee why he thought it necessary to give his negative to the noble Lord's motion The Council proposed for her Majesty was a Council of Advice, not of Controul there was no necessity to bind their Royal Highnesses by Act of Parliament to give their advice to her Majesty, they might give her Majesty their advice whenever they thought proper, and when she desired it he was confident there would exist no necessity or an Act to force such advice to be given It was impossible to place the person of the King in a case of any more attached to him than the Queen, it would therefore be highly improper to separate or make her Majesty trust the less — The House had already decided that the Prince of Wales, as the Heir Apparent of his Father, ought not to have the care of the person of the King The Committee could not appoint any of the Princes of the Blood to the care of his Majesty, unless they violated the principle they had adopted in the exclusion of the Prince of Wales from that trust, and though it might, by the Opposition, be added to the catalogue of those articles of disrespect which they had falsely and invidiously imputed to him, yet as an honest man actuated by every motive of caution for the public safety, it would be inconsistent with the nature of the trust to be reposed in the Queen's Council, to nominate those personages who were in point of succession, personally connected with the Crown.

Lord Beauchamp spoke in support of the motion of the noble Lord, and could see no reason why the objection to the Regent's having the care of the King, should extend to the whole House of Hanover

Lord North went over his former arguments in support of the propriety of the Princes of the Blood being in her Majesty's Council

Lord Maitland warmly supported the motion, and was convinced that this House exercised their judgment and their feelings on the present question, there could not exist a difference of opinion, he was confident that however the House decide, there would be but one opinion in the country which would be on the impropriety of excluding from the Council his Majesty's sons and brothers

Mr Addington agreed with the noble Lord (Maitland) that, however they might decide the question, there would be but one opinion in the country and that he was confident would be, as it had been, in favour of the Right Hon Gentleman (Mr Pitt) He approved of the persons appointed for their integrity and ability, the nomination of which did honour to the Right Hon Gentleman, and he was happy in giving him his support, which he did from the clear conviction of his conscience

Mr Burke quoted the 5th of his Majesty, to prove that all who were not of the Royal Blood were excluded from the care of a sovereign during a Regency, on that Act he said he would lay his hand, and asked the Right Hon Gentleman (Mr Pitt), and in asking him, he asked all those who voted by the eye with him, whether they were not acting directly contrary to that Act?

The question being called for, the Committee divided upon Lord North's motion,

Ayes	130
Noes	177
Majority	47 against it

Lord North next moved, 'That his Royal Highness Prince William Henry be one other of his Majesty's Council,' upon which the Committee divided,

Ayes	127
Noes	177
Majority	50 against it

His Lordship next moved, "That his Royal Highness Prince Edward be one other of her Majesty's Council,", which was negatived without a division.

His Lordship moved, "That his Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester be one other other of her Majesty's Council," on which the Committee divided,

Ayes 129
Noes 178
Majority 49 against it

His Lordship then moved, "That his Royal Highness Henry Duke of Cumberland be one of her Majesty's Council," which was negatived without a division

Mr Dempster then moved, that in virtue of his high office, and being the first Commoner in England, the Speaker of the House of Commons should be added to the list of the Members of the Council

The motion was negatived, without a division

Mr Dempster next moved, that the Lord Mayor of London be a member of the Council

This motion was also negatived without a division

After a variety of uninteresting observations had passed on minute articles, and diverse clauses, till the Chairman came to that which regulated the manner in which the exercise of the Royal authority may be resumed by his Majesty on his recovery,

Mr Pitt here remarked, that though the resumption itself was a matter on which all were agreed, yet from some hints, there was a probability, that there would be a diversity of opinion as to the mode in which it ought to be effected It was therefore suggested to him, that it would be more convenient if they should proceed to the discussion of this point to-morrow

This was agreed to The House resumed and adjourned to

WEDNESDAY, FEB 11

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day, that the House do now resolve itself in a Committee of the whole House on the Regency Bill—which being agreed to,

Mr Brooke Watson took the chair The clause being read which provides for the mode of announcing the return of the King's health, through the medium of the Queen and her Council, independent of the interposition of Parliament,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he supposed that the provision in this clause, from what had been already thrown out on it in former debates, though not immediately before the House, in his opinion rendered it unnecessary for him to enter into any particular disquisition on the subject, he should only treat it therefore in a general manner He then divided the subject into two parts The first respected the right of the King to the re-assumption [illegible] ment, as soon as it [illegible] was in a capacity to [illegible] sides must undoubtedly collect [illegible] ference of opinion then could only [illegible] the mode—and he trusted that Gentlemen on appearing upon reason and conviction would find that he had provided this convenient, the first subject to [illegible] and that in restoring to the dignity of Majesty was peculiarly confined It was necessary that the recovery, of which they gave great hopes, should be notified through some ostensible channel To accomplish this, it was provided, that as soon as this much wish'd for period took place her Majesty should notify the same to each of his Majesty's Privy Council; and if any five of that Committee should be convinced that his Majesty was in a sound and proper capacity to resume the Government, they should countersign a proclamation to that effect, which proclamation should be inserted in the London Gazette; In consequence of which, if the Parliament was not then sitting, it should assemble on the occasion —and the power of the Regent should cease This he conceived to be the most congenial to the spirit of the Constitution, as the Privy Council might be said to be the natural channel of his Majesty's will and pleasure by this means his Majesty would be instantly restored to that right which was his alone, and to which he was entitled by the laws of the country.

Mr Powys dissented from the plan of resumption submitted by the Right Hon Gentleman, which he condemned as a system perfectly novel, derogatory to the vital principles of the constitution, and incompatible with the rights of the two Houses of Parliament He reprobated the selection of the Privy Council as producing a packed and garbled judgment, and therefore very unlikely to give satisfaction to the public Why should Parliament be deprived of the agreeable office of declaring the King's restoration to his former sanity, after the Hon Gentleman had allowed them the melancholy task of declaring his incapacity? On the same principle he had given the Regent the invidious parts of the Royal Authority, and denied him the more pleasing and ingratiating part of it After several other observations, he expressed his hope that the House would not vote their own condemnation, by agreeing to clauses which would seem to intimate that they did not deserve to be trusted, and that they were not sufficiently loyal to his Majesty, to be will

[illegible] hail the happy day of his awaking from that ſlumber of the mental faculties in which he now lay. He concluded with ſaying, that he had ſeveral amendments to propoſe, which he would bring forward when the Committee came to thoſe parts to which they were applicable.

Mr Vyner ſupported the argument of Mr. Fowys

Sir R Sutton ſaid, it was matter of ſurpriſe to him that thoſe who ſome time ſince contended againſt the rights of Parliament to lay any reſtrictions on the Regent, now came forward to lay reſtrictions on their lawful Sovereign He ſaid, his Majeſty's claim was irreſiſtible, the moment he recovered, to reſume his Government, and to put an end to the Regency He condemned the idea of the two Houſes going into an examination of the capacity of his Majeſty, upon his recovery, which he conſidered as very injurious to his Majeſty's rights, and argued that it bore no parallel with the neceſſity of a Parliamentary examination to prove the incapacity The King not meeting his Parliament in perſon or by commiſſion, and a ſtop enſuing, to all Executive acts, it was neceſſary that the infirmity ſhould be proved, to ſhew the right of the two Houſes to proviſe for the exerciſe of the royal authority: on his Majeſty's recovery he would recover his right, and Parliament would have no right to conſider of the exerciſe of the executive authority being convinced of the propriety of the clauſe, he gave it his hearty approbation

The Hon Mr Marſham ſaid he intended to propoſe an amendment, which he read, as ſoon as he had delivered his ſentiments on the queſtion, which he reprobated in very forcible terms The heads of the amendment were, that on the notification of the Queen, the Phyſicians attendant on his Majeſty ſhould be examined on oath, in the moſt ſolemn manner, at the Bar of that Houſe, in a certain number of days—not leſs than four, nor more than ſix, after the ſaid notification—whether the King was capable of governing, and that they ſhould then addreſs his Majeſty, and deſire him to take into his hands the reins of Adminiſtration

Mr Bouverie ſaid, that the Regent might have prorogued Parliament at the time of the notification — He would be glad to know, if any clauſe in that reſpect exiſted in the Bill

Colonel Phipps ſupported the propriety of the clauſe, which was conſonant to that which was followed on the acceſſion of a King on the demiſe of another As to his Majeſty aſking to whom he was indebted for the medium of his reaſſumption? It was neither to his Parliament, Sons, Brothers nor Privy Council, but to the Act of Settlement — And what puniſhment ſhould be deemed too great, in the eyes of the country, for thoſe (alluding to the Council) who had diſappointed the expectations, and deluded the hopes of a loyal people, in holding out a premature recovery? Could it be denied that the right lodged in the King ſhould exerciſe itſelf the very inſtant the neceſſity ceaſed?

Mr Sheridan entered largely into the queſtion, and took a view of the arguments urged in favour of the clauſe, which he combated with great preciſion of reaſoning and elegance of language Mr Sheridan then inſiſted, that the Houſe in delegating a truſt had given up their right, and that it was given up to thoſe who had not a natural intereſt in the Crown, nor yet in the people On this he drew a concluſion on the probability of the confidence which the people at large would place in the two Houſes of Parliament, and in the Councils, and the fatal conſequences that might enſue, in caſe the King ſhould ſign a Commiſſion of the recovery of his health, appointing a Regent, which he might do in caſe he ſhould relapſe, which was not improbable and in caſe of the Queen's death, his Majeſty, under this Bill, could not be reſtored without the conſent of the Regent, who had it in his power to appoint one in her ſtead to ſend that notification Another bar to the reſtoration of his Majeſty was, that the proclamation muſt be counterſigned by ſix of the Privy Council, which they need not do unleſs they were in themſelves fully ſatisfied that his Majeſty was in a capacity to reſume the Government

Mr Dundas ſupported the clauſe, and in order to ſhew the precaution which had been taken in the Bill, to prevent a premature reaſſumption, there were three checks, firſt, the Queen, ſecondly, five of her Council, and ſix of the Privy Council, who were to examine the Phyſicians, and in order to inform themſelves on the ſubject, the learned Gentleman wiſhed to know if it was decent or becoming, that his Majeſty ſhould come to that Houſe as a ſuppliant for his right, or look out of the window of a public houſe, to ſee the ſhow of his ſon coming down to Parliament, that they might decide on his ſanity.

Mr. Burke condemned the clauſe as unconſtitutional, and as dangerous to the country

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Colonel Phipps again ſpoke, as did Mr Sheridan and Mr. Bouverie.

Mr. Grey and Sir Charles Gould each ſaid a few words againſt the clauſe.

The Attorney-General ſupported it

Mr. Sheridan propoſed as an amendment,

" that

"that a certificate of his Majesty's recovery be laid before the two Houſes of Parliament," on which the Committee divided

Ayes	113
Noes	181
Majority	68 againſt it

The Committee proceeded to fill up the blanks of the clauſe, after which the five remaining clauſes were put and carried *

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved an additional clauſe, which was agreed to, the Houſe reſumed, and the report immediately brought up and read

THURSDAY, Feb 12

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day, for the third reading of the Regency Bill

The Bill was accordingly read a third time.

Mr Pulteney then roſe, and adverted to the poſſible danger that might ariſe from the power of creating Peers being too long dormant If a factious oppoſition ſhould be carried on in the Houſe of Commons, the Crown might exerciſe the prerogative of diſſolution, and thus appeal to the people, but no ſuch appeal could be made with reſpect to the Houſe of Lords, in which Houſe, if any faction ſhould endeavour to counteract the meaſures of Government, the only mode of prevention or reſtraint was to create new Peers Though he did not conceive that ſuch a faction was at preſent likely to prevail, yet the poſſibility of danger ariſing from it was ſufficient to countenance the motion which he would now ſubmit to the Houſe, viz that, in the clauſe of the Bill which reſtricts the Regent from the creation of Peers, the duration of ſuch reſtriction be limited to three years

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was not inclined to apprehend the leaſt danger from the Peerage being dormant for ſome time, but as there was a poſſibility (though not a probability) of ſuch danger [illegible] full diſpoſed to reſiſt [illegible] motion, particularly as [illegible] was the utmoſt extent to which [illegible] recovery was likely to be protracted [illegible] that happy event ſhould even be [illegible] a much later time, it was not the [illegible] ſupporters of the Bill to continue the [illegible] tions any longer *

Mr Hawkins Browne ſignified his [illegible] bation of the motion

Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Powys [illegible] their proteſt againſt the motion, if it was meant to preclude any Parliamentary diſcuſſion or re-conſideration of the Bill for three years

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that he did not agree to the motion under any idea that it was intended to preclude Parliament from taking away the Reſtrictions on the Regent within a period much leſs than three years

Sir James Johnſtone concurred in the motion

Mr Pulteney's motion was agreed to; and a clauſe founded upon it was brought up, read three times, and annexed as a rider to the Bill

Mr Alderman Newnham expreſſed his diſapprobation of the far greater part of it. In the courſe of his ſpeech, he beſtowed ſome compliments on the excellence of heart, as well as head, with which the Prince of Wales was endowed

Mr Alderman Watſon, in a ſtrain of pompous elogium, panegyriſed the merit and virtues of the Miniſter, and expreſſed his decided approbation of every clauſe of the Bill

The queſtion for the paſſing of the Bill was then agreed to, and the Houſe reſolved, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer do carry it to the Lords to morrow

Between eight and nine, the Houſe adjourned

THEATRICAL JOURNAL

THE Impoſtors, a Comedy, by Mr Cumberland, was acted the firſt time at Drury Lane. The Characters are as follow

Lord Janus,	Mr Palmer
Policarp,	Mr Wroughton
Sir Solomon Sapient,	Mr Baddeley
Captain Sapient,	Mr Aickin

* In the courſe of this debate Mr. Burke remarked, that "the Almighty had been pleaſed to ſmite the Sovereign with his hand—he had hurled him from the throne, and put him in the condition of the meaneſt peaſant of the country" The Marquis of Graham called to order, and ſaid that he would ſuffer no Member of that Houſe to make uſe of ſuch language unreſtrained; and was going to make a motion to have the words taken down by the Clerk of the Houſe, but was interrupted by Mr. Burke, who ſaid that the lamented ſituation of the Sovereign was not the act of the Houſe, but the will of the Deity, but depriving him blood, the Prince of Wales, from the full inheritance of his Authority, was an act of that Houſe.

[illegible]	Mr. Lamash.
[illegible]	Mr. Sweet.
Sir Charles Freemantle,	Mr. Barrymore.
Miss Eleanor Sapient,	Mrs. Jordan.
Miss Deborah,	Miss Pope

Two Sharpers, under the names of Lord James and Pofitarp, obtain admiſſion (how does not appear) into the houſe of Sir Solomon Sapient, the former intending to marry Miſs Eleanor, and the latter making declarations to Miſs Deborah, an antiquated virgin, couſin to Sir Solomon. The introduction of Sir Charles Freemantle, who preſerves the young lady when thrown from her horſe, ſerves to diſcover the deſigns of the impoſtors, who, however, on being diſcovered, are not conſigned to puniſhment. Sir Charles obtains the Lady, and the play concludes.

The performance, like every thing written by Mr. Cumberland, is not excellent in itſelf, but has merit ſufficient to ſhew it to be the production of a perſon who would be able to do better, were he to exert the full force of his genius. The incidents are hardly probable, nor have the plot or characters any pretenſions to originality. The ſituations are however pleaſant if not new, and the dialogue is certainly elegant and ſprightly. In theſe particulars hardly any dramatic writer is happier than Mr Cumberland. It is a fault in this play, that the buſineſs is over at the end of the Fourth Act. The general tendency is highly to be applauded. It is moral and conſequently uſeful, and was received with great approbation.

The performers were all excellent, and it would be extremely difficult in the whole range of the Drama, to point out more exquiſite acting than was diſplayed by Miſs Pope and Mrs Jordan.

The following Prologue and Epilogue were ſpoken before and after the comedy.

Spoken by Mr PALMER

THE Comic Muſe, tho' privileg'd to wear
A maſk on her own face, ſtrips others bare,
And whilſt ſhe gives all nature to your view,
Shall not her mirror ſhew th' Impoſtor too?
For tho' moſt knaves in this ingenious age
Out trick the law, we trap them on the ſtage:
But then ſome poets make their knaves ſo ſly,
That when they pluck their viſors off, you ſpy
Now that's a fault of poets dead and gone,
Our bard has kept his conſcience clear for one,
Indulge his knave in a few roguiſh failies,
To call him witty wou'd be downright malice,
His bittereſt enemies, with all their railing,
Are well diſpos'd t' acquit him of that failing.
Time was indeed, but that good time is paſt,
When novelties did not grow old ſo faſt:
Woe to the piece, tho' at firſt ſight 'twere ſtriking,
If ſecond-ſight ſteps in and mars your liking!
Like a new face, it glitters for a day,
All run, crowd, follow, ſtare—and turn away.
Love hath its honey-moon, but that once o'er,
From ſweet to flat, from flat it turns to ſour;
Croſs follows cool, as cool ſucceed to civil,
My duck! my darling! once, and then—my Devil!
Even Wit's fine edge is dull'd by too much wearing,
And truths twice told will tire us in the hearing.
The Orator, that tries his lungs too often,
Will ſet the lungs of other men a-coughing,
No ſooner up, than ſtrait all parties join
In one unanimous reſolve—to dine,
The leſſening ſenate melts away by drops,
And metaphors are left for mutton-chops.
How then? If novelties be ſo uncertain,
Sad news for our old friend behind the curtain,
Whoſe Muſe has puſh'd her Helicon about
So quick, we almoſt fear the tap is out
If, truth, wit, eloquence are but a jeſt,
How ſhou'd a mere Impoſtor ſtand the teſt?
I'll give the Bramble's anſwer to the Oak,
Small ſticks will blaze, when great ones only ſmoke.

EPILOGUE

Spoken by Mrs. JORDAN.

CUNNING projectors may pretend to find
A ſcheme for ſailing ſhips againſt the wind,
But never poet yet cou'd ſtart a ſcheme
For navigating plays againſt the ſtream:
Oh heavens! no ſooner does your angry gale
Hiſs in his teeth, than back goes every ſail,
Furious he drives—Ah dreadful ſituation!
Stern foremoſt down the rapids of damnation.
Yet here and there a ſturdy wit has try'd
To pull and tug and puff againſt the tide,

But

But what is one poor puff of his own making,
When all around him the wild waves are breaking?
Plung'd in the gulph like Ceyx ſtill he raves,
Murmuring his own applauſe beneath the waves.
Magnetic quacks can ſtare you into fits,
No muſcle ſtirs for our magnetic wits,
Stomachs there are that can digeſt a ſtone,
Your's will not gulp a little nonſenſe down
Now this is hard, for till your taſtes agree,
How can we know what Comedy ſhou'd be?
"Reform," Sir Courtly cries, "reform your ſtage!
"Poliſh your mirror that reflects the age,
"Copy from France, give your Apollo grace,
"And with pearl powder deck your Muſe's face!"
"Oh, rot your delicacy!—Give me fun," Sir Balaam Blubber cries "My dreary Dun
"Againſt your Pegaſus nine nights to three,
"That is your only galloper for me
"John Bull's my man, I love his honeſt roar,
"I come to laugh, or I come here no more"
Not ſo Miſs Biddy—ſhe is all for feeling,
For ſentiment, for ſighing, ſobbing, kneeling,
Rope ladders ſhe admires and cloſet ſcenes,
Eſcapes, ſurprizes, huddlings behind ſcreens,
And ever when two meanings maſk the jeſt,
Miſs Biddy's purity picks out the beſt
Stand by, make way! Lady Bell Bloſſom's places!
Slap goes the door and round go all your faces,
In comes her Ladyſhip with vacant ſtare,
Smiles heav'n knows why, and curtſies heav'n knows where.
Aſk now what ſays my lady to the matter,
What does ſhe like?—Her own inceſſant chatter.
For me, tho' poets various arts employ
To make me wife, maid, widow, man and boy,
Yet all this while there's but one thing in nature
I truly am to be—Your faithful creature:
Here I'm at home, this is my natural part,
This character flows freely from my heart.

FEBRUARY 3.

The Toy, a new Comedy, was acted the firſt time at Covent-Garden. The Characters are as follow:

Sir Carol O Donovan,	Mr. Aickin.
Young O'Donovan,	Mr. Middleton.
Arcourt,	Mr Lewis
Larry Lavanagh,	Mr. Blanchard.
Miſs Mackenzie,
Miſs Fenton,
Decroupet,
Waiters,	Mr. Hamerton. Mr. Lewis.
Boy,	Maſter Egerton.
Footman,	Mr. Frank.
Lady Arabella,	Mrs. Bernard.
Lady Jane,	Miſs Brunton.
Sophia,	Miſs Pope.
Fibb,	Miſs Stuart.
Katy Lavanagh,	Mrs. Wells.

This play takes its name from the place where the ſcene of it is partly laid, the Toy at Hampton Court. It has more Farce than Comedy. The incidents are ſufficiently varied, but highly improbable, and the characters, though not ill ſupported, have been long hackneyed on the ſtage. Meſſeglin is taken from Malvolio. It is, however, on the whole, a pleaſant and laughable performance; and if the production of a new writer, and not Mr O'Keeſe, as has been ſuſpected, is intitled to be conſidered with candour, and diſmiſſed with applauſe.

The performers, and particularly Mr. Lewis, did great juſtice to their characters.

4th The Prophet, reduced to two Acts, was performed at Covent-Garden, and was received with applauſe.

7th Coriolanus, altered from Shakeſpeare and Thomſon, was revived at Drury-Lane: the parts of Coriolanus and Volumnia by Mr. Kemble and Mrs Siddons. In this alteration the beſt parts of Shakeſpeare and Thomſon are retained, and compoſe a more pleaſing Drama than that of either Author ſeparately. The different parts, if we miſtake not, were blended together by Mr Sheridan, ſen. and were produced by him at Covent Garden, in the year 1755, when he himſelf performed the principal character. Neither Mr Kemble nor Mrs Siddons will loſe any of their reputations by their performances in this play. The former pourtrayed the fiery, impetuous, and turbulent Coriolanus with great propriety, and the latter the tender and ſpirited Volumnia with equal ſucceſs.

TO THE TRAGEDY of the BROTHERS,

Performed in Mr FECTOR's Private Theatre at DOVER, February 9, 1789, to a brilliant Audience.

Written by W GILLUM, Eſq.
Spoken by WILLIAM FECTOR, Eſq.

BY late defeats you ſee not quite ſubdu'd,
My ſaucy phiz again I here obtrude;

[illegible] upon the launch of the Fall,
[illegible] triumphs paints my ardent soul,
And spite of all facetious wags may say,
I mount these Hustings now without dismay;
Living no parts, though I've lost the day*!
In one great cause we all I'm sure agree,
The Drama's insults none can tamely see
In these enlighten'd times, shall it be said,
Our taste for Avon's heavenly Bard is fled?
That Congreve's wit has lost its magick power,
Nor suits the palate of the present hour
That even Siddons' match'less skill has fail'd,
When Humphries and Mendoza have prevail'd;
That she, Melpomene's most favoured child,
Who into grief has flinty hearts beguil'd,
Is now the object of the publick's slight,
Seen without tears, and heard without delight!
To mend the heart, alas! she vainly tries,
A nobler science bears away the prize,
Given unto those who best can give black eyes!
Shall we be touch'd with scenes of artful woes,
And view, unmov'd, a real BLOODY NOSE?
Such scenes as these what Briton can resist?
Who'd crush the glorious trophies of the fist?
With all her charms Thalia too must yield,
Whilst Covent-Garden bruisers keep the field
The Manager, by rich experience taught,
Knows by his treasures how his heroes fought,
And as with joy he reckons o'er his gold,
Each guinea proves how well their blows have told
Perchance some critic of the ancient school,
Hearing these practices, can scarce be cool,
Thinks that the Drama's dignity is gone;
Its state degraded, sunk, and quite forlorn
To contradict him I will not pretend,
Can such a system boast a single friend?
Can you, who warmly now such zeal display,
And pay such tribute to the inspir'd lay
Of Genius, Virtue, Energy, and YOUNG,
Who always give instruction as he sung;
Can you behold the honours of the stage
Expiring thus, and still refrain your rage
At such a stigma on a modern age?
In every face I read a just disdain;
I know your sentiments—the answer's plain
I see the lightning dart from Beauty's eye,
Flashes so keen 'tis folly to defy,
Whilst such defenders, none can be afraid,
Nor need the Muse, neglected, seek the shade.

EPILOGUE.

Written by Mrs. PIOZZI.

Spoken by Mr. FECTOR

WHILE gath'ring storms succeed to cloudless skies,
And Winter's call bids misty vapours rise,
While doubts distract, and fogs surround our isle,
How can pert Epilogue provoke a smile?
No, rather let the soften'd soul retain
Awhile the impression of dramatic pain;
Run o'er in solitude these scenes of woe,
Till your Night Thoughts approve our evening's shew
Well knew the bard, whose melancholy lay
Wept the short summons of the young and gay,
How ill a monarch's heart endures the probe,
When its strong pulse pants thro' the purple robe
Parental anguish shakes both crown and hall,
And unextinguish'd instinct breathes thro' all.
You then, whose hopeful sons too early seek,
Like Prince Demetrius, to the Continent,
Should they some foreign prejudice imbibe,
Judge not with angry haste the travelling tribe;
The dove-like, swift in circling heights they run,
And shew their various plumage to the sun
Think what temptations giddy youths surround;
Smiles that seduce, and doctrines that confound
Yet when return'd from Paris, Spa, and Rome,
This bird of passage late revisits home,
Accept with pleasure his improvements made,
O'erlook the fopperies, and they soon will fade
Then, when the touch of parent earth inspires,
And his warm heart beats high with patriot fires,
Point out the joys that land alone can yield,
Which to all ranks spreads forth Ambition's field;
Where the firm Briton, bred on freedom's plan,
Feels his own consequence, and lives a man:
Let frisk and frolick from that hour be over,
And TRAVEL'S EPILOGUE be spoke at Dover.

POETRY.

LOVE PREFERRED TO GLORY:

AN EFFUSION.

VIOLENCE, giddy Love!—thy reign is o'er!
Away!—I'll heed thy voice no more!
No more at sight of lip or eye
Burst into praise, or heave a sigh;
No more at Beauty's smile rejoice,
Or tremble when I hear her voice,

* These lines were highly applauded, alluding to the Election lately at Dover between Mr. Pybus and Mr. Trevannion.

No more to ſee her frowns repine,
For Reaſon's potent charms are mine.
I long have wander'd in thy train,
Fond Boy!—and wander'd long in vain!
Thy train, where Folly rears her creſt,
Her mottled plume above the reſt,
And ſtill in pleaſure or in pain,
The firſt to rule thy frantic train.
Hence!—I will quit the childiſh crew,
And, Wiſdom!—ſeek a home with you.
Now, Love, farewel!—I now reſign
Each dream, each hope, each joy of thine;
And truſt me, not as heretofore
Shalt thou entice from Wiſdom's door.
I know the time, with bluſhes know,
When thou could'ſt make me all forego:
There was a time when all reclin'd
In Wiſdom's ſhade I ſtor'd my mind,
I paus'd upon the hiſtoric page,
I trac'd the arts of every age,
And hop'd at leaſt my heart could bear
The rude aſſaults of mortal care
Thou cam'ſt—I ſaw thee dare intrude
Upon my uſeful ſolitude,
A roguiſh ſmile I ſaw thee wear,
And thus you urg'd the wily prayer
"Leave, leave thy muſty tomes to age;
"In youth 'tis folly to be ſage!
"O do not give from Love's pure joys
"A ſingle moment to be wiſe!
"This wound reſtores thy loſt deſires;
"Let Wiſdom ſoothe when Love retires"
I felt the piercing wound you gave,
I trembled, and became a ſlave!
I ſaw Meliſſa's matchleſs charms,
And ſwift withdrew from Wiſdom's arms
The Arts, the Muſes were forgot,
The hiſtoric page—I knew it not!
Philoſophy, who bade me fly
Imperious Paſſion's ſerpent eye,
Was ſoon forgotten, or deſpis'd,
And Paſſion's charms alone were priz'd,
All elſe appear'd inſipid, cold,
Fit only for the toyleſs old
Alas! how ſoon the viſion's fled,
Which then inflam'd my heart and head!
How ſoon the ſun of hope declin'd!
How ſoon deſpair poſſeſs'd my mind!
Meliſſa, ere the autumnal ſun
Its mild declining courſe had run,
With all her matchleſs train of charms,
Fled to my happier rival's arms!—
Where'er I fled, or did, or thought,
How low my heart by grief was brought,
Avails not——for the day is paſt!
Thy firſt of triumphs, Love!—and laſt!
A nobler call my boſom fires
Hark!—Glory's voice to arms inſpires!
I fly!—haſte!—bring my ſword and ſhield!
I'll ſeek renown in Honour's field
I'll ſtem the torrent of the foe,
I'll level adverſe nations low,
[illegible]
For [illegible]
So ſhall the ſtorming [illegible]
Through every [illegible]
Alas! what [illegible]
What means th' involuntary tear?
Are hopes and ardours thus [illegible]
When Glory fires the youthful breaſt,
What!—e'en in imagin'd fights
Doth fear my [illegible]
Ah no!—[illegible]
What ſcenes of blood and horror riſe!
I ſee, by War's aſſaſſive hand
Each art, each pleaſure leave the land
What tongue the countleſs ills ſhall ſpeak!
What heart that hears them will not break!
I ſee Deſtruction's ſinewy arm
Rais'd high amidſt the ſpreading ſtorm;
His blood-ſhot eyes—his boſom bare,
Gorg'd with the ſpoils of human care,
With many a tender lover's blood!
With many a father's, wife and good!
See ſhrieking Agony appear,
And Pity drop her hotteſt tear,
Her unavailing tear!—for then
Few comforts reach the hearts of men.
Ah few, amidſt the impulſive band,
Have power to ſtretch the ſaving hand!
What cry was that?—The wakeful train
Have burſt upon the village ſwain!
I ſee the mead, the ſtream, the wood,
All crimſon'd with their maſter's blood!
The poor man!—who each morn aroſe,
And toil'd until the evening's cloſe!
The profits of his toil no more
Than to keep famine from the door;
Yet, 'midſt the weary ſcene, his mind
Sent forth a prayer for all mankind
I hear the mother's bitter wail!
I hear the children's weeping tale!
I ſee the trembling man of age
Sent want-full on the world's broad ſtage!
Or, all unable to retire,
I ſee him, plung'd in flames, expire!
Are theſe the triumphs Glory knows,
Exalted but on human woes?
Higher, and higher ſtill, her head
She lifts amidſt the increaſing dead.
Oh wretch! who deems the victory ſmall,
Unleſs around whole nations fall!
Unleſs the hell directed deed
Bids half mankind to weep and bleed!
Avaunt, thou murderous fiend!—away!
Hence! hide thee from the face of day!
Hence! where congenial ſpirits dwell,
Hence! hide thee in the caves of Hell!
Thou, Father, whoſe all-bounteous hand,
Pour'ſt bleſſings o'er this favour'd land;
Whoſe miracles will never ceaſe,
Who breath'ſt in all thy mandates peace,
Regarding with the ſame kind ear
The peaſant's and the monarch's prayer,

All-

[redacted] Flower!—for ever sigh!
Thine I surely hate Ambition's sigh
Come, smiling Love!—return, return!
Come!—bid once more my bosom burn
Inspire it with thy sacred flame,
Forgive the wrongs I've done thy name
Alas! impassion'd with despair,
I murmur'd strange things to the air,
But thou'lt forgive the things I said!
To lose such blessings!—such a maid!
To see her in my rival's arms,
With all her matchless train of charms,
Who would not raise the frantic eye?
Ah!—who of anguish would not die?
Come, Love!—return, in smiles array'd,
And with thee bring a beauteous maid,
Be mine to bend before thy shrine,
Tho' all thy keenest woes be mine,
E'en tho' contempt should be my lot,
At all its pangs I'll murmur not!
For still beneath thy rudest sway,
My heart shall bless thee and obey
E'en tho' my maddening eyes behold
The maid whom most I love, infold
The youth whom most my thoughts disdain,
I'll die!—but not thy power arraign,
Amidst the life dissolving groan,
Blest'd that I've caus'd no sorrows but my own!

Dover. RUSTICUS.

SONNET

To the NYMPH of TUNBRIDGE-WELLS.

By the AUTHOR of the ELEGY on the DUKE OF RUTLAND

HEALTH to the healing powers of this pure well!
As to fair Rutland they are healing found,
Whose fond heart still sits pond'ring o'er its wound
Nymph of the fount, if thy cool urn can quell
Throbs that from eyes like hers such smiles expel,
As gild the orient morn, a quick'ning grace
Breathe o'er the pensive languish of her face,
And speed the lout'ring spirits their light round
Far may thy fount, auspicious nymph! surpass
Fonnts of all climes! as Rutland, Queen of Love,
Each paragon of beauty soars above;
For as night's radiant goddess the bright class
Of lucid orbs that trembling in her train,
Spread their faint glory o'er the ethereal plain.

SICKNESS.

ILL-starr'd the wretch whom pining pain denies
With rosy Health to tread the dewy lawn!
To see the crimson-skirted sun arise,
And taste the breezes of the vernal morn.
The couch invites to court coy flying Sleep,
Her poppy wreaths entwine not his sad eyes,
Sorrow still whispers he must wake to weep,
And fill the ear of silence with his sighs.
Disease with palsied hand directs his dart,
And strikes, or seems to strike, the destin'd blow
Terrour, grief, anguish, feed upon his heart,
That swells with more than visionary woe
From these snake crested fiends the rapid start
Scarce frees him——flashing rage, with slow step they depart

A SONG

ON every tree, in every grove,
I'll carve the name of my dear love,
Where er I am, my constant theme
Shall be the nymph of Towridge Stream.

Beauty with innocence conjoin'd,
Exquisitely sensible and kind,
Such as to our thoughts the angels seem,
Such is the nymph of Towridge Stream.

When Sol with radiance fills the east,
When he betakes himself to rest,
By day I think, by night I dream,
Only of the nymph of Towridge Stream.

Tho' fate fix far from hence my home;
Tho' in rude lands compell'd to roam;
No other nymph to me will seem
Equal to her of Towridge Stream.

Would Heav'n but grant me my desire,
One only gift would I require;
What else it could give as nought I'd deem,
Give me but the nymph of Towridge Stream.

GENERAL CONWAY'S ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF

MISS CAROLINE CAMPBELL,

DAUGHTER OF THE Right Hon. Lord WILLIAM CAMPBELL.

SINCE 'tis the will of all-disposing Heaven
To seize the boon its kinder hand had given,
Whether on earth thy friendly spirit rove,
'Midst the once happy partners of thy love;

(Scenes

(Scenes where thy virtues reign'd, thy talents shone,
And fond affection made each heart thy own,)
Or, bounding swift, has wing'd its airy flight
To the pure regions of eternal light;
Look down, fair Saint, and O, with pity see
Where sad Remembrance lifts each thought to thee.
Accept the heaving sigh, the trickling tear;
The last best offerings of a heart sincere.
What tho' no costly hecatombs should bleed,
Nor lengthen'd train in sable pomp succeed,
Yet shall the sweetest flowers thy grave adorn,
Wash'd by the kindliest tears of dewy morn,
There shall each friend, thy heavenly virtues made,
With pious dirge invoke thy gentle shade,
Like fragrant incense the soft breath shall rise,
And smooth thy passage to thy kindred skies
Severely kind, O why did adverse fate
Grant such vast bounties with so scant a date?
Give such sweet fragrance to this short-liv'd flow'r,
The virtues of an age to last an hour!
It gave her wit might grace a Muse's tongue,
The charm of numbers, and the power of song,
Th' angelic touch to strike the trembling string,
And tune such notes as its own seraphs sing
But O! o'er-bounteous, with that sacred art,
It gave each nicer movement to the heart,
And her soft breast, with strong sensation fir'd,
Felt the keen impulse which those arts inspir'd
Too great a portion of celestial flame
Strain'd the frail texture of her weaker frame,
The subtle fire too pow'rful forc'd its way
Thro' the soft yielding mould of mortal clay
As the clear air in crystal prison pent,
Oft bursts its fair but brittle tenement,
While in the dust the glittering fragments lie,
The purer æther gains its native sky
Ere the stern Sisters cut the vital thread,
I saw and kiss'd her on the fatal bed,
Just as her gentle spirit took its flight,
And her faint eye-lids clos'd in endless night,
No strong convulsions shook her parting breath,
No tremors mark'd the cold approach of death,
Her heart still heav'd, with vital spirit warm,
And each soft feature wore its wonted charm
Ah me! in this perplexing maze of fate,
Thus doubtful, erring, varying, restless state,
Tho' [illegible]
With pomp and [illegible]
[illegible] power;
Tho' worth like [illegible] no pitying power shall save
From sickness, pain, and an untimely grave?
Yet stay, rash mortal, nor presume to scan
By thy imperfect rule th' Almighty's plan.
O censure not his sovereign high behest,
But prostrate own, whatever is, is best.
Judgment's the part of Heaven; submission thine;
We may lament; but we must not repine.
Each has his lot (for so does Heaven ordain)
His stated share of happiness and pain:
And mortals best its just commands fulfil,
Who, tho' they enjoy the good, and patient bear the ill

DOVER

By Mrs PIOZZI.

HE, whom fair winds have wafted over,
First hails his native land at DOVER!
And doubts not but he shall discover
Pleasure in every path round DOVER!
Envies the happy Crows which hover
Above Old SHAKESPEARE's Cliff at DOVER;
Nor once reflects, that each young Rover
Feels just the same return'd to DOVER!
From this fond dream she'll soon recover,
When debts shall drive him back to DOVER!
Hoping, tho' poor, to live in clover,
Once safely past the STRAITS of DOVER!

But he alone is his Country's Lover,
Who absent long, returns to DOVER;
And can by FAIR EXPERIENCE PROVE HER
The BEST he has found SINCE LAST AT DOVER!

The following LINES were addressed to Mr HUMPHREY, the celebrated Miniature-Painter, on his Portrait of Miss FARREN,

By LORD DERBY

O THOU whose pencil all the Graces guide,
Whom Beauty, conscious of her fading bloom,
So oft implores, alas! with harmless pride,
To snatch the transient treasure from the tomb;
Plain'd, I behold the fair, whose comic art
Th' unwearied eye of taste and judgment draws;
Who charms with Nature's elegance the heart,
And claims the loudest thunder of applause.

Such, such alone should prompt thy pencil's toil:
Of saving Folly give thy labour o'er;
Fools never will be wanting to our isle,
Perhaps a Farren may appear no more.

ACCOUNT of the BLEACH-WORKS at LLEWENY.

(WITH A PLATE.)

THE BLEACH-WORKS for IRISH LINENS lately erected by the Hon. THOMAS FITZMAURICE near his ſeat at LLEWENY, in DENBIGHSHIRE, conſtitute from a deſign of Mr. THOMAS HARDY, which certainly does that Artiſt great credit.—The rooms are extenſive, and fitted with every convenience neceſſary for that buſineſs. The Mill-room is 175 feet in length, and the machinery in it is very curious.—A handſome arcade extends along the whole front, 350 feet in length, and forms a flat Creſcent Oppoſite the center is a figure of the River God Thames, pouring a ſtream through his urn, into a large baſon; and on each ſide of him are two fountains, which in ſummer contribute to render the air cool and agreeable.—The waſte water, or overflow from theſe, is conveyed in pipes to a ſmall canal—from whence, after forming a number of ſmall caſcades for the ſpace of near half a mile, it falls into the Clwyd at the bottom of the Bleach-Green

The buildings—with the Cloth on the Green, and the natural romantic country in the back ground—form a moſt delightful view from the houſe—and it is highly worthy of the attention of thoſe gentlemen who may chance to paſs near it.—Perhaps it may be hard to ſay, whether they will be more delighted with the beauty of the place—or charmed with the politeneſs of its hoſpitable Maſter.

YESTERDAY the Recorder of London, with the Sheriff and the Town Clerk, attended his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, at Carlton houſe, with the unanimous vote of thanks from the Common Council of London, in preſenting which the Recorder thus addreſſed the Prince

"Sir, We have the honour of attending your Royal Highneſs, by the direction of the Corporation of London, with their moſt reſpectful thanks for that Princely bounty, which is the ſubject of the reſolution in my hand I believe I ſpeak truly the ſentiments of theſe gentlemen, as well as my own, in aſſuring your Royal Highneſs, that no charge could have been given to us, which we ſhould have executed with greater pleaſure, and we think ourſelves peculiarly happy in the honour of preſenting to your Royal Highneſs, the firſt public teſtimony of that reſpect and veneration from the greateſt city in the world, to which you are ſo eminently entitled from every good citizen, and every truly affectionate ſubject of your Royal Father. The vote of thanks which we now preſent, we flatter ourſelves will be the more acceptable, for having paſſed without one diſſenting voice"

The Addreſs was then read, to which the Prince of Wales replied, "That he received with much pleaſure this mark of reſpect from the Citizens of London, of whoſe loyalty and affection he had now a freſh proof, that he ſhould be ſtudious to cultivate their affection, and deſerve their eſteem"

Extract of a Letter from Stamford, Jan 19.

"The following ſingular circumſtance of preſervation may be relied on as a fact:—Laſt Saturday ſe'nnight about ſix at night, as Mr Richard Reckaby, of Langrick-fen, in this county, and a ſhepherd of the late Dr Shaw's, of Wyberton, were attempting to croſs over Foſs-dyke waſh, without a guide, they found the water rather higher than they expected, and the channel full of large pieces of ice as it was impoſſible to get over without venturing upon the ice, they made choice of the largeſt piece they could find, and intended guiding themſelves over with a walking-ſtick; but it being too ſhoal, before they had got half way over, the tide came ſo ſtrong, their efforts were not able to reſiſt it, and they were drove up the river towards Spalding, where, although they were near a houſe on the bank, they could not make any perſon hear to give them aſſiſtance; one of them attempted to gain the bank, but had a narrow eſcape from being drowned; they were therefore obliged to deſiſt, and wait the mercy of the tide, which on its return, conſigned to their deſperate ſituation, took them back from thence into Boſton deep, about three leagues below the Scalp, and was likely to take them more out to ſea; but they had the good fortune to hail a veſſel very near them. As the morning was very foggy, the ſailors had ſome difficulty to find the above unfortunate young fellows, whom they had the humanity to take on board, almoſt dead with cold One of their lives was deſpaired of, but we are happy to hear he is nearly recovered"

FEB 2 On the ſecond of December the Houſe of Aſſembly of Jamaica voted 1000 guineas, to be laid out in the purchaſe of an elegant ſword, ornamented with diamonds, to be preſented to his Royal Highneſs Prince William Henry, his Majeſty's third ſon, as "an humble teſtimony of the very high reſpect and eſteem that iſland entertains for his eminent virtues, and the happineſs they feel in ſeeing him amongſt them, as well as of the grateful ſenſe they have of the particular attention which his Royal Highneſs pays to the duties of a profeſſion which is the ſupport and defence of the Britiſh empire in general, and of that iſland in particular"

When the Committee of the Houſe waited on his Royal Highneſs, to requeſt his acceptance of the ſame, he received them in the politeſt manner, declared himſelf unconſcious of any merit that could entitle him to ſuch a mark of regard, and aſſured them he ſhould remember, with peculiar pleaſure, their ſentiments of loyalty and affection for his perſon.

"My Lord and Gentlemen,

"With the deepest concern I find myself obliged, on opening the present session of Parliament, to communicate to you the painful information that his Majesty has been for some time afflicted by a severe malady, in consequence of which he has not honoured me with his commands upon the measures to be recommended to his Parliament

"I have directed such documents as I have received respecting his Majesty's health to be laid before you, and I shall also communicate to you so soon as I shall be enabled, such further information as may assist your deliberations on that melancholy subject

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"Deeming it at all times my indispensible duty to call your attention to the security of the public credit, and to the maintenance of the civil and military establishment, I have ordered the public accounts to be laid before you

"My Lord and Gentlemen,

"It is unnecessary for me to express to you my earnest wishes for the welfare and prosperity of Ireland, which, in every situation, I shall always be anxious to promote Nor need I declare my confidence in that affectionate attachment to his Majesty, and in that zealous concern for the united interests of both kingdoms, which have manifested themselves in all your proceedings"

As soon as the Lord Lieutenant had retired, and the Commons had quitted the Upper House, an Address to his Excellency was moved for by Lord Longford, which was ordered to be brought in the next day, when it was agreed to nem con, and ordered to be presented.

In the House of Commons the Address was moved for by Lord Kilwarlin, which was seconded by Mr Trench, and agreed to; yet there was a very long and anxious debate upon it. Several parts of it were strongly opposed; particularly whatever was [illegible] monarchy to the Lord Lieutenant.

The several documents relative to the King were presented by Mr Fitzherbert—A dispute arose as to the time expedient to take into consideration the state of his Majesty's health The Secretary mentioned Monday the 16th—Mr Grattan Wednesday the 11th—This was the trial of strength between the parties The Secretary was supported by the Attorney General, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr M Mahon—Mr Grattan by Mr I Jones, Mr Bushe, the Secretary of State, Mr C O Neill Mr D Browne, Sir H Cavendish, Mr Ogle, Mr Curran, and Mr M Smyth On a division the numbers were, for the Minister 74, against him 128, majority against the Minister 54.

9 A letter from Gloucester of this date says, "On Tuesday evening last a tremendous storm of thunder and lightning fell at Tetbury, in this county, which broke a large hole through the steeple on the west side, which, if reduced to a square, would be at least four feet wide, and cracked the south-west side for more than six yards almost perpendicularly, and also shattered and displaced the crib stones on the south west and north-west sides, from almost the top to the bottom Many stones were scattered about the church yard, and one fell through the roof of a dwelling-house at a considerable distance the bell wheels are injured, but there is reason to hope the bells are secure, though it is judged very dangerous even to toll either of them The steeple, which was esteemed to be very beautiful, is so much shaken, that it is thought it must be taken down The church is not materially damaged, though there are many small holes in the walls of the cloisters, near the floor, and through the windows, where the lightning vented itself; and what is very remarkable, it forced its way through the stone-work on the sides and tops of the windows more than through the glass"

Majority against the Minister 19

17 Saturday evening a French Gentleman, seemingly of fashion, committed the desperate act of suicide in Greenwich Park

The following are the particulars, as we have collected them, that attended this melancholy transaction

He had been at the Ship Tavern in Greenwich from Thursday with a lady and servant On Saturday morning, he sent the lady to Town and discharged his servant, at the same time presenting him with his trunk containing a great quantity of wearables, and also added two valuable watches He then called on Sir Hugh Palliser, at Greenwich Hospital, offering him a sum of money to be distributed among the seamen of the Hospital this however the Governor thought proper to decline, alledging, that as they wanted for no comfort whatever, his donation in that form would be useless

The unfortunate Gentleman then retired, refusing to tell his name—The remainder of Saturday was spent in visiting different inhabitants in Greenwich, among whom he distributed several sums of money to the amount of 150l or 200l —particularly meeting the young gentlemen of Dr Egan's Academy, as they walked, he threw among st them eight guineas and a half This circumstance being reported to the Doctor, he was struck with suspicion of the intended fact, and the Gentleman being seen to enter the Park, he dispatched one of his assistants, together with a young gentleman, after him They accordingly followed him as he walked, and entering into conversation invited him to take tea at the Doctor's He seemed happy to meet with those who could converse with him in his native language, and acknowledging the politeness of the invitation, pulled forth a watch he had still remaining, and forced it on the young gentleman, requesting him to wear it for his sake, observing he himself should have no further occasion for it

Having walked some distance in the Park, his natural politeness led him back part of the way with his companions—but taking his leave of them before they quitted the Park, they had not proceeded far when they were alarmed with the report of a pistol, and running back, found him stretched on the ground and lifeless

It appeared he had applied a case of pistols to his forehead, by which the roof of his skull was nearly shattered to pieces, and rendered his dissolution instantaneous The pistols bore the marks of the Gens d'Armes of France on them, by which it may be conjectured he belonged to that corps

In person he was tall, and remarkably handsome and in manners elegant and polite, so as to impress those who were witnesses to his behaviour and his fate with the most lively regret

A TRANSLATION of a French letter found in the pocket of the unfortunate Monsr Mimant de Bere, who shot himself in Greenwich Park, on Feb 14, at a quarter past five o clock in the evening, as mentioned above

Addressed to "Him who shall find it"

"Two o clock in the afternoon, and three hours before my death

"That I might prevent any further enquiries, and at the same time apologize for the trouble I must create you, I thought proper to leave these few lines, Sir, and beseech you to grant me a little portion of ground for my interment

"The indifference of my relations, the repugnance I feel at acting as an impostor, the perfidy of one whom I tenderly loved, are weighty motives in a mind of sensibility, which has thrown off the fetters of prejudice, to terminate my existence by those means which only can give ease to the wretched — I am far from aiming at lofty things, neither am I incapable of encountering misfortunes, but had I been so happy as to have been blessed with the constancy of my beloved friend, who alone could have endeared and made me cherish life, I should have met the approach of death with horror, but now I survey it with smiles, and even have been long desirous of putting a period to my existence. The fear of disturbing the tranquility of my family, induced me to form a pretence for leaving my country, in order to find a silent tomb London and Paris, with all their boasted pleasures, have by no means convinced me that life is preferable to death, on the contrary, it would be folly to labour under affliction without the hope of cure

"This is my opinion, let every man act as he pleases, you will consider me as a fool —I rather chuse to be thought so, than to lengthen out my unsupportable sufferings —I cannot discover any real enjoyment in life—eating, drinking, and sleeping constitute the principal employments for it, and as of all these sleeping is undoubtedly the ſweeteſt, I ſhall take this evening ſome pills, which will make me ſleep a long time

"Were the four elements to reunite, and after a thouſand combinations reſtore me to life, I would not conſent to live but under the Engliſh Government, where happineſs alone exiſts, and which ought to ſerve as a model for all the nations of the earth——But no!—In vain ſhould this body be formed again, by a concourſe of the four elements of which it is compoſed For I have ſeen every thing, enjoyed every thing, and I wiſh not to renew my exiſtence!

19 Both Houſes of the Iriſh Parliament having waited on his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant with their addreſs to the Prince of Wales, deſiring his Royal Highneſs to take upon himſelf the government of the realm during his Majeſty's preſent indiſpoſition, and having requeſted his Excellency to tranſmit the ſame unto Great Britain—His Excellency was pleaſed to return the following anſwer

"My Lord and Gentlemen,

"Under the impreſſions which I feel of my official duty, and of the oath which I have taken as Chief Governor of Ireland, I am obliged to decline tranſmitting this addreſs to Great Britain

"For I cannot conſider myſelf warranted to lay before the Prince of Wales an Addreſs purporting to inveſt his Royal Highneſs with powers to take upon him the Government of this realm, before he ſhall be enabled by law ſo to do."

23 About twelve o'clock at night, a fire broke out in Long Acre, near James-ſtreet, which entirely deſtroyed the houſes of Mr Holmden, glover and breeches maker, Mr Wright, upholſterer, and two others in front, beſides conſiderably damaging an umbrella warehouſe on one ſide, and an oil and colour ſhop on the other Communicating backwards to Hart-ſtreet, its progreſs was rapid and deſtructive, but, by a timely application of the fire engines and a plentiful ſupply of water, this dreadful conflagration was got under Happily no Lives were loſt

26 It is now authenticated from the beſt authority, that the King's late diſorder was owing ſolely to his drinking the waters of Cheltenham Several caſes have been within theſe few days communicated to his Majeſty's Phyſicians, which are exactly in point, one of a young lady of good family in Yorkſhire, and who is well known, but whoſe name it would be indelicate in us to report, another of two Ladies further advanced in life, and another, which is the moſt in point, of a Male Breton, a French gentleman

This gentleman went during laſt ſummer to Cheltenham, with letters of recommendation from Sir Joſeph [illegible] waters there ſix weeks, [illegible] and was ſhortly after, as [illegible] indiſpoſed in the ſame manner as his Majeſty has been, which continued on him for three months

In referring to his Majeſty's mode of living while he was at Cheltenham, it is now fully believed that his drinking too copiouſly of the waters, and not taking ſufficient animal nouriſhment to counteract the ſtrong nature of them, was the only cauſe of his late illneſs

27 Friday laſt the Duke of Leinſter and Lord Charlemont were deputed by the Houſe of Lords, and the Right Hon T. Conolly, J O'Neil, W B. Pontonby, and J Stuart, Eſqrs by the Houſe of Commons of Ireland, to preſent the Addreſs of both Houſes to the Prince of Wales, requeſting him to take upon him the Regency of that kingdom, during the indiſpoſition of the King his father: at the ſame time the Houſe of Commons voted by a majority of 83, that the anſwer of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant to both Houſes, in refuſing to tranſmit the ſaid Addreſs, is ill-adviſed, and tends to convey an unwarrantable and unconſtitutional cenſure on the conduct of both Houſes—The abovementioned Deputies arrived in London on the 25th inſt

Though ſmall its field, thy pencil may preſume

As nature's ſelf, in all her pictures fair,
Colours her inſect works with niceſt care,
Nor better forms, to pleaſe the curious eye,
The ſpotted leopard than the gilded fly;
So thy fine pencil, in its narrow ſpace,
Pours the full portion of ſublimer grace,
And portraits true to nature's larger line,
Boaſt not an air more exquiſite than mine
Soft Beauty's charms thy happieſt works expreſs,
Beauty thy model and thy proneſs
For her thy art has to perfection brought
Th' uncertain toil, with anxious trouble fraught,
Thy colour'd cryſtal at her fond deſire
Draws death-leſs luſtre from the dangerous fire,
And, pleas'd to gaze on its immortal charm,
She binds thy bracelet on her ſnowy arm

THE EUROPEAN MAGAZINE AND LONDON REVIEW,

THIS [illegible] 1754 [illegible] his father was [illegible] land, of the family [illegible] in the county of [illegible] ſeſſed a [illegible] quarter. [illegible] ended [illegible] Haſly-hall [illegible] Lute is [illegible] Irwin's father [illegible] abroad, [illegible] India Company, [illegible] and died, and [illegible] children, left the gentleman of [illegible] are about to give a ſhort account.

He was ſent to England at a tender age to obtain that education, India was incapable of affording. For ſome years he was placed under the care of Mr. [illegible] of Chiſwick, but the bent of his inclination leading him to follow the ſteps of his father, he was removed to a celebrated academy in London to qualify himſelf for the line he had choſen. The portion of a younger brother was perhaps no little motive for his reſolution to abandon England, and thoſe literary purſuits which the poſſeſſion of independency alone can command with comfort, and which appear to have been neareſt to his wiſhes: theſe however were ſoon interrupted by the buſtle of office, and the cares of improving his fortune. His deſtination was in the civil ſervice of the Company at Madras, where he arrived in the year 1767, and ſucceſſively filled the different ſtations in that line. It was ſo early as 1771 that he wrote the poem of "St Thomas's Mount," as we find by the adverſiſement to that work, and a ſhort time after "Bedukah; or, The Self-devoted, an [illegible] from [illegible] communicate [illegible] curioſity, as [illegible] him to prefer it. [illegible] which Lord [illegible] of the [illegible] Eaſt-India Company, that he accordingly entruſted Mr. Irwin with a confidential diſpatch. It would be needleſs to touch on a journey which has been given to the world by the author's own hand, and which, from its deſerved ſucceſs, is known to every one. But we may obſerve with regards his poetical capacity, that it was during this journey that he wrote his "Eaſtern Eclogues," which he publiſhed at the ſame time with his Travels, viz. in 1780. An Epiſtle to Lord Pigot came out previous thereto; and though the noble Peer did not live to partake of the tribute of public ſpirit to injured virtue, it will ſerve to record our author's principles, and his opinions on that unfortunate event. The delays and dangers of his journey were in all probability forgotten in the ſatisfaction when he received at home by an honourable [illegible]t in the interval between his arrival in England and his ſecond journey, a new [illegible]ſtor was given to Mr. Irwin's life, by his marriage in 1778 to his preſent lady, Miſs Brooke *, the daughter of a benefi[illegible]ced clergyman in the county of Longford. On his return to Europe, being reſolved to ſettle in the country where his family had ſo long reſided, he made a viſit to Ireland, and there met with the object of his affections While in this kingdom, it is ſuſpected that he indulged his poetical vein on two celebrated occaſions, viz. in an Epiſtle on the firſt Maſquerade given in Dublin, and in the Triumph of Hibernia, on the free trade granted her by England; but as theſe have not been publiſhed in London, we cannot ſpeak with any certainty concerning the matter.

[illegible]ation to the ſervice of the [illegible]pany, which took place previous to [illegible] arrival

The ſituation in which Mr. Irwin had left his affairs, by his ſudden departure from India, forbade him the life of repoſe and retirement which his matrimonial union led him to wiſh for. The urgency of his money concerns obliged him to go once more abroad, and what muſt have been a trying circumſtance both to him and his lady, the general war which then raged, added to ſome family calls, were the means of depriving them of each other's company for ſome years For greater ſecurity, and perhaps to gratify his thirſt of knowledge, Mr Irwin reſolved to return to India by land, though by another route than he had tried before It appears from the relation which he has lately given the world of that route, that he left England in Oct 1780, and was once more pitched on to be the bearer of confidential diſpatches to the Governments in India In this ſecond journey his Muſe was not ſilent among the new ſcenes which opened to her view in the Archipelago and on the banks of the Tigris, as his "Occaſional Epiſtles to Mr Hayley," publiſhed in 1783, ſufficiently teſtify We know that Mr Irwin arrived at Madras at a very important criſis, while the Carnatic was invaded and over-run by Hyder Ally, and the coaſt threatened by a French fleet, and while the public ſafety depended on the vigilance and ability of the new Governor Lord Macartney On this occaſion we may obſerve, that the approbation of the India Company, and of the public at large, have done juſtice to his Lordſhip's exertions and ſucceſs, and if the execution of an important truſt in the management and controul of all the revenues to the ſouth of Colcroon during the moſt diſtracted period of Lord Macartney's adminiſtration, have a title to ſecondary praiſe, we may boldly claim it for Mr Irwin, who fulfilled the duties of

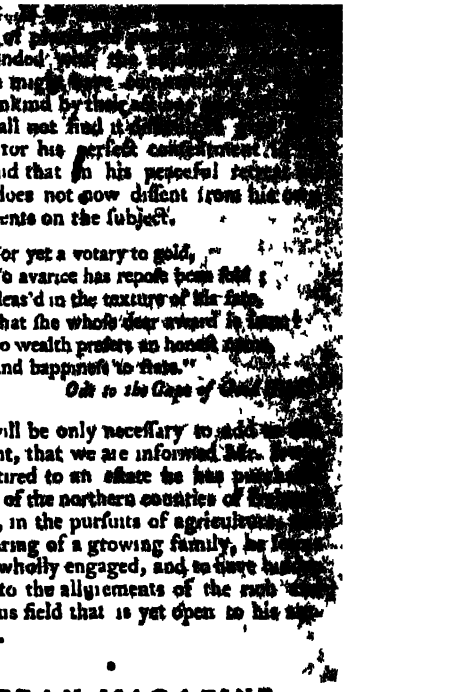

* Our readers will not be diſpleaſed at reading the following addreſs to Mrs. Irwin by her huſband, prefixed to the "Eaſtern Eclogues"

Lamp of my life! and ſummit of my praiſe!
The bright reward of all my toilſome days!
After unnumber'd ſtorms and perils brav'd,
The port in which my ſhipwreck'd hopes were ſav'd,
Who when my youth had pleaſure's round enjoy'd,
Came to my craving ſoul, and fill'd the void
To thee, whoſe feeling heart and judgment chaſte
Give thee of Fancy's luxuries to taſte,
To thee I dedicate theſe rambling lays,
And bold thy ſmiles beyond a monarch's bays!
See, on our bliſs the nuptial year decline,
And ſtill the ſun which lights it ſeems to ſhine!
Crown'd is our union with a ſmiling boy,
And thou ſtill courted, like a virgin coy.
Ye ſhades of lovers! witneſs what we feel—
To modern couples vain were the appeal!
Though human joys are ever on the wing,
Though ſmall the ſcope of life's enchanted ring;
Though time advances with a courſer's pace,
And ſtill muſt rob thee of ſome charm or grace,
No ſights ungrateful can ſalute our eyes,
Who uſe no optics but what love ſupplies!
Who bow in this betray a partial ſide,
Still each to each, the bridegroom and the bride!

a laborious and trying ſituation, to the ſatisfaction of the government and the improvement of the revenue. The country, we find, had been aſſigned by the Nabob of Arcot to his Lordſhip, for the payment of the troops and the ſervices of the war. That aſſignment being annulled by the Company on the reſtoration of peace, and Lord Macartney leaving Madras in May 1785, Mr Irwin only remained behind to cloſe the accounts of his Superintendency, and in October of the ſame year embarked for Europe, to regain that health which continual buſineſs and fatigue had impaired, and to rejoin his family, from whom he had been ſome years ſeparated. We ſhould however obſerve, that ſtate affairs had not ſo totally engroſſed his mind as to make him forget the Muſe, to which an Ode on the Death of Hyder Ally, and ſome occaſional Odes written during that period, bear witneſs. It is lucky for the biographer that the enquiries of Parliament into India matters, and a publication of great merit which an officer of reputation * has lately given to the world, enables him to ſpeak with certainty of Mr Irwin's tranſactions abroad, and with confidence of their ſucceſs, [illegible] ſports of [illegible] ſurrounded [illegible] ſtation might [illegible] of mankind by [illegible] we ſhall not find it [illegible] credit for his perfect [illegible] lot, and that in his peaceful retreat his heart does not grow diſſent from his ſentiments on the ſubject.

Ode to the Cape of [illegible]

It will be only neceſſary to add to this account, that we are informed Mr. Irwin has retired to an eſtate he has purchaſed in one of the northern counties of [illegible] where, in the purſuits of agriculture, and the rearing of a growing family, he ſeems to be wholly engaged, and to have bid adieu to the allurements of the moſt glorious field that is yet open to his ambition.

To the EDITORS of the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

AS Mr Groſe, in his Local Proverbs, and Mr Beckwith, in his Edition of Blount's Fragmenta Antiquitatis, have given an improper explanation of

" Firſt hang and draw,
" Then hear the cauſe by Lydford law,"

I beg leave through the channel of your entertaining Magazine to ſet them right, which poſſibly may afford a few minutes amuſement to ſome of your numerous readers.

LYDFORD, a place about ſeven miles from Oakhampton, in the road to Taviſtock, was formerly of ſome note, though now an obſcure village. It is famous for its Caſtle, under which there is a moſt horrid, and, I may add, infernal dungeon. This dungeon was the priſon for criminals proceeded againſt in the Stannary Courts of Taviſtock, Aſhburton, Chagford, and Plympton, it being expreſsly ordained by the charter or grant made by Edward the Firſt, that the Warden of the Stannaries in the county of Devon ſhould have full power to juſtify the tinners &c. and if any of the ſaid tinners ſhould in any thing offend whereby they ought to be impriſoned, they ſhould be arreſted by the Warden; and in the King's priſon at Lydford, and not elſewhere, be kept and detained until they were delivered according to the law and cuſtom of the realm. This charter was confirmed by Parliament in the 50th of Edward the Third, on the petition of the Commonalty to prevent ſeveral abuſes complained of by the petitioners; and amongſt the reſt, that there was not a delivery of the ſaid gaol above once in ten years. Offenders being detained in this diſmal hole, which is very ſmall and totally dark, and frequently for trifling offences, has given riſe to the proverb abovementioned; clearly intimating that it is much better to be brought immediately to trial, and to ſuffer a more ſevere puniſhment than the crime deſerves, if it be almoſt death itſelf, than to be confined in this terrible, unwholeſome priſon.

In ſupport of what I have ſaid, I ſhall quote ſome verſes from a poem, which

* See Col Fullarton's View of India.

[illegible] by Mr. Brown†, and inserted in Mr. Croft's Local Proverbs.

Most have heard of Lydford law,
How in the morn they hang and draw,
And sit in judgment after;
At first I wonder'd at it much,
But since I find the reason such,
That it deserves no laughter

They have a Castle on a hill,
I took it for an old windmill,
The vanes blown off by weather,
To be therein one night, 'tis gueft,
'Twere better to be lion'd and preft,
Or hang'd, now choose you whether

Ten men less room, within this cave,
Than five mice in a lantern have,
The keepers, they are fly ones,
If any would devise by art,
To get it up into a cart,
'Twere fit to carry lions

When I beheld it, Lord, thought I,
What justice and what clemency
With Lydford! when I saw all
I know none gladly there would stay,
But rather hang out of the way,
Than tarry for a trial

One lies there for a seam of malt,
Another for a peck of salt,
Two sureties for a noble

By this you will perceive that the proverb is applicable to those unfortunate wretches who are thrown into prison for petty offences, and by the confinement alone suffer a much greater punishment than their crime deserves

I am Yours, &c.

Lydford, besides the Dungeon, is famous for its Cataract and Bridge (of both which you have favoured the Public with a View), and for being the largest parish in Devonshire, as it includes the whole of the Forest of Dartmoor

Lydford Law is mentioned in a pamphlet of the last century, entitled, 'A Briefe Relation of the Death and Sufferings of Archbishop Laud,' Oxford, 4to p 4, in these terms "Lydford Law, by which they used to hang men first and endite them afterwards"—EDITOR

IF to have been an eminently good and useful man in his place and time, be a just claim to perpetual remembrance, the subject of the following epitaph was peculiarly entitled to this frail kind of immortality.

He was born at Bideford, of a very ancient and respectable family In his youth he experienced some very remarkable deliverances from imminent dangers, which seemed to indicate him born for the good of his fellow-creatures He fell, at one time, from a craggy precipice, of a tremendous height, without hurt; and another time an arrow struck him forcibly on the forehead, without any other consequence than leaving a mark which remained to his death

Though he carried on a very extensive foreign trade, and had many ships on the sea at once, it was remarked that he never lost one

The plague breaking out in the town, in the year 1646, the Mayor ran away, and Mr TRANCE, with amazing boldness and philanthropy, took the critical office on himself, to the great comfort of the inhabitants in their grievous duties. He visited every infected house, took care to supply the needy with food and physic, and saw the dead buried with decency

When these, by his prudent management, the town was cleared of this dreadful enemy, Mr STRANGE fell the last victim to its rage

The following Epitaph is engraved on a fair monument, beneath the bust of this excellent Man, who appears to have been the HOWARD of his day.

Sacred to the Memory of

Mr JOHN STRANGE, some time merchant of this towne, whose sweetness of disposition, affability in discourse, courteousness in carriage, uprightness in commerce, fidelity in magistracy, largeness of heart, and liberality of hand to the needy, bountifulness in hospitality, humility in the flow, equability in the ebb of outward things, and sincere love to GOD, his Gospell, and Saints, having lived belov'd and deservedly honour'd, after the pilgrimage of 56 years ended, dyed, desir'd, and not without cause much lamented, August, An Dom 1646, in his 4th and fatal mortality, whose better part returning whence it came, he left unto the world the precious odour of a good name, and the clearer example of a sweet conversation, together with his earthly tabernacle, put off, and hereby interred, 'till being return'd and raised a glorious bodie, the more glorious soule returne to take possession of it, and both be rapt up to enjoy that bliss, that knows neither tearme nor tedium

In Antistitem quendam

ESSE Lutheranum rumor te, Posthume, clamat,
Sed tuus Antistes te tamen esse negat
Tam scortatis, ait, quam si vel Episcopus esses,
Et potas dubiam pervigil usque diem:
Nec memor es Christi, nisi cum jurare libebit,
Nec scis scripturæ vel breve iota sacræ
Nempe per hæc fuevit nunquam fallentia signa
Ille vigil sanas noscere pastor oves
Quisquam igitur dubitat, rumorne an Episcopus erret,

FAME says, my friend, that you're a Methodist, and 'tis believ'd by many,
You parson cries, 'Tis false, he's fond,
Because he knows you keep a whore.
He says, he minds you every day,
You're often drunk, but never pray,
And as to Christ, you've heard his name,
Yet never view'd, but to blaspheme,
The Bible you abuse, he's seen,
And nothing of its doctrines known.
In short, you conduct through the town,
Is just a copy of his own.
Then still remains the shepherd hound,
By which to prove the sheep is sound,
And as he keeps the sheep in view,
Fame must be false, if he be true.

WHEN first a stranger to this land I came;
This land of genius, science, valour, fame;
Trembling I came where all can judge or write;
But here the Critic's candour met me, not his spite.
No noisy plaudits injur'd Nature's cause,
Your noble silence was my best applause
I am, I must be vain when you commend.
I know with tragic powers the breast to rend
In Virtue's cause,—to touch the tender heart;
The spirit high to raise,—to make the villain start,—
Moral and chaste from place to place I rove,
To serve the children and the spouse I love.
Oh! may blest Heaven on you and your's bestow
That kindness,—which to me and mine you shew
So still to Scotland grateful, humble, dear,
Shall fall the matron's, mother's, muse's tear
But——
If from my breast to your's those transports roll,
Which form the candid, high, and melting soul,
Then I the honours pay which I receive,
And leave you, leave you generous,—just,

SIR,

IN perusing a few mornings since No 75 of the European Magazine, for March 1788, published, I perceive, in your name, I discovered an error in the account therein given of the Diamond Mines in Bundelcund I am the author of that account, which I sent some time ago to the Publisher of the Asiatic Miscellany

In the Magazine account three thousand rupees are stated as the value of the stones which the Rajah appropriated to himself, but instead of three thousand, thirty thousand rupees, or three thousand pounds, should be inserted I now yield you an opportunity to correct this mistake, and you may, if you think proper, subjoin my name to the account itself.

I am, SIR,
Your most obedient servant,
GILBERT IRONSIDE.

THIS edifice, destined for the residence of his Majesty's second son, is only in part new. It formerly belonged to Sir Matthew Featherstone, and the front, including the dome, is what has been added to the building by Mr Holland, who has been also employed at Carlton house. To the style of the additions in both houses, some objections have been levelled, which seem to have more of wit than justice or truth, though we cannot but allow that something of heaviness is chargeable on the building, as it first appears to the view We are, however, inclined to believe that, circumscribed as the artist was for room, he has done every thing that the space to which he was confined would admit Elegance must sometimes be sacrificed to convenience, and splendor give way to utility.

LETTER IX.

SIR, Paris, 4 Dec 1677

I NEVER had a more unwelcome occaſion of writing to you than now, believing I can ſcarce ſend you more unacceptable news than that of the illneſſe of a perſon whom not only you and I, but all the world have ſoe juſt reaſon to eſteeme and admire On Thurſday night laſt I was ſent for to my Lady Ambaſſadrice, whom I found in a fit of ſuch violent and exquiſite torment, that (though ſhe be, as you know, a perſon of extraordinary temper, and I have ſeen her even in the courſe of this diſtemper endure very great pain with a patience that ſeemd to feele noe thing) it forced her to ſuch cries and ſhrieks as you would expect from one upon the rack, to which I believe her's was an equal torment, which extended itſelf all over the right ſide of her face and mouth When the fit came, there was, to uſe my Lady's own expreſſion of it, as it were a flaſh of fire all of a ſuddaine ſhot into all thoſe parts, and at every one of thoſe twitches, which made her ſhreeke out, her mouth was conſtantly drawn on the right ſide towards the right eare by repeated convulſive motions, which were conſtantly accompanied by her cries This was all that appeard outwards in theſe fits according to the exacteſt obſervation I could make, having had but too many oportunitys to doe it. Theſe violent fits terminated on a ſuddaine, and then my Lady ſeemd to be perfectly well, excepting only a dull pain which ordinarily remained in her teeth on that ſide, and an uneaſineſſe in that ſide of her tongue which ſhe phanſided to be ſwollen on that ſide, which yet when I looked on it, as I often did, had not the leaſt alteration in it in colour, bigneſſe, or any other way, though it were one of her great complaints that there was a ſcalding liquor in her fits ſhot into all that half of her tongue. She had uſually a preſention of the fit by a little throbing upon her gum of the lower jaw, where ſhe had this ſummer a tooth drawn, and a like throbing in the upper jaw, juſt over againſt it In all this time of her being ill ſhe has not found the leaſt pain in all the other ſide of her face or teeth, which hath ſoe wholy poſſeſſed the right ſide that it went even to the very tip of her tongue, and the laſt tooth before on that ſide. With all this torment that ſhe endured when the fit was over there was not the leaſt appearance of any alteration any where in her face, nor inflamation or ſwelling in her mouth or cheeke, nay little deſtruction of them more then what the contraction of thoſe parts in thoſe fits might cauſe Speaking was apt to put her into theſe fits; ſometimes opening her mouth to take any thing, or touching her gums, eſpecially in the places where ſhe uſed to finde thoſe throbings: preſſing that ſide of her face by lying on it were alſo apt to put her into fits. Theſe fits laſted ſometimes longer, ſometimes ſhorter, were more or leſs violent, without any regularity, and the intervals between them at the longeſt not halfe an howre, commonly much ſhorter. It being night when I was cald, I ſaw noe roome for any thing elſe to be done but to endeavour to give her preſent eaſe by topical anodyn applications to thoſe parts of her gums where the firſt beginnings of her fits appeare, which had ſoe good an effect that that night ſhe had two or three howers reſt together without any fits, beſides ſome other little intervalls of ſleepe. But the next day the fits returning, tho' not altogether ſoe frequent and violent as they had been, yet bad enough to make us feare they might, I thought it neceſſary to purge her Honour, for beſides that I ſaw not indication for bleeding My Lady had borne ſoe often and ſoe much bleeded on the like occaſion this ſommer, without any effect, that there was little to be hoped from it, and I thought it ought to be very warily made uſe of after ſoe much taken already The purge wrought ſeven or eight times, the fits continuing ſtill by intervals after her purge, for all night, as you know is uſuall, ſhe tooke a quieting cordial The firſt part of the night ſhe had the fits very ſeverely, but the latter part hath been more favourable, and till about nine or ten of the clock that I write this, there remains only an ordinary tooth acke, the violence of thoſe fits being ceaſed, but whether we are not to apprehend their returne in this extraordinary caſe I cannot be over confident, two or three days of ordinary tooth acke having preceded them I wish with all my heart you were here, both to aſſiſt my my Lady by your better ſkill, and to eaſe moſt a part of that ſollicitude I am under, having the care of a perſon of her conſideration wholy upon me; ſhe having had ſoe litle ſucceſſe with the French phyſicians here this ſummer, in the like caſe, wherein for eight days togeather their applications did her noe good, that ſhe is reſolved to trie them noe more If I durſt interpoſe my opinion in a caſe ſoe extraordinary as this, I ſhould aſke whether you did not thinke this to proceed from ſome affections in the nerves in the place where the tooth was drawn, which drawes all the reſt into conſent and convulſive motions on this ſide, and that perhaps ſome ſharpneſs in her blood may contribute to it I beg your opinion, and of whoever elſe of the ableſt of our phyſitians you ſhall think fit to conſult with, but I wiſh much more for your company, than your opinion without it I am, Sir,

Your moſt humble Servant,
JOHN LOCKE

There is ſome mixture of vapours I alſo apprehend with the other ſymptoms.

Paris, 4 Dec 77
At One in the Afternoon

YOU will certainly thinke me in great diſtraction, when after a letter and note that I ſent you already this morning, I now ſend you this third But it is to tell you, that my Lady upon a little increaſe of her paine, apprehending the violent returne of her fits, hath ſince the writing my laſt note, had a bliſtering plaſter put on to her neck * In a litle fit ſhe had ſince, the violence of the pain not being ſoe great as it uſually is, ſhe had the liberty to ſhew me her tongue, which ſhe had ſome reaſon to imagine ſwollen, all the left ſide of it being drawn up dureing the fit, and ſoe ſeemd thicker as if it were ſwollen, but as ſoon as ever the fit is over, it returnes to its natural ſtate, and there is noe diſcernable difference between the ſides of it, nor the leaſt impediment in my Lady's ſpeech, or alteration in her voice She has, eſpecially when the fits are moſt violent, a drineſſe in her lips more than ordinary † It may not perhaps be amiſſe to let you know alſo, that during all the pain and diſorder my Lady has ſuffered, her temper has been as good and her pulſe as equall, ſedate and regular, as that of any one in the beſt health, only ſometimes the violence of her paine puts her into a litle ſweat, but as ſoon as that leaves her, ſhe returns preſently to her ordinary good temper I am willing you ſhould know as much as I doe of all the circumſtances of her caſe And I ſhould be glad you knew better what would perfectly cure it, tho' I wiſh heartily it may be over before your anſwer come I am, Sir,

Mr Robert Nelson to Dr Mapletoft

London, the 1st Jan. 9½

MY dear friend's affliction has sensibly touch't me, and I heartily compassionate the severity of it: if I have not told you so sooner, 'twas out of a respectfull indulgence to so just a concern, for I think there should be some time allowed to calm our passions, even when our reason is obedient to the dispensation I can assure you I am a great sharer in your loss, not only from what I knew, but from what I expected in so valuable a neighbour —but God knows what is best for us, and a chearful submission to his will, is certainly the surest foundation of present ease and satisfaction, as well as the only method to make us eternally happy I need not go about to prove this proposition to one who has often with great advantage cleared this sacred truth, and has convinced other people of their duty in this particular, but give me leave, good Sir, to urge one thing upon you, which is the necessity of confirming your doctrine by your example We shall be apt to think there is very little force in those arguments our guides comfort us with in affliction, if we find they have not power to support their own spirits in the like sad circumstances; and 'tis no small [illegible] to the Christian religion, [illegible] us so perfect [illegible] taught—that you must [illegible] unreasonable, if we [illegible] perfect vertue from those who [illegible] honour and happiness to them. [illegible] you are the light that must [illegible] us, and the salt wherewith we [illegible] seasoned, and consequently have greater obligations to influence you than I can pretend to I must confess I [illegible] of finding you all of a piece; but [illegible] great minds are sometimes shaken, [illegible] upon my earnest desire of seeing you fast upon a rock, and if I am got beyond my sphere put it upon the score of friendship, and reckon it as an effect of that value and esteem which I have always profest for you. I thank God, after a long illness, my wife is very much recovered, and is rather better in her health than she was before, she talks of returning to Blackheath in February, but I am afraid it may be too soon; but that depends upon the weather. I have sent you this day, by my gardner, a book lately printed, which I am sure was designed by the Author to beget a Christian temper under sufferings, which most that fall under have great occasion of —I believe you would hardly have meet with it, which made me take the liberty of presenting you. The season of the year obliges me to wish you all happiness, but I can assure you 'tis the constant temper of my mind towards you, for I am with great sincerity,

Your most affectionate humble Servant,

NELSON.

NUMBER VI

Laudis amore tumes? Sunt certa piacula, quæ te Ter pure lecto poterunt recreare libello. Hor.

FEW are the situations in life which deserve to be envied, when rightly compared in every point of view with that with which we are dissatisfied

The character of a MAN OF WISDOM is esteemed by many as somewhat supernaturally excellent; and oftentimes the conceit of those who enjoy it serves to confirm the vulgar opinion.

And yet, if we impartially examine, we shall find this character attended with such a number of disagreeable peculiarities as to render it no very desirable object

In company, the mere man of letters is chagrined, if his opinion is not implicitly obeyed; and should he be an author, he is not easy till his writings are introduced as the topic of converſation, and their general and particular merit acknowledged. This ſets him to the mean taſk of angling for praiſe, by covertly introducing thoſe ſubjects of literature which he has handled in print. But the generality of perſons, even thoſe of the lower rate of talents, who profeſs the greateſt veneration for learned men, are not ſo eaſily caught, and having no intereſt in thoſe things which are neareſt to his heart, ſoon take the opportunity to drop all diſcourſe about them. The common topics of converſation-entertainment return into their natural channel, and the man of wiſdom muſt ſit ſilent, brooding over his diſappointment, or by entering into the play before him, render himſelf ridiculous, for want of having properly attended to thoſe uſeful matters of common life which men of his caſt too commonly deſpiſe.

These and many other purpoſes environ HUMAN WISDOM, and the more a man engages in familiarity with it, the more will he feel their influence, and deep, as we are aſſured, indeed, will be the wounds he will receive from them, unleſs he poſſeſſes a greater degree of prudence and fortitude than generally falls to the ſhare of any child of mortality. The multitude of cares which always preſs on his mind when engaged in writing, and the fears attendant on publication, are ſuch as the generality of perſons can have no conception of, but they are nevertheleſs ſeverely felt by me.

What led me to theſe reflections was a letter which lately fell in my way, and which, for its curioſity, I ſhall here inſert.

OLD FRIEND,

YEARS have revolved ſince I ſaw thee, but the friendſhip of our youth is not ſubmitted, at leaſt not on my part.

In thoſe pleaſant days when we ſtudied the volumes of the ancient ſages together, thou haſt often predicted that I ſhould be diſtinguiſhed in the world of literature, and be yet a burden to myſelf from not being ſufficiently attentive to the affairs of the living and buſy world. Whether thou haſt predicted right will in ſome meaſure appear from the account which I ſhall now give of myſelf and purſuits.

Called from a life of learned indolence (which was, to me, the beſt of luxuries) to the management of a paternal eſtate, I hurried from College with the avidity of a man who expects to find in a country retirement all the beauties and delightful conveniencies that can ſatisfy the wants or wiſhes of a craving heart.

Having formed to myſelf a romantic picture of my inheritance, what wonder if I found it conſiderably different from thoſe ideas I had drawn from the charming deſcriptions of rural proſpects by the Grecian and Roman bards, and which I did not conſider were ſuitable only to thoſe countries where the ſun beſtows his fervid heat all the year round.

I entered upon it, however, with delight, grounded on the determination of rendering the place every way accordant to my wiſhes. After the ceremonies therefore of condolance and congratulation from my neighbours were over, I began to ſurvey my domains, and formed various plans of improvement.—" I builded, I planted."—The gardens were laid out in a new taſte, and having baniſhed the groves of box and yew, I built temples to the ancient gods and goddeſſes, and having deified the illuſtrious dead, philoſophers and patriots of antiquity, I devoted unto them the moſt eminent of thoſe ſacred retreats. In the temple of the great Socrates I read the works of the divine Plato and the entertaining Xenophon. In that of Homer I read nothing but the productions of that bard of fire. Thus did I conſecrate, if I may ſo expreſs myſelf, the ſervice to the place, and no religious enthuſiaſt could be more ſcrupulous than I was in my devotions.

From theſe ſacred places all the writers of modern times were excluded, thoſe of the moſt eminence, however, had their names inſcribed on columns or tablets affixed to clumps of trees.

In this manner did I paſs away a year or two of my time, with no other pleaſure than the tranſient one derived from the contemplation of theſe trivial works, and from poring over the duſty volumes of antiquity.

But even this kind of pleaſure ſoon began to grow inſipid. I viewed my guides without admiration in proportion as they became familiar. My viſits to them and to the temples I had erected began to grow leſs frequent, and my devotions, like thoſe of every fiery enthuſiaſt, grew irkſome by often repetition. I ſaw the temple of Homer with leſs fervour, and that of Socrates without devotion,—and frequently read the works of the one in the ſame of the other.

At this time the Cacoethes ſcribendi began to creep upon me. I had formerly given given the public an anonymous eſſay upon a doubtful ſubject of antiquity, and which had been well received by the ſtudious in ancient learning The bookſeller being now inclined to publiſh a ſecond edition, I enlarged it with notes and prolegomena, and imagining that I had found the infallible clue to ſome great diſcoveries, I entered farther into the labyrinth of antiquity, and aided by a warm imagination, aſſerted the boldeſt paradoxes as certain truths I twiſted the writings of every ancient author I could meet with to my purpoſe, and not doubting but that the learned would inſtantly yield me the laurel with admiration, I raſhly put my name to the work For a ſhort time after the publication, I enjoyed ſomething which might be called pleaſure, and which was increaſed by my being elected, without any ſolicitation on my part, a Fellow of the Antiquarian Society

This pleaſing delirium, however, laſted not long, my literary offspring became familiar, and my new title ceaſed to charm me when I diſcovered what a number were in poſſeſſion of the ſame So far, indeed, all would have been well, had not chance in a luckleſs hour threw in my way a literary journal, in which my performance was condemned with the utmoſt rigour of criticiſm and even ridicule This was a dagger to my heart I ſhut myſelf up for ſome weeks, and then produced a bitter reply to the critics, but alas! I found they were in the full confidence of the public, and the ridicule increaſed upon me

Though I had hitherto but ſeldom engaged in company, and when I did, the air of conſtraint always accompanied me, yet now I durſt ſcarcely venture out of doors I imagined that every perſon, though a country booby who could neither write nor read, was ridiculing me in his heart I began to hate mankind for their ſuppoſed ingratitude; and keeping myſelf ſhut up from all ſocial intercourſe and amuſement, cauſed my health to fail in a ſurpriſing degree In addition to all this, my finances decreaſed, for I had neglected the ſuperintendance of my eſtate, and even ſuffered my ſervants to cheat me to my face Such is the condition in which I am now involved, though I have turned off my ſervants and taken new ones, who I have reaſon to believe are no honeſter than their predeceſſors

I never go to church, becauſe the Vicar of the pariſh once ſeemed to ſtagger me in a diſpute, and what was worſe, I heard him blaſpheme in the pulpit the ſacred names of Socrates, Plato and Seneca, by falſely charging them with actions and doctrines of the moſt criminal nature. This hath brought on me the name of Atheiſt, which in conjunction with that of Magician drives the innocent farmers, whom I would willingly entertain, from my doors

I feel myſelf a prey to diſappointment and miſanthropy, and often hear the country people ſay as they paſs me, with an emphatic application of the hand to the forehead, Poor gentleman!

At length I have reſolved to recur to paſt friendſhip, and endeavour to regain ſome of thoſe pleaſures to which I have ſo long been a ſtranger, and this hath induced me to write to thee as the friend of my former days, and as thou haſt mingled much with the buſy as well as the learned world, to intreat thy preſence for my amuſement, or, if thou art otherwiſe engaged, to ſend thy opinion and advice to

Thy miſerable friend,

AN intimacy between Dr Monſey and the late Mr Garrick was at one time much cultivated by both parties, and continued with apparent ſincerity and without abatement for a conſiderable period It had its commencement from a whimſical incident. On a crowded night at the Theatre, Dr Monſey was in the pit, and being much incommoded by the preſſure of ſome perſons upon him, he exclaimed with great vehemence, "Were I not the greateſt coward in his Majeſty's dominions, no one would dare to treat me in this manner" The acquaintance once commenced ſoon led to familiarity, which in the end broke down the barriers of good-breeding, and introduced liberties which both parties were offended at To create a laugh at the Doctor's credulity, Garrick told him, that on a night in which he performed, wiſhing to ſee a particular ſcene at Covent Garden, he left a performer called Mar to take his place on the ſtage, and returned time enough to reſume his character before it was neceſſary for his repreſentative to utter a ſyllable He alſo contrived to ſend the Doctor to enquire after a machine for ſhaving two perſons at once, which he aſſured him was to be ſeen at a houſe which he named, the owner of which was prepared to give his viſitor an unpleaſant reception As a retaliation, the Doctor ridiculed Garrick's foibles with no ſparing hand On a report that he meant to quit the ſtage, Monſey ſaid, "He will never do it as long as he knows a guinea is croſs on one ſide and pile on the other" This ſarcaſm was reported to Garrick. He reſented it, and the cordiality which had ſubſiſted between them was entirely deſtroyed An anonymous letter was ſaid to have been ſent by the Manager which contained the frequently quoted extract from Horace,

Abſentem qui rodit amicum, &c &c.

It has been obſerved, that intimate friends when converted into enemies, ſeldom fail to diſgrace themſelves by more than common acrimony in their remarks on each other, and it was ſo in the preſent caſe Sarcaſms and retorts were mutually handed from one to the other by their officious friends, and every day increaſed their enmity When Garrick fell ill, our Doctor wrote ſome ſatirical verſes on the occaſion, which he deſtroyed as ſoon as death had taken away his adverſary A few imperfect ſtanzas are remembered, but they are not of importance enough to be preſerved

Our Doctor, after he had reſided ſome years with Lord Godolphin, appears to have been providently attentive to a future and permanent proviſion for himſelf. The Lord was fond of bowling, and ſometimes in fine weather ordered his carriage to drive him and the Doctor to Cheſea. In ſome of theſe rambles the ſtate of Chelſea College became the ſubject of their converſation On theſe occaſions the Doctor ſuggeſted his wiſh to ſucceed the Phyſician of that charity when the poſt ſhould become vacant The Lord obſerved he had but little intereſt at Court He promiſed, however, to exert himſelf with his friend Henry Pelham, and when the opportunity offered he found himſelf ſucceſsful. Dr Monſey had the appointment

On the death of the Earl, Chelſea College became the conſtant reſidence of Dr. Monſey, and from this period the even tenor of his life was interrupted with little variety Some diſputes with Ranby the ſurgeon, at one time occupied his attention, and ſome abuſes in the College at other times attracted his notice His profeſſional attendance was often called for, and he engaged in compleating the claſſical education of the Marquis of Carmarthen

He

He is ſaid alſo to have written ſome papers in the World, and his medical abilities may be ſeen in the Medical Tranſactions, Vol II and Gooch's Medical and Chirurgical Obſervations. He amuſed himſelf alſo with writing ſome poetical pieces which received the approbation of his friends With purſuits like theſe he employed and amuſed life as long as the infirmities incident to old age would permit him He at laſt grew ſplenetic and moroſe to the generality, though ſtill free of acceſs to thoſe of whom he entertained a favourable opinion As he advanced in years, his eye-ſight failed him He had long conceived a contemptible opinion of funeral parade, he therefore determined to have it avoided in his own caſe, and in Nov 1782 began a letter in his own handwriting, which is ſtill in being, addreſſed to Mr Forſter, though by reaſon of infirmities he did not finiſh it until ſome time in 1784 Many of the ſentiments in this letter are repeated verbatim in another epiſtle which he afterwards dictated to the ſame gentleman, a copy of which we having been favoured with, it may be proper here to inſert at length, as highly characteriſtical of the author

DEAR SIR, Cheſea College

ACCORDING to my promiſe, you will receive with this my old withered ſkin and bones, by the help of our friend Taylor; but take this along with you, according to your own requeſt, to do what you will with them, except putting life into them again Some of my friends, and I preſume all my enemies, have, or will cry out, "This puppy does all this out of affectation, ſingularity, or to be talked of" Now once for all, I call Almighty God in the moſt ſolemn manner to witneſs, that none of theſe things have any ſhare in my intention whether they will believe or no, I neither know nor care —I am very careleſs what is ſaid about me, and if they think proper, may ſet me down for a doating old fool, pick pocket, houſe breaker, or any other opprobrious term they think fit I owe the world very little ceremony, and they me leſs perhaps, nor would I now give one guinea out of my pocket to have a ſtatue of gold in every metropolis of Europe, with the moſt fulſome eulogia that the moſt abject ſycophant could pen for the moſt deſpotic tyrant — What are all theſe things for, but to gratify the pride and ambition of vain men? A monument laſts a hundred, five hundred, a thouſand, two thouſand years, and then ( )'tis gone. Juvenal tells us, in his tenth Satire, one of the beſt pieces of morality left us by the ancients,

Quandoquidem idem ſunt ipſis quoque fata ſepulcris

And Lucan tells us, that when Alexander the Great ſearched for the tomb of Achilles, he could not find it:

Etiam periere ruinæ.

The Caliphs of Egypt thought to enſure immortality by embalming their putrid carcaſſes by wholeſome ſpices, but are deceived, but we fooliſh Doctors, and I myſelf one among the reſt, have preſcribed a morſel of their putrid fleſh as a medicine: however, I now hope we are got to the end of this nonſenſe kind of our own folly.

Princes have now taken into their heads to have their guts taken out and put into an urn, and ſent to the place of burial to notify their ſpeedy arrival after ſoon; but there is no end to theſe ſort of follies I was very early ſtruck with the vanity and nonſenſe of all funeral pomp and parade, and cannot conceive how a dead carcaſe can be made a more proper uſe of than to ſubject it to the ſurgeon's knife for the benefit of mankind, if he will be ſo good to undertake it

Some French Biſhop finding his countrymen averſe to diſſection, for there are fools in France as well as in England, ordered his body by will to be ſent to the Hotel de Dieu for publick diſſection What can happen worſe to a dead carcaſe than to rot and ſtink in a dirty churchyard, if there were room to make uſe of the terms better or worſe with any propriety in this caſe?

I come now, my dear Mr Forſter, with humble ſubmiſſion to give you ſome hints and directions what I would have you do About ſeven years ago, I went to apply to that famous and ſagacious anatomical lecturer *, and deſired him to feel my pulſe: he did, ſtared me full in the face, and ſaid, he (had) felt ten thouſand pulſes, but never felt ſuch a one before, ſaid, "You are an old fellow, and muſt have ſomething or other to knock you down. There is ſome miſchief in the heart, the pericardium, the mitral valves, or beginning of the aorta, or ſome of the arteries thereabouts are oſſified, and I ſhould be glad to ſee what"—"Sir, you do me an honour and pleaſure! I have given my body to a ſursoon for dissection, and shall be glad if you will be present at the dissection"—But, poor man! he has unkindly slipt out of the way, and left my heart and arteries to shift for themselves Soon after I saw him, I took a medicine with a little crude mercury for the benefit of my blind eyes it did them no good, but it set my pulse quite to rights, so there's an end I think of our wise theories and visions of vitiated arteries, &c for I can never believe a few grains of mercury could unossify an artery Since that, it has returned about three months ago in a different shape, without a why or a wherefore, it now beats very languidly one, and stops sometimes two with a little sort of flutter, hardly ever three, but to my surprise one night it beat strong and well thirty or forty If you can trace out this little devil in its tricks and quirks, send me word by the first convenient carriage, or bring it with you when we meet in a better place If my mind can be present, I will place it on the point of your incision knife, and direct you what to do, if I could suppose you wanted it I have been troubled with bloody urine this five or six years, without any pain in the kidneys or bladder, or at least with very little I believe my lungs, stomach, and intestines, are all sound, except there may be a skin in the inner coat of the intestinum rectum, which Cheselden hastily, and I fear injudiciously tied up for a prolapsus ani Another thing which I shall not mention here, having told you of it, you will just look at About seventy-seven years ago, I lost the bone at the end of my fore-finger by an ulcer ill treated I took off the plaister as I lay in bed, the bone stuck to the plaister, and I drew it out myself without the least degree of pain If you have a mind to look at it do. And now I think I have done with the miserable anomalies of my shattered carcase, and for your own sake I wish you had done so too Having done so very little good in my life-time, I wish what you do with me now I am dead, may be of the least service to mankind I wish my old worthy friend Mr Adair Hawkins may be present at the dissection, at his own desire, and to have any part of me as a memorandum of an old friend I would give him my brains, if I was not fully assured he does not want them; so you may give them to an alderman, a page at Court, or a shoe-black When you have done, I wish you would draw up a short account of the state you find me in, and give or send it to my most excellent friend and physician Dr Heberden And now I think I will have done, for dictating a letter is a very disagreeable thing, I think a worse than the scrawl of a blind man is to its reader And there is another reason for having done The pious and learned Doctor Butler, in his elegant sermon on the government of the tongue, enumerating the reasons why a man should be silent, gives this very good one, "that a man should be so when he has nothing to say" But I am of the true English bull-dog breed, when I lay hold of a friend, I don't know how to let go Diffusion is my talent, it is only your true geniuses who write in miniature Bellosteſ in his Hospital Surgeon, tells a story of a soldier, which I am inclined to believe is all a damned lie, who lost his eye, and had only a red caruncle at the bottom of it, cured by caustics behind the ears On the presumption of this being true, I put a couple of caustics behind the ears of the daughter of a parish clerk, 12 or 13 years old, who came to me with two gutta serenas I cured the one, but not the other If you have the book, put it in your pocket the next time you do me the favour to call here. And now I will have done, I think, so after wishing you all the blessings and comforts of a world of which you are so great an use and ornament, I am

Yours very affectionately,
M MONSEY*.

He outlived the writing this letter several years On the morning of his death, the 25th Dec 1783, being at breakfast, he said to the maid servant who waited on him, "I shall certainly lose the game," and on her asking what game, he meant, he replied, the game of 100, which he had played for very earnestly for many years, but he added, that he should now lose it, as he expected to die in a few hours He then asked for a glass of wine and bit of bread, as they might prolong his life a few hours The wine he drank, but the bread he was unable to eat, and in a short time expired

He had been married early in life, and had a daughter, who married a Mr Alexander, and is still living She has also several children

Dr Monsey had a great aversion to footmen, and latterly hardly permitted no male to approach his apartment He was shaved by his maid when he became unable to perform the operation himself, and

though

though a barber dreſſed his wig, he never was allowed to come further than the door His objection to male viſitors is reported to have gone ſo far, that he with difficulty admitted his grand-ſons, tho' his grand daughters were always received with great politeneſs

With reſpect to his religion, he was a ſtaunch ſupporter of the Unitarian doctrine, and early imbibed an unconquerable averſion to Biſhops and Eſtabliſhments, which continued to the end of his life In the firſt letter left for Mr Forſter already noticed, after mentioning the direction of the French Biſhop about diſſecting his body, he added, that it was done "like a man of ſenſe and reaſon, "and not like a Biſhop, who is, generally "ſpeaking, a ſuperſtitious bigot and hy-"pocrite Witneſs the Ath——n jargon "and impiety, and the 39 articles of the "Church of E——d, to the eternal re-"proach of their virtue and morality, if "they had any but the time is now ap-"proaching, I believe, from the account "of St John's Revelation, when all this "ſtuff and jargon will be thrown off, and "the purity and ſimplicity of the Chriſtian "religion be reſtored, of which there now "ſeems to be a very promiſing proſpect, "and God grant it may prove ſo, "though the appearance of theſe preſent "flagitious times (May 1784) a little "damps the hopes of ſo glorious a proſ-"pect" Converſing once with a gentleman who ſaid he ſometimes talked with people who believed there was no God, he replied, "And I talk with people who believe there are three."

In his political principles he was a Whig, in the moſt liberal ſenſe of the word He was influenced by very extraordinary apprehenſions concerning the funds, in which he would not for a long time truſt any of his property This circumſtance drove him to depend on private ſecurities, which often failing, he was obliged at laſt to rely on public credit He was certainly avaricious, but did occaſional acts of generoſity

As a Phyſician, he was of the old Boerhaavian ſchool, and adhered to rules which he uſed to ſay he had ſanctioned by fifty years trial, of courſe, he either knew not, or neglected the acknowledged improvements of the moderns both in theory and practice Thoſe who had the opportunity of obſerving his practice, can, however, bear witneſs to the frequency of his happy prognoſtics, his minute and accurate delineation of ſymptoms, and his undeviating attention to nature.

Our Doctor was much addicted to mechanics, and as long as his age and ſight allowed, he amuſed himſelf in executing various pieces of joiners work, both for himſelf and his friends. He was alſo particularly fond of a watch, a clock, and a time-piece which he poſſeſſed

After a pauſe, ſays the Author of a ſketch of his life, let us aſk the following queſtions Did he in general effect his purpoſe?—Does it appear that his change of ſituation advanced him on the road of happineſs?—Did his rare talents elevate him to any great or lucrative employment?—Did his learning and powers in converſation make him more feared or loved?—In a word, did they contribute to ſmooth his paſſage through life?—After conſidering theſe queſtions, the humble man may perhaps look up with thankfulneſs to Providence, for bleſſing him with content, and the ignorant and unlearned ceaſe to complain of not being initiated in thoſe dangerous arts, which ſo often tend to diminiſh the happineſs of our neighbours as well as ourſelves

He left the bulk of his fortune to his daughter for her life, and afterwards gave it, by a long and complicated entail, to her female deſcendants He mentions a young lady with the moſt laviſh encomiums on her wit, taſte and elegance, and bequeaths her an old battered ſnuff-box ſcarce worth ſixpence Another female he mentions, to whom he ſays he meant to have left a legacy, but that he diſcovered her to be a proud, conceited minx, with as many affected ſilly airs as a fooliſh woman of quality, which induced him to alter his mind He bequeaths his body for diſſection, an old velvet coat to one friend, and the buttons to another, inveighs againſt Biſhops, Deans, and Chapters, and gives annuities to two Clergymen who had reſigned their preferments on account of the Athanaſian doctrine

On the Saturday following his death, Mr Forſter read a diſcourſe at Guy's Hoſpital, in which, after vindicating his friend from the charge of affectation, vanity, or whim, in ordering his body to be diſſected, he adverted to the MORBID AFFECTIONS, which he had prepared for demonſtration, deſcribing the appearance of the thorax and the abdomen, with their viſcera in ſitu He remarked, that the quantity of interſtitial fluids was unuſually ſmall, that the viſcera univerſally exhibited an healthy appearance, that there was no adheſion of the lungs to the pleura, that the abdominal viſcera were ſound.

found, The heart he obſerved to be much larger than the ordinary ſize He demonſtrated an entire bony ring at the mitral valves of the left ventricle, an oſſeous depoſit in the ſide of the ſame ventricle, the ſemilunar valves compleately oſſified in their open ſtate, the aorta alcendens conſiderably enlarged, the aorta deſcendens loaded with innumerable depoſits of oſſeous matter during its length, even to the extremities He hinted, that the ſymptoms the Doctor experienced ſo many years back, on riſing from the horizontal poſition, might be accounted for by theſe oſſifications He mentioned, that all the cartilages between the vertebræ were abſorbed, conſequently the ſpine was an entire bone He obſerved, there were ſeveral depoſits of oſſeous matter as big as peas in various parts of the ſpine, and that there were ſeveral holes likewiſe from abſorption of the vertebræ themſelves The ſpine had a conſiderable incurvation

After the whole of the demonſtration, he ſaid, that having made his report of theſe morbid affections to Dr HEBERDEN, according to the will of Dr MONSEY, he ſhould depoſit all theſe parts with theſe ſingular appearances in the Muſeum of Mr CLINE, as that able anatomiſt would doubtleſs in his lectures be able to render them ſubſervient to the promotion of public utility

The following EPITAPH in the Character of the Doctor is the production of PETER PINDAR

HERE lie my old limbs—my vexation now ends,
For I've liv'd much too long, for myſelf and my friends
As for church yards and grounds which the parſons call HOLY,
'Tis a rank piece of prieſtcraft, and founded on folly
In ſhort, I deſpiſe them, and as for my ſoul,
Which may mount the laſt day with my bones from this HOLE,
I think that it really hath nothing to fear
From the God of mankind, whom I truly revere
What the next world may be, little troubles my pate,
If not better than this, I beſeech thee, oh! FATE,
When the bodies of millions fly up in a riot,
To let the old captain of MONSEY lie quiet.

NUMBER III

Tu, quid Ego et Populus mecum deſideret, audi. HOR

THE Man who wiſhes to emerge from the multitude, (and what inſenſate upon earth who has not ſuch a deſire?) muſt, if he be remarkably deficient, make uſe of means as remarkably extraordinary. Had I, when I began my Heteroclitical career, merely preſented you with ſober Eſſays — Quere? would my productions (however in themſelves deſerving it) have at all been diſtinguiſhed from the uſual trafh of the day? and would they not, after having, like other venerable compoſitions, had, as the Critics term it, their turn, by a kind of natural magic, been hocus pocus'd

— In vicum vendentem thus et odores,
Et Piper, et quadquid Chartis amicitur inepti

Apprehenſive therefore of this impending fate, and little caring to make an immediate excurſion to the land of oblivion, whatever I may do hereafter—eſteeming too of each and every diminutive pygmy in literature the moſt diminutive, and deter-

de ermined—if after all I muſt be a pygmy —to be at leaſt an original and viſible one, —as an effectual remedy againſt their mortifying conjectures, I have judg'd it proper—firſt, to diſſent abſolutely in toto from ſcraping in general, and laſtly, as a ſolid eternal remedy againſt the corroſive tooth of that inſatiate monſter Time, to requeſt for theſe my diſſentaneous principles, a place of durable abode in the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE. This my requeſt has generouſly been granted, and,

OBLIVION, I DEFY THEE

Well—and what now—now that you are it ſeems afraid of nothing—what now is your next ſubject? You gave us, I think, in your laſt, ſome hopes that it would be a ſerious one—Suppoſe I did do ſo—ſtill it amounts not to a promiſe, —and had it—even promiſes, you know, (or at leaſt might know, by poring over the preſent Inſtitutes of Rutherforth's Natural Law) are by no means at all times binding—much leſs, then, at a time when neceſſity was entirely out of the queſtion. To be plain with you, gentle Sir, I have for this preſent made choice of no ſubject—I do not however affirm, but that my fancy may hit upon ſomething like a ſubject towards the concluſion of my diſcourſe. For the preſent, I ſhall confine myſelf to a few ſagacious obſervations upon a few temporary topics. Does this pleaſe you?—No!—Then go unpleaſed!

And firſt, I lay it down as a fundamental propoſition, 'That in the heart of man there lurks too much of a principle known by the name of Self intereſt,' (as little ſuſpected royal David the reſult of Nathan's Parable) as our obliging Editor the corollary of my fundamental propoſition) witneſs—the typographical management of the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE. Why have we ſuch a little naſty ſcrig-ſtraggling †, eye-paining print?* Muſt we never find the roſe without its thorn? Are we always to have our hearts charmed, and our underſtandings improved at the expence of our eyes! Fie, Mr Editor, fie! 'tis beneath the dignity of a conductor of a Work like yours, to be anxious in hoarding up the additional ninety-ninth part of a farthing, where the additional ninety ninth part of a farthing would ſo vaſtly conduce to the comfort of your indolent deſirous—'Other Magazines are conducted after the ſame manner.'—True, but are other Magazines worth any perſon's peruſal? Yours has but one fault—that I have here taken the liberty to point out, and that (unleſs you are reſolved to make Hercules's of us all) you will there take the trouble of amending.

Another obſervation I muſt hazard, (which, however, I expect not but to be brangled for by the profeſſed admirers of gee gaw architecture) which is, that your Indian Views promiſe fair for being ſuperior in quantity only.—I allow, indeed, that they are not wanting frequently even in quality, but I ſuſpect them to be of, upon the whole, an improper ſpecies; and many, I dare affirm, of your leſs aſpiring Readers would be better entertained with a ſimple elegant little landſcape, or domeſtic rural view; than, with the moſt exact and ſuperb engravings of Oriental magnificence. Will not our Mother Country, think you, furniſh us with proſpects equally engaging as foreign countries? Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, Northumberland, Derbyſhire—do they not abound with the pleaſing, the curious, the tremendous?—Have you exhauſted all theſe ſources? If not—why take not from them? If you have—why not ſo her make choice of a ſource which muſt for ever continue inexhauſtible? Why not out-Hogarth Hogarth, and render your engravings, too, ſubſervient to morality?—'You ſee the aſterik—'Tis the ſign of a request, that in your next Number you will favour me, by way of note, with your objections to ſuch a plan, ſince to me it appears ſo feaſible, and at the ſame time ſo well calculated to ſupport Virtue, (who, God knows, needs at preſent full all the ſupport ſhe has) that I cannot even conceive the ſhadow of an objection.

Thus, Mr Editor, allowing my reaſoning concluſive, you ſtand of courſe conquiſted—not allowing it ſo—it remains that you prove it inconcluſive.

In the certain expectation therefore of an exculpating line or two from you in your next Magazine, (recollect, abſtruſe ſilence will but ſeem to prove the circumſtances alledged) I for the preſent bid adieu, and ſhall employ the interim between now and this day month, in preparing and ſharpening up ſome perfectly new thoughts upon ſome perfectly new ſubjects.

† I might have here written ſmall, but we have too many monoſyllables, and ſtand in need of a few additional curious compounds.

* Here apply the MOTTO above.

SIR,

Among the papers of an ancient Clergyman of this County lately deceaſed, who had in his youth been very intimately acquainted with the Wits of the times, I found the following DIALOGUE, which, from the corrections in different parts of it, ſeems to have been intended for the preſs The enquiries I have made concerning it, have not led to any diſcovery of its having appeared in print, and therefore I ſend it to the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE Of Mr. COFFEY, one of the Interlocutors, I know no more than that he was the Author of a once popular Farce called "The DEVIL TO PAY,

Barnſtaple, Mar 2, 1789 I am Your's, A J L*

A DIALOGUE between Mr POPE and Mr. COFFEY, POETS, in ST JAMES's PARK.

YOUR ſervant, Mr POPE

Mr POPE You ſervant, Sir I don't know you

Mr COFFEY I believe you, Sir But knowing me well, you'd know yourſelf better I mean, Sir, without taking the ungrateful trouble to look into yourſelf, you might ſee many of your failings in me Nature has formed us very much alike to outward appearance, and it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe our virtues, vices, paſſions, much alike

Mr POPE Pray, Sir, who are you?

Mr COFFEY Sir, my name is Coffey And as I have the honour to be like you

* To our Correſpondent's account, we ſhall add from the Biographia Dramatica, that Mr COFFEY was the Author of nine Dramatic Pieces, the chief of which were unſucceſsful He was deformed in his perſon, and once performed the part of Æſop for his own benefit in Dublin, He died the 13th of May 1745, and was buried in the pariſh of St Clement Danes The Edition of Drayton mentioned in this Dialogue, appeared firſt in folio 1748, and again in 4 vols. 8vo. 1753. Some Poems by him were alſo printed in the Grand Magazine 1760.

in other reſpects, ſo I have the pleaſure to ape you in poetry, we were born both alike, Sir Poeta naſcitur, non fit, you know, Sir

Mr POPE I know you are none fit to be called a poet

Mr COFFEY Good Sir, I thank you Now you condeſcend to level yourſelf with me by that poor quibble And, if you won't be offended, I will endeavour to give you a better opinion of me, and a worſe of yourſelf, than you uſed to have I hope you'll allow that is ſerving us both in reality

Mr POPE Sir, you make very free But the bee does not collect all his honey from the ſweeteſt flowers I am contented to hear you, Sir

Mr COFFEY Why there, now, you borrowed that very thought from a ſong of mine, but there is nothing new I am ſorry, Mr Pope, that, upon our firſt interview, I muſt complain of rude return to a civil letter I am an Author, Sir, as well as you, and for one man that has read your tranſlation of Homer, five hundred have ſeen my Devil To Pay You have a Belinda, I have a favourite Myra, you have Gnomes, Sylphs, and airy Spirits, I have Conjurors, Fairies, Devils Your begging Epiſtles are wrote in verſe (for, after all, what are they but begging Epiſtles? and mine are wrote in proſe) Now, Sir, this is the ill treatment I complain of I wrote to you to beg the honour of your name to my liſt of ſubſcribers for the excellent works of the famous Michael Drayton I ſent you a liſt of my worthy ſubſcribers names, ſuch as would have conferred more honour on you than your name could on me I wrote you a letter out of my ordinary courſe, for you know we Authors have one letter for a thouſand ſubſcribers, but I conſidered I was writing to Mr Pope, ſo I mounted on Pegaſus, and gave ſome raiſe to my common hackney My condeſcenſion was but ill rewarded You had better not have ſent any anſwer than that you did ſend It was wrote upon a ſcrap of paper, much blotted, and dawb'd with ſeveral drops of candle greaſe, not unlike a Doctor's recipe, who had been knocked up at three in the morning, and went to bed fuddled at one, and the contents of it were 'Sir, I don't know you, and I 'never ſubſcribe to perſons unkown' Had you been anſwered after the ſame manner when you printed Homer by ſubſcription, Mr Pope's gardens had not been famous for delicacy, nor would a moſt curious grotto have invited Mr. Pope to gentle ſleep and eaſy poetry.

An humble cell, inſtead of grot,
Had then been Pope's unhappy lot,
The Verge would then his garden be,
In caſe, as figure, juſt like me.

Now, Sir, do not you think you have treated me very ill?

Mr POPE Sir, your addreſs ſeems more like a challenge than an argument to convince me, as you told me at firſt you would However, to give you ſatisfaction, I will let you know why I was ſo indifferent, or, as you are pleaſed to call it, rude in my anſwer I have every day many letters from poor Poets, ſome begging relief, others only hinting their neceſſity Was I to give a trifle to every one that aſks me, I ſhould ſoon be pennyleſs: was I to ſubſcribe to every one that aſked me, what I got by ſubſcriptions, I ſhould loſe through the ſame channel. But, Mr Coffey, you are an entire ſtranger to me, beſides, you are about to print another man's works had the ſpecimen you ſent me been your own compoſition, you then had been worthy of every man's conſideration But, you know, it is in the power of every ſchool-boy to reprint any old Rum that comes to hand

Mr COFFEY What, Sir, do you undervalue Michael Drayton? Do you abuſe his works with the title of old Rum, What part of your writings ever came up to his? 'Tis true, your name is up. But was every gentleman to ſign his name to his own lines, you would be the daw in the fable

There's Swift, and Gay, and C—d,
And many more beſide,
As O—d, B—e and W——d,
Contribute to thy pride

Why this is no ſecret, and yet I will allow you to be a pretty fellow The world eſteems you I meet with reſpect upon your account I am often taken for Mr. Pope

Mr POPE You are often miſtaken. Yet I am never taken for Mr Coffey

Mr COFFEY I am ſorry for it Would to Heaven you had been on Saturday laſt! I had eſcaped a Spunging-houſe, and you would be ſenſible of the misfortunes attending a poor poet But I am determined to write againſt the Court, as you did formerly, it will encreaſe my liſt of ſubſcribers, and will gain me the protection of the ſame ſet of men that made your fortune favour first to be worthy the esteem of such great men. Pray, Sir, what have you writ to recommend you to the pub of the world? Had you stayed at home (for aught I know) your genius is in proportion to the knowledge or taste of your own country; and there you might meet with that encouragement which, I imagine, you will not find among us. I am certain you do not imagine I am jealous of your fame. Go home. My advice is disinterested, and ought to be followed.

Mr. POPE Mr Coffey, you muſt endeavour

Mr Coffey. Sir, you know very well that the knowledge of my country is equal to your own country. England is beholding to us for excellent men of all professions, the gown, the sword, the law, and the stage.

Mr Pope. Mr Coffey, I confess you are all swords-men; and Westminster-hall and the Old Bailey will certify how great a share you have in law affairs. But I scorn to throw national reflections.

Mr Coffey. I perceive you do, but when I first spoke to you, I expected and was prepared for this. But, Sir, I will not tax you with ingratitude. I will lay the whole blame on antipathy. An Englishman is naturally so unkind to an Irishman, as the air of Ireland is destructive to poisonous creatures. The English and Irish, like water and oil, have no appetite of union, no desire of incorporation. The reason is this, oil is not of the same tribe or family with water, wherefore it hath a diversity of pores, or a different disposition of atoms designed for action or passion, with its own kindred.

Mr Pope. It is also a true observation, that the vine and the colewort thrive not, being planted near together. The enmity is mutual, and I will add, that contraries operate with as much facility to destroy, as things of like nature to preserve.

Mr Coffey. I could give you some instances, not unpleasant, of the antipathy between the English and Irish, had you but leisure to listen to them.

Mr Pope. Mr Coffey, you are a greater philosopher than I took you for. Pray proceed.

Mr Coffey. The story I am going to tell you is fact. I knew both the men.—An English gentleman, Peters by name, of a good estate, and of an old Roman Catholick family, was resolved to be priested. He had a younger brother to get heirs to the estate, and he designed to settle it upon him, when at years of discretion. He set out for Spain, where he expected to see his religion flourish and where he knew its purity was supported by an holy Inquisition. His zeal, which but ill him with too much precipitation, made him forget to learn a little Spanish before he left his own country, the want of which, when he arrived in Spain, laid him under several inconveniences, however, it fortunately happened, that an Irish student belonged to the same College. The Irishman had been years in Spain, spoke Spanish well, and English well enough to be an interpreter to Mr Peters. Their mutual convenience made them very intimate. Mr Peters had a good income, and spoke no Spanish, the Irishman spoke good Spanish, and had no income. They were both good honest men, and agreed very well. Custom is second nature, and Mr Peters, when master of the Spanish language, could not throw off his Irish acquaintance, he had been used to him, they had imparted their secrets to each other, and their tempers suited. In short, they both were priested, and Mr Peters's purse was as much the Irishman's as his own. Affairs of consequence oblige our Englishman to return to London. He is unwilling at the thoughts of quitting his old companion, and he generously offers to live with him, promises to support him and provide for him in England. The Irishman acknowledges his obligations, confessing he must stay in Spain if left behind, not having wherewithal to bring him to his own country, which, by the bye, is too often the case of many of his countrymen. The poor farmers and shepherds of Ireland are all ambitious of breeding up their sons for holy lives, many of them are sent abroad to take orders, where they are mostly maintained by charity, and in many countries, as in private tutors in gentlemen's families, their poverty commands respect in a nation making such improvement as would recommend them when they get home; and indeed their ignorance, chiefly owing to their poverty, brings their religion into much contempt at home. But to proceed, our travellers arrive in England, are never parted, they live as brothers ought to live, and are remarkable for their friendship. It pleases God to afflict Mr Peters with a fit of sickness, he bears it like a good Christian, and is daily and hourly attended by his friend the Irishman, but all attempts are fruitless, there is no hope of recovery, and the poor gentleman settles his affairs, and endeavours to ease his conscience as much as possible before he leaves this world. After having unburthened himself, and received such rites as of his church as are proper in his circumstances, at last with a heavy sigh he calls his friend the Irishman he tells him, "My dearest friend, 'tis in your power to make me die with ease and satisfaction, I have but one thing that lies heavy at my heart, and if you'll pardon me I will die contented Oh! pardon, pardon me, I conjure you, as you expect pardon, when in my circumstances" The Irishman replied, "My worthy friend, I never knew you had injured me, pray let me know in what, and you shall see how heartily I can forgive you" The dying man then said, "I will confess myself the greatest hypocrite on earth, but first, to do you justice, I must own you have good qualities sufficient to deserve the friendship of any man of any nation, and now accept of my sincere confession, which I hope will entitle me to pardon both from Heaven and you Though you have studied to oblige me, though you have been serviceable to me, and though, in appearance, I have been grateful in my returns of friendship, yet I confess, of all mankind I hated you most, even your services were injurious, and when I seemed most kind I almost wished you at the devil At first my ignorance in the Spanish tongue obliged me to make use of you, and I could not be absent from you for the same reason, custom is so prevalent, that afterwards I chose rather to be an hypocrite than to struggle and be uneasy in getting the better of that custom I have endeavoured to vindicate you by true reasons to my mind, but such unaccountable hatred was not to be overcome by reason. You are an Irishman, and I had sucked in an insurmountable prejudice with my nurse's milk, or, I will rather believe, a national antipathy, which was constantly augmented by jests and stories which I every day learned to the disadvantage of your kingdom in general Thus have I continued in sin for some years, flattering myself I only waited some opportunity of shewing my hatred to your whole nation by using you extraordinarily ill It has pleased God to give me grace to declare my true sentiments, though not with that sincere contrition I heartily wish for, even now when I confess my crime And I am truly sensible, it is a crime to aspersе a nation in general for a few men's faults I cannot get the better of the prejudice of education, and I expect mercy more from your forgiveness and my true confession, than from a sincere repentance, hoping in God Almighty, that national natural antipathies are not to be accounted for by us poor mortals. Now, brother and old companion, shew what mercy you expect by forgiving me." The Irish Priest, without confusion, in like him thus replys: "And is this the great offence you are guilty of? Die in peace, dear brother, I forgive you, heartily forgive you; and I will endeavour to ease your mind by as sincere a confession as you have made to me My necessity was so great that nothing could exceed it but my obligations to you And Heaven forbid, that natural national antipathy (as you call it) should be accounted sinful, for then I have more to answer for than you have; for even my obligations could not make me grateful When I have reflected on the ill usage our country in general receives from yours, I have been inclined to think you were but the instrument of God in relieving my necessities, and that no more thanks were due to you, than were due to the ravens that supported Elisha in his great distress; so that if your hatred be hereditary, be national, be natural or unnatural, our hatred is the same, with this difference only, that all Irishmen are used ill in England, and that Englishmen in general are used too well in Ireland. In time, I hope, we shall get the better of that bad custom, for I am apt to believe, it is more owing to our polite education, and natural great hospitality, than to any regard we have for you, or any abatement in our national antipathy So, dearest brother, dear my dear brother!" and the Englishman gave up the ghost —Now, Sir, what think you of national antipathy? We ourselves are strong instances of it, for though so like in person and profession, yet I think we heartily hate each other It is not my good fame can make you envious, so you have no reason but antipathy And tho' I have pretensions to be envious, I protest sincerely that is not my reason

Mr POPE Mr Crefty, I am acquainted with many worthy Irish gentlemen, and yet will confess, that the esteem I have for them, scarce lessens my ill opinion of the country in general I distinguish philosophically Some aspersе the whole nation for particular men's faults I esteem particular men, without regarding the whole nation And this I must observe, that the men of that country that honour me with their friendship, have all been educated in England How far the English air, with help of education, has blunted blunted their natural antipathy, I will not at present account for, but I think I can answer for our reciprocal affections.

Mr Coffey. Sir, your way of distinguishing philosophically, puts me in mind of an Irishman, who with eighteen Englishmen was going to the gallows. He told them, he prized so many worthy gentlemen, who were to suffer on the same tree with him, and had honoured him with their friendship, "but now that you are obliged to go, I wish with all my soul this sport was to continue daily for fifteen years." Eighteen Englishmen for one Irishman would be glorious indeed! I believe you do not doubt of the reciprocal affections of the nine and one; not of my countryman's hatred to your kingdom in general. Besides, his education was English.

Mr Pope. But education teaches us to distinguish justly, and when I am convinced that all good qualities centre in a person, it is positiveness, madness, in short, I cannot give a name bad enough for persisting in an ill opinion of that person.

Mr Coffey.

He that is convinced against his will,
Is of his own opinion still.

And was an Angel from Heaven to descend at Charing Cross, to tell the English, that Ireland was once the island of Saints, that the Irish still are Christian people, that we think and act like other men, that vices are no more countenanced nor hereditary in that kingdom than here, they would stop the Angel in the middle of his discourse, and tell him he was a damned lying Spirit.

Mr Pope. But, Mr Coffey, you make your Angel descend in the worst part of the town; he makes his harangue to hackney-coachmen, chairmen, and the mob, place him in White's Chocolate-house, if you please, Sir, and then—

Mr Coffey. Angels have admission every where, though I believe as little welcome at White's as any where. But let White's be the place. I hope your education will have some effect, there good manners will prevent interruption, but in a little time the Angel might preach by himself, for it is now fashionable good manners to depart without taking leave; besides, gentlemen too well know the consequence of scandalous reflections, and I cannot recollect cowardice to be among the number of vices ascribed to our country.

Mr. Pope. You are a great advocate for your country, what pity it is that your ability and inclinations are so ill suited! I do not question, but if you had Irish Kings as formerly, one to every province, you would be Secretary of State, or one of the Privy Council at least.

Mr Coffey. I always thought Mr Pope dealt more in the sublime than sincere. But to answer you honestly, our kingdom is exceedingly well pleased with our King, we are good and faithful subjects, we discountenance libelling Court or Minister, and it is equal to us whether our King was born in Germany or in England, we like him well, and hope to deserve his favour. But I wonder Mr Pope forgets to ask after our wild Irish, it is commonly second part to our vices.

Mr Pope. No, Mr Coffey, I am too much ashamed of the ignorance of many of my countrymen, who are imposed upon by such idle stories.

Mr Coffey. Well, you may be ashamed, for even bears in inland villages have been taken for wild Irishmen. But a lobster that was sent a present into the country, happening to crawl out of the basket, gave a holy day to a whole parish, and the judicious consultation ended in being positive it was either a spread eagle, or a wild Irishman.

Mr Pope. Mr. Coffey, you are very merry. And pray let this small present assure you I will be glad to see you another time. I am positive neither you nor I believe there is any antipathy between our countries, though we have now jested about it. Prejudice of education has too much weight: but that prejudice, like the notion of wild Irish, will soon be overcome. Let these five guineas make an atonement for my not subscribing to your works, and let the book, when it comes out, be your receipt. Farewell, Sir, no apology, I thank you for your good company.

ANECDOTE of Mr CONGREVE and Mr ROWE,

NEVER BEFORE PRINTED.

Mr Congreve happening to have some snuff which Mr Rowe the poet took a fancy to, he left his box several times to be replenished. At length Mr Congreve thinking him too importunate, gave him a genteel reproof, by writing with a pencil, on the lid of the box, the two Greek letters Φ Ι Ρ. This being told to Dennis, he declared he was sure the man who was capable of making so vile a pun would not scruple to pick pockets.

Hogarth from this story probably took the hint of his Lis Beta Pye.

THE LONDON REVIEW AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

For MARCH, 1789.

Quid ſit turpe, quid utile, quid dulce, quid non.

OF the various branches of literature, none is ſuperior in entertainment or uſefulneſs to Biography. The faithful delineation of the lives and characters of thoſe perſonages who have eminently diſtinguiſhed themſelves on the great ſtage of the world, never fails to intereſt the paſſions of the reader. We think with the philoſopher, feel with the poet; fight with the hero, rule with the prince; and weep with the unfortunate.

The ſubject of the preſent Memoirs ſhone for a great number of years in ſo many different lights of eminence, and his reign was ſo long and active, as to render his hiſtory intereſting to perſons of almoſt every country and deſcription.

As a man, he was truly ſui generis; as a ſovereign and hero, famous for greater actions than any ſince the days of Alexander, as a writer, if not deep, yet brilliant and entertaining. In ſhort, ſo peculiar was the character of Frederick the Third, that we took up the preſent Memoirs of him with avidity; and, in two words, proceeded in the peruſal with pleaſure, and finiſhed it with ſatisfaction.

Dr Towers, if he is not equal to a Hume, a Robertſon, or a Gibbon, in thoſe qualifications which are requiſite to form the character of what is called an elegant hiſtorian, is yet equal to either, or all of them, in a qualification of much greater value—impartiality. He gives a plain account of every material circumſtance, from the beſt authorities, and ſo connects the chain of narration that it is no where tireſome. He ſeldom remarks on circumſtances; but where he does, it is with the utmoſt propriety of judgment and modeſty. As Frederick ſtudied to be the grand Mecenas of his time, and accordingly kept a number of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons of the age, both learned and others, in his ſervice, Dr. Towers enlivens his work with well-written memoirs of the moſt eminent of them, thrown into notes in their proper places.

As a ſpecimen of the Doctor's manner of writing, we ſhall lay before our readers his character of this wonder of human kind.

"Frederick the Third, King of Pruſſia, was in his perſon below the middle ſtature; but his limbs were well formed, and he had a healthful and vigorous conſtitution. The portraits of him at different periods of his life, exhibit a conſiderable diverſity of appearance. In his earlier years he ſeems to have poſſeſſed an handſome countenance and a graceful figure; but he was afterwards much altered by the perpetual fatigues that he underwent. In the latter part of his life he ſtooped conſiderably in the ſhoulders; and his head was almoſt conſtantly inclined on one ſide. He was ſhort-ſighted; but he had fine blue eyes, full of vivacity and fire, and his look was expreſſive of uncommon keenneſs and penetration. His tone of voice was extremely clear and agreeable, and he ſpoke ſeveral of the modern languages with eaſe and correctneſs. He talked much and with great ſprightlineſs, and excelled at repartee. In converſation, his features acquired a degree of animation which no portraits could exhibit; and though not generally fond of the company of women, he yet diſplayed great vivacity in converſing with ſuch ladies as were poſſeſſed of any ſuperior merit. His intellectual powers were great, and when we advert to his ſituation, and to the little care that had been taken of his education, it muſt be acknowledged that his literary acquiſitions were conſiderable. He had much general knowledge of the ſciences, and was extremely conversant with French writers in polite literature: but he is said to have been very imperfectly acquainted with the Latin language, and he acquired his knowledge of the great authors of antiquity, both Greek and Roman, chiefly through the medium of French translations. He was partial to the literature of France, but in the latter years of his life this partiality was much abated. His memory was uncommonly retentive; and he recollected the faces of those soldiers who had served in his own regiment when Prince, more than forty years after. In his convivial hours among his favourites, he was cheerful, facetious, witty, and sarcastic. But his pleasantries on those who were admitted to his familiarity were often too biting, though he sometimes met with very smart retorts, and which he generally received with good-humour.

"His conduct and character were very various, and in different lights appeared in a very different light. His predominant passion was the love of glory, and this often led him to those actions which would extend his fame, rather than to those which were dictated by virtue. He may truly be said to have been covetous of fame, for he wished to unite in his own person the reputation of a great king, a wise legislator, an illustrious hero, an accomplished general, a fine poet, and an enlightened philosopher. But though he loved fame more than virtue, and was more solicitous to extend his reputation, and to enlarge his dominions and his power, than to regulate his conduct by the principles of justice and humanity, he wished, notwithstanding, for the praise of virtue, even when his actions were in direct opposition to its clearest dictates. He confesses that his conduct was often variable and inconsistent, and that the same man sometimes appeared an unfeeling tyrant, and at other times mild, gentle, and humane.

"One great object of his aim appears always to have been the aggrandisement of his dominions, and in this he would probably have succeeded much more than he did, as his conduct, at the beginning of his reign, had not so strongly excited the jealousy and apprehension of his neighbours, and produced so formidable a confederacy against him. There is reason to believe that he had formed a great scheme, which the number of his enemies prevented him from being able to put in execution. Had France and Russia not united against him, he might, perhaps, have totally crushed the House of Austria, and overturned the whole Germanic system.

"Active, enterprising, indefatigable, and intrepid, he kept his neighbours in continual alarm, and their apprehensions of him were the greater, because he scrupled scarcely to employ any means that would effectuate his purposes. In the conduct of his affairs, he displayed the most unremitting vigilance, the most unwearied industry, and the keenest sagacity in seizing those decisive moments, which were the most favourable to the promotion of his views. At periods, and in situations, of uncommon difficulty, and uncommon danger, he displayed the highest degree of courage, astonishing presence of mind, and the greatest magnanimity. No danger, no difficulties, no fatigues could deter him from the prosecution of those schemes, to which he was prompted by his ambition, and his love of fame. In attention to his army, to his government, and to the general concerns of his kingdom, he was probably the most indefatigable prince that ever existed. Every department of government was under his own immediate inspection, and the most minute particulars of internal domestic policy did not escape his observation. And, notwithstanding the many faults in his character, there is the utmost reason to believe, that no prince then in the world employed so much time and attention as Frederick did for the last twenty years of his life, in promoting the happiness of his subjects, and the general prosperity of his dominions, so far as was consistent with his mode of government, and with the maintenance of his own power and authority.

"As he was born heir to a despotic monarchy, and trained up from his infancy in military ideas, these circumstances ought to be taken into consideration in judging of his character. But with the taste for literature, and the distinguished talents that he possessed, he would probably have been a better man and a better king, if he had not so early imbibed the pernicious scepticism of Voltaire.* Though he wrote against Machiavel in his youth, he yet appears to have adopted much Machiavelian policy, and,

* But, with all due deference to Dr Towers, we cannot help observing, that it is more than probable, Frederick was a thorough Deist before his acquaintance with Voltaire, or his writings. REV.

and, on many occasions, his conduct appeared to be more characterized by craft and subtility, than by generosity, or true dignity of mind. The case of Baron Trenck, his treatment of the inhabitants of Saxony, and other instances, also afford evidence of too convincing a nature, that he could occasionally be guilty of great cruelty.

"His talents as a general, were of the very highest order. In this character, he was eminently distinguished by the rapidity of his marches, his skill in the art of encampment, and the dexterity of his manœuvres, by the fertility of his expedients, and his extensive knowledge of military science, and by the promptitude with which he availed himself, even in the heat of action, of every circumstance that could be turned to his advantage. He was sometimes chargeable with rashness, but it was in those cases, in which he had some important object in view, for the promotion of his general designs, and, in such cases, he sacrificed the lives of his men with a readiness that reflected no honour on his character.

"Though naturally and generally passionate, he was occasionally magnificent and liberal. He was also kind to his domestics, if they properly discharged the duties of their stations, and manifested a great attachment to some of his generals, and others, whom he favoured with his friendship. His love of music accompanied him through life, and except at those times when the circumstances of war, or other affairs of importance, rendered it impracticable, he attended his concerts with almost as much uniformity and exactness, as his military reviews. His ablest musical performers were with him in the camp, and in his most active and busy campaigns, he always devoted some time to musical performances, and to the pursuits of literature. With all his faults, he was undoubtedly a great king, possessed of very splendid qualities; and indeed one of the most distinguished and extraordinary princes, of whom the records of history have preserved to us any memorial."

Such is the character the immortal Frederick has left behind him — and upon it may we not drop the tear of compassion for human nature, and heave the sigh of pity even for kings? For what is the whole volume of ancient and modern history but a continued display of weakness and vanity, written in characters of blood, and, like the prophet's roll, filled with woe throughout? — He that can read the sanguinary page without feeling for the miseries of his fellow-creatures, continually violated by the great ravagers of the earth, and their murderers of mankind, must have a very callous heart indeed! We would wish, on the contrary, to see all those actions described by the historian in such a manner as to rouse the sovereigns and subjects of different nations into a thorough detestation of human blood, and a love for the arts of humanity and peace.

In fine, we recommend the present Memoirs of Frederick the Third, as being impartial, interesting, and entertaining.

Considerations upon Wit and Morals. Translated from the French. 8vo. 6s. boards. Robinson.

PERHAPS no species of literary composition has been carried to a higher degree of excellence, or cultivated with more brilliant success, than that which has for its object, a nice discrimination of the various shades and colourings of the human character, as touched by the hand of nature, and influenced by the state of society. Ingenious writers, possessed of leisure to view and contemplate the varying picture of life and manners, observe that every age presents a different scene, and the natural love of novelty, together with the acuteness of observation which is flatteringly implied in a capacity to detect the causes and effects of human action, are sufficient reasons why superior men in every age and country have employed their talents upon this subject. Among the English, Addison, Steele, and Swift, have been greatly conspicuous, but among the French, La Rochefoucault, La Bruyere, Duclos, and Brancis, have shone with unrivalled lustre, and the Author of the present work is no mean constellation in the literary hemisphere. In describing the method in which he has chosen to write, he observes with great truth, that literary productions are too voluminous, and that Authors, by an over fondness for definition and arrangement, so elaborately unite the several parts of their works, that the cement, in general, fills up more space than the stones which compose the edifice. But we shall describe the nature of his design in his own words.

"Detached thoughts, when they are well expressed, produce a greater effect, and are more easily retained than if they were confounded with the whole matter of a chapter They awaken the attention of the reader, and spare both him and the author an useless multitude of words

"I have been copious or concise, and have written a chapter, given maxims, or delineated characters, according as matter occurred, or as by one means or the other I could more clearly express my thoughts

"In the characters I have traced I had no person in view, and I have carefully avoided drawing portraits A character relates to a quality, vice or defect, which is meant to be described, a portrait assembles all the qualities, vices and defects of a person, their opposites and extent, with all the elements of which that person is constituted. A faithful portrait belongs to a person only, because there are not two persons in the world who have the same physiognomy and stature, whose qualities are in every degree similar, nor between whom they are equally divided La Bruyere was less timid he introduced into his characters notorious particulars of conduct, and thereby could not fail of indicating the persons He went still further, he spoke of the great events of the times, and of the most distinguished personages, without covering his recitals with the thinnest veil"

The Author opens his ingenious, entertaining, and instructive miscellany, by observations ON WIT, and as a definition of this subtle quality seems to have puzzled most writers on the subject, the curious will perhaps be gratified by an extract from this preliminary part of the work

"The vague word Wit is the source of an infinity of errors If, after the manner of the English, a less general expression were used, ideas would be more clear and precise The English try a man by his Parts The union of well proportioned features, joined to colouring, produces beauty, but a figure may be pleasing by presenting some agreeable lineaments A woman, without being handsome, may have some beautiful features

"This may be understood of Wit An invention of terms would be necessary to describe its different parts, This word, as well as that of LOVING, has not a sufficiency of distinctive gradations.

"A celebrated author pretends that the difference of Wit and Parts is produced by education alone Such a system is scarcely worth refutation, its falseness may be demonstrated without going into the obscurity of metaphysics Facts and the slightest reflection are sufficient to prove that the man of genius owes every thing to nature Were it otherwise, all the students in an academy, of painting or sculture, would become Raphaels and Bouchardons

"The insufficiency of study and practice is apparent in the trifling progress made by a constant application to the games of chess and commerce, or to any other game which requires combination The degree of perfection, at which all are capable, is very soon attained, and beyond this neither attention, avidity, or self love, although daily excited, can possibly carry us

"I will endeavour to define Wit, that I may fix my ideas and in some measure understand myself

"It appears to me, that Wit may be called the knowledge of causes, relations and effects Profound Wit goes back to causes, that which is extended embraces relations and affinities, and refined Wit consists in immediate judging effects The last kind is a special gift of discernment, it seems to belong particularly to women, for which reason it perhaps is, that the Germans attribute to them something prophetical, or relative to divination

"Locke's definition of Wit is undoubtedly superior to mine "Wit," says he, "consists in distinguishing resemblances in objects, which differ from each other, and judgment in distinguishing in what objects which resemble each other are different This distinction throws much light upon the nature of Wit, and upon that part of it called judgment, which is thereby well defined and established But a more simple notion must be reverted to Wit is the aptitude of thought, and thought itself I very thing intellectual and physical is confined to two operations; conception and production The man who thinks most, and is most inclined to thinking, possesses to the highest degree the gift of Wit How many authors, rigorously examined according to this rule, would lose their reputation There is more thought in single pages of Montaigne, de la Bruyere, and Montesquieu, than in a whole poem

"If several works were analized, leaving apart manner and colouring, and the attention were to be confined to what is profound and extends the sphere of the reader's intelligence, we should be astonished at the mediocrity of the result

"Wit has been compared to the sight, by which the most just idea and the liveliest image is given of it All its operations may be affiliated to those of the eye,

eye, which seems to be the material soul of the body The properties of Wit and sight are the perception of objects, the distinction of their forms and difference, the judgment of the distance, and seeing clearly far and quickly These relations have been found so just, that without reasoning upon their causes, the same expressions are used to determine the qualities of Wit and those of sight sagacity, clearness, perspicuity, penetration, futility obtuse, obscure, are words applied to one and the other Eyes accustomed to certain objects discover in them shades which escape a more penetrating eye, not being in the same habitude In this manner, the eye of a connoisseur in painting soon distinguishes a copy from an original, the man of letters, the man of wit, instantly discovers in a work all that relates to the style and genius of a great writer In the simple statement of a proposition, he quickly discovers distant consequences, in a principle seemingly unconnected, many applications, in a simple idea, something sublime, and in a brilliant thought, falsehood and affectation

"If Wit be nothing but thought, if it consists in perceiving clearly, its degrees of elevation must be assigned the distance of objects measured, the obscurity with which they are surrounded, and their complication determined before its qualities can be appreciated, and he who shall have penetrated the greatest obscurity, or clearly seen objects at the greatest distance, will be the man of superior Wit

"Who, according to this principle, can refuse to Newton, and the Chancellor Bacon who had discovered what Newton demonstrated, the first rank among men of superior understanding? The discovery of the laws of nature certainly required the greatest extent of genius, and manifested the most sublime conceptions. The knowledge of man, the springs by which he acts, the means of directing him, and of subjecting his inclinations, ought to place the philosopher and the legislator immediately after These are the Newtons of the moral world In the same class will be found the historian, who assigns the causes of the revolutions of empires, the vices of their constitution, and who traces, in the ruins of antiquity, the progress of human intelligence Poets form a class apart some have talents only, others harmony joined to philosophy, sentiment and thought Rousseau frequently devoid of thought and philosophy, Rousseau remarkable for nothing but harmony of style, and who seldom speaks to the heart, may be considered as a musician

"In following the same principle, and on examining the extent of the faculty of thinking, thoughts will be distinguished as they are profound or enlightening. The result will prove, that there is much difference in the merit to be attributed to moral or philosophical works It seems, however, that once ranged in a class, as upon the shelf of a library, one author is, to the generality of observers, equal to another By frequently hearing Montaigne, La Bruyere, La Rochefoucault, and Duclos quoted together, we might be led to believe that their wit was upon a level However ingenious Duclos may be in his definitions, or of whatever sagacity he may give proofs in the discovery of certain gradations, he is very unequal to Montaigne and La Bruyere Duclos sees clearly, but not at a distance He knows men, but they are those of Paris, of a certain circle, in the moment when he writes He has frequently described a fugitive being The horizon of his ideas is circumscribed In another age or country Duclos's men will be unknown. This author will be like those painters whose pictures are sought after for no other reason than because they shew the modes and fashions of the age in which they are produced He was, however, quoted twenty years ago with Montesquieu, Buffon, and Jean Jacques Rousseau The reason of his success is easily found. His kind of Wit, which was precision, justness, and sagacity, to a certain elevation of ideas, gave him great advantage in conversation It was of Duclos of whom it was first said, That he had his wit in ready money He seized with promptitude the objects most within the reach of the society of his time, and which were most interesting to it This must have produced the greatest effect The moment he wished to elevate himself he shewed the bounds of his talents The painter of a few portraits fell beneath mediocrity when he attempted to paint history Duclos described manners, ridicule, vices, and the false virtues of those with whom he lived, but he had never lived with Louis XI

"Wit is seldom discovered in the conversation of men of genius or great talents. As soon as they are out of their sphere, they appear not superior to others, and there is some difficulty in reconciling the contradiction between their works and their conversation Men of eloquence must more particularly feel this disadvantage.

A great theatre is neceſſary to animate them and call forth their talents Wit is proportioned to the ſubject and circumſtances, but talents require to be entirely developed Without an eſtabliſhed reputation, it is with difficulty a man can give attention when he reaſons upon a ſubject Nothing but a ſucceſſion of brilliant thoughts has a great effect in converſation Subtilties vaniſh, they are loſt in the circle when the auditors are not previouſly prepared by the reputation of the ſpeaker The eloquent man muſt be exceſſively—rouſed the man of wit is always maſter of himſelf, his expreſſions fall every where with equal force, and, without being dazzling, illumine every object to which they are directed thoſe of a man of eloquence or talents are a torrent which overflows one part only, like the poet, he alſo muſt be in the humour The man of wit always knows the meaſures he is to purſue, he combines, judges and expreſſes himſelf with truth, elegance, and agreeableneſs the eloquent man is ſometimes carried away by the impulſe of ſudden inſpiration, and frequently has no idea of the great effects he is going to produce

THE lively energy of the female mind ſpeaks through every page of this light yet entertaining work, and diſcovers that the fair and noble Authoreſs is poſſeſſed of an enviable ſhare of animal ſpirits and mental vivacity, but it is greatly deſtitute of that vividus animi which alone inſpires the boſom of real genius The motive indeed of this "long and extraordinary journey," ſeems to have been a deſire to let the world ſee "where the real Lady Craven has been," and not for the purpoſe of philoſophiſing on the various objects of her route her Ladyſhip therefore has confined her obſervations to the ſuperficial appearances of things, and her deſcriptions to the momentary impreſſions which ſurrounding objects made at the inſtant on her mind; and if theſe Letters are conſidered merely as the converſation of an agreeable and prattling female, they will meet with admiration But let the work ſpeak for itſelf

"From Piſa Lady Craven proceeds to Venice, and gives no very favourable account of the conſtancy of the Venetian ladies, or of the jealous fondneſs of their huſbands

"Venice ſeems to me to be a new world, retired and different from any other I have ſeen.—The Venetian ladies are ſome of them very handſome, and a few of them are moſt remarkably determined in their reſolutions —It is not an uncommon thing here for a lady, married in the morning, to declare to her parents before night that ſhe has taken an averſion to her huſband—who, upon ſuch an occaſion, is forced with the parents to apply to the great maſter of the church (the Pope) who is always good enough to admit of the reaſons given him, as ſufficient to grant a divorce —The lady, once out of her convent, bears the name of her own family in the world—and the gentleman looks out for another wife

"Nothing is more frequent here than to ſee a Venetian lady quit her palace, for months together, to live in a villa, of which the huſband perhaps does not even know the ſituation —I could divert you extremely with ſome Venetian anecdotes, but I have no leiſure to make this letter much longer, for between my Venetian acquaintance and the Ambaſſadors I have ſcarcely time to breathe

We ſhall contraſt this account with that which is given of the Turkiſh women

"As to women, as many, if not more than men, are to be ſeen in the ſtreets—but they look like walking mummies —A large looſe robe of dark green cloth covers them from the neck to the ground, over that a large piece of muſlin, which wraps the ſhoulders and the arms, another when goes over the head and eyes, judge, Sir, if all theſe coverings do not confound all ſhape or in ſo much, that men or women, princeſſes and ſlaves, may be concealed under them I think I never ſaw a country where women may enjoy ſo much liberty, and free from all reproach, as in Turkey —A Turkiſh huſband that ſees a pair of ſlippers at the door of his harem muſt not enter, his reſpect for the ſex prevents him from intruding when a ſtranger is there upon a viſit, how eaſy then is it for men to viſit in paſs for women —If I was to walk about the ſtreets here I would certainly wear the ſame dreſs, for the Turkiſh women call others names, when they meet them with their faces uncovered —

When

When I go out I have the Ambaſſador's ſedan chair, which is like mine in London, only gilt and varniſhed like a French coach, and ſix Turks carry it, as they fancy it impoſſible that two or four men can carry one. Two Janiſſaries walk before with high fur caps on—The Ambaſſadors here have all Janiſſaries as guards allowed them by the Porte.—Think Heaven, I have but a little way to go in this pomp, and fearing every moment the Turks ſhould fling me down they are ſo awkward, for the platform where people land and embark from and to Pera, is not far from this houſe."

At Vienna her Ladyſhip was honoured by a private audience with the Emperor.

We ſhall conclude our preſent extracts from this Work with her Ladyſhip's deſcription of the celebrated GROTTO OF ANTIPAROS.

"Mr. de Choiſeul's artiſts were to take aſtronomical and geometrical obſervations of this famous grotto, and I had promiſed to deſcend into it with them. An aſs led by two Greeks was waiting on the ſhore for me, as the heat was exceſſive, and my companions were afraid I ſhould be too much fatigued if I had walked.—Indeed it was a league diſtant from the ſhore, and we deſcended conſtantly. Turning ſuddenly to the left, we deſcended a hill, and a ſcene truly romantic offered itſelf. A vaulted ſemicircle formed by craggy rock, ſome bearing the appearance of pillars, which ſeemed to ſupport the pendent roof, and caverns which afforded a refreſhing ſhade to different flocks of goats which the Greek ſhepherds had driven in, and were paſſing by, was an object worthy the pencil of my companions.

"Here we reſted, and a ſmall hole on the ground was pointed to me as the entrance of the grotto. I was obliged to crawl in, a ſtrong cord was faſtened to the outſide, and ſeveral ſailors and Greeks preceded as with flambeaux. It required a good deal of courage and dexterity to proceed. Sometimes I ſat, and ſlid down ſmall points of rock, which were the only ſupport for hands or feet—in two places the deſcent was perpendicular——there rope-ladders were faſtened, and in one or two places, through holes on the left, we could look down perpendicularly into the grotto—where I arrived ſafely, deſiring company to be aſſiſted, for I thought myſelf in greater ſafety in truſting to my own hands and feet, than to the aſſiſtance of others, who had enough to do in preſerving themſelves from ſlipping.

"Tournefort ſays the grotto is three hundred fathoms perpendicular from the entrance, it is three hundred feet only; but as there are ſeveral windings in the paſſage, in times when mathematical calculations were in leſs perfection than at preſent, the miſtake was an eaſy one.—The feeble deſcription my pen may trace of this famous grotto I muſt defer at preſent, I yet remember with pleaſure its gloomy freſhneſs, and the ſweet ſpring of left water we found in one corner of it, that made us reliſh our cold collation with much pleaſure. My patient contemplation of objects, which the ſilent and cold hands of time only can produce, was very favourable to the artiſt who was taking a drawing of the interior of the grotto, intended for Mr. de Choiſeul's ſecond volume of his publication du Voyage Pittoreſque de la Grece, where I am to be ſeated at the foot of what they call le Grand Lit! —— Would, my dear and honoured friend, you had been ſitting by my ſide, for I fear no pen or pencil can do juſtice to the immenſity of objects I ſaw, nor the beauty of them.

"The water, which diſtils drop by drop conſtantly from the top of the grotto, hardens, and by degrees the firſt drop acquires a conſiderable like a brittle and thin ſhell, the next extends round the firſt, ſo that upon breaking off and examining the pendent point, at the end of which there was conſtantly a drop of clear water, it reſembles many glaſs quills that are made to go within each other—the laſt forming a much ſmaller circle than that it ſeemed to precede it.—Theſe are of a beautiful colour like alabaſter. The clears and pillars which all from me ſtood upwards, ſome of them being taller than the tall Frenchman, are of a different colour to thoſe which hang round, a greeniſh brown, ſo ſeemingly more hard than the hanging ſtone—but evidently cruſted by the dropping of the water, which muſt be a curious ſpeculation for a mineraliſt to explain why the ſame matter, in the ſame atmoſphere, ſhould, in ſhort ſpace of time, produce ſuch different petrifactions. The cauſe ſeems perfectly natural to me, for the firſt is ſuſpended, and as it were congeals in the air, while the other reſts upon the rock, and ſcales off gradually to form, like kind in the bowels of the earth.

"When the Ruſſian fleet was here, ſome of the officers broke off ſome pieces of pillars, which by a long proceſs, and probably by the diſtillation acting in the ſame perpendicular line downwards for

for ages, had reached from the top to the bottom of the grande salle—I saw them in a very imperfect state at Petersburgh, and in the grotto the tops and bottoms of them, for the material being so brittle, they could not be broken off in their length If the Empress could know how little satisfaction the curious must receive by seeing them in an imperfect and mutilated state in her Museum—and what beautiful things they must have been in the grotto —she would grieve with me, that even a desire of obliging could induce her officers to commit what I think a sacrilege against antiquity —Nothing can be more beautiful than the shapes the crystallizations have taken in some parts of the ceiling, if I may so call it, of this place — Wherever by any accident the congealing drop has been removed from its direction, it takes another course —As there are millions constantly oozing out and congealing, some of which are removed accidentally, the petrifaction represent the folds of drapery curtains, hanging festoons, &c —As to the alcarras, as the French call them, which mount sparkly towards the ceiling, their ends have been deranged like it, and wherever the congelation has ceased at the point, it is like a cauliflower head—and most of them look like pyramids composed of cauliflowers, supposing them to be brown the colour of the superior part, is a great addition to the beauty of the place After the drawings were taken, the measures ascertained, and the artists had perfectly finished what Mons de Choiseul had commanded them to do, we searched in every corner of the grotto, and found another chamber lower than that we were in, with several recesses unsuspected before Names were engraven on the most conspicuous parts of the grande salle, and we left ours engraved in the rock, and burnt into a board, for any bold adventurer to read after us—and ascended, but with much more difficulty than we had entered, for one of the rope-ladders was so contrived that I could not reach from one step while my foot was on the other How I scrambled up at last I cannot very well tell—but I was not sorry to see the light of the sun again —I was now much surprised to find myself surrounded by Greek peasant women, one pointing to her head, another to her stomach, a third to her arm, all bewailing their ill state of health, and touching my clothes with devotion —I found at last, that hearing a woman had descended, they took her to be a supernatural being, and were perfectly convinced I could cure all disorders, nor could I tirer myself d'affaire, otherwise than by distributing some I threw vinegar which I had in my pocket

"One of the most singular scenes I ever saw, was the descending of about five-and-twenty people after I was at the bottom of the grotto, most of them with torches. As there was but one rope to hold by, when we were obliged to have recourse to it, I insisted that only five people should go down with me—and the rest set out when we were safely landed, lest the rope should break As the passage to the grande salle is winding, and as there are many steps in it, we caught and lost sight of these people alternately and of the torches —The brilliancy of the petrifactions, the jagged shapes of the rocks, through which we saw the men, the darkness of part of the grotto, and the illuminations which reflected light in new places every moment, displayed the strangest and most beautiful scenery that can be imagined —Doubtless, my dear Sir, there are many observations easy to make, which my ignorance prevents me from attaining to, but you will be amply satisfied, when Mr de Choiseul's account of this grotto shall appear

"He has promised me two copies of his works, and there his pencil will give you a better idea of this remarkable curiosity than my pen possibly can And now I confess to you, that had it not been that my pride felt superior to my fears, I never should have gone down —Mr de C——, when we were laying out the plan of my Grecian tour, said, Jamais femme n'a descendu dans la grotte d'Antiparos, peu d'hommes veulent y descendre, mais vous, Milady vous, il faut absolument que vous y entriez— When I had got about two or three yards into the narrow entrance of the cavern, the smoke of the torches, which could only find issue there, almost took my breath away, and I was forced to set myself down, or rather lie upon the rock—as I fell almost suffocated—and I was upon the point of going out again: but I should have been ashamed to have seen the spirited Ambassador, who had run so many risques in searching after the truths of antiquity, if I had returned without seeing the Grotte d'Antiparos, and I took courage and descended

An Hiſtorical Eſſay on the Dreſs of the Ancient and Modern Iriſh. Addreſſed to the Right Honourable the Earl of Charlemont. To which is ſubjoined, a Memoir on the Armour and Weapons of the Iriſh. By Joſeph Cooper Walker, M. R. I. A. Dublin: Printed by Luke Dillon Finſbury.

THE zeal with which antiquarians purſue the objects of their reſpective ſtudies, occaſions a regret that the induſtry of them labours ſhould in general be attended with ſo few real advantages. The reſearches however of Mr. Walker are directed to a quarter from whence, it is hoped, conſiderable, real benefits may ſpring. "Iriſh Hiſtory," ſays he, "for ſome ages hath worn a forbidding aſpect, but touched by the Ithuriean ſpear I do not deſpair of ſeeing her ſtart up into an engaging form." Animated in the purſuit of information, I left no means untried to obtain it. I viſited the couch of the aged, and patiently liſtened to "the tale of other times," I trimmed the midnight lamp over many a dry annaliſt, and poured with unremitting attention on many a muſty manuſcript; I explored the mouldering walls and "vaulted receſſes" of cloiſtered times, for figures illuſtrative of my ſubject—nay, I even unbarred the gates of death, and entered the tomb in queſt of evidences."

The reſult of theſe extraordinary induſtry has enabled Mr. W. to commence his hiſtorical enquiries from the remote period of the Milleſian invaſion, but he treads with cautious ſtep thro' the mazes of its obſcurity, and proceeds to deſcribe the dreſs of the ancient Iriſh, which conſiſted of the TRUIS or ſtuart Brecca, the long COTA, the COCHAL, the CANABHAS, the BARRAD, and the BROG. The TRUIS covered the ankles, legs, and thighs, riſing as high as the loins, and fitted ſo cloſe to the limbs as to diſcover every muſcle and motion of the parts which it covered. The COTA was a kind of ſhirt, open before, which fell below the waiſt, and was occaſionally folded round the body and made faſt by a girdle to the loins. The COCHAL was the upper garment; a kind of long cloak, with a hanging cowl or hood of different colours, which only reached ſo low as the middle of the thigh, and being brought over the ſhoulders was faſtened on the breaſt by a claſp or brooch. The CANABHAS was a large looſe garment, not unlike the Cochal, and being thrown over the ſhoulders it ſpread all over the body, and when the hood of the Cochal was drawn over the head ſerved completely to diſguiſe the wearer. The BARRAD was a conical cap, not unlike the cap worn at preſent by grenadiers, except that the cone of the Barrad uſually hung backward. The BROG was made of the dried ſkin of beaſts, and faſtened to the foot by means of a lateliet or thong. The ancient Iriſh alſo wore a kind of buſkin or ſhort boot, reſembling to the Britiſh Butis, the Scotch Mutkin, and the Roman Perones. Among the early Iriſh the BEARD was cheriſhed with as much ſolicitude as formerly among the orientals, nor did they reſtrain the growth of the hair on the head, but throwing it back from the forehead, allowed it to flow about the neck, calling thoſe ſuſpended locks COLUNS or GLIBBS, and taking an honeſt pride in them.

"Amongſt the ornaments which formerly adorned the fair daughters of this iſle, the BODKIN is peculiarly deſerving our notice. Whence the Iriſh derived this implement, I might conjecture, but cannot determine. Although I have purſued it with an eager enquiry, I have not been able to trace it beyond the foundation of the celebrated palace of Emania. The deſign of this palace (according to our old chronicles) was ſketched on a red of ſand by the Empreſs Macha, with her Bodkin. If this tradition be founded in reality, Bodkins muſt have been worn by the Iriſh Ladies ſeveral centuries before the Chriſtian æra. But I ſhould be contented to give them a date remote, provided I could aſſign them a more certain antiquity. If the word Accaide in the Brehon laws will admit the tranſlation of a Bodkin, we may infer their uſe in Ireland about the commencement of the Chriſtian æra, from a mode of puniſhment by laws of the ſame code directing a frequent mention of the Accaide. But I am diſpoſed to conſider the Accaide as a kind of dart, from its reſemblance of name ſignifying the dark of the water by its ſwiftneſs, as was formerly the caſe among the Highlanders, whoſe frequent intercourſe with the Iriſh occaſioned a ſtriking ſimilarity in the cuſtoms and manners of both people.

"This inſtrument was known in Ireland under ſeveral names, viz. COTTIA, DEALG, MEANNADH. Its uſes were two fold: it was equally worn in the breaſt and head. The cuſtom of wearing the Bodkin in the breaſt, is alluded to in the following paſſage of an old Iriſh MS.

 "Tom ſits,

[illegible]nce, called, THE INTERVIEW BE-[illegible]TWEEN FION MA CUBHALL AND CAN-[illegible]AN. "Cannan, when he ſaid this, [illegible] was ſeated on the hill, on his right hand lay his ſpear, and upon his left his beautiful daughter Fin alve, ſo exceedingly fair, that the ſnow driven by the [illegible]ſtorm ſurpaſſed not her fairneſs, and her cheeks were the colour of the blood of a young calf. Her hair hung in curling ringlets, and her teeth were like pearls. A ſpacious veil hung from her lovely head down on her delicate body, and the veil was bound by a Golden Bodkin."

"Such Bodkins as were worn in the head, were termed DEALG-FUIL I Even at this day the female peaſants in the interior parts of this kingdom, like the women of the ſame claſs in Spain and Turkey, collect their hair at top, and ſtriking it ſeveral times make it faſt with a Bodkin.

"Beſides theſe uſes, the Bodkin had ſometimes it was ſometimes made to anſwer the purpoſe of a Needle. Hence its name of MEANNADH-FUAGHALA. To be ſo employed it muſt have had an eye. It is in a Bodkin of this kind that Pope's Ariel threatens to impriſon ſuch of his Sylphs as are careleſs of their charge

"Or plung'd in lakes of bitter waſhes lie,
"Or wedg'd whole ages in a Bodkin's Eye"

"Whether or not the Iriſh Ladies, like thoſe of the neighbouring nations, employed their Bodkins as weapons of offence and defenſive, neither tradition nor hiſtory informs us. But ſuch of thoſe implements as I have ſeen, certainly ſeemed as capable of making a man's quietus, as that with which Julius Caeſar is ſaid to have been killed, or that with which Simkin in the REVES TALE protected the honour of his wife.

"But perhaps we ſhould not confine our Bodkin to the toilet of the fair. However I ſhall let it remain there until I am properly authoriſed either to give it a place in the breaſt, or to bury its body in the hair of the ancient heroes of this Iſle. According to the ingenious Mr. Whitaker, Bodkins conſtituted a part of the ornamental dreſs of the early Britiſh Kings. This he aſſerts on the authority of Coins. And from the works of ſome of the old Engliſh Dramatiſts it appears, that Bodkins were worn by Engliſhmen during the middle ages."

IN the fifth and ſixth chapters of this excellent Treatiſe Mr. Necker conſiders the "influence of religious principles on our happineſs." Some would accuſe Religion of entirely ſtripping the buſineſs and the pleaſures of the world of their importance, but Mr. Necker proves, with the greateſt clearneſs, that it is Religion alone which confers any true dignity upon them.

"Religious principles," ſays he, "are perfectly adapted to our nature, to our weakneſſes and imperfections, they come to our ſuccour in our real difficulties, and in thoſe which the abuſe of our foreſight creates. But in what is grand and elevated in our nature it ſympathiſes moſt, for if men are animated by noble thoughts, if they reſpect their intelligence, their chief excellence; if they are intereſted about the dignity of their nature, they will fly, with tranſport, to bow before Religion, which ennobles their faculties, preſerves their ſtrength of mind, and which, through its ſentiments, unites them to Him whoſe power aſtoniſhes their underſtanding. It is then that, conſidering themſelves as an emanation of the Infinite Being, the commencement of all things, they will not let themſelves be drawn aſide by a philoſophy whoſe fatal leſſons tend to perſuade us that Reaſon, Liberty, all this immaterial eſſence of ourſelves, is the mere reſult of a fortuitous combination, and an harmony without intelligence." In the diſcuſſion of this part of his ſubject Mr. N. is beautifully pathetic, as well as convincing, of which the following is a proof.

"I will ſay it: the world without the idea of a GOD, would be only a deſert embelliſhed by a few deluſions, yet man, diſenchanted by the light of reaſon, would find nothing throughout but ſubjects of ſadneſs. I have ſeen them, the dreams of ambition, the allurements of fame, and the vain ſhews of grandeur; and even when often the illusion was most dazzling, my heart always returned into itself, and was attracted to an idea more grand, to a consolation more substantial. I have experienced that the idea of the existence of a Supreme Being threw a charm over every circumstance of life; I have found that this sentiment alone was able to inspire men with true dignity; for every thing which is merely personal is of little value, and that places seem in much high above themselves; it is necessary, in order to have any reason to glory, that, at the same time we exalt ourselves, we elevate human nature; we must refer it to the sublime intelligence, which seems to have dignified it with some of its attributes. We then hardly perceive those trivial distinctions which are attached to transitory things, on which Vanity exercises her sway, it is then that we leave to this queen of the world her rattle and toys, and that we search elsewhere another portion, it is then, also, that virtue, exalted sentiments, and grand views, appear the only glory of which man ought to be jealous."

The following observation is very important. "It is not virtue only, but virtue united to different motives, which contributes to our happiness."—This is illustrated in a very extensive and excellent manner, but we cannot possibly detach any of the particulars, on account of the narrowness of our limits.

Chap. VII. is one of the most interesting, and one of the very best, in the work, it treats of "Religious Opinions, in their relation with Sovereigns."

It is impossible to speak in too high terms of this excellent Chapter. Mr Necker shews, with the greatest force of argument, the necessity of religious principles for the influencing the conduct of Sovereigns and their Ministers, as, without them force, the people can have no security for their liberties.

One particular passage struck us, as we may have too much reason, perhaps, to make an application of it to a case wherein this nation is nearly concerned. It is on the evils which result to Prince and people from corrupt Ministers.

"Ministers without virtue," says Mr Necker, "are more to be feared than Sovereigns indifferent to public goods; newly come out of the crowd, they know better than the Monarch the selfish use that they can make of all the passions and vices, and, as they are connected with society, as they have a continual relation with the different orders of the state, their corruptions are [illegible] dangerous influence [illegible] once attacked, [illegible] public, they become [illegible] is their means of [illegible] despairing of [illegible] eyes of a whole people [illegible] address against [illegible] they pry into, [illegible] encourage those which may [illegible] yet the defects of their character [illegible] apply themselves, at the same time, [illegible] adorn immorality with every grace [illegible] can render it amiable; and they employ [illegible] your to make virtue hateful, by decorating it as austere, imperious, [illegible] and almost incompatible with [illegible] and manners: it is thus that [illegible] not restrained by principles, [illegible] only the misery of a country, [illegible] influence lasts, but they poison the [illegible] of public felicity, by weakening in the Monarch his sentiments of duty, [illegible] ing his good dispositions, and [illegible] if I may say so, his natural virtues."

Chap. VIII. answers "an objection drawn from the wars and from the commotions which Religion has given rise to." In replying to this, Mr Necker shews the greatest philanthropy of heart, liberality of sentiment, and strength of judgment. "Fanaticism (to which we are to attribute all those calamities) and Religion have not any connection, though very often these ideas are found united."

Chap. IX. examines another objection made against Religion by Infidels, and that is, "the appropriation of one day in seven to the cessation from labour, and the attendance on religious ordinances." This is considered, by Mr. Necker, entirely in a political light, and, after a variety of acute observations, he draws this satisfactory conclusion: "That so far from finding fault with Religion for appointing a day of rest, devoted, every week, to public worship, we ought to acknowledge with pleasure, that such an institution is a benevolent act extended to the most numerous class of the inhabitants of the earth, the most deserving our consideration and protection, from which we require so much, and return so little; towards that unfortunate class, whose youth and maturity the rich profit by, and abandon them when the hour is come when they have no more strength left, but to enable them to pray and weep."

Chap. X. is the shortest and the worst in the book; it contains an observation on the public service of the Church of

...ush is condemned, by Mr Necker, not being in the vulgar tongue ... though we could readily allow his observation" to be right, on itself, yet ... certainly wrong, placed as, in a treatise of religious opinions considered as influential to the happiness of mankind, in general, no one could possibly expect to find the discussion of any particular controversies about ceremonies, much less of such a very trivial, and often confined one as the present.

If we were mortified a little, however, in reading the above Chapter, the perusal of the next more than dispelled the chagrin. In this Chapter Mr N. proves, in the closest and most masterly manner, that "the single idea of a GOD is a sufficient support of morality." In doing this, he "first follows the course of those simple sentiments, and natural thoughts, which guide the mind and the heart of man, in every climate and country under heaven." After this he discusses that very intricate metaphysical question of "liberty and necessity." Mr Necker does not appear, however, to have gained the victory over the doctrine of philosophical necessity; though we must confess that he hath adduced many new and ingenious arguments, well worthy the Necessitarian's most attentive consideration. From this our excellent author proceeds to the consideration of another famous, and no less difficult, question, the materiality or immateriality of the human souls; and many, and sensible, are his arguments in favour of the latter, though, perhaps, nothing he has advanced amounts to a full and decisive proof.

Chapters XII XIII XIV are taken up in proving "that there is a GOD." This, in our opinion, Mr Necker has done in a manner that is not equalled by any of the numerous theological or philosophical writers who have gone before him. Mr Necker does not merely combat all the objections that have been made against this important truth, but he makes so many devout and lively observations, drawn from the most intimate acquaintance with human nature, that he forces the mind to submit to the truth, from the desire that it should be so.

Chap XV treats "of the respect that is due from true Philosophy to Religion," which, though short, is handled in the same masterly manner as the Chapters preceding. There is something in the following remarks which we could wish to submit to the cool consideration of those pseudo-philosophers who are so forward in condemning the faith and worship of their country. "I know nothing more dangerous," says Mr Necker, "than the inconsiderate censures of those religious ceremonies received and respected in the countries we live in. Some do not think that they are acting wrong when they speak slightingly of the various symbols of public worship, yet, if they attentively observed the kind of minds, and the first habits, of the greater part of those to whom they address such discourses, they would know how easy it is to wound them in the sentiment which is the source of all their tranquility, and the safeguard of their moral conduct. The deliverer of Switzerland struck off, with one of his arrows, an apple placed on the head of his only son, but every one cannot expect to be so fortunate."

In Chap XVI Mr Necker pursues the same subject, and makes some excellent observations on intolerance. "The operations of the mind," says he, "can only be influenced by reasoning, all the designs formed to attain this end by violence, are attempts to subvert the belief of the spirituality of the soul, and indirect accusations with regard to us, for we must believe in the identity of matter and thought to have a right of presuming that the empire exercised on us by rigorous treatment can have an influence on our opinions, and then we must consider man as a being governed by mechanical laws, to be able to imagine that with instruments of torture we can excite a conviction, which, by an unknown condition, might act instead of judgment, and the sentiment of persuasion." His other arguments against persecution are equally new and convincing.

Chap XVII contains "Reflections on the Morality of the Christian Religion."—This, though a true subject, is treated by Mr Necker with his usual elegance, force and perspicuity. "The severe censure of superstition," says Mr Necker, "which we find throughout the gospel, is derived from an idea as reasonable as enlightened men are too much disposed to make their religion consist of little exterior practices, always easier than the conflicts with, and triumphs over, the passions. Our minds seize with avidity every extraordinary idea which they are in part of our own creating, they aid our ill love to fatiguing our imagination, man is not at the age of maturity terrified by those phantoms which annoy his infancy, but mysterious, occult causes, extraordinary appearances, continue to make an impreſſion on his mind, and, like all the wonders of nature, form too large a circle round his thoughts: it is by ideas more proportioned to his ſtrength, by mere ſuperſtition, that he permits himſelf often to be led captive we love trivial commands, obſervances and ſcruples, becauſe we are little ourſelves, and that in our weakneſs we would wiſh to know every inſtant the limits of our obligations —"Sometimes, perſons terrified by their imaginations, or by the confuſed picture which they form of the duties of religion, attach themſelves to ſuperſtitious practices as a ſafe guard near at hand, which may quickly guard them from the different anxieties of their minds The precepts of the goſpel are deſigned to deſtroy the evil diſpoſitions, for on one ſide, they facilitate the ſtudy of morality, by reducing to ſimple principles the entire ſyſtem of our duties, and on the other, they ſeek to render our intercourſe with the Supreme Being more eaſy, by teaching us that we may unite ourſelves to Him by the expanſion of a pure mind; by informing us, that it is not either on Mount Sion or Gerizim that we are to raiſe an altar, but that every honeſt heart is a temple, where the Eternal is adored in ſpirit and in truth. The Chriſtian Religion is the only one which, diſcarding ceremonies and ſuperſtitious opinions, leads us to the worſhip more conſonant to our nature Chriſtianity indeed, in that grand thought, has pointed out the dictates of our conſcience as moſt worthy of reſpect, benevolence, as the worſhip moſt agreeable to the Supreme Being, and all our moral conduct as the moſt certain prognoſtic of our future ſtate There reigns a profound philoſophy in the doctrines of the goſpel, men have only added a vain pageantry, a more ſounding tone"

Chap XVIII and laſt exhibits a beautiful picture of its Author's heart, and is indeed a maſter-piece of good writing, reaſoning, and piety

Of this the following paſſage, which is the laſt we ſhall extract from the work, is an abundant and pleaſing proof,

The "Piety which I form an idea of," ſays he, "may be properly repreſented as a vigilant friend, tender and rational. It lets us ſee the various blemiſhes of life, but it recals us to the idea of gratitude, in order to augment our happineſs by referring it to the moſt generous of all benefactors: it allows us to exerciſe our faculties and talents; but recalls us to the idea of morality and virtue, in order to aſſure our ſteps, and ſhield us from regret. it allows us to run the race of glory and ambition; but recals us to the idea of inconſtancy and inſtability, to preſerve us from a fatal intoxication it is always with us, not to diſturb our felicity, not to impoſe uſeleſs privations, but to blend itſelf with our thoughts, and to unite to all our projects thoſe mild and peaceable ideas which attend wiſdom and moderation: in ſhort, in the day of adverſity, when our ſtrength is broken, in which we have placed our confidence, piety comes to ſuccour and conſole us; it ſhews us the nothingneſs of vanity and worldly illuſions; it calms the remorſe of our ſouls, by reminding us of a particular providence, it ſoftens our regrets, by preſenting more worthy hopes than any earthly object can afford, in order to engage our intereſt and fix our attention"

After having dwelt ſo long upon this article, and made ſuch copious extracts from it, nothing more need to be ſaid in its recommendation, indeed all that we could ſay would fall ſhort of its merit.—As to the Tranſlation, it is in the main juſt and ſpirited, but it appears to have been haſtily executed ſhould it come to a ſecond edition, we would adviſe a careful reviſion of the whole, and a total expulſion of the tenth chapter, which has no proper affinity to the work; and the ſubject of it is adapted only to the meridian of Roman Catholic countries.

Letters on Greece, being a Sequel to Letters on Egypt, and containing Travels through Rhodes, Crete, and other Iſlands of the Archipelago, with comparative Remarks on their ancient and preſent State, and Obſervations on the Government, Character, and Manners, of the Turks, and modern Greeks Tranſlated from the French of M. Savary 8vo 7s Robinſons

IN our literary Journal of January laſt we made ſome general obſervations on the nature of this work, and left our induſtrious traveller on the Iſland of Caſtel Roſſo He deſcribes a vaſt amphitheatre, ſituated about half an hour's ſail to the eaſt of the harbour, large enough to contain the inhabitants of a populous city, the deſign design of which, he conjectures, was for the purposes of viewing public exhibitions both by sea and land, it being above twenty feet high, and containing eighty rows of seats raised one above the other. From this place he sails for Rhodes, and during his passage observes an innumerable multitude of swans and cranes sailing on the waters, ranged in files like soldiers in order of battle. Each of these files was upwards of a quarter of a league in length, and the whole body consisted of thirty files, all swimming in a similar direction. The head of this army terminated in a point, resembling the prow of a ship. Each individual bird kept its post, notwithstanding the motion of the waves, with their heads turned towards Africa, to which quarter they were fleeting, for, at the approach of winter, they fly from the snows and ice of the North to seek a milder climate. Mr Savary at length arrives at Rhodes, and gives a very elaborate description, collected from a variety of authors, of its former opulence and greatness. The modern town, built on the ruins of the ancient city, occupies only a quarter of its extent, and possesses no remarkable antiquities. Not even the smallest remains of the theatre, temples and portico are to be discovered. Statues, colossuses, paintings, all have been destroyed or carried off. To wide and skilfully disposed streets have succeeded narrow lanes, and houses without taste, regularity, or decoration, and Mr Savary asserts, that "if a Rhodian of the days of Alexander were to revisit his native city, he would find himself absolutely a stranger; he would not recollect the smallest monument, but must imagine himself transported into a country inhabited by barbarians." From Rhodes the Author embarks for Crete, but, by contrary winds is forced to put into Cairos, one of the Islands of the Archipelago, and subject to the Turks, but they dare not inhabit it because it has no port. This fact is a most fortunate circumstance for the inhabitants, who owe to it alone the tranquility, happiness, and liberty they enjoy.

"Demou, says Mr Savary, of obtaining some knowledge of the island, I set out from the village, and directed my course toward the highest mountain, which I reached in an hour's walk. From hence we may discover Carpathus, which appears to be at no great distance, and extends from east to west. In front of the village, three little islands situated to the east, west, and north, form the extensive road in which our vessel lay at anchor. They are uncultivated, and produce nothing but brambles. Below the hill from which I made my observations, stands a small chapel surrounded by figtrees. Here begin a chain of hills, that, bending into a semicircle, leave in the middle a plain of a league in circumference, which has been cleared out by the inhabitants, with infinite labour. They have torn up large pieces of rock, and removed heaps of stones, with which they have formed the walls of the inclosure. All this space is divided into compartments, and shared among the Cairots. They sow barley and wheat here at the commencement of the rainy season, which lasts from October to February. The rain is not continual in these months, but none falls in any other, the remainder of the year the air is pure and serene, and both days and nights continually fine and clear. The heats are moderated by the sea breezes, and beneath so beautiful a sky the inhabitants enjoy a delightful temperature, and are almost strangers to every kind of disease. The sides of the hills are covered with vineyards, the grapes of which produce a very agreeable wine. I could not help admiring the industry with which these islanders have been able to cultivate rocks, hardly covered with a few inches of earth, and rejoiced in the reflection that they were recompensed for their labours, and that the island sufficed for their subsistence.

"When I had satisfied my curiosity, I returned to the house of my host, where they were waiting for me to dine. A hen, with rice, new-laid eggs, excellent pigeons, some cheese, and a glass of good wine, made me amends for the miserable repasts I had made on board. The men dined together, seated in a circle on the carpet, and the women in a separate apartment. This is the custom, and, though not in the French taste, I was obliged to conform to it. Towards the end of our meal the cup was circulated from hand to hand. The company drank to me, wishing me a prosperous voyage, and I returned the compliment, by drinking health and happiness to the people of Cairos. The guests were beginning to grow merry, when the sound of musical instruments made us rise from table.

"About twenty young girls, dressed all in white, with flowing robes, and plaited locks, entered the apartment, and with them a young man who played on the lyre, which he accompanied with his voice. Several of them were handsome, all healthy and lively, and there were

among them some who even rivalled the two belles I have already described I must own, Madam, that this scene appeared to me enchanting The uniform dress of these nymphs, the modesty which heightened their charms, their becoming bashfulness, their joyous but decent merriment, all contributed to make me almost imagine myself suddenly transported to the island of Calypso They began to range themselves in a ring, and invited me to dance I did not wait for many entreaties The circle we formed is singular from the manner in which it is interwoven the dancer does not give his hand to the two persons next him, but to those next them, so that you have your hands crossed before your neighbours, who are thus locked, as it were, in the links of a double chain This interweaving is not without pleasure, for reasons by no means difficult to understand In the middle of the circle stood the musician, who played and sang at the same time, while all the dancers kept exact time in advancing, retreating, or turning round him For myself, I followed where my partners led me, my mind being less occupied with the dance than with the charming females who composed it

"The next day I took a view of the village It consists of about a hundred houses, each of them inhabited by a single family they are all of stone, built very strong, and contain, in general, two or three lower parlours, with a couple of rooms above Each house has its oven, and cistern, cut out of the rock The latter are filled during the rainy season, and the water is preserved in them pure and limpid Besides this, a hundred paces below the village is a fine spring, which flows the whole year

"I entered several houses, where I found the women employed in spinning and embroidering, and some in making the fine lace which they wear Their frames are small, but well contrived, and they work with a great deal of skill I every where met with activity industry, and neatness I afterwards paid visits to several of the girls I danced with the day before, and was received very favourably I entered into conversation with them, and inquired why so many pretty women were to be seen in the island, and so few men, for I had only met with five or six They answered that, during the spring, the summer, and part of autumn, the men were out at sea "They trade, said they, "to different islands of the "Archipelago, and return from time to "time, to bring their families the provisions they may stand in need of, but "only pass the winter with them. They "sow the land in November, get in the "harvest in March, and, immediately "afterward, return to sea The produce "of the island not being sufficient for the "maintenance of its inhabitants, they "are forced to seek supplies from other "countries, with the assistance of which, "if we are not rich, we live at least in a "comfortable mediocrity The boys "accompany their fathers, and become "sailors while they are absent, we spin "cotton as you see, and weave a part of "it for their clothing and our own"

"In these visits I could not but admire the regularity and wisdom of this little republic, the peace and harmony that reigned among its members, and, above all, that entire fulness and content which was so visible in their countenances. Happy people! said I to myself; ambition and intrigue trouble not your tranquillity, the thirst of gold hath not corrupted your manners, the quarrels, dissensions, and crimes with which it hath covered the earth are to you unknown. Here no citizen, proud of his titles, or his wealth, tramples under foot his humble countryman, nor ranging value himself the vices of his master, man is equal to man not does the Cabot blush, or abase himself before the Cabot Respect and mutual esteem unite you Your enjoyments consist in the pure pleasures which nature offers to all her children, and your happiness is founded on the durable basis of mediocrity and equality!

"I here expect I owe to truth, however, obliges me to confess that, in a private conversation with some of these handsome Cabot girls, I drew a flattering picture of the happy lot of the ladies of France I represented them as elegantly dressed, adorned with gold, silks, and diamonds, conveyed in superb carriages from show to show, and from entertainment to entertainment, surrounded by admirers only attentive to give them pleasure, and wholly occupied with their amusements, and a succession of new delights I had only pourtrayed the roses of a life apparently so delicious, and my admiring auditors seemed enchanted with my description. They sighed, regretted their condition, and, despised the humbler pleasures to which they were born, could have wished to have been transported instantly to France. So natural is it to the human heart to quit the

"Another day I paid a visit to two sisters who were said to be very amiable. Melancholy reigned in their house, and sighs escaped them amid their occupations. The eldest, who was about eighteen, was tall, well made, and had a very pleasing countenance. She had not been at the ball. A deep grief cast a veil over her beauty, and her cheeks had lost almost all their colour. A dying flame shone languidly in her eyes, and tears seemed ready to start. How much was I affected! Her younger sister shared in her sorrows, and resembled a flower which, growing in the shade, receives not the beneficent rays of the sun, but languishes at its opening. I could have wished to console these afflicted charmers, but I had no claim whatever on their hearts, and, in so short a time, could not inspire them with sufficient confidence to be permitted to dry up their tears. I knew that one of them had just lost a husband, whom she tenderly loved. I was told that they were the handsomest couple in the island, and united by the purest affection, but that, after having been married only a month, the unfortunate man was shipwrecked, and perished in the sea. "How the more "to be lamented,' added my informers, "as he had not attained his twentieth "year. The youngest of these amiable "girls, tenderly attached to her sister, "participates sincerely in her grief. This, "however, is not the only cause of her "melancholy, she is sixteen, and not "yet married, and, in this country, "men are scarce, the sea devours a "great number of them, and, therefore, "many of our poor girls remain without "husbands."

"This explained to me the reason why in Candia, and in several other cities, I have frequently met with Cairot girls, who have voluntarily forsaken their country. These young females, having neither protectors, friends, nor relations, are obliged to seek a maintenance by service. Their innocence is exposed to great dangers, and frequently, led astray by example, or seduced by the temptations wealth ever has it in its power to offer, they embrace a life of licentiousness and debauchery. I have seen many of them who had entirely forgotten the manners of their island, and totally lost that modesty, and ingenuousness, which constitute the loveliest charm of their countrywomen.

"During my stay at Cassos, a bark arrived, laden with rice, melons, pomegranates, and various fruits. Immediately almost all the women hastened down the hill with the greatest impatience, some to meet a husband, others a father, a brother, or a friend. I never witnessed stronger expressions of joy and tenderness, they embraced them with transport, pressed them to their bosoms, and thanked Heaven for once more restoring them to their anxious wishes. Every token of the most heartfelt joy, every expression of the tenderest love, was lavished on both sides. The scene was indeed most affecting. These, said I to myself, are the ancient Greeks; such was their lively imagination, ever ready to take fire, and such the exquisite sensibility, which distinguished them from all the nations of the earth. This rock has preserved them from the Turkish yoke, and they have retained their ancient character.

"The afternoon of this memorable day was dedicated to pleasure. The Cassiot captain gave a little ball, and I accepted of his invitation. The hall was filled with a number of lively girls, with their tresses perfumed, and dressed in their handsomest boddices, their best embroidered sashes, and their whitest gowns. Various rounds, such as I have before described, were formed. Two lyres, and fingers placed on a raised seat, animated the motions of the dancers, and pleasure sparkled in every eye. The young men who had just arrived took their places in the file of their wives or mistresses, clasped them round the waist in dancing, and felt the palpitation of their hearts, while joy beamed in every face. The young Greek females, with downcast eyes, endeavoured to conceal the pleasure they felt, but their blushes, and their heaving bosoms, sufficiently showed who were the objects of their affection. How great the pleasure of this simple recreation! Each motion gave a new sensation of delight. Our artificial dances may be infinitely more graceful, elegant, or majestic, but how cold are they when compared to this joyous round! In those vanity alone is gratified, in these heart speaks to heart, by a look, a smile, and, above every thing, by the touch. All with Nature has implanted the means of happiness within ourselves. The rich man flatters himself he shall obtain it amid the brilliant companies he assembles, and, by displaying pomp and magnificence, endeavours to purchase it with gold. Alas! knows he not that this inconstant divinity flies the importunity of ostentation, disdains a bribe, bribe, and contemns the pride and vanity of wealth!

"The westerly winds have detained us eight days in the road of Cafos, and I thank Heaven for their continuance. I have visited countries, on which liberal Nature has lavished all her treasures. I have seen others where tyrants have compelled her to refrain her bounties, and every where have found nations unhappy, not by their own fault, not by the sterility of the soil, but by the vices of the government to which they are subject. In the midst of slaves crouching beneath the Ottoman yoke, I have found a rock, only three leagues in circumference, on which the Turk does not set his foot, and inhabited by a brave and happy people. There each father of a family, as a sovereign within his own house, he decides every difference, and his decrees are laws, which cannot but be equitable, since they are only dictated by paternal tenderness. When any disputes arise, the priests and the old men peaceably decide them. But disputes cannot be frequent among citizens, who are all equal and alike unacquainted with poverty or riches. All the members of this little society are employed, and I have seen the handsomest of their women go down into the valley, to wash their linen at the fountain, as in the days of Homer. They chear their labours with a song; nor do they imagine themselves disgraced by their humble employment. It is only in countries where the rich can purchase service from the hands of the poor, that they blush to make use of their own.

"Travellers, who have made observations on the character of the Greeks under the Ottoman yoke, justly reproach them with hypocrisy, perfidy, and meanness. These vices are not inherent in their nature, but are the consequence of the servitude in which they live. The inhabitants of Cafos are also Greeks, but, enfranchised, and warmed, by a ray of liberty, they possess industry, sensibility, and integrity. Send them a Cadi, a Pacha, or a Mouteach, they will become as perfidious and corrupt as the rest of their nation. From this observation we may be convinced of the first and most sacred of political truths, that, in general, man is virtuous in proportion as he preserves his liberty and natural rights, and that as he is deprived of that, he becomes vicious and degenerate."

THIS eccentric and entertaining work, which now for the third time engages our attention, was originally published at ROME, and sold at PARIS, without a name, but it seems to be admitted, that the Abbé Dupuy, or the President Dupaty, since settled by Mr. Pothier, and the English translator of it, is entitled to commendation for this singular performance. We have not seen the original, but we are told that the author announces it as TRAVELS in ITALY, rather than TRAVELS into ITALY, and a story of the sensations which he felt, rather than a description of the objects which he saw, and we must acknowledge that he appears to be "tremblingly alive" upon every occasion, and amidst remarks and observations the most profound and erudite, he mingles to "die of a rose in aromatic pain." The continual propensity to extasy, begets a suspicion that his feelings are in some measure affected, but, admitting this defect in its fullest extent, the Reader of these Travels will still find a finite source of amusement and instruction. He is an enthusiast, but his enthusiasm is supported by so much wisdom and good sense, that though it now and then "o'erleaps the modesty of nature," it is easily forgiven. We shall conclude our remarks on this Work with presenting to our Readers extracts of the Author's visits to the TOMB OF VIRGIL, and MOUNT VESUVIUS.

"I yesterday took a delightful ride.

"I first went on pilgrimage to the tomb of Virgil, on the mountain of Pausilippo.

"I found it falling to ruin, and buried amongst the weeds which are completing its destruction.

"A laurel however is growing in the midst of them.

"I entered the tomb, and seated myself on some flowers, I repeated the eclogue entitled Gallus, I read the beginning of the fourth book of the Eneid; I pronounced the names of Dido and Ly-

ments; I cut a branch from the laurel, and then deſcended, full of thoſe ſentiments with which ſuch a place muſt neceſſarily inſpire every ſoul awake to Nature, Love, and Virgil

"Continuing my ride, I paſſed thro' the grotto of Pauſilippo, that is to ſay, a road of five hundred toiſes in length, extremely high, and very wide, dug through the mountain, to ſhorten the road from Naples to Puzzoli What a prodigious effort of labour and perſeverance! This road is paved with lava, and is the work of the Romans

"On coming out of the grotto, I proceeded through fields full of lofty poplars, united to each other by vines, which hang ſuſpended to their branches, under which three or four different crops are reaped by turns in the ſame year

"On a ſudden an enormous mountain opens its ſides, and midſt eminences black with chefnuts and gloomy trees, I find myſelf in an enchanting valley

"Here are the ſulphurous baths of St Germain, there the ruins of antique caſtles; further on, the celebrated Grotto del Cane; on every ſide, alleys formed in woods of an immenſe extent and depth, and in the middle of the valley, in the mouth of an extinct volcano, the lake Agnano, one half of which is bordered with a double row of lofty poplars; lake Agnano, which rolls the pureſt waves, and which is continually peopled and ploughed by thouſands of aquatic birds

"I firſt entered the hot baths of St Germain

"In a houſe, built for the purpoſe, ſulphureous vapours, more or leſs powerful, riſe up from the earth in different places. The patient remains amidſt theſe vapours, a longer or ſhorter time, according to the nature and degree of the diſorder. It is thus the dry bath is taken It was with difficulty I could breathe in ſome of the chambers. The ſoles of my feet were burnt by the vapour The walls are covered with ſulphur.

"A few paces from theſe ſtoves, you find the Grotto del Cane; it is an excavation in the rock, which may contain three perſons

"My guide had brought a dog with him. Scarcely had he entered the grotto, before the poor creature tried to make his eſcape; but his maſter took him by his legs and laid him on his ſide. Within the ſpace of a ſecond, the vapour that exhales here from the earth, began to act upon the animal, he ſwelled, fell into convulſions, loſt all motion, and was expiring. His maſter dragged him out of the grotto, and, on expoſing him to the air, he ſoon found his legs and ran away

"The experiment of the piſtol did not ſucceed, when fired at two inches from the earth, it went off, at that diſtance, in general, it makes no exploſion

"On coming out of the grotto I left my conductor, and made the tour of the lake alone on foot. I ſeated myſelf on its banks, I fixed my eyes on its waves, and was abſorbed in meditation

"I ſenſibly felt the contraſt of this happy calm, of this melodious murmur, of the inſenſible undulations of the waters of the lake, with the waves and roaring of the ſea, which I had juſt quitted.

"What delight I took in this delicious valley! The ſky was perfectly beautiful, and its azure ſoftened by the ſilver tints of a few flying clouds I enjoyed ſeeing them paſs over my head How lovely the union of the colours of theſe waters, that ſky, thoſe mountains, and the lively rays of the ſetting ſun, which were ſparkling on the horizon

"I ſhall ever ſay to hearts of ſenſibility and melancholy who may viſit Naples — "Fail not to go and ſeat yourſelves on the banks of the lake Agnano."

"Every traveller ſhould viſit Portici, not for the king's palace, which has nothing very remarkable in it either in point of architecture or external ornaments, but for its picturesque ſituation

"Portici is ſeated on the ancient Herculaneum, amidſt lawns and flowers, between Veſuvius, ſmoaking over its head, and the ſea boiling at its feet

"Herculaneum, Veſuvius, and the ſea, all threaten to ſwallow up Portici, Veſuvius in its lava, the ſea in its waves, and Herculaneum among its ruins

"Portici deſerves alſo to be ſeen for ſome marble ſtatues which decorate its periſtyle; eſpecially for the equeſtrian ſtatues of the two Balbuſes, monuments of gratitude or flattery, for ſtatues have been proſtituted in every age Not that I am ſo much an enthuſiaſt, as many amateurs of that of the younger Balbus he is naturally enough repreſented on horſeback, but his figure is ignoble, he has the carriage of a peaſant, and the horſe, which is of marble, appears to be of marble

"The objects moſt worthy of curioſity are two cabinets, the one of antique paintings, and the other of vaſes, inſtruments and ſtatues, equally antique

"A whole

"A whole volume would not describe every thing interesting in the latter of these cabinets *

"Every thing it contains, in fact, is either invented with ingenuity, elegant in the workmanship, or formed of precious materials, and is besides antique and Roman

"The Romans bestowed remarkable pains on the ornaments of their lamps, they are all adorned with figures of men and animals, in the representation of which, taste has delighted to exert itself, and imagination had its full scope

"Amongst others, I remarked the following —At the extremity of a table of bronze, rises the trunk of an old tree, it has already lost its leaves, and its branches are on the point of falling, to all these branches are negligently attached by slight chains, which suspend them at different heights and intervals, seven or eight small lamps of bronze, all varied in their size and forms, and chased with the greatest art and admirable elegance

"This elegance and art are not less worthy of admiration in these chandeliers, these tripods, and candelabras, more particularly in a tripod formed by three satyrs bearing on their shoulders a large bason, these figures breathe, this is truly casting life in bronze

"We find here almost all our instruments of agriculture and surgery Necessity has dictated nearly the same arts and the same laws over the whole earth

"This collection of instruments of surgery, agriculture, cookery, music, war, and religion, presented together to the imagination and the eye, form a very whimsical picture

"The shape of the vases, and particularly of the cups, is inviting you with to drink out of them

"I sat down in a curule chair

"I had never before seen any of those lacrymatories, those little phials in which were collected the tears that were shed over the tombs They would not now be made so large, it is perhaps better to make none at all The Romans had carried every thing to excess, Nature was too circumscribed for them, they tried to escape from it in every direction The idea of the conquest of the world, which was the first of Roman ideas, had given the ton to all the rest, all their other ideas must necessarily be exaggerated, to accord with that

"Who would not be surprized, on visiting the ruins of Herculaneum, to find eggs in perfect preservation, as well as bread, corn, oil, and wine; and chafing-dishes with their coals and cinders?

"The mind is delighted and astonished that any thing so perishable should have escaped during so many ages as have elapsed since the destruction of Herculaneum.

"We feel a pleasure in contemplating a grain of corn which has triumphed over time, and shared in the eternity of the brazen statue

"But nothing perhaps can appear more astonishing than the burnt manuscripts, which preserve, in that state, the ideas intrusted to them The fire slept at them, and left just as much matter as was necessary to their existence But how is it possible to draw them hence, or to restore that connection which has been interrupted by the fire?

"The method has been discovered; but it requires a more than imaginable degree of patience, extreme dexterity, and the labour of many years Each bed of ashes is gradually unrolled, with infinite slowness and precaution, and by degrees, as they unroll it, a sheet of paper, thin as air, follows after, lays hold of it and adheres to it, it thus receives one line and then another, and sometimes, at the end of a month, has got possession of a page

"What care is necessary to prevent all those ashes, when they are stirred, from mingling together, and to preserve the proper places of these symbols of thought, which constitute their whole existence!

"The part of these manuscripts which is preserved, is that which has been burnt the rest, which was not touched by the fire, has perished

"They have succeeded in restoring a Greek manuscript on music The operation, possibly, would have been less tedious but that it depended on the government

"The busts and statues in bronze are for the most part in the best taste, and of the finest workmanship Nothing is comparable, in particular, to a sleeping faun. He is really asleep

"I admire also two young wrestlers; they are quite naked, and going to begin

* "The Chevalier de Non, formerly Charge des Affaires of France at Naples, has also made a very valuable collection of antique vases Every body is acquainted with the taste, talents, and knowledge of that lover of the arts"

the conflict; you feel for them, for you forget that they are of bronze. I was tempted to address them in the following stanza of M. Rochet.

Et pour des combats plus doux l'Amour forma vos charmes

"For softer combats Love has form'd your charms."

"All the apartments of the cabinet are paved with fragments of Mosaic found in Herculaneum.

"But I must not omit one of the greatest curiosities in this celebrated cabinet. It consists in the fragments of a cement of cinders, which in one of the eruptions of Vesuvius surprized a woman, and totally enveloped her. This cement, compressed and hardened by time around her body, has become a complete mould of it, and in the pieces here preserved we see a perfect impression of the different parts to which it adhered. One represents half of her bosom, which is of exquisite beauty, another a shoulder, a third a portion of her shape, and all concur in revealing to us that this woman was young, that she was tall and well made, and even that she had escaped in her shift, for some pieces of the linen are still adhering to the cinders."

"I have written these few lines on the summit of Vesuvius, by the light of an eruption.

"They are a sort of medal I have struck, to authenticate my journey, to remind such of my children as may one day come to view the same wonderful conflagration, of this moment of their father's life, and to embellish in their eyes, with this reflection, so magnificent a picture.

"On my arrival about six in the evening at Resina, a little village beyond Portici, I left the carriage that had brought me, and mounted on a mule, while three sturdy fellows accompanied me, provided with a number of torches.

"I began by ascending between two fields covered with poplars, mulberry and fig-trees, interwoven with plant and flowering vines, which sometimes support themselves by, and hang suspended from those trees, at others mount up, and lose themselves by their own exertion in the air.

"As I passed on, the house of Portolese was pointed out to me, whither he retired to forget that men in holy it once so happy and so fatal, to which, at the age of twenty seven, he owed his immortal Stabat, and his death.

"After traversing, for an hour, a number of beautiful orchards, I arrived at an immense lava.

"Vesuvius vomited it forth, in an eruption, about sixty years ago.

'All Naples trembled, but after threatening that city for a moment, it stopped its progress.

'Though stopped and extinguished, it has still a menacing and fearful appearance.

"The borders of this lava, like the banks of the Seine, are clad with turf and flowers, and shaded here and there with young shrubs, which are constantly bedewed, as I may so say, and nourished by fertile rills.

"After pursuing for some time a very rugged path, I found myself on frightful rocks, in the middle of moving cinders.

"There the earth is no longer trodden by the feet of animals, but those of men, who has discovered almost all the boundaries of Nature, and often overstepped them, still venture further.

"I was obliged to climb with the utmost difficulty through heaps of ashes, which crumbled beneath my feet.

"I paused a moment to look around me.

"Before me, the shades of the night and clouds thickening with the smoke of the volcano, were flowing around the mountain, behind me the sun sinking beyond the hills was illuminating with his expiring rays, the coast of Posilippo, Naples, and the sea, whilst the moon was rising over the island of Capreæ, to the left beheld at the same instant the waves of the sea sparkling with the reflection of the sun, the moon, and Mount Vesuvius. How glorious a picture!

"After contemplating this object in all that splendour, this so horrible, so rare, and sublime an union of scenes, on that face of Nature so gay, animated and teeming, the empire of death and that of life, I threw myself amongst the clouds, and continued to ascend. At length I reached the Crater.

"This then is that formidable volcano which has been burning for so many ages, which has overwhelmed so many cities, which has consumed nations, which every hour menaces that vast country, and that luxurious Naples, where at this moment they are laughing, dancing, and singing, and not so much as thinking of its ravages. What a light flames around this Crater! What a burning furnace in the middle! But the horrible abyss thunders, and already, with a tremendous crash, vomits into the air, through a thick

cloud of cinders, an immenſe ſheet of fire Millions of ſparks and thouſands of ſtones which are diſtinguiſhed by the blackneſs of their colour, hiſs with the rapidity of their explohon, fall, and return back into the rumbling gulph, or roll upon the mountain there is one juſt fallen only a hundred paces from me. On a ſudden the abyſs cloſes, and then, as ſuddenly, again opening its yawning mouth, vomits forth a horrid fiery torrent, in the mean while, the lava riſes to the edges of the Crater, it falls, it boils, runs over, and plows up, in long ſtreams of fire, the black ſides of the mountain

"I was really in ecſtaſy while viewing at once this deſert! this height! this night, and the volcano actually burning before my eyes

"I could have wiſhed to paſs the night beſide theſe fires, and ſee the ſun, at his return, extinguiſh them with the ſplendor of his dazzling rays

"But the wind, which blew with impetuoſity, had already frozen me, and I deſcended with regret It coſt ſome pains to take the laſt look at ſuch a ſcene!

"Adieu, Veſuvius! Adieu, thou lava, and ye flames which illuminate and crown the profound abyſs! Adieu, thou mountain, at once ſo formidable and ſo little dreaded! If thou ſhalt one day to drown beneath thy aſhes theſe caſtles, thoſe villages, and yonder city, let it not at leaſt be at the moment when my children ſhall be there

"My guides had lighted their torches, I deſcended, or rather rolled, ſinking half-leg deep in aſhes I rolled ſo faſt (for it is impoſſible to do otherwiſe) that I only employed half an hour in coming down a ſpace which had coſt me three hours in climbing One of my ſhoes, torn into a thouſand pieces, fell off when I was half way the other I was obliged to leave at the place where I had quitted the mules

"In deſcending, I met with ſome Engliſhmen who were going up to the Crater we ſtopped and talked of Veſuvius and for a moment interrupted by the light of our torches, the night which extended over that river of lava, and diſturbed with our voices the deep ſilence which reigned all around

"We bid each other adieu, I purſued my way, and at length arrived, greatly fatigued, at Portici I inſtantly lay down, and had a moſt profound ſleep

"But when in the morning I awoke with the ſummit of Veſuvius, its crater, its conflagration, and its lava preſent to my imagination My ſoul ſtill ſhuddered with all the emotions it had experienced the night before.

"The eruption of Veſuvius is one of thoſe ſpectacles, that neither the pencil nor language ever can deſcribe, and which Nature ſeems to have reſerved only for the admiration of man, like the riſing of the ſun, and the immenſity of the ocean."

The Natural Hiſtory and Antiquities of Selborne, in the County of Southampton, with Engravings, and an Appendix containing Letters to the Hon Daines Barrington, and Thomas Pennant, Eſquire By the Rev Gilbert White, A M 4to 11s boards White and Son

WHAT has been well ſaid of the Naturaliſts, that they are moſt valuable who have confined themſelves to a ſingle ſubject, money after proper ſtirs, holds equally true when applied to the writers on antiquity By graſping at an extent of country too wide for the accurate inſpection of one man, many have been obliged to ſwell their volumes with churchyard anecdotes, and unintereſting extracts from the deeds of eſtates If we were to extend this remark to local poetry, the celebrity of the Cooper's Hill of Denham, and of Pope's Windſor Foreſt, when contraſted with the neglected Poly Olbion of Drayton, though his other works ſhew that he was by no means devoid of poetical merit, would juſtify it.

Mr White, like Sir John Cullum, has here ſet a laudable example by giving a view not of the pariſh where he reſides, in a county which has hitherto lain unnoticed, yet, from its ſize and ſituation, capable of furniſhing abundant materials to the hiſtorian, and, would others follow him, we might, at ſome future period, expect to ſee a deſcription of Hampſhire, not compiled merely from memorials of the dead, and regiſters of fleeting property, but conſiſting alſo of obſervations on the various ſoil, the agriculture, and the population, which would afford general and permanent information

The hiſtory of the Antiquities commence with a learned diſſertation on the ſeveral ſorts of Roman copper coins, editions,

After describing the church, in its present state, and giving a detail of the Vicars, from early times down to modern days, our Author proceeds to the Priory, which had been erroneously inserted by Dugdale, in the Monasticon Anglicanum, among the alien Priories "The Priory of Selborne was founded by Peter de la Roche, or de Rupibus, one of those accomplished foreigners who resorted to the Court of King John" P 233 This Poitevin adventurer, by his insinuating address, soon became a favourite, and attained the highest offices in the kingdom, both civil and religious On his return to England from the Holy Land, whither he had been driven by a confederacy of the Barons against him, de Rupibus began, in 1232, to build and endow this convent, which, at times, received considerable donations from the mistaken piety of professors of land in the neighbourhood But it appears that the Canons very naturally preferred the conviviality of social life to chanting dismally vigils to the pale cold moon For by the Visitatio Notatius de Selborne, holden by William of Wykeham in person, we find, that one of the irregularities which the prelate reprehends is, that "some of "the Canons are given to wander out of "the precincts of the convent without "leave, and that others ride to their "manors and farms, under pretence of "inspecting the concerns of the society, "when they please, and stay as long as "they please" P 367 It should also seem that they had no dislike to the jollity of a christening, since the bishop enjoins them, for the future, not to stand godfathers

The Visitatio displays so highly finished a picture of monastic disorders, that we cannot forbear to insert one or two quotations from this document They religious are forbidden to join any more in public, noisy, tumultuous huntings, "or to keep any hounds, by themselves or by others, openly or by stealth, "within the convent or without" P 368.

How deeply planted in the human mind is the propensity towards foppery in dress, when the solitude and austerities of a cloister were not able to subdue it! The Visitor reprimands the Canons severely for throwing aside their statutable clothing, and wearing publicly fashionable buskins, instead of the boots of the order, and appearing "with fringed "gloves, and silken girdles trimmed with "gold and silver P 371 This gay apparel brings Reeve's Abbote, in his pendle gyrdle, before our eyes

Though their revenue was fully sufficient to have supported them, had they conformed to the rules of their order, yet to supply their extravagancies, the Prior and Canons misapplied their income, and suffered "notorious dilapidations to take "place among their ministerial houses, and "in the walls and inclosures of the con-"ventricle" P 369 At the same time they pawned their relics, plate, holy vestments, and books P 372 To such an height were these abuses carried, that Pope Martin V issued a bull to revoke the property which had been alienated from the Priory of Selborne P 379 Beside the dissolute manners of these recluse, they seem to have been possessed with a rooted aversion to the institution itself The original number of fourteen could not be kept up When Wykeham held his visitation they were decreased to eleven, in 1462 they were dwindled to four, at last there wanted no tyrannical Henry to dispossess them, for the place was totally deserted At this juncture, the newly-established College of St Mary Magdalene, in the University of Oxford, procured from their founder, William of Waynflete, an appropriation of the estates, which grant was ratified, in 1486, by Pope Innocent VIII

"The site of the Convent (we learn "from this gentleman) is now become "a rough, rugged pasture-field, full of "hillocks and pits, choaked with nettles "and dwarf elde, and trampled by the "feet of the ox and the heifer, p 423 and he says, in the preceding page, that of this venerable structure "nothing re-"mains but a piece of a wall, about ten "feet long, and as many high" This ruin might bear an inscription similar to the following, which the late Lord Rochford caused to be fixed on a remaining wall of a religious house, at St Osyth, in the county of Essex

But before we indulge the triumph of the eighteenth century over former ages, on our enfranchisement from monastic establishments, let us pause a moment to consider whether posterity may not, with equal reason, look on an order of men trained to the arts of destruction, to be full as degrading to the dignity of human nature, and as opposite to the true interests of mankind, as the votaries to the cell, which they have succeeded On every principle of sound policy, is a man separated from his fellow-citizens, and maintained in idleness by the labour of the rest of the community, a soldier is a military monk Nor ought we to forget that this land of liberty is still disgraced by prisons where men are immured, tho' not accused of a crime, deprived of every means of supporting themselves or their families, and compelled to live a burthen on the public

However, the dawn of philanthropy now spreading over Europe, allows us to hope that a more enlightened period will enable antiquaries hereafter to survey the ruins of a barrack, or of a gaol for debtors, with the same philosophic complacency that Mr White contemplates the vestiges of the monastery he describes *

The barbarous word junctorum occurs in the inventory of the relics, p 384. We believe our author is right in rendering it a joint, as we recollect the more classical word junctura, in Bede's Ecclesiastical History. Among the benefactors to the Priory of Selborne, Sir Adam Gurdon and his family stand conspicuous Gurdon was an inhabitant, and an owner of lands, in this parish He is memorable, alike, for his perseverance in opposition to the government of Henry III and for his fidelity to Prince Edward, who vanquished him in personal combat, and received him into his confidence P 341 A lively portrait of the ferocious generosity of feudal manners. Here, indeed, we may with justice congratulate the felicity of our times, when it is no longer in the power of a factious chieftain, or a turbulent prelate, to embroil his country in a civil war.

The Knights Templars, an order remarkable for the rapidity with which it rose to affluence, and for the barbarity with which its members were extirpated, enjoyed large possessions, and a preceptory, in Selborne The Chapel of their Manor-house, is still standing

This work is embellished with several romantic views in the village, well engraven, and the elegant manner in which it is printed, does much credit to the publisher.

To conclude, we cannot dismiss this article without strongly recommending it to the notice of the public In the course of our occupation, as reviewers, we have been but too often disappointed by title-pages, which promised more than the performance warranted, here, on the contrary, in the history of an obscure parish, we have been agreeably surprised to meet with a variety of original and general information, in the part relating to Natural History, from what fell under the author's own observation, and in the Antiquities, with valuable extracts from inedited records, the whole conveyed in pleasing language, and frequently enlivened with classical allusion.

A General Description of China, containing the Topography of the Fifteen Provinces which compose this vast Empire, that of Tartary, the Isles, and other tributary Countries, &c &c &c Illustrated by a New and Correct Map of China, and other Copper plates Translated from the French of L'Abbe Grosier, 2 vols 8vo. 12s. (Continued from Page 42)

FROM a description of the laws and customs of China relating to the female part of that extraordinary empire, with the substance of which we presented our readers in the Review of January, the Abbé Grosier proceeds to describe the education

education of their children, the vestments and dress of both sexes, the building and furniture of their houses, their public and private diversions, and their funeral rites

"Funeral rites," says the Abbé, "are considered by the Chinese as the most important of all their ceremonies The day of one's death is always very splendid in China, and people receive more honour and homage at that period, than ever they did when alive

"A few moments after a person has expired, he is dressed out in his richest attire, and with every badge of his dignity He is then placed in the coffin which has been purchased for him, or which he himself had provided in his lifetime; for one of the most anxious cares that engage the attention of a Chinese, is to prepare himself a coffin, and not to delegate that business to his successors — Those, often, who are not worth above nine or ten pistoles, employ the greater part of their money for this purpose Sometimes the coffin remains twenty years under in the family, and is considered by the head of it as the most valuable piece of furniture in his possession In cases of poverty, when all other means fail, the son often sells himself, or becomes a slave, to procure his father a coffin

"Rich people frequently expend a thousand crowns to have a coffin of precious wood, ornamented with different colours Those of citizens who are only in easy circumstances, are much less expensive. They are formed of strong planks, six inches in thickness, and often more, which last for many years In order that they may better resist the injuries of time, they are daubed over with pitch and bitumen, and afterwards varnished, which prevents the exhaling any disagreeable smell

"The custom of opening dead bodies is not practised in China It would be considered there as an act of cruelty, worthy of punishment, to separate the heart and entrails from the body, in order to inter them apart The Chinese would be no less shocked and offended, to see, as in Europe, the bones of people deceased heaped one upon another A Chinese is sure of being always buried entire, unless he has lost some of his limbs by accident Their manner of interment is generally as follows They first sprinkle, in the bottom of the coffin, a small quantity of lime, they then lay the body in it, taking care to place its head on a pillow, and to add a great deal of cotton, in order that it may remain more steady, and be prevented from shaking They use cotton, likewise, with some other means, to preserve the body in the same position in which it is first placed The lime and the cotton serve also to receive the moisture which may issue from it

"In this manner the body remains exposed seven days, but these may be reduced to three, if any substantial reason renders it necessary During this interval, all the relations and friends, who are purposely invited, come and pay their respects to the deceased The nearest relations even remain in the house The coffin is exposed in the hall of ceremony, which is then hung with white, but some pieces of black, or violet coloured silk, are here and there interlarded, as well as some other ornaments of mourning Before the coffin is placed a table, upon which stands the image of the deceased, or a carved ornament inscribed with his name These are always accompanied with flowers, perfumes, and lighted wax candles

"It is customary for those who enter the hall, to salute the coffin, in the same manner as if the person it contains were still in life They prostrate themselves before the table, and knock their foreheads several times against the earth, they afterwards place upon the table some perfumes and wax candles, which they have taken care to provide for that purpose The intimate friends of the deceased, or those who are supposed to have been so, accompany their ceremonies with frequent sighs, and other marks of sorrow, either real or pretended.

"The salutation which they have made to the body of the dead, is returned by the eldest son, accompanied by his brothers The latter come forth from behind a curtain, which hangs on one side of the coffin, but they do not walk, they creep on the ground, and drag themselves along, until they reach the spot where those stand whom they are going to salute After which, without rising up, they return in the same manner to their former station The same curtain conceals also the women, who every now and then send forth dismal and mournful cries

"Those who come to pay their respects in this manner to the dead, are afterwards conducted into another apartment, where they are treated with tea, and sometimes with dried fruits and sweetmeats A distant relation, or some intimate friend of the family, is deputed on such an occasion

eason to be master of the ceremonies, he introduces the visitors, and in like manner accompanies them to the door when they are about to depart

"Those who live in the neighbourhood of the place go in person to pay their respects to the deceased, but those who are indisposed, or whose habitations are at too great a distance, send a note of excuse, which is entrusted to the care of a domestic. All these visits are afterwards returned by the eldest son of the deceased, but complimentary billets are generally substituted for real visits. The custom is not to be at home when he calls.

"The relations and friends of the deceased are again informed of the day fixed for performing the funeral rites. Few of them ever fail to attend, according to invitation.

"The procession commences by a troop of men, who march single file, carrying different figures, made of pasteboard, some of which represent slaves, others lions, tigers, horses, &c. Other troops follow, who walk in two files; some of these carry standards, some flags, others filled with perfumes, while others play plaintive and melancholy airs, on different musical instruments. We find that music has been always used at the funeral ceremonies of every ancient nation. These machines immediately precede the coffin, which is covered with a canopy in form of a dome, and entirely composed of white coloured silk; its four corners are ornamented with the like number of tufts, made of white silk, very neatly embroidered, and covered at the top with net work. The coffin is placed upon the bottom of this machine, and is carried by sixty four men. The eldest son, clothed in a coarse sack, having his body bent and leaning on a staff, follows next the coffin, and behind him his brothers and nephews, but neither the one nor the other are dressed in cypress.

"Next come the relations and friends, all clad in mourning, and followed by a great number of chairs, covered with white stuff, which contain the wives and female slaves of the deceased. These shew particular marks of sorrow, and imitate the lamentations with their cries, but in general the lamentations of the Chinese, in such ceremonies, are so methodical, [illegible] that a European would be induced to accuse them of the effects of custom and art, rather than the natural emotions of a mind agitated and oppressed with grief.

"When they arrive at the burying place, the coffin is deposited in a room appropriated for it, not far from which there are tables ranged in different halls. These tables have been expressly prepared for the purpose of giving a repast to the assistants, which is served up, after the ceremony, with the greatest splendour.

"This repast is sometimes followed by fresh marks of homage rendered to the corpse; but these are often changed into thanks returned to the eldest son, who answers only by signs. But if the deceased was a grandee of the empire, a certain number of his relations never leave the tomb for one or two months. There they recite, in apartments which have been previously prepared for them, and they renew the marks of their grief and sorrow every day, together with the children of the deceased.

"The magnificence of these funeral ceremonies is augmented, in proportion to the dignity and riches of the deceased. In the procession which attended the corpse of the eldest brother of the Emperor Kang hi, there were more than seven thousand people, all of whom had particular offices assigned them relating to the ceremony.

"Burying-places in China are always situated at a small distance from a city or town, and generally upon some eminence. It is usual to plant pines and cypresses around them. We find that this custom has existed at the same period in different nations who never had the least communication one with another. The form of the Chinese tombs is various, according to the different provinces, and according to the situation of those for whom they are intended. The poor are contented with placing the coffin under a shade, covered with a roof of thatch; others enclose it in a small building of brick, in the form of a tomb. Those of people in affluence are in the figure of a horseshoe, well whitewashed, and finished with great taste; but those of the mandarins, and great people, are much more sumptuous and delicate. A vault is first constructed, in which the coffin is shut up, over this vault is raised a pyramid of earth, well beat together, about twelve feet in height and ten in diameter. A layer of lime and sand laid over this earth, makes a kind of plaster, which renders the whole very durable and solid. Various kinds of trees are planted around the tomb, in regular order. A large and long table of white marble, well polished, is placed before it, upon the centre of which are to be seen a censer, accompanied by two vases, and the same number of candlesticks, of exquisite workmanship But this is not all a great number of figures, representing officers, eunuchs, soldiers, saddled horses, camels, lions, tortoises, &c. are ranged round the tomb in different rows, and F Du Halde assures us, that the whole produces a very striking effect It appears, at least, more calculated to make a deep impression upon the multitude, than the costly decorations of our funeral monuments in Europe

"Some of the Chinese have carried their filial attachment so far, as to preserve in their houses, for three or four years, the bodies of their deceased fathers Mourning continues in China three years, and during that long interval they abstain from the use of flesh and wine, they can assist at no entertainment of ceremony, nor can they frequent any public assembly. When they have occasion to go abroad, which is even not permitted them at first, the chair in which they are carried is commonly covered with a white cloth These are general rules for every Chinese who is in mourning, but those who preserve the bodies of their fathers in their houses for several years, impose on themselves a great many other duties they use no other seat, during the day but a stool, covered with white serge, and no other bed but a plain mat, made of reeds, which is placed near the coffin

"When a Chinese dies in a province in which he was not born, his children have a right to transport the body to the burying-place of their ancestors. This right has been even converted into an indispensable duty. A son who should be wanting in this respect, would be disgraced in his family, and his name would never be placed in the hall of ancestors—a place reserved to honour their memory, of which we shall speak hereafter Besides this, the coffin cannot be carried through any town, it must be conveyed round part of its circumference, in order to regain the direct road Permission from the Emperor sometimes abridges these difficulties, but it is forbidden, in any case whatever, to inter a person lately dead on the grave of another, unless it has entirely lost its former figure

"With regard to the hall of ancestors, it is a vast building, considered as common to all the branches of the same family, and destined for the following purposes All these branches repair further at a certain season of the year Sometimes they amount to seven or eight thousand persons, whose fortune, dignity and rank in society are all very different, but there no distinction is known The man of letters, the mechanic, the mandarin, the labourer, are all on a level in these assemblies age alone regulates precedency The oldest always takes place of all the rest, even although he may be the poorest in company

"The distinguishing ornament of this hall is a long table set against the wall, upon which is generally seen the image of one of their ancestors, who has filled some office of distinction in the empire, with honour to himself, or who has been rendered illustrious by his talents and virtues Sometimes it contains only the names of men, women, and children belonging to the family, inscribed upon tablets, together with their age, the day of their death, and the dignities they enjoyed at that period. these tablets are ranged in two rows, upon steps, and are only about a foot high each

"It is in spring that these relations assemble in this hall They sometimes repair thither in autumn also, but a strict observance of this custom is not always necessary The only privilege allowed to the richest on these two occasions, is to prepare an entertainment, and to treat the whole family at their own expences We must observe, that the entertainment appears to have been prepared for their ancestors only, and that they first pay respect to their memory, for they never permit themselves to touch a bit of any thing, until an offering has been made to them

"The honour rendered to ancestors in this hall, which is consecrated to them, does not free the Chinese from the obligation they are under of visiting their real burying places once or twice a year It is generally in the month of April that they discharge this duty They begin by plucking up the weeds and bushes that surround the sepulchre, after which they renew those ordinary marks of respect, affection and grief, which were shewn at the funeral, and conclude by placing wine and provisions upon the tomb, which serve to dine their visitants

"Such are the marks of honour which the Chinese pay to their deceased relations, and which they constantly renew in memory of them These at first were, perhaps, the simple dictates of nature, supported by custom, but at present they are established into a Law, which cannot be broken broken with impunity Confucius ſaid, Render to the dead the ſame duty and reſpect as if they were ſtill preſent and alive. This is only in advice, but its counſels of Confucius have in China become precept

"It may, perhaps, be ſuperfluous to obſerve, that thoſe who are very poor have no ſtall to honour the manes of their anceſtors. They are [illegible] the names of their parents [illegible] have departed this life, in the moſt ſpacious part of their houſes. We do not ſcruple to the manners and cuſtoms of a nation among the pooreſt ſort of people they can neither ſet an example themſelves, nor imitate that of others.

Mount Pelham A Novel By the Author of Roſa de Montmorien Small 8vo 2 Vols 5s

THIS Novel is evidently the production of a female pen, and it poſſeſſes, in an eminent degree, the artleſs and ſimple elegance characteriſtic of the ſex The ſtory is deeply affecting, but it does not abound with that variety of incident which is conſtituted by the vitiated taſte of the preſent day as the ſine qua non of this ſpecies of writing The ſtyle in general is eaſy and harmonious, and thoſe meretricious ornaments of which female writers are too often ambitious, are judiciouſly avoided The moſt endeavours to mediate a diſtinction between that affection which is the offſpring of ſenſibility and reaſon, and that delluſive and perverſe bias of inclination which is nurtured only by fancy, and independent of the heart and we agree with the fair Authoreſs, that thoſe who rationally hope to taſte the domeſtic ſweets of conjugal bliſs, ſhould learn early to make this firſt diſcrimination We think, however, that there is a degree of inconſiſtency in the conduct of Tracy Pelham, for with the manly mind he is made to poſſeſs, the ſuſpicion he entertains of his wife's partiality to Sir Alfred, will ſcarcely warrant his ſudden dereliction of a woman of whoſe virtue he was ſo well convinced.

Maria Cecilia or, Life and Adventures of the Daughter of Achmet III. Emperor of the Turks Tranſlated from the French 12mo. 2 Vols. 5s

IF Language be the DRESS of thought, as moſt unqueſtionably it is, every TRANSLATOR may be conſidered as acting in the capacity of a TAYLOR to the work which he tranſlates, but it happens in the literary world with books, as it does in real life with men, that they are frequently caſt in a ſhape, or rather figure, ſo extremely awkward and out of all proportion, that THE TAYLOR in the one caſe

TRANSLATOR in the other, equally at a loss how to cut or contrive a dress by which their respective subjects can be, in any fashion, adorned. Of this deformed character is the history of MARIA CECILIA, the unfortunate daughter of Achmet the Third, and the ingenious Translator of her Life and Adventures has discovered so much judgment and dexterity in Letting Things out, by his endeavour, though unsuccessful, to expose beauty, and conceal defects, that it is only lamentable he should have employed his talents upon so unprofitable an object. It is well known that Truth, in whatever garb she may appear, conveys a secret and almost irresistible charm to every mind, and her name is therefore boldly attempted to be called in upon the present emergency, for the pretended Editor of the original work undertakes to warrant, from "the most authentic papers," that the substance of this History is real and genuine. It seldom becomes necessary, however, to assert the positive existence of facts, except, from the general complexion there is reason to apprehend that they would otherwise be deemed fictitious. The commencement of their Adventures excited great expectation of future entertainment, but their progress is carried slowly and uninterestingly along, until the conclusion suddenly proves abortive. In short, to use the apothegm of Dr Johnson, the whole work seems to afford "little need of innovation of hope, or variety of succession of disappointments."

The Ill Effects of a Rash Vow. In a Series of Letters. 2 vols 12mo 5s

THAT a rash vow is pregnant with such ill effects will prove destructive to the domestic happiness of the votaress, and the happiness of the votaress herself, is a position, we fear, too frequently verified, to require any stronger proof than the confirmation of this painful truth by the English history, during the fourteenth century. It is highly laudable in the novelist, as a preceptor of useful morals, to guard the unwary against falling into the numerous abysses, by pointing out the rocks and quicksands with which it abounds, but, in the present instance, he seems to have employed his pen to little purpose, as the incidents are not sufficiently numerous to attain their end. Nor can the style of the work appear capable of detaining the attention of the mind, or of making a favourable impression on the heart. It is uniformly cold and uninteresting, and seldom frequently obscure, and from its stiffness and inflexibility, the language is incorrect, the sentiments puerile, and the characters of the pieces unnatural. It furnishes indeed most pregnant proof that the best intentions, like the best motives, may produce very bad effects, and, perhaps, if the natural dissolution of the writer be considered, it will not seem extraordinary, that the virtues of a rash vow and a rash resolution should be exhibited conjunctively in the same type.

The Two Farmers' Son. 12mo 1s. 6d. Designed to recommend the Practice of Humanity to Children, and all other living Creatures, in the Religious Observance of the Sabbath Day. By Mrs Trimmer. 12mo London

THIS exemplary tale is not much calculated to please the fancy of the reader, as the whole piece of machinery is not to be compared to the fairy tales of twenty novels—novels, I fear, of the prettiest sort. Mrs Trimmer is certainly unambitious of fame, and leaves many things from the commencement to her understanding exercises to shew the true and natural part of human life, where we can expect to be happy, that is, in the fields. Highly as we respect the lady, however, we must say, that she sometimes discovers too much of the spirit of party-zeal, which, more than Popery itself, is the great cause of every species of Christian error, and—what is worse—Christian uncharitableness.

* "Begs all"—Why "desired"—Would it not have been more consonant to your manners, good Lady, had the expression been "entreated"—But let us not be with you in words about a word, especially when we know, that from the pen of that woman nothing can ever flow but what is both elegant and calculated to promote the welfare of society.

JOURNAL of the PROCEEDINGS of the SIXTH SESSION of the SIXTEENTH PARLIAMENT of GREAT BRITAIN.

HOUSE of LORDS.

TUESDAY, Feb 24

THE order of the day being read for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the further consideration of the Bill intitled 'An Act to provide for the Care of his Majesty's Royal Person, and for the Administration of the Royal Authority during the Continuance of his Majesty's illness,'

The Lord Chancellor left the woolsack, and said the account of the progress that his Majesty made towards recovery continued to be so favourable from day to day, that he presumed the great reasons that before actuated their Lordships, and induced them to adjourn but Tuesday, would prevail for a further delay, and induce them to adjourn for a few days longer. He should therefore move to adjourn till Monday next.

The Duke of Norfolk said, he should be happy to hear what were the present appearances of his Majesty's health, and if his Majesty should continue in the same progressive state of amendment, though not able to take upon himself the actual business of the regal station, what steps would be to be pursued after the period of adjournment proposed, and whether another examination of his Majesty's Physicians would take place

The Lord Chancellor said, that during the late interviews that his Majesty had commanded him to have with him, he had found the posture of his Majesty's mind to be clear and distinct, so much so, that he appeared to be perfectly capable of conversing on any subject that might be proposed to him. What step might be proposed, it ought, he should conceive, to be grounded on a view of his Majesty's health, as near to the moment of the proceeding as possible, and therefore it was impossible for him at that time to anticipate the measure, or say what it might be.—The House adjourned to

MONDAY, March 2

Lord Dudley Ward took the oaths and his seat.

The Duke of Leinster took the oaths and his seat as Viscount Leinster

The order of the day being read for the House going into a Committee on the Regency Bill,

The Lord Chancellor rose, and said, the accounts of his Majesty's health being every day more and more favourable, he should content himself with reminding their Lordships, that the late adjournments had been proposed on the principle of bringing the pressure of public affairs as gradually as possible under his Majesty's notice, and therefore on the same principle he should move, "That the order of the day be adjourned to Thursday next."

This motion being agreed to nem. dis. their Lordships at five o'clock adjourned to

THURSDAY, March 5

The order of the day being read for their Lordships going into a Committee on the further consideration of the Regency Bill,

The Lord Chancellor left the woolsack, and informed their Lordships, that since their last adjournment his Majesty had found his health so far re-established and confirmed, that he had expected the intention of signifying on Tuesday next, to his Parliament, what business was necessary to be taken into consideration, he should therefore move that their Lordships do adjourn to Tuesday next. Ordered nem. con.

TUESDAY, March 10

In consequence of a message from their Lordships to the Commons, desiring their attendance, the Speaker and a considerable number of the Members attended in this House, to hear his Majesty's Commission read. The Commissioners were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, the two Secretaries of State, &c.

The Lord Chancellor addressed the Lords and Commons to the following effect, viz. "That his Majesty, not thinking fit to be present this day, in his Royal Person, had been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued under the Great Seal, authorising and commanding the Commissioners who were before appointed to hold this Parliament, to open and declare certain further causes for holding the same."

The Commission was then read; after which his Lordship delivered the following Message from his Majesty

"My Lord and Gentlemen,

"In obedience to his Majesty's commands, and by virtue of both Commissions already mentioned to you (one of which has now been read), we proceed to lay before you such further matters as his Majesty has judged proper to be communicated to his Parliament

"His Majesty being, by the blessing of Providence, happily recovered from the severe indisposition with which he has been afflicted, and being enabled to attend to the public affairs of his kingdoms, has commanded me to convey to you his warmeſt acknowledgments for the additional proofs which you have given of your affectionate attachment to his perſon, and of your zealous concern for the honour and intereſts of his Crown, and the ſecurity and good government of his dominions.

"The interruption which has neceſſarily been occaſioned to the public buſineſs will, his Majeſty doubts not, afford you an additional inducement to apply yourſelves, with as little delay as poſſible, to the different objects of national concern which require your attention.

"His Majeſty has likewiſe ordered us to acquaint you that, ſince the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion, he has concluded a Treaty of Defenſive Alliance with his good Brother the King of Pruſſia, copies of which will be laid before you: that his Majeſty's endeavours were employed, during the laſt ſummer, in conjunction with his allies, in order to prevent, as much as poſſible, the extenſion of hoſtilities in the North, and to manifeſt his deſire of effecting a general pacification: that no opportunity will be neglected on his part, to promote this ſalutary object; and that he has, in the mean time, the ſatisfaction of receiving, from all foreign Courts, continued aſſurances of their friendly diſpoſitions to this country.

"Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

"We are commanded by his Majeſty to acquaint you that the eſtimates for the current year will forthwith be laid before you; and that he is perſuaded of your readineſs to make the neceſſary proviſions for the ſeveral branches of the public ſervice.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We have particularly in charge from his Majeſty to aſſure you, that you cannot ſo effectually meet the moſt earneſt wiſh of his Majeſty's heart, as by perſevering in your uniform exertions for the public welfare, and by improving every occaſion to promote the proſperity of his faithful people, from whom his Majeſty has received ſuch repeated and affecting marks of invariable zeal, loyalty, and attachment, and whoſe happineſs he muſt ever conſider as inſeparable from his own."

After the Commons had retired, a motion was made for an humble addreſs to his Majeſty, congratulating him on his happy recovery, and thanking him for his gracious communication, was made by

The Earl of Cheſterfield, who expreſſed his high ſatisfaction at the fortunate circumſtance which had occaſioned the Houſe to aſſemble that day. The reſtoration of his Majeſty's health deſerved to be conſidered as a great national bleſſing; and he truſted that the feelings of the people at large coincided with his own on that joyful occaſion. He made ſome remarks on the preſent reign, of which he ſpoke in terms of great encomium. He then adverted to the late proceedings of Parliament, and gave it as his opinion, that the meaſures which had been propoſed towards the ſupply of the defect in the executive government, were the moſt wiſe and conſtitutional that could have been adopted. His Lordſhip concluded his ſpeech with obſerving, that he had embraced the opportunity of moving this addreſs to a Monarch who was juſt veſted by his people, as the higheſt honour that he could enjoy.

Lord Cathcart was happy in ſeconding the noble Earl's motion. It was beyond his power to deſcribe the emotions of joy which he himſelf, and (he doubted not) every individual who heard him, felt on this occaſion. Their gratitude to the Divine Being for the mercy he had thus extended to the nation, would alſo keep pace with their joy. To make a proper eſtimate of the joy and gratitude the noble Lords muſt reflect on the ſorrow they felt at the firſt rumour of his Majeſty's illneſs, as well as on the dangers and difficulties it had involved.—He then made ſome remarks on the conduct of the Miniſtry, who, by a timely ſtep, had reſcued the nation from the jaws of a tempeſtuous ſea.

Earl Stanhope ſeconded the motion, and ſaid, that while he acknowledged, in common with every perſon in the nation, the goodneſs of the Omnipotent in reſtoring his Majeſty, a doubt roſe in his mind with reſpect to the parliamentary proceedings now ſuggeſted. The two Houſes had unanimouſly adopted a reſolution, that the King was incapacitated, by indiſpoſition, from executing the duties of his function, and they had claimed a right of ſupplying the defect thus produced, and had proceeded to make proviſion accordingly. A bill was now in progreſs through that Houſe, in which was a clauſe, ſpecifying the manner in which his Majeſty was to reſume the reins of government. The Queen and her Council were to decide when his Majeſty ſhould be capable of reſuming his government. Now the two Houſes having ſatisfied, by the examination of Phyſicians, aſcertained the fact that the King was incapable, and having, by a clauſe in the Bill, declared their ſenſe as to the manner in which the nation ſhould be ſatisfied of the King's reſtored powers, he wiſhed to know whether the preſent meaſure was ſtrictly parliamentary? He ſpoke only for the ſake of order. He had no heſitation in giving full confidence as to the fact of his Majeſty's reſtored restored health, but it was essential that they should act strictly in consonance to order. If the King could declare himself well, and of himself resume the reins of government, why introduce the clause into the Bill, by which the Queen and her Council must previously declare his capacity? If that clause was right, surely the present measure was wrong. He urged the House to avoid rashness and precipitation; and he wished the present motion might be deferred only for sufficient time to enable the House to do away the resolution that stood on their Journals.

The Lord Chancellor expressed his astonishment that any noble Lord should have suggested a doubt of the propriety of the measure. As to the clause introduced into the Bill which was in its progress through the House, the noble Earl was mistaken as to the principle on which it was founded, and also as to the tendency. In the first place, surely no declaration of the two Houses on occasion of the King's illness could take from him the right of governing, nor could any clause in such Bill interrupt his exercise of his powers on the restoration of his health. Neither would the Bill in question, or the Bill itself, vest the powers of which he wished to bury it (a striking oblivion) founded on the declaration of the Houses. The power was founded on the fact of the King's [illegible]—a fact of which Parliament had the best testimony, namely, that the King neither met the Parliament nor allowed any Commission for the duty to be executed by others, as had been done [illegible] day. It was his peculiar duty from his office, to keep the happy medium on the subject; and he never could consent to a manner, after the last precedent, that no Commission had been issued, the two Houses proceeded to take upon themselves the task of providing for the emergency then, in framing a temporary Government, they introduced the clause alluded to by the noble Lord, as they thought it right, that the Queen were to have the Government entrusted to her, might more decidedly determine that there might be no doubt upon the [illegible] which his Majesty was to resume the reins of Government on his restoration to health. He thought the noble Earl would not persist in his motion when he should have more maturely considered the subject.

Earl Stanhope denied that he had made any motion, or to the intended to make any; he had only suggested doubts that struck him on the subject.

The question was then put on Lord Chesterfield's motion, and the address was agreed to nem. con.

The Lords with white wands were despatched to wait on his Majesty to know [illegible] Houses should attend him with the address.

Lord Mansfield moved a congratulatory address to the Queen, on the recovery of her Royal consort, which was readily agreed to.

The Regency Bill was then ordered, on the motion of Lord Hawkesbury, to be for-ever superseded and rejected.

At a quarter before six their Lordships adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 12.

The Earl of Salisbury reported to the House his Majesty's answer to the address of Tuesday last. The address and answer were ordered to be printed, which are as follow:

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your Throne, and return our most humble thanks for the gracious Speech which your Majesty has commanded to be made to both Houses of Parliament.

"We most sincerely congratulate your Majesty on your happy recovery from your late indisposition, and upon your being again enabled to attend to the urgent concerns of your kingdoms, and to exercise personally your Royal Authority.

"We acknowledge, with all possible thankfulness, the goodness of Almighty God, in due attention to the prayers of a loyal, affectionate and afflicted people, and in restoring your Majesty to the wishes of your faithful subjects, and we most earnestly hope that the health of your Majesty's just and happy Government may long be continued to us.

"We humbly offer to your Majesty our most sincere professions of gratitude for your gracious acceptance of our best endeavours to prove our zeal and affectionate attachment to your person and our anxious concern for the honour and interests of your Crown, and the [illegible] good government of your dominions.

"Your Majesty may be assured that we will with [illegible] apply ourselves to the consideration of the different objects of national concern which [illegible] our attention.

"We return it humbly thank your Majesty for the order which [illegible] been graciously pleased to give for laying before this House a copy of the Treaty of Defensive Alliance which your Majesty has concluded with the King of Prussia.

"We are sensible that your Majesty's endeavours, in conjunction with your Allies, to prevent as much as possible the extension of hostilities in the North of Europe, and to contribute to the restoration of general tranquility

[illegible], are the natural result of your Majesty's known wisdom and humanity; and we have a full confidence in the continuance of your exertions towards promoting so salutary an object

"We hear with satisfaction that your Majesty continues to receive from all foreign Courts the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country

"We are conscious, Sir, that we endeavour to ourselves the approbation of your Majesty, when we attend to the public welfare, and to the advancement of the prosperity of your people, whose zeal, loyalty, and attachment to your Majesty, are the natural and spontaneous effects of their uniform experience of your Majesty's virtues, and of the constant blessings derived from your mild and auspicious government"

His MAJESTY's most Gracious ANSWER.

"My Lords,

"This very dutiful and affectionate address calls forth my warmest thanks; the "sentiments expressed in it have so universally prevailed among my loving subjects, that they must, if possible, increase "my solicitude for the prosperity and happiness of this, my native country

The Queen's answer to Lord Aylesbury was to the following effect

"That her Majesty was sensible of the "great confidence which the Parliament had "placed in her hands"

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, without a single word by way of preface, moved that this House do adjourn to Tuesday next.

Mr Vyner rose, and expressed his surprise that the Right Hon Gentleman had not assigned some reason for the motion he had just made He wished that gentleman to inform him whether there was good authority for the hope now entertained of his Majesty's speedy restoration to perfect health.

The Minister not thinking proper to answer Mr Vyner's interrogatory,

The question of adjournment was again put, and agreed to by the House.

TUESDAY, Feb 24.

This being the day appointed to ballot for a Committee to try the merits of the Colchester petitions, and the Speaker at four o'clock not being able to count more than 84 Members, they adjourned to

WEDNESDAY, Feb 25

The Speaker was not more successful this day than he was yesterday, and a little before four o'clock, finding that there were not 100 Members assembled, without which number he could not proceed to a ballot, he adjourned the House to

One hundred Members being assembled, they proceeded to ballot for a Committee to try the merits of Mr Tierney's petition on the Colchester election

A new writ was ordered to be issued for the election of a Representative to serve in Parliament for the city of Worcester, in the room of the Hon William Ward, now Viscount Dudley and Ward

Mr Addington moved to discharge the order of the day standing for Friday the 6th of March, for balloting a Committee to examine the merits of Lord Hood's petition against the Westminster election, for the purpose of moving to have the Committee appointed on Friday the 3d day of April next.

Mr Bouverie wished the Hon Gentleman would assign some reason for this motion

Mr Addington said the two gentlemen interested, for their mutual convenience, agreed to the motion of postponing the Committee, which would also be convenient to the House, as it would not interrupt the public business, which necessarily must be brought forward before that period.

The question being then put, the first order was discharged, and the 3d of April appointed for the House balloting a Committee.

The

The Chancellor of the [illegible] that, as no public business was before the House, it could be attended with no inconvenience to adjourn to Monday; he therefore moved, "that this House, at its rising, do adjourn to Monday next"

This motion was agreed to without any observation

MONDAY, March 2.

Richard Ford, Esq took the oaths and his seat for East Grinstead

Mr Barnard was sworn and took his seat for Aylesbury

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the late interruption of public business, as they well knew, had been occasioned by his Majesty's indisposition, but would now be removed by the happy circumstance of his Majesty's recovery In order, therefore, to allow as much time to confirm that recovery as the state of public affairs would admit, he meant to propose a short adjournment, to which he hoped there would be no objection, and therefore, with leave of the House, would move, That, at their rising, the House do adjourn to Thursday next

This motion was agreed to nem con and the House adjourned

THURSDAY, March 5.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose and said, from the present happy state of his Majesty's health, he had the pleasure to inform the House, it was probable that they would receive a communication from the King on Tuesday next he should therefore move the House to adjourn to Tuesday next. This motion was agreed to without any debate.

TUESDAY, March 10

Richard Wigley, Esq took the oaths and his seat for the city of Worcester

Mr. Neville, Chairman of the Colchester Committee, stated that Sir William Young had been absent from that Committee on the two last days of their sitting

Mr Wintour, a gentleman of the faculty, was immediately called to the bar; and being questioned on the cause of Sir Wm Young's absence, replied, that that gentleman was too much indisposed to be able to attend the Committee

The House then resolved, on the motion of Mr. Neville, that the Committee should have permission to prosecute their enquiries without the presence of Sir Wm Young

A petition for leave to establish an Antitontine Society in Westminster was ordered to be referred to a private Committee

Much private business was transacted before the Commons received a message from the Lords, to attend the reading of his Majesty's message

[redacted] Earl Gower rose and [illegible] similar to that which the Earl of [illegible] had proposed in the other House. [illegible] with stating his inability for public [illegible] a circumstance which would have prevented him from rising on any other occasion than the present joyful event of his Majesty's recovery. For several months past, a melancholy interregnum had taken place, and the State had resembled a dismasted vessel, which, however, was now safely brought into port. The Sovereign was restored to the ardent wishes and prayers of a loyal people, and he hoped that they would long continue to enjoy the best of Governments under the best of Kings Compared with this pleasing event, the other topics mentioned in the speech were so light and trivial, that he would not say a word respecting them He concluded with moving an address in the usual form

Mr Yorke seconded Lord Gower's motion He adverted to the joy which the whole nation could not but feel on his Majesty's restoration to health He then begged leave to say a few words on the late proceedings of Parliament, although he by no means wished to allude to them in such a manner as to disturb the unanimity which ought to prevail on this occasion. Let us, he said, congratulate ourselves on having acted with caution, and on having adopted measures, without regard to private interest, for preserving the dignity of the Crown, and the rights of the people

Let us congratulate ourselves, that his Majesty has an opportunity of applauding the steps taken by his Parliament The moment that announced the King's recovery appeared to him particularly auspicious; for, in addition to that great blessing, the situation of this country with respect to foreign politics was exceedingly favourable the wars in which we were engaged in on the Continent resulted from the great ability of his Right Hon. Friend (Mr Pitt), in whom every foreign Court placed, as this Country placed, the utmost confidence; his integrity, his ability, and his prudent Administration, had placed this country in the utmost grandeur and respectability —In alluding to the treaty with Prussia, he noticed what had fallen from a Right Hon Gentleman opposite him (Mr Fox) at the time of this country's interfering in the troubles of Holland on that occasion the Right Hon Gentleman declared he approved of the measure on the ground of Ministers pursuing further Continental con-

[illegible] and the right fully answer the unexampled exertions of Administration for the [illegible] of their country. There was no part of the speech, or of the Address, that in his opinion was liable to the least objection, it was impossible for them to use expressions too strong in the Address to his Majesty

Mr. Fox did not rise for the purpose of disturbing the unanimous joy and loyalty of the day; on the contrary, he sincerely hoped that the Address might be voted nemine contradicente Far from rising to cause dissensions, he rose solely to deprecate that part of the Hon Gentleman's speech, which seemed so industriously inserted for no other purpose than to destroy that unanimity which he had professed to hope He was exceedingly willing to declare that he saw not a word either in the Speech, or in the Address, to which he had the least objection: the manner in which the noble Lord (Lord Gower) had moved the Address, did honour to his understanding and his heart, and shewed him to be a warm and loyal subject of his King: he had heard many Addresses moved, but never heard one moved with greater elegance and propriety The Hon Gentleman who had seconded the noble Lord's motion, had not however been so prudent, he had chosen to mix, in his support of an Address to his Majesty, his approbation of the King's Minister. He (Mr Fox) thought, that on that day, the gentlemen on the other side of the House might have kept the Minister a little back, and made the King their only subject; the conduct of the Minister might meet future discussion he would not enter into that discussion then, the only matter before them being his Majesty's Speech, and the Address moved. He had no objection to the idea expressed in the speech by his Majesty's thanking the Commons for their care of his crown, and the interests of his people: such an idea every King of this country ought to entertain of his Commons, whose duty it was to preserve the dignity of the crown, and the interests of the people, he did however object to the use the Hon. Gentleman had made of that idea, not thinking it right that it should be insinuated from any expression in a King's speech, that his Majesty had examined into the proceedings of the House, and had expressed his approbation of this or that side The speech was always considered as the speech of the Minister, it was therefore improbable that he would in such speech applaud his own measures; and, if such approbation had been intended, it would have been highly improper, as the measures alluded to were not completed. From what he knew of his Majesty, he held too high an opinion of his love of equity and justice, to suppose for a moment that his Majesty would decide between two parties without hearing both, and having full explanation given of their conduct, he was sure that his Majesty would not, and he was equally sure that no opportunity had offered itself to give any explanation. Notwithstanding every thing that had fallen from the Hon Gentleman, he would not be prevented from uniting in the general joy of his Majesty's recovery, and every person in the House could with the greatest propriety, and he hoped they would, unanimously vote the Address He concluded by expressing his disapprobation of the doctrine of measuring the attachment to a King by the attachment to his Ministers, as it was a well-known truth that those who might most oppose a Minister, might be the most loyal subjects in his Majesty's dominions

The question on the Address being put, it was carried nem con

The Marquis of Graham now rose to move an Address to the Queen, whose conduct had endeared her to the country, and whose exemplary and brilliant virtues were looked up to with the highest respect and admiration by every Prince and by every Court of Europe He concluded by moving that a message be sent to her Majesty, congratulating her on the King's happy recovery and to assure her Majesty of their high respect for her exemplary virtues, and that they rejoice in every circumstance that contributes to her Majesty's domestic happiness.

Mr Fox thought, that if an Address was voted to the Queen, there should also be one to the Prince of Wales

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not know of any precedent for addressing a Prince of Wales on such an occasion, though there were precedents of addressing the Queen

The question was put and carried nem con.

At half past five o'clock the House adjourned

WEDNESDAY, March 11

It then prayed that he might be diſcharged.

Mr Neville made the motion for his being diſcharged, on paying his fees; which being agreed to he was called to the Bar, and acquainted with it by the Speaker

Sir G. Cooper and General Burgoyne propoſed their objections to the precipitancy of the buſineſs, and the former propoſed, that for the preſent, no further eſtimates ſhould be voted, but ſuch as were neceſſary for paſſing the Mutiny Bill

To this the Secretary at War had no objection, if it appeared either agreeable or requiſite—neither of which, however, did he underſtand to be the caſe, as there was no alteration from the eſtimates of laſt year, but the addition of a company to the cavalry in the Eaſt Indies, in the ſame manner as the regiments had been augmented at home.

COPIES of the ADDRESS from the PARLIAMENT of IRELAND presented to His R. HIGHNESS the PRINCE of WALES, on Friday February 27, 1789, and HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS's ANSWER

To his ROYAL HIGHNESS GEORGE, PRINCE of WALES

The Humble Address of the LORDS SPIRITUAL and TEMPORAL and COMMONS in Parliament assembled.

May it please your Royal Highness,

WE, his Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons of Ireland in Parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your Royal Highness with hearts full of the most loyal and affectionate attachment to the Person and Government of your Royal Father, to express the deepest and most grateful sense of the numerous blessings which we have enjoyed under that illustrious House, whose accession to the throne of these realms has established civil and constitutional liberty upon a basis, which, we trust, will never be shaken; and, at the same time, to condole with your Royal Highness upon the grievous malady with which it has pleased Heaven to afflict the best of Sovereigns

We have, however, the consolation of reflecting, that this severe calamity hath not been visited upon us, until the virtues of your Royal Highness have been so matured as to enable your Royal Highness to discharge the duties of an important trust, for the performance whereof the eyes of all his Majesty's subjects of both kingdoms are directed to your Royal Highness

We therefore beg leave humbly to request, that your Royal Highness will be pleased to take upon you the government of this realm, during the continuation of his Majesty's present indisposition, and no longer, and under the style and title of PRINCE REGENT of IRELAND, in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, to exercise and administer, according to the laws and constitution of this kingdom, all regal powers jurisdictions and prerogatives to the Crown and Government thereof belonging

His HIGHNESS's ANSWER.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Address from the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons of Ireland, which you have presented to me, demands my warmest and earliest thanks

If any thing could add to the esteem and affection I have for the people of Ireland, it would be the loyal and affectionate attachment to the person and government of the King my Father, manifested in the Address of the two Houses

What they have done, and their manner of doing it, is a new proof of their undiminished duty to his Majesty, of their uniform attachment to the House of Brunswick, and of their constant care and attention to maintain inviolate the concord and connection between the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, so indispensibly necessary to the prosperity, the happiness, and liberties of both

If in conveying my grateful sentiments on their conduct, in relation to the King my Father, and to the inseparable interests of the two kingdoms, I find it impossible adequately to express my feelings on what relates to myself, I trust you will not be the less disposed to believe, that I have an understanding to comprehend the value of what they have done, a heart that must remember, and principles that will not suffer me to abuse their confidence

But the fortunate change which has taken place in the circumstances which gave occasion to the Address agreed to by the Lords and Commons of Ireland, induces me for a few days to delay giving a final answer, trusting that the joyful event of his Majesty's resuming the personal exercise of his Royal Authority, may then render it only necessary for me to repeat those sentiments of gratitude and affection for the loyal and generous people of Ireland which I feel indelibly imprinted on my heart

The following are the names of the Noblemen and Gentlemen who accompanied the Lords and Gentlemen Commissioners * on the delivery of the above Address:

* The COMMISSIONERS were as follow

The DUKE of LEINSTER—second son of the late Duke, and the only peer of that dignity in Ireland.

EARL CHARLEMONT—who was chosen Commander in Chief of the Volunteers.

Mr. CONOLLY—the last, in remainder, of the male line of his family. His estate is above thirty thousand pounds a year

Mr O NEIL—of a very ancient family, at Shanes Castle in the North of Ireland.

Mr PONSONBY—son to the Speaker of the Irish House of Commons of that name, who married Lady Betty Cavendish, aunt to the present Duke of Devonshire.

Mr.

Duke of Devonſhire, Mr. Burke, Lord Darnley,
Lord Inchaquin, Mr George Conway, Lord Galtrim,
Lord Fitzwilliam, Mr. Bingham, Lord Beſborough,

Mr JAMES STEWART— a country gentleman of great property, and [illegible] Killymoon, from the name of his chief ſeat, he has the honour of repreſenting in Parliament the county of Tyrone

The following PROTESTS againſt the preceding Address were entered on the JOURNALS in IRELAND.

Diſſentient,

1ſt, Becauſe the Addreſs in queſtion, to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, is an Addreſs, requeſting, that he will be pleaſed to take upon him the Government of this Realm, in ſuch manner as is therein mentioned; and to exerciſe and adminiſter according to the laws and conſtitution of this Kingdom, all Royal powers, juriſdiction, and prerogatives to the Crown and Government thereof belonging, without any law or authority whatſoever that we know of, authoriſing him ſo to do.

2dly, Becauſe we are apprehenſive, that the ſaid Addreſs may be conſtrued to be a meaſure tending to diſturb and weaken that great Conſtitutional Union, whereby, as fully declared, enacted, and ſpecified in ſundry Acts of Parliament in this kingdom, this Realm of Ireland is for ever united and knit to the Imperial Crown of England, and is a Member appertaining and rightfully belonging thereto

3dly, Becauſe, although in every ſentiment of duty, affection, and reſpect towards his Royal Highneſs, we hold ourſelves equal to, and will not be exceeded by any of thoſe who join in the ſaid Addreſs, or by any other perſon whatſoever, and are and ever ſhall be ready to lay down our lives and fortunes in the ſupport and maintenance of the juſt rights of our moſt gracious Sovereign, and of every branch of his Royal and Auguſt Family—we cannot pay any compliment to his Royal Highneſs, or to any one, at the expence of what we conſider as great Conſtitutional Principles; and we cannot (for ſuch are the workings of duty, affection, and reſpect in our breaſts) join in the ſaid Addreſs, which may, as we are apprehenſive, bring difficulty and embarraſſment upon his Royal Highneſs, already too much oppreſſed by the great calamity which hath befallen our moſt gracious Sovereign, his Royal Father.

Diſſentient,

For the Second Reaſon in the foregoing Proteſt

And alſo, Becauſe, feeling every ſentiment of duty, reſpect, and attachment to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, and thinking him the only proper perſon to be appointed to this high ſtation, I conſider, that to addreſs his Royal Highneſs to accept the Regency of this Kingdom, before we have any authority to know that he is as yet appointed Regent of Great Britain, is inviting him to aſſume a power, which under the actual and exiſting Conſtitution of Ireland, he cannot exerciſe, inaſmuch as, by Statute 10th of Henry VII no Bill can receive the Royal Aſſent here, that is not certified from Great Britain, under the Great Seal of England; and until his Royal Highneſs ſhall have authority to direct the uſe of that Great Seal, he cannot diſcharge the functions of the Royal Office for Ireland; it being impoſſible, according to the laws and the Conſtitution of this kingdom, that any perſon ſhould be Regent of Ireland, who is not at the ſame time Regent of Great Britain.

GLANDORE.

Diſſentient,

1ſt, Becauſe with an anxious deſire that the Regency of this kingdom, during his Majeſty's indiſpoſition, ſhould be conferred on his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales in a manner moſt expreſſive of reſpect and affection to his Royal Highneſs, and convinced that his Royal Highneſs will think that mode of appointment moſt expreſſive of duty and affection which is conſtitutional, and muſt conduce to preſerve the connexion between Great Britain and Ireland inſeparable, we conſider an Addreſs of the two Houſes of Parliament, purporting

of

[illegible]	Lord Lucan,	Lord G. Cavendish, ſen.	Mr Fraſer,
[illegible]	Gen Conway,	The Hon. T. Pelham,	Biſhop of Clonfert, [illegible]	Lord Rawdon,

On

of his own authority to confer Royal Power at a time when they are not fully competent to paſs a bill for the purpoſe of effectually providing for the exerciſe of the ſame, to be a moſt dangerous violation of the fundamental principles of the Conſtitution

2dly, Becauſe the connexion between Great Britain and Ireland (on which the ſafety of the Conſtitution in Church and State depends) is preſerved and maintained by the unity of the Executive Power alone; and yet the Addreſs propoſed by the Reſolution now paſſed, is to appoint his Royal Highneſs Regent of Ireland, without our being certain that his Royal Highneſs is or will be Regent of Great Britain, and without making any proviſion that his Royal Highneſs ſhall not continue to be Regent of Ireland longer than he ſhall be Regent of Great Britain: thus expoſing to chance and accident the preſervation of the only bond of that connection between the countries, upon which all that is dear to us depends, and making a precedent that may be of the moſt fatal conſequences to poſterity

Tyrone,	Wm Oſſory,
Wm, Kilmain and Ferns,	Bellamont.

Diſſentient,

For the firſt reaſon in the Proteſt immediately preceding

And alſo—Becauſe we conſider, that if by virtue of this Addreſs alone his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales ſhall take upon himſelf the Royal Powers of this kingdom, his Royal Highneſs will, by ſuch aſſumption, be drawn in to decide upon an important Conſtitutional queſtion, equally affecting Great-Britain and Ireland

And alſo—Becauſe we conſider theſe words in the Addreſs, "and no longer," as unneceſſary, and at the ſame time diſreſpectful to the Prince of Wales, tending to convey an idea that this country can confer, or that the Prince might continue to hold over the powers of a Regent for a longer time than the continuance of the King's indiſpoſition incapacitated his Majeſty from being reſtored to the full exerciſe of the power appertaining to the Crowns of Great-Britain and Ireland,

CARHAMPTON CONYNGHAM.

The following PROTESTS were alſo entered on the LORDS JOURNALS in IRELAND, on Friday Feb 20, upon a Motion for putting off the Conſideration of appointing PARLIAMENTARY COMMISSIONERS to carry the ADDRESS to the PRINCE OF WALES to the 1ſt of October.

Diſſentient,

1ſt, Becauſe the appointment of Parliamentary Commiſſioners, by ballot, the 27th of June 1661, to ſuperintend the intereſts of the Iriſh Parliament, and to counteract private claims and petitions in England, was in conſequence of a conference with the Houſe of Commons, in which weighty reaſons, which appear upon the Journals, were aſſigned by them for the adoption of this meaſure,—and becauſe this memorable precedent was not duly attended to in the preſent proceeding.

2dly, Becauſe that Commiſſion, in 1661, coſt this country twelve thouſand pounds—and although the Noble Commiſſioners, with proper dignity, ſeem to diſclaim any idea of pecuniary compenſation, ſuch a meaſure ought not to be adopted, nor ſuch a precedent created, unleſs upon moſt momentous national concerns, upon the ground of great public inconvenience and expence in future.

3dly, Becauſe it was admitted in debate, that the Addreſs was incomplete and inefficient, without an Act of Parliament,—the proceeding for this reaſon has begun at the wrong end—and I ſhould be ſorry that the noble and reſpectable Commiſſioners ſhould carry a premature and nugatory invitation to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, to take upon him an office intended to be created by law, which as yet has no legal exiſtence in this country

4thly, Becauſe the tranſfer of full regal powers from a Britiſh Monarch upon the throne to his ſucceſſor, reſembles the irregular and violent proceedings againſt King Edward the Second 5thly, Becauſe the ſtyle and title of Prince Regent of Ireland is a fanciful deſignation, of which no reſemblance can be found in our annals——nor are the terms of that title (in my humble opinion) juſtified by courteſy or precedent—countenanced by grammar, or warranted by law.

6thly, Becauſe

On Thurſday morning the 12th of March the Peruck of Wa[illegible] the Commiſſioners from Ireland waited on to take leave of her Royal [illegible]

6thly, Becauſe there are authentic accounts of his Majeſty's progreſſive [illegible] well founded hopes of his ſhortly re-aſſuming the Royal function[illegible] that an Act of Regency will not be neceſſary

7thly, Becauſe if we may reaſon from the paſt to the future, from what has [illegible] happen, hazard conjectures upon probable conſequences, and reflect upon his M[illegible] magnanimity upon the proceedings in the Regency Bill in 1765, it may be ſuppoſed [illegible] due ſubmiſſion, that it is not impoſſible that our gracious Sovereign may provide, with the [illegible] vice of his faithful Parliaments, for ſuch aid and aſſiſtance as may be expedient and neceſſary [illegible] and make thoſe permanent proviſions, during his reign, which may accord with his own, and with the wiſhes of his people

MOUNTMORRES.

PROTEST upon the RESOLUTION declaring the RIGHT of the TWO HOUSES to create a PRINCE REGENT of IRELAND

Diſſentient

Becauſe the undoubted right, and the indiſpenſible duty, declared in the [illegible] Reſolution to have been exerciſed and diſcharged by the Lords and Commons of Ireland, and to which it is alledged they are alone competent, do not, in any legal or ſound ſenſe, appear to them to have any exiſtence —And becauſe the aſſuming a right in the Lords and Commons alone, to confer upon his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales the government of this kingdom, under the title and title of Prince Regent of Ireland, in the name and on the behalf of his Majeſty, to exerciſe and adminiſter, according to the laws and conſtitution of this kingdom, all regal powers and prerogatives to the Crown and Government thereof belonging or the addreſſing his Royal Highneſs to take upon himſelf ſuch government in manner aforeſaid, before he be enabled by law ſo to do, ſeem to us altogether unwarrantable, and to be highly dangerous in its tendency to diſturb and break the conſtitutional union, whereby this realm of Ireland is for ever knit and united to the Imperial Crown of England, on which connexion the happineſs of both kingdoms eſſentially depends, and we are the more apprehenſive of danger, leſt the ſo doing ſhould be conſidered as tending to the prejudice, diſturbance, or derogation of the King's Majeſty in, of, or for the Crown of this realm of Ireland

PROTEST upon the VOTE OF CENSURE * on the LORD LIEUTENANT for declining to tranſmit the ADDRESS of the TWO HOUSES to the PRINCE OF WALES

Diſſentient,

Becauſe, when his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, his Majeſty's repreſentative here, hath told us, that under the impreſſions of his official duty, and of the oath † that he hath taken as Chief Governor of this kingdom, he is obliged to decline tranſmitting to Great-Britain the Addreſs of both Houſes of Parliament to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, it doth not conſiſt with that decorum, with that juſtice, and with that grave proceeding with which this Houſe, the great and dernier Court of Juſtice, ſhould ever act, to proceed to a condemnation and cenſure of his Excellency, without being allowed to enquire and look into the conſtruction of his oath, or into his oath — And beſides, we cannot conſider it as a want of reſpect to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, the not tranſmitting the ſaid Addreſs to him, as it would expoſe his Royal Highneſs to difficulty and embarraſſment, by laying him under the diſagreeable neceſſity of deciding upon great, legal, and conſtitutional, principles, in which his Royal Highneſs's future intereſt, and the rights of the Imperial Crown which he is born to inherit,

The substance of the Prince's Answer was, to express, in the most dutiful manner, his sense of the importance of the two Houses, by congratulate the kingdom on the event that made his acceptance of the proposed restrictions no longer necessary; to recommend concord between the two countries, as the chief source of mutual strength; and finally to express his grateful satisfaction that the Parliament of Ireland should so laudably endeavour to preserve the King's prerogative from being diminished."

† On Monday March 2, the Speaker of the House of Commons of Ireland informed the House, that a Letter had been delivered to him in the Chair, which he read to the House, and which contained as follows:

"To the Right Hon. the SPEAKER of the HOUSE of COMMONS of IRELAND.

"SIR,

"WE have the honour to acquaint you, for the information of the House of Commons, that in pursuance to their order, we have presented the address of both Houses to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who was graciously pleased to give us the inclosed Answer [which Answer is inserted p 236] from which it will appear to the House, that it is our duty to wait his Royal Highness's further command.

After the Prince's Answer was read, Mr Grattan immediately moved, that a copy of the said letter, with his Royal Highness's Answer, be entered on the Journals of the House. Ordered.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have it particularly in charge from his Majesty to assure you, that the prosperity of his faithful and loyal People of Ireland, from whom his Majesty has repeatedly received the strongest proofs of affectionate attachment to his sacred Person, will ever be near to his heart; and that his Majesty is fully persuaded, that your zeal for the public welfare will enable him to promote by every wise and salutary measure the interests of this kingdom.

"I cannot conclude this communication to you, without expressing my fullest conviction, that his Majesty's faithful Parliament of Ireland does not yield to any of his subjects in sincere and devout acknowledgements to Almighty God for the restoration of his Majesty's health, and in fervent prayers, that a long continuance of that blessing may secure to his People the happiness which they have constantly enjoyed under his Majesty's mild and auspicious Government."

An Address of Congratulation * to his

His Lordship [redacted] happy [redacted] subject [redacted] the [redacted] heard him; that no one could [redacted] entirely that [redacted] Lordship [redacted] was now paid for their [redacted] moving Address; but that he could not help trespassing upon their Lordships' goodness, in offering to their consideration that precise one, to which he was persuaded they would all unite in giving their heartiest and unanimous concurrence; that we might now expect that harmony, peace, and tranquillity, which we had ever experienced under his Majesty's mild and prosperous reign: and he was convinced it was unnecessary for him to say more upon the subject, as he perfectly well knew their Lordships would be most anxious to express their happiness upon the occasion, and at the same time to testify their loyalty, affection, and duty, to their Sovereign.

His Lordship was particularly animated upon the subject, and spoke with great feeling and effect.

Their Lordships immediately concurred in the Address nem. con.

* The Address was as follows:

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, embrace, with unfeigned and lively joy, this opportunity of renewing to your Majesty our most dutiful and sincere professions of unalterable loyalty and affectionate attachment to your Majesty's sacred Person, Family, and Government; and of assuring your Majesty, that we find ourselves unequal to express the silent feelings of our hearts at the joyful communication which, by your Majesty's command, has been made to us, that it has pleased the Divine Providence to remove from your Majesty the severe indisposition with which you have been afflicted, and that you are now again enabled to attend to the urgent concerns of your Kingdoms, and personally to exercise your Royal Authority: That for these signal marks of Divine Favour we shall not cease to pour out the lively effusions of gratitude and thanksgiving to the Almighty, who has vouchsafed, in the plenitude of his mercy and goodness, to restore our beloved Monarch to the fervent and united prayers of his People.

"We gratefully acknowledge your Majesty's goodness, in the assurance you have been pleased to give us, that the prosperity of your loyal and faithful subjects of this Kingdom must ever be near to your heart.

"We shall endeavour to justify the confidence which your Majesty is pleased to repose in your Parliament of Ireland, by a chearful concurrence in such wise and salutary measures, as may enable your Majesty to fulfil your gracious intentions of promoting the general interests and happiness of all your dominions.

"We beg leave humbly to assure your Majesty, that sensible of the happiness which we have constantly enjoyed under your Majesty's mild and auspicious Government, we do not yield to any of your people in the sincerity with which we offer up our devout acknowledgements to Almighty God, for your Majesty's happy restoration to your former health, and that we shall unceasingly supplicate the Divine Providence for a long and uninterrupted continuance of that inestimable blessing."

[illegible] afterwards propoſed an Addreſs to the Lord Lieutenant, which was alſo agreed to unanimouſly.

In the Commons the Congratulatory Addreſs * was moved by Lord Kingſborough, who ſtated the ſatisfaction which he felt in having an opportunity of publicly expreſſing his ſincere and heartfelt joy upon his Majeſty's recovery; and he would not take up much of the time of the Houſe, as he was perfectly convinced they would join with him unanimouſly in the Addreſs which he had the honour to propoſe to them *.

The Addreſs was ſeconded by the Right Hon. David Latouche, who, in a very excellent and well-delivered ſpeech, expreſſed the pleaſure which he had in ſeconding the noble Lord's motion, as no one could ſo truly feel the happineſs which he did upon the ſubject.

Mr. Latouche ſaid, that this country had peculiarly benefited under the mild and auſpicious reign of his Majeſty; and that he was convinced the recovery of his Majeſty would preſerve the peace and proſperity of Ireland

Mr Grattan then roſe, and expreſſed the warm ſatisfaction which he felt upon this happy news, that he gave his hearty concurrence to the Addreſs, and that he could not help ſaying how much he admired the temperate, proper, and cautious manner in which it had been announced to the Houſe, that he would not ſay more, except repeating, that from his heart he rejoiced in the King's happy reſtoration

The Right Hon. Mr Brownlow alſo ſpoke to the ſame effect.

The Addreſs was carried nem. con

An Addreſs of Thanks to the Lord Lieutenant was then moved by Sir John Parnell, and ſeconded by Sir Henry Armſtronge, and carried unanimouſly.

The Committees were then immediately appointed to draw up the Addreſſes, and in the courſe of an hour all of them were preſented to his Excellency, a circumſtance unexampled in the Journals of either Houſe

THE Law of Lombardy and Lethe were revived at Drury-lane for the benefit of Mrs Siddons, who performed the Princeſs in the former, and the Fine Lady in the Latter. The Law of Lombardy is the weakeſt of Mr Jephſon's Tragedies, and never acquired much popularity. On the preſent occaſion it had all the advantages which good acting could afford it, but is ſtill unlikely to produce much dramatic effect. Change of manners has rendered Lethe already obſolete, and the Fine Lady, which Mrs Clive repreſented with ſo much

* The Addreſs was as follows:

"Moſt Gracious Sovereign,

"We, your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the Commons of Ireland, in Parliament aſſembled, beg leave to lay before your Majeſty our aſſurances of the ſincere and cordial ſatisfaction with which we are penetrated, on being informed from the Throne, by your Majeſty's command, that it has pleaſed the Divine Providence to remove from your Majeſty the ſevere indiſpoſition with which you have been afflicted, and that, by the bleſſing of Almighty God, you are now again enabled to attend to the urgent concerns of your kingdoms, and perſonally to exerciſe your Royal Authority

"Your Majeſty entertains a juſt confidence that we ſhall chearfully proceed in making ſuch proviſion as may be neceſſary for the honourable ſupport of your Majeſty's Government

"We ſhould be dead to every generous feeling, ſhould we omit to acknowledge your Majeſty's unceaſing ſolicitude for the intereſts of Ireland, or to ſecond, by every ſalutary effort, your benevolent wiſhes for the welfare of your People The numerous bleſſings derived to this kingdom from your Majeſty's auſpicious reign, are deeply imprinted in our boſoms and ſenſible as we are of the ineſtimable value of theſe benefits, we beg leave to repeat to your Majeſty upon this joyful occaſion, our moſt ſincere profeſſions of reſpect and attachment to your Royal Perſon, Family, and Government

"We conclude theſe our fervent congratulations with devout acknowledgements to the Almighty for this ſignal inſtance of his goodneſs, in reſtoring our beloved Monarch to the prayers of his afflicted people. Our gratitude for ſuch a mark of the Divine favour, is only equalled by the ardency of our wiſhes for the continuance of your Majeſty's health, and that your Majeſty may enjoy that invaluable bleſſing during a long and happy reign."

This play is rather a narrative than a drama, a verification of parts of Robertſon's Hiſtory, and is cold and unintereſting, though on a ſubject very ſuſceptible of dramatic effect. No perſon ever ſaw Banks's play on this ſubject without tears, but even the efforts of Mrs Siddons could hardly produce any at this repreſentation. The characters are brought forwards and diſappear we ſcarce know how; and a tamer Queen Elizabeth both in the writing and performing was never ſeen. The deſcription of Queen Mary's leaving the coaſt of France, verſified from Robertſon's, was the moſt poetical Some parts of the piece had a ludicrous effect, and ſome were tedious. It had a moſt powerful ſupport from the audience of the firſt night; but with every aſſiſtance of ſcenes, dreſſes, and expellent acting, will probably never be very popular.

SONG.

By the SAME

OFT I awake and think I'm free,
And boast that love affects not me;
'Tis true I look and must admire,
But then my breast no more feels fire
That cruel rage, that dreadful smart,
Which to a cinder turns the heart.
I look at, laugh at, and despise,
Till I behold my Celia's eyes,
When one kind look from that sweet maid
Will cancel every word I said.

SONG.

By the SAME

ADIEU, pretty songster, adieu,
No longer permitted to stay,
Maria has ask'd me for you,
To her then with speed wing thy way:
No more when the sun beams his ray
Shall Robin awake me from rest,
Nor soothe with his soft warbling lay
The anguish that reigns in my breast.

Sweet bird, how I envy thy fate!
Could I but like thee be approv'd,
With rapture I'd enter thy state,
To be by Maria belov'd!
Around her I'd flutter and skip,
And oft on her soft bosom repose,
Each nectar I'd take from her lips,
And singing complain of my woes.

In love's gentle notes I'd complain,
In tenderest accents bewail,
Till soften'd she'd pity my pain,
And suffer my song to prevail.
Then prithee, sweet Robin, take wing,
Thy musical power to prove,
Repeat what I taught thee to sing,
And tell her the tales of my love.

SATIRE ON A RHYMING LADY.

By the SAME.

IN days of yore, when babbling Scandal spoke,
She talk'd in common prose like other folk,
Bless us! how great the change these modern times!
'Tis ten to one but what she speaks in rhymes,
And might to poetry make some pretence,
But for the want of wit and common sense.
Where'er she deigns to ope her dirty mouth,
How'er unlikely or how'er uncouth,
She tells the sland'rous tale, and tho' absurd,
The gaping world believes it every word,
Whate'er the measure, or whate'er her view,
'Tis Scandal says it, and it must be true
Whene'er you write, with rhymes adorn your lays,
Rhyming alone has gain'd immortal praise
Tag well your lines, and plunge through thick and thin,
Sappho can write as fast as she can spin
Sappho can hymns, and odes, and lyrics write,
And Scandal says, she loves her man at night:
Sappho of yore was said to do the same,
Wrote like an Angel, yet indulged her flame.
Sappho can pray, or throw off all restraint,
Can be the filthiest de-joye or wear the saint
All saints are sinners, flesh and blood's the same,
'Tis only call'd by some religious name
Where nature points, there sins will be forgiven,
They may be sins in Earth but not in Hea-

ODE

To BRYAN EDWARDS, Esq

Occasioned by his indefatigable and energetic efforts in the cause of justice and humanity, by which the law for restraining cruelty, and for securing to slaves in Jamaica more impartial trials and other important benefits, has at length been carried through against reiterated opposition

Beati qui sunt misericordes, quoniam ipsis misericordia tribuetur

Beate es! Servus tuus et fidelis ingredere in gaudium domini tui.

WHILST birds obscene (a rav'ning train)
Low hov'ring prowl th' enfanguin'd plain,
Or darkling shun the light;
Conscious of strength and dignity,
Th' aspiring eagle soars on high,
Soars an immeasurable height!

Aloft on his strong pinions borne,
Above the clouds he meets the morn,
And fixing on the sun his stedfast eye,
The radiant orb with rapture hails!
Amidst a flood of glory sails,
Sublimely sails the sky.

So in the moral world we view
The sons of Vice, a sordid crew,

Labrin

Lab'ring with wretched arm to gain
What Virtue views with horror or disdain.
'Tis Virtue's nature ever to advance,
T' exalt her vot'ries higher still and higher,
Till quitting time for long eternity,
She soars triumphant to her native sky,
Nor stoops her wing, till in the bright abodes
Sublimely plac'd amidst her kindred Gods,
" On sainted seats" her votaries receive
Th unfading palms prepar'd for her to give
The gen'rous patriot there, in bliss complete,
Amongst applauded Angels takes his seat
Amongst the good and wise, now perfect made,
There, Edwards, shall thy gen'rous toils be paid;
When all thy arduous task is o'er,
Each part perform'd and duty done,
The race of Virtue fairly run,
And time to thee shall be no more.

From this perturbed scene where mortals jar,
And good and evil wage perpetual war,
From this dim spot call'd up to highest heav'n,
Where Virtue's sure and rich reward is giv'n,
Amongst the sons of light, there shalt thou shine,
Glory and immortality be thine,
Myriads of golden harps for thee he strung,
And rapturous songs of gratulation sung.

Scap'd from the stormy sea of life,
Thy toils, thy dangers now are o'er;
Safe from malevolence and strife,
Hail, patriot, to the peaceful shore.

Approv'd on high, thy honour'd name
No more shall Envy now defame,
No more malignant arts employ,
The excellence she thought too great,
The worth she cou'd not emulate,
With fiend-like rancour to destroy.

Lo this th' irrevocable word
In heav'n's indelible record,
The battle's fought, the race is run,
Well hast thou, faithful servant, done,
Enter the mansions of thy Lord;
His bounteous hand will here bestow
The freedom that thou lov'dst below,
When lab'ring on heaven's gracious plan,
The friend of liberty and man,
Thou fought'st (how merciful are all the brave)
To ease the rankling chains and fetters of the slave,
To bind fell Cruelty with penal laws,
And bring Astrea down to plead the wretch's cause.

GREAT Guardian Power of happy Britain, hear
The lofty voice of joy which here reſounds,
And from ev'ry Britiſh ſhore the voice rebounds
For GEORGE our King, for unto his people pray'r
As from on high, ever it hath been bleſt and true,
So ages yet unborn ſhall hail the Iſle of Liberty!

II.

Right to our hearts ſhall riſe the grateful ſtrains,
A tribute for this beſt of bleſſings giv'n
Since our Iſle was mark'd the favourite of Heav'n;
Nor ſhall it e'er be quench'd while Britain bears the name.
As from, &c.

III

And what tho' powerful nations oft have roſe
With all their force our bleſſings to deſtroy,
Still Britain's firm defence was always nigh,
And hurl'd confuſion upon all her foes.
As from, &c

IV.

From every trial ſtill ſhe roſe with glory new,
Her ſons freſh laurels in all climes attain'd,
Laurels by humanity and valour gain'd;
And the more the ſtorm did rage, the Britiſh oak ſtill firmer grew.
As from, &c.

And ev'ry Faction's baneful force hath fail'd
To blaſt the glory of the Britiſh name;
For ſtill its Guardian Spirit, e'er the flame,
O'er war and diſcord foul hath yet prevail'd
As from, &c.

VI.

But why here of wars and factions do we ſing?
The Muſe's ſtrains a nobler theme require!
And a nobler theme awaits the Muſe's lyre;
Britain reſtor'd to joy in GEORGE her King!
As from, &c.

VII.

Amidſt our general joy for bleſſings paſt,
For Britain reſcu'd from a tyrant's ſword;
And all its bleſſings firmer ſtill ſecur'd,
One gleam of joy was by dark ſhades o'ercaſt.
As from, &c

VIII.

But tho' we ſaw our Monarch fall'n a while
Beneath the raging power of dire diſtreſs,
Yet Britain's Guardian Spirit mark'd its ways,
That Britain might enjoy his longer ſmile
As from, &c

IX.

And what tho' Faction ſeiz'd the malign hour,
And Ambition arm'd, with Fury in her cauſe,
To overturn our liberty and laws,
Our Guardian watch'd his charge to make it more ſecure.
As from, &c.

X

When moſt for our Land and King we did complain,
As fall'n beneath diſtraction's utmoſt pow'r,
And ſunk our hopes, nor did expect them more;
Then the hour was come for Britain to rejoice again
As from, &c.

XI

The clouds were ſcatter'd by our Guardian's wing,
Who eaſe'd the Sun of Happineſs to ſhine
On Britain once again, with rays divine,
That Britons might rejoice ſtill more in George their King.
As from, &c.

Then once again we ſhout for joy; again
Our peeans rend the lofty arch of Heav'n
For this laſt boon to Britons ever given,
To rejoice once more in their lov'd George's reign

And O thou Guardian of happy Britain, hear
The vows we offer to the Throne of Heaven,
To remember that this glorious Jubilee,
That George was given unto his people's prayer!
As from, &c.

XIV.

And hear, ye Britons, who boast the glorious name,
Inscribe upon your hearts the grateful vow;
And for years to come let it be fresh as now,
And that your posterity may do the same.
As from ancient times it hath been blest and free,
So ages yet unborn shall hail the Isle of Liberty!

COME, Resignation, wipe the human tear
Domestic Anguish drops o'er Virtue's bier,
But selfish Sorrow hush the fond complaint,
Nor from the GOD she lov'd detain the Saint
Truth, meekness, patience, honour'd shade! were thine,
And holy Hope, and Charity divine,
Tho' these thy forfeit being could not save,
Thy Faith subdued the terrors of the grave.
Oh! if the living excellence could teach,
Death has a lotuer emphasis of speech:
In Death thy last, best lesson still impart,
And write, PREPARE TO DIE, on every heart.

SONNET

TO THE MOON

Composed while walking over SALISBURY PLAIN at Midnight.

BLEST be thy friendly light, which o'er the plain
Conducts my wand'ring steps, and guides my way
To her the best belov'd, who feels the pain
And owns the pleasure of fair Friendship's sway
Thy beams transcend the lustre of the day.
And still to thee will I my homage pay,

SECOND SONNET.

THE evening flames in May's loud'ning pride
And all the sunny hills at distance glow,
And all the brooks that thro' the valley flow,
Seem liquid gold. O! had my fate decry'd
Leisure and power to taste the sweets that glide
Thro' waken'd minds at the soft Seasons go
On their still varying progress—for the woe
My heart has felt, what balm had been supplied!
But where great Nature smiles, as here she smiles,
'Midst verdant fields and gently swelling hills,
And glassy lakes, and many murmuring rills,
And narrow wood-wild lanes, her spell beguiles
Th' impatient sighs of grief, and restores
Poets hearts to life with all its ills

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Vienna, Feb. 15.

[illegible] inclined to interfere in [illegible] ; on which account [illegible] has sent to all the Ministers [illegible] in friendship with the Porte [illegible] declaration, viz.

"The Sublime Porte, living in peace and friendship with Poland, and desirous of supporting the same without interruption, has, with all prudence and regret learned, that whilst the Republic, lawfully assembled in Diet, was employed in improving its constitutions, the Court of Russia, with its usual preponderance, is making fresh attacks on its sovereignty, and pretends to hinder them from adopting such changes in government as they think necessary, under pretext of the guarantee which they forced the Poles to accept in 1775, a guarantee which tends to [illegible] all power, by retaining them as [illegible] to Russia without the least appearance of liberty. It is a thing unheard of in the history of nations, that any State can hinder a neighbouring State from taking the deliberations it thinks proper to improve or change its interior government, and is the greatest proof that the world can have of the immeasurable ambition which Russia has always shown. In consequence of which, if ever the Sublime Porte is requested to lend their powerful assistance to deliver the Poles from the oppression they groan under, his Highness, to whom the Almighty has given a numerous host, will accomplish with the quickest expedition and fidelity, the engagements of the treaties subsisting between the Republic of Poland and the Sublime Porte, and will, in fine, do all which is required for the honour of his empire, for the support of the weak, and scourge of the powerful. This resolution of the Sublime Porte is shewn to the Minister of ——, that he may immediately inform his Court, as a friend of the Sublime Porte, and that it may be known for what motive his troops enter into the service of Poland. Given the day of the month and Moon which corresponds with the 23d of November 1788."

Stockholm, Feb 3 In the course of last week his Swedish Majesty nominated M Ludberg, Burgomaster of this town, Speaker of the Burghers, and M Olof Olofson, a farmer of the province of Ostrogothia, Speaker of the Peasants. After which the four Houses assembled, and sent the usual deputations to compliment the King and the Royal Family, and all the States were convened to assist at the opening of the Diet. The States accordingly assembled yesterday morning in the cathedral, and from thence to the hall of the States in the Palace, where the King being seated on the throne, in his royal robes, made a long speech upon the various interesting objects to be brought before the Diet. After his Majesty had ended, the Secretary of State read a paper, stating, in general terms, the care his Majesty had bestowed upon the different branches of the interior Administration. The Marshall of the Diet, and the Speakers of the three inferior Orders, then complimented his Majesty, in the names of their respective Houses, and were admitted to the honour of kissing his hand.

The four Houses being again assembled to-day, the King laid before them the propositions on which they are to deliberate, and the four orders returned immediately to their respective Houses. Lond. Gaz.

Geneva, Feb 14 All is joy in this city, the Common Council, or Assembly of the Burghers, carried the proposed articles by 1321 votes against 52, upon which all the Burghers united and brought the four Syndics home in triumph, crowned with oak boughs. Te Deum was sung, and the two united parties celebrated the change of affairs which puts this city again upon the footing it was in the year 1738, by the most splendid entertainments.

Hague, Feb 18 We have accounts from Geneva, by the way of Paris, that the famous aristocracy, instituted for some years, is entirely put an end to, the people having found means to get possession of the entire government. The arms they used to oppose the troops were the fire-engines of the city, from which they played upon the soldiers with boiling oil mixed with saltpetre and vitriol, by which out of 900 men only 400 escaped. The citizens do military duty, and the aristocratic party have sent couriers to Versailles, Turin, and Berne, to request the assistance of those three powers, who are guarantees of the treaty of 1782, in the mean time the citizens are perfectly quiet, after having proved that no military art can oppose the courage of a people struggling for their liberty.

Warsaw, Feb 20 The States of Poland yesterday received the answer of the Empress of Russia to the requisition made by the Polish Diet for the evacuation of her troops out of the Polish territories.

The purport of it is to the following effect. "That, in the early part of the war, the Empress had signified her intention to the Republic, of the passage of her troops through [illegible] of allowing a free [illegible] to be [illegible] in it for the protection of her [illegible], and that it has had the best effect, [illegible] it from the attacks of the Turks and Tartars that her Majesty should rather suppose it had been of advantage to the country, as her troops had observed the most minute discipline, and paid for every article of provision with the most scrupulous exactness.

"That in order to meet the wishes of the Republic, her Majesty will recall all her troops, which may not be immediately necessary for the protection of her own states, and her relative situation with the Turks; and that she will even withdraw her troops altogether as soon as the rigours of the season will permit it. At the same time, the Empress cannot but remark on this apparent contradiction to those sentiments of friendship and regard which have so long subsisted between the two powers."

On the receipt of this answer, it was immediately taken into consideration. It could not be denied, but that it was conceived in the most friendly and moderate manner. The party in the interest of Prussia, however, thought it was not sufficiently satisfactory to the main question, viz. the immediate evacuation of the Russian troops. M Sochodolski, Nuncio of Chalm, proposed that the King of Prussia should be requested to interpose his mediation, in order to obtain it. After some debate, the question was adjourned to a future day.

Aix, Feb. 22. At an assembly of the third estate, held in one of the provinces of this kingdom, it was debated, whether the clergy ought to be regarded as composing a separate order, or not; which was, nine voix, negatived, and upon the prelates making representation, they were told, that so far from forming a separate order, they could not, without failing in the engagement they took upon their embracing their profes-

The King of Sweden has [illegible] made [illegible] request of the Diet, founded on the [illegible] ticle of the form of Government, [illegible] that a Committee, [illegible] Bishops, [illegible] Barons, four Knights, [illegible] Citizens, with six members of each of the other three Orders, may be appointed to deliberate on the means of forcing their enemies, by a vigorous campaign, to a solid and fixed peace. This has been agreed to.

Stockholm, April 1. The disputes subsisting between our King and his Nobles hath at length terminated in an open rupture. All the Nobles assembled in the Diet opposed

* The Swedish Diet is composed of four orders—the Nobles, Clergy, Citizens, and Husbandmen: the latter are chosen from amongst the land holders, who are actually farmers; for although a man possesses ever so much land, he is incapable of being chosen or sitting in the Diet, unless he follows the occupation of a farmer in every particular, and without any equivocation whatever. The votes are collected in each order separately and whatever the majority agrees to must be carried into execution as law. So that if three of the orders only concur, the other is bound to obey, the King himself having no voice at the Diet, or no negative on their proceedings, but as in all such meetings there are Royalists, who never fail to inform their Sovereign of what is passing, so the Kings of Sweden being acquainted with any disagreeable business, can dissolve the meeting at pleasure, which is proclaimed by a herald in public, after which they dare not meet, until a fresh summons issues for that purpose.

The majority in this Diet has already proved itself to be greatly in favour of the King; three of the four orders will clearly take part in whatever he thinks proper to propose, namely, the orders of the Clergy, the Citizens, and the Farmers.

The Nobility are many of them against the Sovereign, but their opposition must be ineffectual.

every measure of the King with great virulence, and in the warmth of their debates treated the name and character of the King with great disrespect.

Count Lowenhaupt, the particular friend of his Majesty, had been appointed Marshal or President of the Diet, but for some days had not attended in his place. The cause was not at first made public, but now turns out to be, his having received an affront from some of the members. The principal reason of it was, his being attached to the Sovereign, and his being only supported by a very small party in that assembly. Besides this, the Nobility had taken great offence, and violently opposed the Dalecarlian troops from garrisoning Stockholm. They considered it as a suspicion of their loyalty, and refused their entrance into the town.

On the 17th ult. the King attended the meeting of the States in person, and demanded satisfaction for the insult offered to Count Lowenhaupt. Much altercation and many severe speeches passed on this occasion between the King and the Nobility. At length his Majesty rose and said, "That there were among the order of Nobles those who in their hearts would rather wish to see the Russians at Stockholm, and an Ambassador from Russia dictating laws to Sweden, than sacrifice their own ambitious views, and their thirst for revenge." This cutting observation gave great offence to the assembly, and the Nobles immediately quitted the chamber, leaving the King with the other orders of the State.

Public affairs continued in a very tumultuous state till the 20th ult. when the minds of the people became inflamed to a most alarming degree. On the morning of that day, a deputation arrived from the other three orders of the Diet, when the King communicated his intentions to them. His Majesty had scarcely uttered them, when they were put into force. He ordered 25 of the principal Nobility under arrest, which being done, they were conducted prisoners to the Castle of Freedenshoff. Among these were some of the most ancient and illustrious counsellors of the kingdom, men of the largest property and connections.

These dismissions have produced a great number of resignations from many of the first officers of the kingdom, and more are expected. It is little short of a revolution in the government, and the kingdom is at this moment deprived of one of its principal branches, viz. the order of the Nobility. Among those who have resigned, is Count Wachtmeister, who so much distinguished himself in the naval service last year.

The arrest was conducted with great regularity and dispatch, and was made by the light cavalry of the King's body guard, and the armed burghers of Stockholm. Considering the importance of the subject, the city is tolerably quiet. The consequences are expected with the greatest anxiety.

Stockholm, March 5. In the King of Sweden's address to the States, a few days preceding the arrest of the Nobles, he makes use of these expressions:

"I declare from the height of my throne, that I do not aim at absolute Sovereignty, and that should even the continuation of the present tumults force me to exercise it, I will only do it for the occasion. I hold it as a duty to myself, to punish those who wish to wrest the sceptre from my hands, nor will I permit a faction to favour the views of the enemy, by delaying time."

Their High Mightinesses the States General of the United Provinces have demanded payment of arrears due from France amounting to four million and a half Dutch florins, being the remainder of a sum they stipulated to furnish, when the Emperor agreed by treaty in 1775 to receive money instead of the other demands he made. France refuses payment, and urges that Holland, by entering into the treaty with Great Britain, and refusing to admit France to participate in the same, has thereby cancelled all obligation between them—since which France has formally recalled her Ambassador from Holland.

MONTHLY CHRONICLE.

New Palace, Feb. 27.

HIS Majesty continues free from complaint.

St. James's, Feb. 27. By his Majesty's command, the Physicians Report is to be discontinued from this day.

28. An order appeared in this night's Gazette, made by the Lords of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council, for discontinuing the form of prayer for the recovery of his Majesty's health, and reading in lieu the following:

"Almighty God, Father of all comforts, and the strength of those who put their trust in thee, we prostrate ourselves before thy Divine Majesty, and humbly presume to offer up our prayers and thanksgivings for thy mercy vouchsafed to our most Gracious Sovereign.

"Thou hast raised him from the bed of sickness, ſickneſs, thou haſt again liſted up the light of thy countenance upon him, and haſt ſtrengthened him with ſure truſt and confidence in thy protection. Confirm, O Lord, we beſeech thee, the reliance which we have on the continuance of thy goodneſs, and ſtrengthen and eſtabliſh him, if it be thy good pleaſure, the work of thy mercy.

"Grant that he may lead the reſidue of his life in thy fear, and to thy glory, that his reign may be long and proſperous, and that we, his ſubjects, may ſhew forth our thankfulneſs for thy loving kindneſs, and ſo all the bleſſings which through his juſt and mild government thou beſtoweſt upon us. To this end may we be enabled by thy grace to maintain a deep and lively ſenſe of thy good providence, to pay due obedience to his lawful authority, to live in Chriſtian charity towards each other, and to walk before thee in all virtuous and godly living.

"Finally, we pray thee to keep him in perpetual peace and ſafety, and to grant that, this life ended, he may dwell with thee in life everlaſting, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord and Saviour. Amen."

March 1. The King, Queen, and all the Princeſſes, attended divine ſervice in the private chapel at Kew, when the Thankſgiving Prayer was read, and after divine ſervice was ended, the King, Queen, and three elder Princeſſes received the holy ſacrament.

2. The appeal of Mr Bowes againſt the judgment of the Eccleſiaſtical Court of Doctors Commons in favour of Lady Strathmore was fully heard before the Court of Delegates at Serjeants Inn Hall, when their Lordſhips were pleaſed to affirm the judgment, without hearing the Counſel in behalf of Lady Strathmore, whereby her Ladyſhip is re-eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of all her eſtates.

The following melancholy circumſtance happened at Lynn Aſſembly lately. A great number of perſons were met together, among whom were the Rev. Mr Cock Langford, Rector of Maſſingham in Norfolk, and family. This gentleman had been dancing all the evening (an amuſement he was fond of) till near twelve o clock, when complaining of a pain in his ſide, as he was going out of the ball-room for a draught of water, he dropped down and expired immediately. A ſurgeon then preſent opened a vein, but the life was gone.

The Iriſh Houſe of Lords have paſſed a vote of cenſure on the Marquis of Buckingham, ſimilar to that of the Commons, (ſee p. 173) for refuſing to tranſmit the Addreſs of both Houſes to the Prince of Wales.

The Houſe of Commons of Ireland have voted a ſupply for ſupporting the ordinary expences of Government only to the 24th of May next, and for the Military to the 24th of June, which will neceſſarily keep them together, without being either prorogued or diſſolved.

3. The ſix Commiſſioners from Ireland, together with the Dukes of York and Cumberland, the Dukes of Portland and Devonſhire, Marquis Townſhend, the Earls Fitzwilliam, Sandwich, Hertford, Ludlow, Inchiquin, Darnley and Beſborough, Lords Galway, Middleton, Rawdon, Shuldham, Lucan, Southampton, George Cavendiſh, and John Townſhend, Sir Thomas Dundas, Meſſ. Fox, Sheridan, Burke, Conway, Fitzpatrick, Pelham, Francis, Courtenay, &c. &c. all dined with the Prince at Carlton-Houſe. In the centre of the table was a ſuperb ſtructure in confectionary, the prominent object of which was the Harp in a Glory, with the wreath Gloria Hiberniæ, on the tablature, the Order of St Patrick, with its motto diſplayed in confectionary, Quis ſeparabit 1783, being the creation of that Order.

On the 12th of laſt October, a dreadful hurricane was felt at Martinico, Grenada, and St Lucia. At the firſt-named iſland ſcarce a veſſel which remained in the harbour eſcaped deſtruction, and thoſe that put to ſea have not ſince been heard of. Grenada has ſuſtained conſiderable damage, but St Lucia exhibits a ſpectacle the moſt terrifying imaginable. During the height of the hurricane a dreadful earthquake happened, which convulſed the whole iſland, and buried 900 inhabitants.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE ILLUMINATIONS ON HIS MAJESTY'S HAPPY RECOVERY.

In order to have formed, or be enabled to convey, any adequate idea of the general and loyal diſplay of this evening, a tour through the whole cities of London and Weſtminſter, and the ſuburbs and villages for many miles round, was abſolutely neceſſary. Every ſquare and ſtreet, and we may with truth add, every lane and almoſt alley, in the metropolis, exhibited tokens of unbounded attachment to the Sovereign, and of joy for his recovery.

The numerous crouds of ſpectators in all parts, on foot and in carriages, added to the ſpectacle, which was in many places ſuperbly brilliant, in others neatly elegant, and in all, exhibited the ſtrongeſt marks of national feſtivity. Bands of wind inſtruments, with marrow-bones and cleavers, bells, ſingers, &c. paraded with "tranſport and rude harmony." At the weſt end of the town the throng of Noblemen and Gentlemen's carriages the whole night, from nine o clock till two or three in the morning, exceeded what we ever remember, and the gratification afforded to men, women, and children (of which latter many were seen in carriages and in arms) well repaid them for their nightly excursion.

The villages of Islington, Highgate, and Hampstead, appeared from Queen's square, and Bedford square, as striking terminations of this general scene of rejoicing, and the villages on the other side the metropolis were equally zealous to increase this wonderful display.

The following is a little sketch of the Queen's illumination at Kew:

Against the wall opposite the front of the house, was a most splendid arrangement of different coloured lamps. In the center of this brilliant spectacle was a large transparent picture by Rebecca, who paints the scenes for the Opera-House. It represented Æsculapius holding up towards Heaven a medallion of the King unadorned with the laurel wreath. Providence, represented by a female figure, is in the act of dropping the laurel on the uncrowned head, and Britannia kneeling, with arms extended, seems ready to receive her King with a countenance finely expressive of gratitude and joy. Over the picture was a pediment of lamps, at the top of which was a crown, and under the crown the letters "G III The beloved Father of his People." Under the picture were the following lines:

"Our prayers are heard, and Providence restores
"A patriot King, to bless Britannia's shores.
"But not to Britain is the bliss confin'd,
"All Europe hails the Friend of human kind
"If such the general joy, what words can shew
"The charge to transport, from the depths of woe,
"In those, permitted to embrace again
"The best of Fathers, Husbands, and of Men!"

On each side of the picture was a pilaster of lamps, at each side an arch of lamps, and between the arches and pillars, festoons, coronets, &c forming a beautiful display of light.

To particularize every one of even the most remarkable illuminations in the Metropolis, would fill columns of our Magazine, among the Royal ones, White's, Boodle's, Brookes's, and the other clubs, the Opera house, the Halls, Banks, Mansion-house, and all the public offices in the city particularly the India house, and Sun fire office, the former of which was by far the most brilliant there, Somerset house, in its principal and back front, with numberless other public buildings, vied in splendor of decoration.

Of private houses, the Prince of Wales, Dukes of Gloucester, Cumberland, Marlborough and Montagu, Lords Dartmouth, Willoughham, Uxbridge, Sidney, Derby, Grosvenor, Aylesford, Willoughby, Winchelsea, Aylesbury, Chesterfield, Shaftesbury, Stormont, Gower, Chatham, Stanhope, and a great number of others, whose names we cannot immediately advert to, displayed very brilliant illuminations, some of which were in the course of the night renewed.

Lord Hopetoun, in Cavendish-square, exhibited a very grand and magnificent transparency, covering the whole front of the house late the Princess Amelia's, the description of which would intrude too much on our Magazine, but which conveyed sentiments of joy, loyalty, and affection: this, perhaps, was the most expensive, and we will mention Lord Westmoreland's as the most simply elegant, the house universally illuminated, and in the four drawing-room windows, transparencies with wreaths of flowers, and GOD SAVE THE KING, a sentence repeated in many windows, and echoed by the universal voice of the people.—The Earl of Macclesfield had the words of the Coronation Anthem in three emblazoned stars—"GOD SAVE THE KING," "LONG LIVE THE KING," "MAY THE KING LIVE FOR EVER."—Sir Joseph Banks displayed an elegant painting by Hamilton, the King receiving his crown from the Genius of Physic—the motto "REDEUNT SATURNIA REGNA," the likeness and execution most beautiful.

In point of splendour and blaze of light, perhaps Sir Sampson Gideon, in Arlington-Street, exceeded every thing ever attempted—LONG LIVE THE KING, in lamps of various colours, together with the whole illumination, had a most striking effect. These, however numerous, may be said to be a few of the most remarkable, to which we will add one near Cavendish square, the Crown, &c in variegated lamps, in the centre window, and on one side a transparency of Hygeia, presenting a medallion with the Sovereign's head, and beneath BY THE GRACE OF GOD, on the other a transparency of Hope.

Among the various demonstrations of joy, nothing more forcibly spoke the loyalty of the subject than the illumination of the King's Bench and Fleet prisons. Among other transparencies at the former, was a crown shaded with laurel, with these words, "Life to the King, and liberty to the subject!"

The

The tradeſmen in all parts of the city and weſt end of the town, too numerous to be named, added to the general luſtre, and all ſeemed with one voice to join in hailing the happy reſtoration of their King!

There was no tumult, no miſchief was done

In the evening, her Majeſty, and all the Princeſſes came from Kew, to Earl Bathurſt's in Piccadilly, and after taking ſome refreſhment, her Majeſty and the three eldeſt Princeſſes drove through the ſtreets for two hours, gratified, no doubt, with the higheſt of all human pleaſures—that of ſeeing thoſe we moſt venerate—venerated by all

When her Majeſty and the Princeſſes returned to Kew, between one and two in the morning, who ſhould be at the door of the palace to receive them, and make an affectionate enquiry after their amuſement, but his Majeſty, who himſelf opened the coach-door, and handed his royal conſort from her carriage Such attention and politeneſs in a great Sovereign, juſt riſing from a bed of ſickneſs, we believe, till the preſent time, is a novelty among the anecdotes of Princes

The King dined that day at Windſor, when the joy of the people was unbounded on beholding their beloved Monarch reſtored to health

MONTHLY OBITUARY for MARCH 1789.

NOVEMBER 3, 1788

AT Spaniſh Town, Jamaica, the Rev. John Lindſay, D. D rector of that metropolis.

Dec. 19. At Stockholm, Count Guſtavus David Hamilton, Field Marſhal of Sweden, aged 90.

1789

Jan. 13. The Rev Mr Thomas Whyte, of Lyberton, in the county of Edinburgh He was ordained clergyman there in 1742, ſince which time he has continued to perform the duties of his ſacred office with aſſiduity, piety, and faithfulneſs, and to the ſatisfaction of a numerous parith, whoſe voluntary applauſe was the beſt teſt of his care and diligence. Trained to the viciſſitudes of fortune, he bore with chriſtian courage and magnanimity the various calamities with which it pleaſed Providence to afflict him in the courſe of a long life Firmly believing that this is not a ſtate where rewards and puniſhments are proportionally allotted, he looked forward with placid reſignation to that bleſſed haven of reſt, where the virtuous are abundantly recompenſed for their paſt afflictions. In the different relations of huſband, parent and head of a family, his amiable and indulgent diſpoſition and his exemplary manners ſhone forth with unſullied luſtre, and commanded the admiration of all who knew him. Sympathy with the diſtreſſed, and unremitting charity to the poor, were diſtinguiſhing features in his character His behaviour during his laſt illneſs, was in uniſon with the tenor of his whole life,—calm, contented, and perfectly reſigned to the will of Heaven The pleaſing reflection of Nil conſcire ſibi, nulli pallescere culpâ, diffuſed, in his dying hours, a beam of ſerenity, which all the grandeur and diſtinctions of this world can never beſtow. He died in the laſt year of his age His fame ſtill lives, and will do, as long as the remembrance of a grateful and affectionate people ſhall exiſt

This tribute is paid to his memory by a Phyſician, who had long cultivated the cloſeſt habits of friendſhip and intimacy with him, had the beſt opportunities of being acquainted with his many excellent virtues, and who will ever cheriſh the recollection of them with the warmeſt emotion and moſt ſincere affection

ANSWERS to CORRESPONDENTS.

We are desired by the author to say, that the account of Mr Ramsden, in our Magazine for February, was originally written in French by the Abbe Piozzi, in a letter to Mr de la Lande.

Our correspondent from Ireland should have sent us the book he wished to have reviewed. We have no means of getting it, and never trust to anonymous information concerning books without examination.

Anonymous panegyricks on deceased persons cannot be admitted.

Translations from Horace have been so numerous, that new ones would afford but little entertainment.

SOME ACCOUNT of MONSIEUR DE CALONNE.

CHARLES ALEXANDER DE CALONNE was born at Douay, in the year 1734. His father was First President of the Parliament of Flanders, descended from a noble family, originally of Tournay, and well known in the history of that city, which makes honourable mention of his ancestors in the remotest times. Having finished his studies at the university of Paris with extraordinary success, he was appointed, in his three and-twentieth year, Advocate or Solicitor General of the Superior Council of Artois, and before he had attained the age of twenty-five, was promoted to the office of Procureur General or Attorney-General of the Parliament of Flanders, which he exercised with distinguished abilities for six years. He was then called as Rapporteur to the King's Council, to report to his Majesty the most momentous affairs of administration; of which arduous and laborious task he acquitted himself in a manner that evinced his profound knowledge of the government, constitution, history, and jurisprudence of France, and established his reputation as a writer of no less perspicuity and judgment, than elegance and energy of diction.

In 1776, he was named Intendant of the Province of the Trois Evechés, and for fourteen years fulfilled the duties of that important office with universal approbation and applause, and greatly to the satisfaction of the inhabitants, by whom he was much beloved, and who expressed the utmost regret at his departure when he quitted that province in 1780, being appointed Intendant-General of Flanders and Artois. The same amiable affability of manners, and mild and equitable conduct in the administration of public affairs, which had procured him their esteem, conciliated no less the affections of his countrymen in Flanders, to whose commercial interests he shewed particular attention, in promoting the fisheries and every useful establishment both during the three years of his residence at Dunkirk, and after being appointed, in the year 1783, Comptroller-General of the finances and Minister of State. In this high and important office he continued till 1787, and during the period of his administration raised and maintained the public credit by a punctuality till then unknown in the payments of the Royal Treasury, although on his accession he found it drained to the lowest ebb, and soon had the mortification to perceive that the annual income had long been inadequate to the annual expenditure. To trace the cause of this deficiency, its origin and progress, was the secret work of many an hour, supposed by the public to be devoted to pleasure or repose, as he conceived it of the utmost importance to conceal the deficiency till he had explored its source, and provided an adequate remedy for it, such as would restore the proper equipoise between the annual income and expenditure, and provide a surplus for emergencies without increasing the burthen of the people beyond their ability to support. For this purpose he prevailed on the King to revive the an-ancient usage of national assemblies, by calling together the NOTABLES of the kingdom, and after laying before them a true state of the finances, he boldly proposed, as a chief remedy for the deficiency, that the pecuniary privilege and exemptions of the nobility, clergy, and magistracy, should be suppressed. Well aware that a measure which appeared to militate so much against the immediate interests of the three most powerful ranks of the community must meet with opposition, but confiding perhaps too much in the generosity of that Assembly, and the justice of the cause, he determined at all events to risk the sacrifice of his own situation, rather than longer to conceal or palliate the evil. So fair an opportunity to overthrow a Minister was not neglected by his enemies, murmurs were excited, and every artifice of calumny and detraction put in practice with so much success, that finding himself supplanted in the favour of his Royal Master by the Archbishop of Thoulouse, and persecuted by every means that the most powerful hatred could invent, or the most inveterate malice perpetrate, M. de Calonne found it necessary to take refuge in England, where his first care was to justify himself from the cruel and unfounded aspersions of his enemies, who are themselves compelled to admit that his Requete au Roi, and Reponse à l'Ecrit de M. Necker, are master-pieces of eloquence, and written with as much moderation as elegance and perspicuity. With respect to the matters of which they treat, we must refer our readers to the review of the controversy between De Calonne and Necker, in our next Magazine.

SIR, March 19, 1789.

IN your Magazine for last month there appeared a letter, purporting to be a sketch of the life of the late Mr. Rennell, of Dartmouth. In order to rescue his memory from the censures which must necessarily be thrown on the character therein exhibited, it may be necessary to observe, that the picture is by no means a faithful one, for the distribution of light and shade is extremely incorrect, and the whole finished with a sombre pencil, failing to present the character in a just point of view. From the want of proper information (which the biographer complains of) I conclude these errors must have proceeded, but better were it to have left undone that which the want of such information renders so imperfect. I shall not trouble the public with a recital of trivial circumstances, but content myself with observing, that in many instances the account is extremely erroneous. The same disposition which your correspondent has ascribed to the deceased, I must assure the public, did not belong to him. Few men were to be free from the fault of untimely ill-designed and frivolous reflections. In his report of others there was often point, but no sting; and in delineating the character, your correspondent would have done well to have distinguished between the pleasant raillery of an innocent man, and the dark and dangerous insinuations of a satirist. In the following lines the character is most faithfully given by a friend.

To the memory
of
Mr. THOMAS RENNELL, Limner, who died at Dartmouth,
Oct. 19, 1788,
Aged 70.

A man whose rare and eminent qualifications might have raised him to the most distinguished rank of science, but of so placid a mind, that, preferring ease to ostentation, he contented himself to live, anxious to the edification of his friends than to his own worldly advantage.

Looking down with contempt on the parade of human greatness, he died respected and esteemed by those who knew him best.

7th day of May next (1789), where he will be happy to see his friends and well-wishers, for whose amusement there will be a variety of races, wrestling-matches, &c &c The prizes will be a fiddle, two bridles, a pair of Gos ls d' Imeur gloves, which whoever wins is sure to be married within the twelvemonth, a girdle (Ceinture de Venus) possessing qualities not to be described, and many other articles, sports, and pastimes, too numerous to mention, but which can never prove tedious in the exhibition

"From fashion's laws and custom's free,
We follow sweet variety,
By turns we laugh, and dance, and sing,
Times for ever on the wing
And nymphs and swains on Cambria's plain

A short time after a match is solemnized, the parties give notice as above, that on such a day they propose having a BRIDEWAIN In consequence of this, the whole neighbourhood for several miles round assemble at the bridegroom's house, and join in all the various pastimes in the country This meeting resembles our wakes and fairs, and a plate or bowl is fixed in a convenient place, where each of the company contributes in proportion to his inclination and ability, and according to the degree of respect the parties are held in, and by this very laudable custom, a worthy couple have frequently been benefited at setting out in life with a supply of money from ten to fourteen pounds

IN the year 1726 was found at Litchfield, in Staffordshire, a grave stone, about six feet under the surface, with a fess of Fleurs de-Lis, standing on end, cut in the middle, and round the circle the following monkish verses There was no date, but a coffin with bones lay immediately under the stone It was an old English letter, and very legible The words were taken down thus

LETTER from the COMMANDER in CHIEF of the THIRD DIVISION of the RUSSIAN ARMY, MICHAEL KAMENSKOY, to the TARTAR KHAN

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HIGHNESS,

IT is not a Ruſſian General who writes you this letter, (for he would not make ſo bold to enter into a correſpondence with you without the leave of his Sovereign) but a father who is afflicted with the misfortune of another father

I have received intelligence from Murſa Aſham Mahmet, and Piaraſtar Buluh' Gerau Temur Allage, that at the battle which happened near Gangura, they were made priſoners becauſe they wiſhed to defend the ſon of your Highneſs, Mahmoud, whom they at that time looked upon as dead His corpſe was ſought for here in the ſnow, and was found, as alſo a part of his clothes, in which I ordered him to be dreſſed by the abovementioned priſoners. So I ſend him to your Highneſs (though not with the magnificence becoming his high birth) by the clergymen of the village of Ganguta, whoſe ſtations I retain in priſon, in the mean time, that he may more ſafely be delivered Attribute this accident alone to the will of the Moſt High, it is he who determines the fate of whole kingdoms, and of ſingle perſons We, as ſubjects, can only beſeech him for the reſtoration of peace, to prevent ſimilar ſcenes Should it be a miſtake of the priſoners, and that the corpſe (as I ſincerely wiſh) is not your ſon, I ſhall not repent of my proceeding, for when I procure a Muſſulman a burial according to his laws, which he could not have had, I fulfil the rights of mankind.

MICHAEL KAMENSKOY,
Commander in Chief of the 3d Diviſion of the Ukrainiſh Army

Ganguta, 22 Jan 1789

THE KHAN's ANSWER

Venerable, illuſtrious, great General, My ſon, Mahmoud Ghazy Sultan, was killed killed at the battle fought by your and my troops Therein conſiſted the will of God, and this is the fate of thoſe who ſerve their religion and their Monarch You would not believe the aſſurances of the forenamed priſoners, but have ſent the body with a guard, accompanied by the clergy of Gangura, with this requeſt, that I ſhould let you know whether it is really my ſon It is, indeed, my ſon; and the good will you have ſhewn me, by ſending the ſame, is particularly affecting to me. I ſend back herewith the two clergymen, and return you thanks with the tender it emotions, and with many tears, for the great favour you have ſhewn me.

The following AUTHENTIC LETTER from BOTANY BAY comes from a very intelligent Gentleman at that Quarter, on whoſe Veracity we have ſo perfect a Dependence, that though this Account of the Place differs from moſt others, we can confidently deliver it to our Readers as a Repreſentation on which they may rely

"MY DEAR FRIEND,

"I DID myſelf the pleaſure to write to you from the Cape of Good Hope on the 17th of November laſt, and not doubting but you received my letter in due time, I ſhall not repeat what I then ſaid to you, I will endeavour now to give you a ſhort ſketch of our paſſage from the Cape to Botany Bay, and from thence to our preſent reſidence, and of the country round us, &c &c

"As far as I can recollect, we ſailed from the Cape of Good Hope on the 20th of November 1787, having experienced three weeks of contrary winds and tempeſtuous weather We firſt doubled the Cape, and afterwards had rather a favourable paſſage to Botany Bay, where we arrived on the 19th of January 1788

"Here we expected to find a beautiful country, &c &c we had ſo often heard from our fellow-priſoners, at leaſt for two or three years, but you will be as much diſappointed as we were diſappointed, when I aſſure you there is not a ſpot of ground large enough for a cabbage garden, fit for cultivation, within ſeveral miles of it, and but little with ſufficient to ſupply our preſent wants

"The country, for ſeveral miles round it, is either ſwamps or ſurgeſt hills, covered with rocks and trees and underwood, and ſome barren and ſandy, covered with bruſh-wood Here we lay for ſome days conſulting on our hard fate, while his Excellency the Governor explored the coaſt to the northward, however, he at laſt returned with the pleaſing account of having diſcovered the fineſt harbour in the world Highly elated with this diſcovery, we quitted Botany (which by the bye is a beautiful bay, but does not afford ſafe anchorage all the year round for ſhips) on the 26th of January in the morning, and in ſix hours after arrived at Port Jackſon, the harbour above alluded to, which is only ten or twelve miles to the northward of Botany Bay

"On the day following we landed at Sydney Cove (ſo called by the Governor), where we have fixed our reſidence, and laid a foundation for a colony I really am not capable of deſcribing this harbour, which is, with an exception I believe, the fineſt in the known world ſuffice it to ſay, that it extends 14 or 15 miles into the country, forming many beautiful bays and coves on every ſide, which in the ſummer ſeaſon abound with variety of fiſh, but now being winter not a fiſh can be caught I heartily wiſh I could ſay as much of the country round it, which is ſimilar to that of Botany, but not quite ſo bad, there are ſome ſpots here and there, at two or three miles diſtance from this cove, which may be cultivated The country has been explored for upwards of forty miles round us, and hardly one acre of ground could be found in any one place free from wood or rocks, and what is very ſingular, not a freſh water river, or even a ſpring, has as yet been diſcovered The water we make uſe of is the oozing of the hills and ſwamp, which cauſed many diſeaſes at the beginning, but now that we are uſed to it, the bad effects have partly ceaſed

"The natives are accurately deſcribed by Captain Cook (I wiſh he had as faithfully deſcribed the country) They are, I believe, the moſt miſerable of God's creatures, they are clad in nature's dreſs, and live chiefly on fiſh and nuts, which laſt we are not as yet well acquainted with. Their weapons are long poles, well mounted with hard wood, ſharp pointed, and ſharks teeth, and all barbed, which they uſe indiſcriminately in ſtriking fiſh or aſſailing their enemies Their working tools are an axe and a chizel the one a piece of ſtone ſhaped and fixed in a piece of wood, the other made of an oyſter-ſhell. Their huts are few and miſerable, they in general inhabiting the cavities of rocks and hollow trees, which they burn for that purpoſe When treated kindly, they ſeem to be familiar and good-natured; ſtill, in my opinion, they are treacherous, for they have murdered three or four of the convicts whom they met unarmed; I ſay they are treacherous, becauſe they never attacked tacked any one who was armed, the sight of a musket, if presented, would make a hundred of them scout they will not suffer their women to be seen if they can avoid it This miserable state of the natives appears to me to be a sure sign of the poverty of the country

The quadrupeds here are few, the kangaroo, for a description of which I refer you to Cook's Voyage, is the largest, as far as we know as yet several have been killed; the flesh is coarse and lean, and eats somewhat like very coarse mutton, those that were killed weighed from 90 to 100 pounds, one only excepted, which weighed near 200 The opossum is somewhat larger than a cat, and is the next in size, the natives dogs excepted, which are of the fox kind there are some other quadrupeds not worth mentioning

"The feathered creation is by no means as numerous as you may suppose in a wild and woody country, still they are rich in their kinds, one ostrich and one BLACK SWAN (the rara avis of the ancients) have been killed, and several more seen paroquets, lorriquets, and all the species of the parrot kind are very beautiful, different sorts of small birds, totally unknown in Europe, sing pretty wild notes, and darting in general of the woodpecker or fly catcher species

"The boys frequented by the natives produce wild spinage, celery, parsley, samphire, and wild berries some wild grapes have been found in different parts of the country, and a shrub that produces small berries, which are as tart as gooseberries, and make as good pies, grows very common on the hills The country produces various sorts of flowers unknown in England I have met three or four kinds of trees, which are of little use except for burning, one only I can except, a species of fir, which may be of use in building, &c Two very different kinds of these trees produce the same sort of red astringent gum which is used in medicine A large shrub produces a yellow gum of the same kind, with which the natives fasten together their weapons, tackle for fishing, &c and which may be useful in medicine or for varnish of these I'll collect what I can at my leisure, hitherto I have had but little time to look round me You may easily suppose the climate is temperate, when we can live in marquees now, being the middle of winter, without fire The thermometer rose frequently at noon to 90 in the middle of summer, the time we arrived here, and now seldom higher than 60 at noon, and never lower than 35 the coldest night, which is the freezing point The rainy season set in three weeks ago, during the whole of which time it has rained incessantly, which we felt the more, being obliged to live in marquees, as I have already told you, having no huts as yet built for us

"Having now given you a sketch of this country and its productions, I leave you to form your own opinion of it, I shall only venture to say, it will never answer the intentions of Government, and I make no doubt but we shall be recalled, which I sincerely wish His Excellency the Governor has set on foot a brick manufactory, which succeeds to his wishes, having already burnt several thousands for his own house We are all extremely busy in building huts, principally of the cabbage-trees, but only two officers are as yet housed

"You expect, perhaps, I'll give you some further account of myself and situation here On this head I can only say, that I am happy in the company of three friends—no four could be more united or more agreeable to each other, besides, I have enjoyed a tolerable share of good health, thank God, since I left England Every officer on this settlement is allowed two acres of land, besides a certain spot for a garden near his house Four of us, uniting our estates, have already sown half an acre of wheat, which, I am told by my farmer, promises well I propose to set a few potatoes next week, which are the produce of some I set on my arrival here, and which answered my expectation

"I brought six sheep from the Cape, at a great expence, and every one of them is either dead through the badness of this country, or killed by some villains among the convicts, who, in spite of every punishment that can be inflicted, still persist in their horrid pernicious practices four of them have been executed since our arrival here, and three more very likely to suffer the same fate very shortly.

"I forgot to say we had a deal of thunder and lightning, which has done some damage, and a few days ago we had a slight shock of an earthquake, in short, I believe this country to be the outcast of God's works

"I shall have an opportunity to write again in the course of two months, by Mr Sharp, master of the Golden Grove"

Sydney Cove, July 12, 1788

To explain some points in the above letter, we shall just observe, that when we are in the depth of winter in England, it is midsummer in New Holland, and vice versa—So that when the fleet arrived in January at Botany Bay, the weather was extremely hot there, but in July, when the letter was dated the winter had set in

LETTER XI

Mr LOCKE to Dr MAPLETOFT

Paris, Sunday night, ( ) Dec 7-

SIR,

I WISH this would make so much hast as to come to you before the ill news I can now write of, at least, I hope it will not leave you long under that paine which I know you will be in till you receive bet-. It is heer me with great satisfaction and I tell you, that notwithstanding my Ladys fevers yesterday, upon a little coming on, though not of the violent sort of fits, and my apprehension (for who in so extraordinary a case, and for so extraordinary a person, would not apprehend all things) it hath pleased God so to bless those things my Lady hath used, that she had very good rest the last night, and her sleep, which nature itself voluntarily offerd was very seasonable interrupted by any pains that made her complaine. The progresse of this dy hath not been untoward to the precedent night. My Lady continues to get ground upon the distemper, which now, for the most part, is not much more then the grumbling of the tooth ach, with now and then some shooting, which reach now but from that part where the tooth was formerly drawn to the fore teeth on that side, for this I hope in the next opportunity I shall be able to send you word that she is perfectly well. I must beg your pardon for the many faults in my yesterdays writing, which hast and hurry made me commit, for both my letter and myself being cald for whilst I was writeing the first of the three, I was affraid I should misse the post, and I was fayne to hudle up the rest with lesse method and order then was necessary in such a case. But since I hope it will be of no ill consequence to my Lady, and that the businesse will be over before your advice can arrive, I promise myself your excuse and favourable interpretation.

I am, Sir,
Your most humble servant,
JOHN LOCKE

Notwithstanding these present good circumstances, yet I continue my request to you to hasten away the best advice you can find me, whatever may happen, for one cannot be too well fortified against such an enemy, who hath already made more then one breach, and after a cessation returnd

LETTER XII.

Mr LOCKE to Dr MAPLETOFT.

Paris, 22 Dec 87

HAVING gotten another little parcel of time before the post goes, I cannot but tell you, upon occasion of your letter, I was ready to cry out, The spirit of the Prophets is upon the Sons of the Prophets, I having in what I have done here not only proceeded by the same method, but used the very remedys he directed as to the manner, for besides pil cochia and mercurius dulcis, which was the purge I used, though I had not phil Anglic yet by adding some volatile salts to Ludan I provided for sweating. Bleeding I should perhaps have used in another patient, but it not being necessary here, I forbore for much as to mention it, and that upon several considerable reasons. For prevention, I like mightily the plantain water and spirit of vitriol. I had proposed to my Lady something to the same intention before, which was often washing her mouth and gums, her temples, eyes, and behinde her ears with cold water; this I thought likelyer to harden and strengthen the nerves and parts then any of those hot oyles and spirits which are commended, and which I cannot but think likelyer to doe harme then good in this case. Indeed I had not thought of any acid spirits in the water, and perhaps the fear of mixtion hindered me from thinking beyond soft innocent spring water, for he that had seen her in their fits, and how tenderly the parts were upon almost any application, (for there was but that one which he mentions which did not upon triall provoke fit that I saw) would be apt to apprehend any thing that was pungent, but since I read it in his letter I have reflected on it, and thinke it the most proper thing that can be used. I have proposed also to all abstinence from wine, light suppers, and early going to bed, and great care of taking cold, which I thinke is not to be donne by keeping her if very warme (which in my opinion is the readyest way to get colds), but by being and exercising frequently in the ayre and in seasons to oblige her to that, as well a for its owne sake, I propose the taking a slight dose of Goddard's drops, viz gt vi every other morning, and walking after it in the open aire, or at least as often as the weather shall be seasonable for such walking This I think might strengthen the genus nervosum For however I am fully satisfied that by all recall vapours joyn into more de the tumult and disorder in the nerves on the side, and that I believe the drawing of those two teeth, especially the last, hath given some nerve, and so makes it very apt to be provoked, and draw its neighbours into consent; yet by what my Lady has informed me, since the violence of her pains have been over, I have reason to suspect there is an antecedent fault in the nerves of that sine and I know not whether an excrescence she has on the on that side may not occasion or contribute to it, considering what communication there is between the nerves and glandules, this fault in that glandule being of no inconsiderable standing For having sifted by degrees questions concerning her teeth a great way backwards, she told me that she hath heretofore, long before any of these fits, been frequently troubled with extreme violent itching in her gums on that side (when she hath had now since the fit is gon) and sometimes twitchings, which seems to me to be from some fault in the nerves, or fucus nervosus, which you please, on that side I have proposed also the avoiding the evening ayre about sun setting, and at least an hower after, which I think very apt to cause defluxions, and I suspect what would cause an ordinary tooth-ach in another or heretofore in my Lady, will put her in to these fits I desire you two to consult of these things together, and give me your opinion upon these, and your advice of any thing else that you can think on, as probable to secure as much as may be the future Pray remember me very kindly to him, for I am both his and your very affectionate friend and humble servant,

SIR, 16[illegible] Feb 9[illegible]

THE concern you express for your friends makes it rational I should have some account of us since we left Beckheath Dr Radcliff came to us next morning, he does not venture either to purge or vomit my wife He gives her a bitter infusion twice a day, and as often eight drops of tincture of steel in a glass of Spr wine, with some ingredients of roots in white wine posset drink, which she may use as often as she pleases This method he expects she should stick to for some time I must confess I cannot find any alteration for the better. What he aims at is to recover her stomach, and to stop those passages whereby the gall flows into the blood She eats little, and has had worse nights in town than in the country I beg, Sir, your prayers that God would be pleased to bless the means that are used for her recovery, which I may expect from you as a friend as well as a Christian

I am, most faithfully, yours,

LETTER VIII

Mr Robert Nelson to Dr Mapletoft.

Ashtead, 1701, Feb 11th

DEAR SIR,

YOU consulted very much the ease and satisfaction of your friend, by the favourable account I received this day of the welfare of you and your family, and of the present pleasure I feel could admit of my allay, the being without it so long might create some inquiet reflections I am not surprised with Pony and mutinies. I never had any great stress upon his abilities, and have often endeavored to abate that great value which you put upon him; but experience is a surer and truer the understanding test of our fancies, and to that I shall leave you Mr Walter would certainly have entertained you very well, for Sir H Short's letter was a great deal, and before you had parted, you would have convinced him how much you deserved it You would have seen our affairs in a very flourishing condition We had from thence lately very comfortable news — The hot weather we have had, has mended me often pr you, for the rheumatism must be cured by the assistance of wit and money, of both which, God be thanked, you want not sufficient share — My wife, who always remembers you with great kindness and respect, has been very much out of order, but the Spa waters have very much relieved her, which makes her profit in drinking them. I procured Bishop Fowler 5 guineas more for the assistance of Mr Harris, which he took took very kindly, and preſst me to ſet a day to dine with him, that we might not miſs one another He aſſured me that was the only reaſon, but to all that, he treated me very generouſly, and we had ſix diſhes of meat, beſides a handſome ſervice of fruit I am very ſenſible of his great kindneſs towards me, and though I have deſerved it from ſome of his order with leſs have not found it, yet his Lordſhip is all grace and favour Your Corporation has done nothing conſiderable beſides raiſing money to pay the charges of their being a body Our Society having a good ſum by them upon this occaſion, we thought we could not do better than diſcharge part of Dr Bray's debt, to which I took ſome pains to diſpoſe ſome of our members, and I made it appear 'twas a ſervice to the Society thus to diſpoſe of money that lay by us dead, as but than pay intereſt to Dr Bray, which by this method would be ſaved I am confident I have your conſent in this matter, and indeed I know not how to anſwer to myſelf that diſcouragement, that worthy zealous perſon finds from ſome of his own order I am ſure he has been one of the greateſt inſtruments for propagating Chriſtian knowledge this age has produced The libraries abroad, our Society, and the Corporation, are owing to his unwearied ſolicitations If you return near my Lord Weymouth's, you may find him and Biſhop Ken both there, and you may be ſure of a good reception from ſuch a Lord Our neighbour Stanhope was delivered of a daughter laſt Saterday, and in a fair way of doing well ſhe had no melancholy anticipations this time of the painful operation, but preſerved her vigour and ſpirits to the laſt, which every body would wiſh well to, if ſhe knew how to keep them under a prudent government My mother went ten days ago to Tunbridge, to accompany my coſin Lordel, but Sir Richard Blackmore, who I conſulted, forbid her drinking the waters, having obſerved that they do not ſo well agree with perſons of her age I venture this letter according to the date of yours, and ſhould be willing to hazard more, rather than omit ſhewing you any teſtimony of the value and eſteem I have for you I would favour of too much formality to beg an excuſe for this long letter, eſpecially ſince a deſign it as a mark of that kindneſs which with pleaſure paid you by, Dear Sir,

Your moſt faithful friend and ſervant, NELSON.

AN ACCOUNT OF JOHN CASPAR LAVATER

OF the work thus hiſtorically deſcribed, the firſt volume appeared at Leipſic, in the year 1776, in the German language, and ſoon after in a French tranſlation It excited much ſpeculation, much oppoſition, ſome cavil, and not a little wonder Several anſwers were written, and among ſt others, 'A Treatiſe concerning the Science of Phyſiognomy, againſt thoſe who deſcend it as a Means of promoting the Knowledge of Human Nature and the Love of Mankind,' 8vo Gottingen, 1777, in which the author, Profeſſor Lichtenberg, undertakes to ſhew that the method of inveſtigating character by the features of the countenance, and other external mark, is uncertain and fallible in the higheſt degree, that the influence of climate, conſtitution, diſeaſe, and many other accident circumſtances may produce in the countenance thoſe lines and appearances which our author lays down as the marks of diſtinct of virtuous paſſions, and that thus, both charity and truth may be wounded by the rude and erroneous judgment of the Phyſiognomiſt It cannot be denied that this work deſerves attention

Our author for ſome time was Paſtor of the Orphans church, but ſince 1778, he quitted it for that of St Peter's His printed ſermons ſhew with what aſſiduity he endeavoured for the inſtruction of his flock Notwithſtanding the number of his pulpit labours, and the writing which he has ſtill in manuſcript, he appears to have had ſufficient leiſure to make ſeveral journies to viſit ſeveral countries His houſe is the reſort of every nation and of every rank that has a poet and in order to the former enjoyment, he is ſaid to have written on the Meſſiah, and his Paſſion and Canticles I have ſeen ſome of his Mont Lazoth, a Poem Neſtmann in that has had ſo much effect on me as Mont. Lavater —His face is handſome and regular, his countenance open, his motion appears to me all gentle, every line breathes in him warm benignity, and his ſoul is moving ſerbility ſeems ſtrongly inſcribed in his features I am not ſtill with all this ſtrong power in the pulpit, for, except the high of his eloquence —From a lady we have received received the following amiable eulogium "His private character far outſhines his public one If I could for a few moments borrow ſome ingenious pen, capable of fully giving a juſt account of his private virtues! but as that cannot be, I muſt leave it to thoſe who equally eſteem and admire, and to whom nature has been more bountiful, while I in ſilence venerate the huſband, father, friend, with pleaſure think on the cheerful enlivening companion, and with aſtoniſhment contemplate his talents"

After theſe accounts we might leave our author to the enjoyment of that reverence and reſpect which will always attend genius united with virtue, but as he has in one of his works drawn his own character, our readers we are perſuaded would not be ſatisfied were we to omit it It is as follows

"He (Lavater) is ſuſceptible of emotion and irritation to an exceſſive degree, his organization is full of ſenſibility, and his character exhibits a moſt ſingular whole, whoſe parts are in the ſtrongeſt contraſt with each other, and preſent the ſtrangeſt diſparities He is capable of being led by a child, and of ſtanding unſhaken againſt the efforts of an hundred men From this facility in yielding, and this power of reſiſtance, he is warmly loved and keenly hated by different perſons, and alſo eſteemed weak by ſome, and obſtinate by others, though in reality he be not chargeable with theſe extreme The ſmalleſt weight oppreſſes him, but ſuch is his natural elaſticity, that the greateſt cannot crush him He is capable of being kindled, on a ſudden, into the moſt violent fits of anger, but in the ſucceeding moment, at leaſt when the ſmalleſt reflection interveres, the fit ſubſides into a gentle calm Whatever he is to learn, he muſt learn it quickly, or never His memory is happy, but weak and uncertain His imagination is ſaid to be irregular, eccentric and extravagant, and has thus naturally expoſed him to much critical clamour he acknowledges frankly, that left to itſelf, it would ſoar beyond bounds, but he alledges that it is under the check of two ſevere guardians, good ſenſe and an honeſt heart, which always keep it company, or at leaſt never loſe ſight of it entirely He has been looked upon as a cunning and deſigning man, whereas he is rather giddy and inconſiderate, for his thoughts ruſh out as ſoon as they are conceived He is a ſtrange mixture of activity and tranquility, ſecret alſo is his natural vivacity, and yet not greater than his moderation His timidity is exceſſive, and nevertheleſs his courage is intrepid —Credulity has always been his principal failing, and in this he is incorrigible —The impreſſion he has once received can never be effaced He knows much, but is leſs learned than many of thoſe who are profeſſionally men of letters All with him is natural talent, nothing is acquired He has a reluctance againſt all ideas which do not agree with thoſe he has already received His extreme ſenſibility does not ruffle his natural ſerenity, and he is ſolid, with the moſt determined propenſity to levity His religious feelings are accompanied with a ſoft and pleaſing melancholy, and his cheerfulneſs and good humour ſeldom abandon him for half a day"

Mr Lavater is the author of a little volume of Aphoriſms, lately publiſhed by Mr Fuſeli, the printer, to whom the Manuſcript is ſaid to have been tranſmitted See a ſpecimen in Vol XIV page 160

THE PLEBER.

NUMBER VII

Venimus ad ſummum Fortunæ! Pingimus atque
Pſallimus, et luctamur Archivis doctius unctis! HOR.

I KNOW not whence it proceeds that the preſent generation delight ſo much in condemning, as ridiculous, the manners, cuſtoms, and amuſements of their anceſtors But this I am aſſured of, that the vain conceit tends greatly to the general corruption both of principle and practice

If we ſtrike an impartial balance between ourſelves and thoſe whom we affect ſo much to deſpiſe, there will be greater reaſon for us to bluſh, than to boaſt, at the amazing difference.

The manly exerciſes of our forefathers have given way to pleaſures which are calculated to enervate, rather than to ſtrengthen the human frame, and are attended by expences which threaten the impoveriſhment, if not the annihilation, of many ancient families.

The

The nervous and excellent treatiſes of the laſt century, though admirably adapted to inform, and make better, the human heart, are conſigned to a peaceful obſcurity among duſt and cobwebs in the garret, while the Liliputian volumes of modern novelliſts and writings, filled with obſcenity and nonſenſe, are peruſed over and over again with avidity &c.

What we have gained by this exceſſive refinement would be very difficult to determine; but it, at leaſt, becomes us to pay the greateſt reſpect to the memories of thoſe from whom we have derived the means of improvement. And yet nothing can be more common than to hear a pert young coxcomb juſt emancipated from his leading-ſtrings, condemning with a faſhionable oath the Gothic taſte of his anceſtors, who, by not being bleſt with elegant ideas, valued them dirty acres, and by prudent management accumulated an honourable ſufficiency to render their country good ſervice, and tranſmitted the ſame, undiminiſhed and untainted, to their poſterity, that they might do like wiſe.

But theſe are quite a new race, their bodies are not adapted for the ruſtic life of their fathers, nor are their minds capable of entertaining thoſe wiſe and honeſt ideas which was the glory of thoſe from whom they are degenerated.

Debauchery and gaming muſt certainly be allowed to be ſuperior to temperance and oeconomy, becauſe they tend to ſcatter wealth abroad, inſtead of tranſmitting it in a regular line to diſtant poſterity, and they alſo encourage ingenuity and wit, by enabling many to live genteely as pandars and gameſters, who would otherwiſe be obliged to plod in the mean obſcure walks of honeſt induſtry and uſefulneſs.

In promoting ſuch, and ſome other ſimilar, advantages, therefore, the preſent race of nobility and gentry riſe infinitely beyond their wiſe and frugal forefathers. And what though religion, ſenſe, and policy are on the ſide of antiquity, yet who would ſcruple to abandon ſuch unfaſhionable conſiderations for politeneſs, elegance and taſte? But all jeſting apart, what moraliſt can reflect on the lives of the ancient Britiſh gentry, and turn to view thoſe of their deſcendants, without feeling his boſom riſe with indignation, and preſently ſink again under fearful apprehenſion?

And yet it is not to this claſs only that degeneracy of manners has been confined, every other rank of life has experienced the ſame in degrees equally proportionate.

The trading part of the community, whoſe predeceſſors were diſtinguiſhed, chiefly, for their keen commercial ſagacity, cloſe attention to buſineſs, and the plaineſt oeconomy in their expences, now ſhine forth in a quite different ſtile: to ſtand plodding behind the counter, or poring over the leaves of the journal or ledger in the compting houſe, would be quite vulgar in the genteel modern tradeſman.

As the nobleman would deem himſelf highly diſhonoured if found in the act of inſpecting the accompts of his ſteward, or receiving the rents from his tenants, ſo would the man of buſineſs treat the idea of ſerving his cuſtomers. And indeed, to take a view of his ſuperb manſion, the elegance of his furniture, and the coſtlineſs of his table, with the brilliant appearance of his lady and children, and the ſpirit with which he dines and treats, would ſerve to give an idea, to the mind accuſtomed to judge only from the ſuperficial appearance of things, that ſuch a man muſt and ought to be infinitely above the mean drudgery of buſineſs. From hence, however, the man of judgment will fix the grand ſource of that ignominious bankruptcy which daily ornaments our newſpapers under the appellation of Bankrupts; a diſt which in the days of our virtuous anceſtors would have been accounted little inferior, in infamy, to that of the Old-Bailey.

But crimes, as well as virtues, have received an alteration by the ill-tranſmuting hand of time, and as the former have been rendered familiar by faſhion, ſo the latter have ſunk into ridicule. Inſtead of regarding the great villain with abhorrence, who ruins many illuſtrious families, by breaking, as it is called, for an enormous ſum, the more is he reſpected as a man of genius and ſpirit.

In former days ordinary, merchants, and tradeſmen, regarded the Sabbath as a day devoted to the ſervice of the Almighty; and thought it becoming and honourable to aſſemble themſelves in the temple, with their houſehold, to offer the tribute of devotion unto Him. But with them and polliſhed have ſucceeded us into more elegant notions, and the ſight of a Chriſtian at his pariſh church, would be phænomenon ſcarcely to be credited by the eyes which beheld him. And as to the manner in which the lower order of mortals ſpend this ſacred day, let the roads and villages in the vicinity of the metropolis declare.

For I ſay, any farther, the line of diſcricrimination between the manners of our fathers and their defcendants, would be deemed only as the inſidiouſneſs of a gloomy and peeviſh miſanthrope, diſſatisfied with the world for the neglect with which it has treated him

Theſe few particulars, therefore, will be ſufficient to evince how ſhamefully inferior we are, in principles of the greateſt importance, to thoſe whom we ungratefully treat as having been deficient in the arts of elegance and taſte

But it ſhould be conſidered, that it was neither elegance nor taſte which enabled our anceſtors to aſſert the glory of their country, ſo as to render the ſituation of a Briton the mark of envy to all the world

Neither elegance nor taſte were the means by which our braveſt heroes humbled the Powers of Europe by land and ſea

Our Generals and Admirals, in thoſe days, were diſtinguiſhed, not by the effeminacy of their manners, but by an honeſt roughneſs acquired in the hardy fields of glory.

It would be wiſe in we, therefore, to reflect on the former days, and bluſh for ourſelves This might be the means of rendering our country even once more glorious, as the land of freedom and virtue, but on the contrary, the continued love of luxury, and a conſequent general immorality, cannot fail at laſt of ſinking England, like ancient Rome, never to riſe again

An ACCOUNT of a VISIT to the ALPS by M De SAUSSURE

PHILOSOPHERS and Naturaliſts who purpoſe viſiting the ſummit of a high mountain, generally take their meaſures ſo as to arrive at it about the middle of the day, they then make their obſervations in haſte, that they may quit it before the approach of night Hence, all the obſervations that have been made on places of conſiderable height, have been made nearly about the ſame time of the day, and have been confined to a very ſhort ſpace of time, conſequently we have none from which we can form a juſt idea of the ſtate of the air during the other parts of the day, or during the night

It appeared to me of no ſmall moment to fill this gap in our knowledge of meteorology, by remaining on the ſummit of ſome lofty mountain long enough to aſcertain the daily variations of the different inſtruments appropriated to that ſcience, for inſtance, the barometer, thermometer, hygrometer, electrometer, &c and to watch opportunities of obſerving the origin of different meteors, as rain, winds, and ſtorms

Various experiments which I had reſolved to make on Mount Blanc, from the execution of which I was prevented by the ſhortneſs of my ſtay, and the uncertainneſs produced by the rarity of the air, heightened my deſire of undertaking this taſk The difficulty was, to find a convenient ſituation An open place, where the winds and other meteors might meet with no impediment, of about eighteen hundred toiſes elevation, was what I wiſhed It would have been eaſy enough to have found ſuch an one covered with ſnow; but it could not be expected to anſwer the purpoſe, from the cold and humidity of ſuch a ſituation, or from the inſtability of the inſtruments fixed on it Now to find in our Alps an acceſſible rock, at ſuch a height, uncovered with ſnow, and ſufficiently ſpacious to fix our habitation on, was a matter of no ſmall difficulty

I was informed by M Exchaquet, to whom I communicated my ſcheme, that on the newly-diſcovered road from Chamouni to Courmayeur, paſſing by Tacul, I ſhould find ſuch rocks as I wiſhed Relying on his information, I began laſt ſpring to make preparations for this expedition, and in the beginning of June I repaired to Chamouni, with my ſon, to wait for the fine weather ſetting in, and ſeize the firſt favourable opportunity.

I took with me two ſmall canvas tents, but I wiſhed alſo to conſtruct a hut of ſtone It was neceſſary that I ſhould have ſeveral ſeparate habitations or ſheds, not only for ourſelves and our guides, but alſo becauſe the magnetometer and variation compaſs ſhould be ſeparate, that they might not reciprocally influence the variations of each, other I ſent ſome people before me, therefore, to conſtruct a kind of hut.

When this was finiſhed, and the weather appeared ſettled, we left Chamouni The firſt day, July the ſecond, we ſlept under our tents at Tacul, a green plain, on the borders of a ſmall lake, bounded by the extremity of the Glacier des Bois and a rock called Mount Tacul The next morning, at half after five, we ſet off, and in ſeven hours arrived at our cabin. This place I have named the Giant's Neck, neck, (Col du Geant) however is at the beginning of that defile which leads to Courmayeur; and the moſt remarkable mountain in the neighbourhood, which riſes above it is the Geant, a high ſteep rock eaſily noticed from the borders of our lake. The name of Tacul, which is ſix or ſeven hours journey from theſe rocks, is certainly not ſo applicable.

On our route from Tacul to the Giant's Neck, we could not paſs by the Glacier of Triolaporte, which our guides had traverſed the year before, the crevices of that glacier being open and not covered with ſnow, ſo that it was abſolutely inacceſſible we were forced therefore to go by the foot of a high mountain called the Noire, following the courſe of ſteep ridges of ſnow bordered by deep gaps Our guides aſſured us, that this route was much more dangerous than the one they had taken the preceding year but I do not much rely on theſe aſſertions, as danger preſent always ſeems greater than the paſt, and they imagine they pleaſe the travellers by exaggerating the perils from which he has eſcaped It is true, however, that this road is really dangerous; and as it froze in the night, had not our guides gone the day before to mark out the track, whilſt the ſnow was ſoftened by the heat of the ſun, to have paſſed it would have been impracticable

We were ſtill expoſed to another danger, that of crevices hidden under thin ſhells of ſnow, as at Mount Blanc. Towards the ſummit of the mountain theſe crevices became leſs frequent and of leſs extent, and we flatterd ourſelves we had nearly eſcaped them, when ſuddenly we heard a cry of ropes, ropes! Alexis Balmat, one of thoſe who carried our baggage, which was about a hundred yards before us, ſuddenly diſappeared from the midſt of his companions, having fallen into a crevice ſixty feet deep Fortunately he was ſtopped about half way by a maſs of ſnow ſtuck in the cleft: on this he fell with no other injury than a few ſcratches in the face. His particular friend, P J. Farret, immediately cauſed himſelf to be faſtened to a cord and lowered down: his load was firſt drawn up, then the two men, one after the other Balmat was a little pale, but ſeemed not at all diſcompoſed He took his load again upon his ſhoulders, and reſumed his journey with the utmoſt tranquillity

The moment of our arrival at the end of our journey was not, as is uſual, a moment of ſatisfaction Comparing the ſituation of our cabin with other heights with which I was acquainted, I ſhot at once, and with no ſmall vexation, that it was not of eighteen hundred toiſes, as I had been led to hope. I next found our cabin extremely ſmall; it was but ſix feet ſquare, ſo low that we could not ſtand upright in it, and the ſtones ſo ill fitted that the ſnow had entered and half filled it. The edge of the rocks on which our tents were to be pitched, and at the extremity of which our cabin was erected, was confined between two extremely narrow and irregular glaciers, bordered with declivities of ſnow and rocks ſo ſteep, that they might almoſt be termed precipices. This ſituation did not appear very pleaſing for an abode of ſeveral days; but as a Belvidere it was truly magnificent. On the ſide of Italy, we had an horizon of immenſe extent, formed of chains of mountains rising over each other, partly covered with ſnow, and interſperſed here and there with forests and fertile valleys. Towards Savoy, Mount Blanc, the Giant, and the intermediate mountains, preſented a moſt grand, variegated, and intereſting picture

The men who brought our baggage and inſtruments, ſet off immediately for Chamouni, but I kept, beſides my own ſervant, four of the beſt guides, to aſſiſt us in our work, and go alternately to Courmayeur for coals and proviſions

When they had reſted themſelves, and taken ſome refreſhment, I deſired them to begin the neceſſary arrangements, but the little fatigue they had undergone, and the proſpect of the inconveniencies to which they would be expoſed in this ſituation, enfeebled and diſmayed them. When, however, they began to feel the coolneſs of the evening air, they conſidered that they muſt prepare a ſhelter for the night They now began to put a little in order the large maſſes of granite which covered the place, and to pitch our tents, in which we were to paſs the night; for the cabin was not habitable, till a bed of ice, which we found beneath the ſnow, was broken to pieces and removed

My firſt employment was to examine my inſtruments, and make trial of thoſe which needed no preparation I had now the mortification to find both my barometers out of order the great dryneſs of the weather ſince our departure from Chamouni had diminiſhed the diameters of the corks, ſo that they ran a ſtream of the air, however, had not entered, and I repaired one of them by keeping it ſurrounded with wet cloths, which ſwelling the cork enabled it to retain the mercury,

Though

Though our accommodations were by no means enviable, we ſlept ſoundly, which reſtored our ſtrength and activity. In the morning we ſet ourſelves diligently to clear the hut of the ice, and to raiſe the roof ſufficiently for us to ſtand upright in it. We conſtructed pedeſtals for the magnetometer, the variation compaſs, and the wooden plane which ſerved for tracing a meridian, and we even began ſome obſervations. Our guides, who foreſaw a change of weather, employed themſelves in making our tents as ſecure as poſſible, an operation of ſome difficulty on this uneven ſurface, not ſo wide as the tents themſelves, and compoſed of large incoherent maſſes.

It was extremely fortunate that we took theſe precautions, for, the following night, we were aſſailed by the moſt terrible ſtorm to which I had ever been witneſs. At one o'clock in the morning of the fifth of July, a ſouth-weſt wind aroſe, of ſuch violence, that I every inſtant expected it would carry away the ſtone cabin in which my ſon and I lay. The moſt ſingular circumſtance attending this wind was its being periodically interrupted by the moſt perfect calm. In theſe intervals we heard the wind whiſtling beneath us, at the bottom of the valley of Alice Blanche, whilſt the utmoſt tranquillity reigned around us. But theſe calms were followed by guſts of wind of an inconceivable violence, ſounding like repeated diſcharges of artillery: we felt the mountain itſelf ſhake under our mattraſſes, the wind made a paſſage through the joints of the ſtones which compoſed our cabin, and once it lifted up all my bed clothes, and threw me from head to foot. At break of day the wind abated a little, but ſoon roſe again, accompanied with ſnow, which entered our hut on all ſides. We then took refuge in one of the tents, which afforded us a better ſhelter. We there found the guides ſupporting the poles, leſt the violence of the wind ſhould overſet them, and ſweep away the whole together. About ſeven o'clock in unin terrupted ſucceſſion of thunder, attended with hail, added to the terror of the ſtorm. One of the exploſions took place ſo near us, that we diſtinctly heard a ſpark, which formed a part of it, paſs along the wet canvas of the tent, with a crackling noiſe, exactly behind the place where my ſon was. The air was ſo full of electricity, that the moment I put the point only of the conductor of my electrometer out of the tent, the balls diverged as far as they were capable; and at almoſt every clap of thunder the electricity from poſitive became negative or the contrary. To give an idea of the force of the wind, I ſhall only obſerve, that twice our guides going from one tent to the other, which was but ſixteen or ſeventeen yards diſtant, to get ſome proviſions, choſe one of the intervals when the wind appeared a little abated, but were caught about mid-way by ſuch a guſt of wind, that they were obliged to cling faſt to a rock, which they luckily met with, to prevent themſelves from being carried over the precipice, and durſt not ſtir, though, with their cloaths blown over their heads, they were expoſed to the pelting of a moſt violent hail-ſtorm.

About noon the weather cleared up, and M. Exchaquet, who came with four guides the evening before to pay us a viſit, and who had the misfortune to ſhare with us that ſtormy night and morning, took that opportunity to return to Courmayeur.

For our parts, we were highly pleaſed to find that our ſhelter, poor as it was, was capable of defending us againſt the fury of the combined elements, and, perſuaded that it was next to impoſſible for us to experience a ſtorm more violent, we were relieved from the dread of tempeſts, which had been deſcribed to us as extremely dangerous on theſe heights. We purſued therefore, with ardour, the neceſſary meaſures for making our obſervations. The next day they aſſumed a regular and uninterrupted ſeries. When the weather was not too bad, my ſon roſe at four in the morning to begin our meteorological obſervations. I did not riſe till ſeven, but then I ſat up till midnight, whilſt my ſon went to bed at ten. In the day we had each our ſeparate employments.

This active life made our time paſs gaily along; but we ſuffered much from the cold in bad weather, and almoſt every evening, even if the day had been fine. Generally about five in the evening the wind began to ſet in from the ſnow-covered ſteeps, which towered above us to the north and weſt. This wind, frequently accompanied with ſnow or hail, was extremely cold and uncomfortable. The warmeſt garments, even furs, were unable to protect us from the cold: we could not make a fire in our ſmall canvas tents, and our little ſtoves were unable to warm us in our hut, pierced as it was by the wind in ſo many places. In ſo rarefied an air the coal burnt very dull, and only by dint of continual blowing; and if we ſucceeded ſo far as to warm our feet and the the lower parts of our legs, our bodies remained frozen by the wind which penetrated the cabin. At these moments we did not so much regret our being elevated only 1763 toises above the level of the sea for at a greater height we must have felt still more from the cold. We consoled ourselves also by the reflection, that we were about a hundred and eighty toises higher than the summit of Buet, which, a few years ago, was reckoned the highest accessible spot in the Alps.

About ten o clock the wind grew calm I then left my son to go to rest in the cabin, whilst I went to the tent in which the compass was placed. There, wrapped up in furs, I squatted myself down, with a warm stone at my feet, and set in order the notes which I had taken in the course of the day. At intervals, I went out to observe my instruments and the sky, which at that time was almost always extremely clear. These two hours of retreat and contemplation were highly pleasing to me. When they were expired, I went to the cabin, lay down on my little matrass, placed on the ground by the side of my sons, and enjoyed a better sleep than in the most comfortable bed at home.

The sixteenth and last evening which we spent on the Col de Geant was ravishingly beautiful. It seemed as if these lofty mountains were desirous that we should quit them with regret. The cold wind, by which we had been so much incommoded, did not blow that evening. The summits of the mountains which rose above us, and the snow which separated them, were coloured with the most beautiful tints of the rose and carmine, the whole horizon towards Italy appeared skirted with a purple border, and the full moon arose majestically above it, clad in the most delightful vermilion. The air around us seemed to possess that pure and perfect limpidity which Homer ascribes to the air of Olympus, whilst the valleys beneath, filled with condensed vapours, appeared to be the abode of obscurity and darkness.

But how shall I describe the night which succeeded to that beautiful evening, when, after the disappearance of the twilight, the moon alone illuminating the scene, shed waves of silver light over the vast extent of snow and rocks with which our cabin was surrounded! What an astonishing and delicious spectacle did those masses of snow and ice display, whose brightness was unsupportable by the light of the sun! What a magnificent contrast was formed in the midst of this brilliant scene by those rocks of brown granite, cut with such bold abruptness! What a time for meditation! For how many troubles, how many wants, are we repaid by such delicious moments! The soul exalts itself, the mind expands, and in the midst of this majestic silence we seem to hear the voice of Nature, and become the confidants of her most secret operations.

The next day, July 19, as we had finished our intended experiments and observations, we quitted our station and repaired to Courmayeur. The first part of our descent, amidst loose rocks, was rapid and troublesome, but not dangerous: in this respect it is very different from that of l'Aiguille du Goute to which it had been compared. At the foot of the rocks we enter some meadows, below which are woods: to these succeed cultivated fields, which lead us to Courmayeur. Through the whole of this road we meet with no difficulty. We suffered much in it, however, first from the heat, which seemed insupportable to us, after being so habituated to the cold, but from hunger we suffered still more. We had reserved some provisions for this little journey, but they had disappeared the preceding night. We strongly suspected one of our guides of having taken them, not so much to profit by them, as to lay us under a necessity of departing. Their abode, having nothing to employ them, was extremely tiresome to them, and our admiration of the last evening, added to some regret which my son had shewn, made them fear we might prolong our stay. Heat and want of sustenance took away my strength, I even began to grow faint, and my head was affected so that I could not find the words necessary to express my thoughts. My son and my servant also suffered much, but less than I. My weakness retarded our pace, and thus promoted the means of remedying it. It was seven in the evening when we arrived at the village of Entreve, where were the first houses at which we could procure any thing to eat. One day's rest at Courmayeur, however, perfectly recovered me. Thence we repaired to Martigny by the Col Ferret, and from Martigni to Chamouni, where we spent three days to make some experiments to compare with those made on the Col de Geant. At the end of July we returned to Geneva.

[An account of the results of some of the observations made by M. de Sauſſure, will be given in a future Number.]

LETTER from Dr JOHNSON to Dr LAWRENCE.

DEAR SIR,

AT a time when all your friends ought to ſhew their kindneſs, and with a character which ought to make all that know you your friends, you may wonder that you have yet heard nothing of me

I have been hindered by a vexatious and inceſſant cough, for which, within theſe ten days, I have bled once, faſted four or five times, taken phyſic five times, and opiates I think ſix This day it ſeems to remit.

The loſs, dear ſir, which you have lately ſuffered, I felt many years ago; and know therefore, how much has been taken from you, and how little help can be had from conſolation He who outlives a wife whom he has long loved, ſees himſelf diſjoined from the only mind that had the ſame hopes and fears and intereſt, from the only companion with whom he has ſhared much good or evil, and with whom he could ſet his mind at liberty, to retrace the paſt, or anticipate the future The continuity of being is lacerated, the ſettled courſe of ſentiment and action is ſtopped; and life ſtands ſuſpended and motionleſs, till it is driven by external cauſes into a new channel But the time of ſuſpence is dreadful

Our firſt recourſe in this diſtreſsful ſolitude, is, perhaps for want of habitual piety, to a gloomy acquieſcence in neceſſity Of two mortal beings, one muſt loſe the other But ſurely there is a higher and a better comfort to be drawn from the conſideration of that Providence which watches over all; a belief that the living and the dead are equally in the hands of God, who will re-unite thoſe whom he has ſeparated, or who ſees that it is beſt not to re-unite them

I am, Dear Sir,
Your moſt affectionate,
Moſt humble ſervant,
SAMUEL JOHNSON.

THE HETEROCLITE.

NUMBER IV

Quiſquis erit Vitæ, ſcribam, Color HOR

I CANNOT better begin this paper (which, by the by, I am not certain will not illuſtrate exactly the very identical fate it deplores) than with the following tribute of reſpect to the memory of

THE HETEROCLITE, No III

POOR mangled Number! ſtandard of my fame,
Bright ſhield and buckler of my cloud-capt name,
Ah! how I grieve to ſee thee publiſhed thus,
Hack'd all to pieces by thy Critic's curſe
Yet dear departed ſubſtance! living ſhade,
Yet do I prophely—and right I ween,
Thou low in tomb Sewellian now thou'rt laid,
To be with myriad kindreds no more ſeen,
Yet do I prophely, that with freſh grace,
All in a ſmall octavo neatly bound,
Hereafter thou ſhalt ſhew thy brazen face,
While conſcious DIGNITARIES tremble round
Yes, ſlighted HETEROCLITE! thou ſhalt there
Thoſe thouſand charms reſume, which now rejected are

Having thus, by ſo tender and judicious a requiem, appeaſed, in ſome meaſure, the incenſed Manes, I think myſelf at full liberty to proceed in any manner and after what faſhion I pleaſe—that interdicted by my thoughtful and obliging Editor excepted —Now were I not extremely anxious to be handed down to poſterity with all the honours of never-dying immortality, were I not thoroughly convicted of the truth of that moſt lamentable aſſertion,

——niſi quæ terris ſemota ſuoque
Temporibus defuncta videt, faſtidit et odit;

I ſhould poſſibly employ my pen on ſimilar ſubjects with my contemporary ſcribblers, in inveſtigating, for inſtance, the cauſes, effects, &c &c of his moſt gracious Majeſty's late indiſpoſition, together with the probable conſequences of (had

(had ſo unfortunate an event taken place) a mental demiſe But ſince, thank reflection! I have common ſenſe ſufficient to look a little beyond the fleeting faſcinating moment of time preſent, and know that, compared with time future, it bears little leſs proportion than unity to infinity (perceive'ſt thou not, gentle Reader, that thine rhetorichte is ſomewhat of a mathematician too?)—ſince I likewiſe know (nor let it provoke to anger the ſhouls of literary lunatics that ſo peneterating a capacity of diſtinguiſhing a priori ſhould be conferred upon me alone) that though ſmoothly to glide with, be in many caſes ſafe not to rudely and raſhly puſhing againſt the tide, yet when ten to one but this ſwift tide gently wafts us to the port of Oblivion, without once touching at the temple of Fame, ſituate, as I humbly conceive, ſome ten or a dozen leagues out of the common track, it may be, nine worſe, better to drive againſt, than go with, ſo conſiderable a current—for thoſe ſeveral reaſons —and whoever allows them not to be ſolid and weighty reaſons, has never yet offered himſelf a candidate for a ſeat on Parnaſſus, where beaming extenſive luſtre to the benighted Sons of Mortality, on high ſit enthroned the inviſible Company of Caſtle-builders to his moſt bluſtering majeſty king Æolus, diſpenſer of the different winds which agitate the four corners of the univerſe —For thoſe ſeveral reaſons, I will therefore not give ſo much as one ſingle glance, which, as I take it, may be defined the ſmalleſt poſſible part of the mind's immediate object in the inexplicable act of thinking, to the vain and ſhadowy topics of the day, but will employ my abilities upon ſome more ſubſtantial ſubject—upon a ſubject unconnected with Illuminations, though according to all accounts they have been ſplendid beyond conception—unconnected with Mrs Regency, duringly ſuperb though the theme be—unconnected with Party—with thoſe fame dazzling names of Fox, Sheridan, &c on the one hand, or Pitt, Thurlow, &c on the other—finally, unconnected with every thing which may give offence to either A, B, C, or D, or any other gentleman profeſſing a patriotic partiality. All theſe are out of my ſphere, which being in fact neither more nor leſs than a very extraordinary eccentric O, takes in or leaves out many matters of conſequence, in proportion as its tendency happens to be more or leſs towards them The ſame cauſe may be aſſigned for its frequently embracing trifles, and I know not whether in ſome of its lunar periods to come, it may not (in imitation, no doubt, of that great wit of the laſt century the Engliſh Rabelais) draw within its vortex a meditation on a broom ſtick for aſſuredly "things unattempted yet in proſe or rhyme" will my ſoaring genius, if not petrified and rendered by the cold prudence of a too cautious Editor, attempt, yea and, what is more ſtill, forcibly execute —But

Incerti hæc ſi tu poſtules, &c *

* Thus much by way of proem—now to buſineſs Gentle Reader! know that I have carefully, and (from the ſpecimen I have given) profitably I truſt, peruſed the ſeveral Reviews at this time extant—the Analytical, Critical, Monthly, London, &c &c I think them all good, very good, not forgetting however, that "there is one glory of the Sun, and another glory of the Moon, and another glory of the Stars, even one ſtar differing from another ſtar in glory" And ſo much do I approve of the intention and execution of theſe laid Reviews, that by leave and under favour of the laſt mentioned, though not leaſt valued of them, I ſhall, under the unpreſumming title of the "Momentary Pair glances, take the liberty of adding one more to the number And firſt I will begin with, as leaſt liable to exception, an anonymous publication.

THE "Poetry of the laſt world," though in a great meaſure an injudicious collection, contains ſeveral pieces truly poetic, and ſtrictly original—ſome, as the productions of genius, very moderate—and others, which, had any regard been had by the Editor to a certain ſmall but neceſſary virtue called decency, ought to have been inadmiſſible Of the firſt kind, are the Odes of DELLA CRUSCA and ANNA MATILDA!—of the next, many of the productions of ARLEY; and of the laſt, "Ancient Muſic,' with the lines "on Lady T's Ring'† Were I, I' or we, Sir, we! were we inclined to find any fault with the poetry of Della Cruſca and Anna Matilda, we could do it but in a ſlight degree —we could only ſay, that by ſtraining too much at novelty of expreſſion, they have ſometimes thereby

* The Reader is deſired to complete this ſentence, which I cannot at preſent remember.

† Theſe indecent and contemptible lines, which are foiſted on the Public as new, we remember to have heard repeated by a Bookſeller, deceaſed, near twenty years ago This is ſurely robbing the Spital, and deſerves to be expoſed EDITOR.

debaſed the thought; witneſs "the ſlow river's crumpled wave—thy cobweb robe—the rud yell of the tumbling tide—Petrarch's tuneful throat," &c These however, to make uſe of a common place, though on that account not leſs beautiful, compariſon, are ſpots in the ſun The "Elegy on reading Werter" is not much calculated to diſpel lunatical propoſſeſſions, nor are the ſentiments of either of theſe viſionary admirers always conſonant with ſound morality Upon the whole, however, we ſcruple not to ſay of Della Cruſca what Churchill ſaid of Dryden,

"The powers of genius and of judgment join,
"And the whole art of poetry is mine"

With reſpect to the terms ſolluted, ſenſate, &c we cannot but fancy them improvements upon our language, and as ſuch do recommend them to public imitation

Arley's "Repentance of Paſſion" is certainly a ſtriking exception to what we have above aſſerted Some expreſſions in "Ancient Muſic" may with propriety be denominated Elegant Indecencies

The "Lines on Lady T's Ring" reflect (if we may be allowed an expreſſion ſomewhat outrée) the luſtre of diſgrace on both Author, Editor (if indeed theſe two be two) and Printer The WORLD it ſeems has yet to learn, that indelicacy and wit are by no means ſynonimous, the one being a thing common to all, the other a particular appropriation

Benedict's "Sonnets" are much upon a level with Sonnets in general, nor do our Bœotian perceptions permit the acknowledgment of any very extraordinary marks of genius in them The "Lamentation Parliamentary," ſo far as perſonal ſatire is entitled to praiſe, deſerves commendation, but, if there be a compariſon between the "African Boy and the "Ode to Prudence," we give a deciſive opinion in favour of the latter Upon the whole—"The Poetry of the World," as containing "the gathered ſweets of every Hive;" the Editor as preſerving, and now and then poſſibly touching up with a luſcious flavour, thoſe gathered ſweets, and the Publiſher as embelliſhing them, will each, we truſt, reap the reward of their labours in the pleaſing delulion of popular applauſe.

Now, gentlemen, what think ye of me as a Reviewer? Do ye not look upon this as a ſucceſsful adoption of critical ſagacity! But hereof more hereafter —

Before I conclude this Number, which I make no doubt you are all ſincerely ſorry ſhould be concluded ſo ſoon, ſuffer me, Mr Editor, to preſent you with the following beautiful little gothick ballad It may perhaps afford amuſement to the antiquarians in antiquity in conjecturing by what perſons or in what period of literature it was compoſed For my own part, I look upon it as a delicate little morſel, and by how much the more removed from common ſenſe, by ſo much the more valuable.

THE LONDON REVIEW AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

For APRIL, 1789.

Quid ſit turpe, quid utile, quid dulce, quid non.

A Voyage Round the World, but more particularly to the North-Weſt Coaſt of America, performed in the Years 1785, 1786, 1787, and 1788, in the King George and Queen Charlotte, Captains Portlock and Dixon By Captain George Dixon 4to 11 1s boards Goulding

NOTHING can be of greater importance to a maritime country than the improvement of Commerce and Navigation, and happy are we in obſerving that the ſpirit for nautical diſcoveries is not extinguiſhed among us, but that the ſucceſsful labours of former navigators ſtill prompt men of patriotic minds and of bold genius to enlarge the circle of knowledge and of trade

Whether the Voyage, the account of which we are now about to conſider, will be productive of any immediate eſſential benefit to our nation, cannot now be determined, but it is not, therefore, the leſs important, as time may probably educe from it very great effects

The preſent account of the Voyage is given in the epiſtolary form, a manner of writing which, tho' well adapted to novels or travels, is yet very improper in the narrative of a Voyage Round the World, as there is no probability that the letters could have been received by the perſon to whom they are addreſſed till the writer himſelf returned to deliver them unto him. Let this be as it will, however, our author, who appears to be a Quaker, ſhews himſelf to be poſſeſſed of a moderate ſhare joined to a great livelineſs of fancy

The work is prefaced by an Introduction by Capt. Dixon, containing an ingenious and entertaining account of the reaſons of the Voyage, with a relation of the former adventurers on the ſame deſign But as theſe particulars have been already given by us in the laſt Volume of our Magazine, p 332, &c. we think it unneceſſary to repeat the ſame over again; and ſhall therefore take leave of the Introduction with expreſſing our ſincere regret that the whole work had not been written in the ſame manner and by the ſame hand

The firſt five letters are taken up in deſcribing Deal, Spithead, and Guernſey, but as thoſe are places not very remote from England, or much unknown, we ſhall paſs over ſans ceremonie our author's account of them, and launch with him at once into the Weſtern Ocean But even from the ſixth epiſtle to the eleventh we find nothing worth extracting, though the author affects to deſcribe ſeveral of the Canary, Cape de Verde and Falkland's Iſlands

On the 23d of Jan 1786, they left the laſt mentioned place, with an intention of doubling Cape Horn; and on the 26th of May came to an anchor at Owhyhee, one of the Sandwich Iſlands; but not being able to water conveniently at this place, they proceeded to Whahoo, another of thoſe iſlands, where they were completely refreſhed.

Having taken in here a proper ſupply of neceſſaries, they made the beſt of their way to the American coaſt to accompliſh the deſign of their voyage, viz the collecting of furs. They accordingly came to anchor in Cook's River on the 19th of July, where they continued till the 10th of Auguſt purchaſing ſkins, but with no great great ſucceſs Of the inhabitants here the letter-writer gives the following account

"They ſeem not to have fixed on any particular ſpot for their reſidence, but are ſcattered about here and there, as beſt ſuits their convenience or inclination 'Tis moſt probable they are divided into clans or tribes, as in every large canoe we ſaw, there was at leaſt one perſon of ſuperior authority to the reſt, who not only directed their traffic, but kept the men in a proper degree of ſubordination In their manners they ſeem harmleſs and inoffenſive, but this might, probably, be occaſioned by the different treatment they met with from us to what the Ruſſians had uſed them to The weapons we ſaw are bows and arrows, and ſpears; theſe are very uſeful in hunting as well as fighting, the fleſh of the various beaſts they kill ſerving them for food, as their ſkins do for clothing One would reaſonably ſuppoſe that the ſkins of large beaſts, as bears, wolves, &c would be held in the greateſt eſtimation as cloaths by theſe people, this, however, is not the caſe, the greater part wearing cloaths made of marmot ſkins, very neatly ſewed together, one cloak containing perhaps more than one hundred ſkins It is moſt likely that their women's time is principally taken up in employments like theſe —— Beſides the ſea otter, here are bears, wolves, foxes, racoons, marmots or field-mice, muſquaſh, ermine, &c &c but the marmot and fox ſeem to be in the greateſt plenty The trade theſe people are fondeſt of for their ſkins is toes (i. e. ſmall plates of mony) and light blue beads, ſcarcely any other ſort, though we had a very great variety, being taken the leaſt notice of

"In their perſons, theſe people are of a middle ſize, and well proportioned, their features appear regular, but their faces are ſo bedaubed with dirt and filth, that it is impoſſible to ſay what ſort of complexion they have That perſon ſeems to be reckoned the greateſt beau amongſt them, whoſe face is one entire piece of ſmut and grieſe, and his hair well daubed with the ſame compoſition Their noſe and ears are ornamented with beads or teeth if they cannot procure any thing elſe, they have likewiſe a long ſlit cut in the under lip, parallel with the mouth, which is ornamented much in the ſame manner with the noſe and ears, but this I could obſerve was always in proportion to the perſon's wealth We ſaw only one woman, and the people with her behaved with great civility, and attended her with great reſpect, her face, contrary to the general cuſtom, was tolerably clean, and her complexion and features far from diſagreeable, indeed, I have often ſeen much worſe-looking women in England Their ſmall canoes are ſo conſtructed as to hold but one, or at moſt two perſons, and both theſe and the large ones are covered with ſkins."

From hence our voyagers departed on the 13th of Auguſt for Prince William's Sound, but not being able to make either that or St. George's Sound, by reaſon of unfavourable winds and bad weather, they determined to winter at Sandwich Iſlands, and on the 30th of November anchored in Whahoo Bay But though they remained among theſe iſlands near four months, yet we cannot find any thing curious enough to be extracted for the information of our readers On the 26th of March 1787 they again ſet ſail from the Sandwich Iſlands for the American coaſt, and came to anchor at Montague Iſland the 25th of April at this place they found a ſnow called the Nootka, from Bengal, commanded by a Capt Meares, on the ſame deſign with themſelves, this veſſel had wintered in this place, and was in great want of neceſſaries, which they humanely furniſhed him with On the 14th of May the two conſorts parted company, in order to trade ſeparately, and Capt Dixon, whoſe route we are here to follow, anchored in a bay never before diſcovered, on the 23d of May Of this place we have the following account

"As there is good reaſon to ſuppoſe (ſays the letter writer) that we were the firſt diſcoverers of this harbour, Captain Dixon named it Port Mulgrave, in honour of the Right Hon Lord Mulgrave Our anchoring-place is ſituated in 59 deg 32 min N lat and 140 deg W Long How extenſive the Sound is, I cannot ſay, it contains a number of ſmall low iſlands, but at intervals, when the fog cleared up, we could diſcern high mountainous land, to the northward and weſtward, at about ten leagues diſtance, entirely covered with ſnow, and which we judged to be part of the Continent. Theſe iſlands, in common with the reſt of the coaſt, are entirely covered with pines, of two or three different ſpecies, intermixed here and there with witch-hazel, and various kinds of bruſh-wood

"Shrubs of different ſorts appeared to be ſpringing up, but their vegetation was not ſufficiently advanced for us to diſtinguiſh diſtinguiſh what they were; yet the weather was tolerably mild, the mean of the thermometer being 46 degrees.

"We found ſome wild geeſe and ducks here, and though not near ſo numerous as at Montagu iſland, yet they were more eaſily come at. Captain Dixon frequently went on ſhore, to take the diverſion of ſhooting, and ſeldom returned without ſome game, which not only proved an excellent treat for us, but at the ſame time gave the Indians ſuch an idea of fire arms, that their behaviour was perfectly quiet and inoffenſive, and they never attempted to moleſt us.

"The numbers of inhabitants contained in the whole Sound, as near as I could calculate, amounted to about ſeventy, including women and children: they in general are about the middle ſize, their limbs ſtraight and well ſhaped, but, like the reſt of the inhabitants we have ſeen on the coaſt, are particularly fond of painting their faces with a variety of colours, ſo that it is no eaſy matter to diſcover their real complexion: however, we prevailed on one woman, by perſuaſion, and a trifling preſent, to waſh her face and hands, and the alteration it made in her appearance abſolutely ſurpriſed us. Her countenance had all the cheerful glow of an Engliſh milk-maid; and the healthy red which fluſhed her cheek was even beautifully contraſted with the whiteneſs of her neck: her eyes were black and ſparkling, her eye-brows the ſame colour, and moſt beautifully arched, her forehead ſo remarkably clear that the tranſlucent veins were ſeen meandering even in their minuteſt branches—in ſhort, ſhe was what would be reckoned handſome even in England: but this ſymmetry of features is entirely deſtroyed by a cuſtom extremely ſingular, and what we had never met with before, neither do I recollect having ſeen it mentioned by any voyagers whatever.

"An aperture is made in the thick part of the under lip, and increaſed by degrees in a line parallel with the mouth, and equally long: in this aperture a piece of wood is conſtantly wore, of an elliptical form, about half an inch thick: the ſuperficies not flat, but hollowed out on each ſide, like a ſpoon, though not quite ſo deep, the edges are likewiſe hollowed in the form of a pulley, in order to fix this precious ornament more firmly in the lip, which by this means is frequently extended at leaſt three inches horizontally, and conſequently diſtorts every feature in the lower part of the face. This curious piece of wood is wore only by the women, and ſeems to be conſidered as a mark of diſtinction, it not being wore by all indiſcriminately, but only thoſe who appeared in a ſuperior ſtation to the reſt.

"The language here is different from that of Prince William's Sound, or Cook's River, it appears barbarous, uncouth, and difficult to pronounce: they frequently uſed the word aun au, which ſignifies a friend or one, and then numerals reckon to ten, but I was not able to procure any further ſpecimen of their language, as they are very cloſe and uncommunicative in their diſpoſitions."

The remainder of the letter-writer's account of this place, and of the voyage, muſt neceſſarily be poſtponed till our next. W.

A Treatiſe on the Law of Elections, in all its Branches. By John Simeon, Eſq. of Lincoln's Inn, Barriſter at Law. 8vo. 6s. Whieldon.

FROM the firſt eſtabliſhment of parliamentary repreſentation in England, during the feeble reign of Henry the third, to the preſent time, the democratic part of THE CONSTITUTION has been invariably advancing into weight and importance, until it has attained a degree of power equal at leaſt to either of the other two branches of the legiſlature, and all ranks and orders of men now thirſt for the honour or the profit of a ſeat in parliament, as the firſt and moſt deſirable object of popular ambition. Poets, painters, players, and mechanics, upon every vacancy, have ruſhed from their humble ſpheres, and ſtrove, by the magic arts of Election, to riſe into the dignified and exalted character of Britiſh Legiſlators.

To attain this end, the public voice has been more frequently purchaſed than beſtow'd, and from the period of the Reſtoration a ſyſtem of increaſing violence and corruption has prevailed at parliamentary Elections, equally diſgraceful to the political juriſprudence of the country, and ſubverſive of that right of voting, which, as it is truly obſerved, "conſtitutes "the much admired and envied liberty "of Engliſhmen." The magnitude of the evil, however, has for a long time paſt excited the ſerious attention of the real friends to the Conſtitution; and the ſtatute book of the preſent reign, with the ſpirited reſolutions of the ſeveral Committees of the Houſe of Commons, have furniſhed a code of laws upon this ſubject,

ject, which muſt in time effect a reformation But the knowledge of theſe parts of the law being but of modern growth, are poſſeſſed but by few; and the probable extent of their ſucceſs muſt materially depend upon the extent to which they are made known Mr Prynne and Sir Bulſtrode Whitlocke have written ſugely upon the nature of the parliamentary writ, but they have treated the ſubject rather hiſtorically than practically, and their obſervations have little application to the circumſtances of the preſent time Lord Coke, Sir Matthew Hale, and Sir William Blackſtone, have but ſlightly touched the ſubject, and have only marked out its general outlines Mr Douglas, Mr Luder, and Mr Phillips indeed, have approximated the ſubject by their ſeveral publications of the proceedings reſpecting "Controverted Elections;" and thereby enabled "the lawyer and member of parliament to do their reſpective duties with utility to the public, and honour to themſelves" But Mr Simeon, the author of the work at preſent under our review, has at length performed, with equal ability, the more uſeful taſk of bringing "The Law of Elections in all its Branches," into one clear and perſpicuous point of view The work is comprized in the ſmall compaſs of five chapters, which reſpectively treat, 1 Of the hiſtory of the parliamentary writ, and the riſe and progreſs of parliamentary repreſentation 2 Of the perſons who are capable and incapable of being choſen Members 3 Of the perſons who are capable of voting 4 Of the iſſuing, execution, and return of the Writ And 5 Of bribery, and the ſeveral means by which the Election may be avoided To theſe an Appendix is added, containing the forms of the ſeveral oaths, and alſo the ſeveral ſtatutes relating to the practice or regulation of Committees, ſince 10. Geo 3 c 16 which is the foundation of the whole, "ſo pointed as to exhibit "by a marginal abridgement of the "ſubſequent Acts, every variation made "in any ſection of that Act, down to the "preſent time"—The accuracy, elegance, and judgment with which this work is executed, deſerve the higheſt commendations, and we have no doubt but that the learned Author's wiſhes will be fully gratified, by finding that it has greatly facilitated the duties both of the Committee and the Bar. The conciſe manner in which the ſubject is treated, will moſt certainly contribute to the practical utility of the work; but we cannot refrain from obſerving, that in one inſtance Mr Simeon has, in our opinion at leaſt, ſacrificed perſpicuity to brevity In treating of thoſe perſons who are incapable of voting, all that is ſaid of "aliens" is this, "aliens alſo can have "no vote," without explaining that by the 25th Edw 3 ſ 2 and 7 Anne c 5 children born abroad of Britiſh parents are intitled to the rights of natural-born ſubjects, that by 4 Geo 2 c 21 this privilege is extended to ſuch children whoſe fathers at the time of their birth were natural-born ſubjects, and not attainted or baniſhed for high treaſon, or in the ſervice of an enemy, and that by 13 Geo 3 c 21 the children of the male offspring of ſuch natural-born fathers are alſo intitled to the rights of Engliſhmen

ORATORY hath been cultivated among us, of late years, to a very conſiderable degree

Our Univerſities and public ſchools give proper encouragement to the maſters of this pleaſing art, to inſtruct thoſe who are to fill our pulpits, ſenate and bar

Since the late Mr. Sheridan, perhaps no public profeſſor of Elocution hath deſerved better from the public than the Author of the little work before us, and we are happy in finding that his merit is properly conſidered Of this his gratitude hath urged him to make mention, and he hath evinced it ſtill farther by ſimplifying this uſeful and pleaſing art—The Elements of Geſture prefixed to this work, are judicious, and plainly adapted to the loweſt underſtanding, and the plates which he has given ſerve to convey juſter ideas than even the pruneſt written rules

The collection of pieces which make up the main body of the book, are choſen and arranged with taſte and judgment; and as the whole forms a very uſeful miſcellany of inſtructive and entertaining reading, we take upon us to recommend it to thoſe who are engaged in the important province of forming the minds of youth

Military Antiquities reſpecting a Hiſtory of the Engliſh Army, from the Conqueſt to the preſent Time. By Francis Groſe, Eſq F. A. S. 2 vols. 4to 4l. 4s. Hooper.

THE high degree of eſtimation in which the literature of Great-Britain is held in all the poliſhed nations of Europe, muſt make every well-wiſher to his country ſincerely rejoice, when any new acquiſition of diſtinguiſhed importance adds freſh reputation to that Britiſh preſs. It is therefore with peculiar ſatisfaction that we enter upon a general review of this uſeful and entertaining work, the completion of which muſt have required the conſtant and combined exertions of ingenuity, unlimited application, and determined perſeverance.

We conſider it as a new acquiſition, becauſe we know of no regular hiſtory of the military art in Britain, traced from its origin under the firſt permanent eſtabliſhment of civil government, and carried down to the preſent time, in due chronological order, prior to this valuable publication.

In general, the labours of the moſt ſtudious and learned Antiquaries have been but little attended to by the bulk of mankind; the ſcience to which they have perhaps devoted the greateſt part of a long life, being conſidered as abſtruſe, uncertain, and for the moſt part unprofitable to the community: and, to ſay the truth, this popular opinion ſeems to have been well founded, while the moſt painful reſearches into the remote periods of Antiquity ſerved only to gratify idle curioſity, to propagate ſpeculative ideas, and to uphold endleſs controverſies concerning frivolous and unintereſting objects.

But when the diligent enquiries and accurate obſervations of the judicious and well informed Antiquary are directed to ſubjects of the firſt magnitude, ſuch as the illuſtration of any art or ſcience in which the great body of the nation is deeply intereſted, and when both information and inſtruction are the reſult of his labours, ſociety may be as much benefited by this branch of literature as by any other.

With this view Capt. Groſe ſeems to have formed a general plan to bring forward the Antiquities of his native country, for the purpoſe of throwing new lights on its civil hiſtory; and that part of his deſign which he has long ſince ſucceſsfully executed, is a convincing proof of the utility of ſuch an undertaking *.

In the work now under conſideration, the ſcheme is extended to ſuch military Antiquities as ſerve for the baſis and illuſtration of a hiſtory of the Engliſh army.

An adverti ſement prefixed to Vol. I. gives a ſatisfactory account of the methodical arrangement and contents of the two volumes, from which we have taken the following heads.

A brief account of the Anglo-Saxon army before the battle of Haſtings. The general outlines of that part of the feudal ſyſtem which reſpects military ſervice, inſtituted by William I. The conſtitutional force of this kingdom ſhortly after the Norman invaſion, with the ſubſequent regulations relative thereto. Of ſtipendiary, or mercenary troops. Of troops, proviſion, and munition, levied by the Royal Prerogative.

The modes of ſummoning the military tenants. The forms of aſſembling the poſſe comitatus. Of embodying and arming the clergy. Commiſſions of array. Methods of engaging for troops by indenture, and other occaſional expedients practiſed for levying ſoldiers in caſes of emergency.

The different kinds of troops of which our armies have from time to time been compoſed. Their arms offenſive and defenſive, the diviſion of the ancient forces into troops and companies, the number and denomination of their officers, with the ſucceſſive alterations to the preſent time.

The general field and ſtaff officers of different ranks. The antient manner of muſtering the troops, and aſſeſſating the horſes of the cavalry, with the prices allowed for them.

The pay of the officers and ſoldiers at different periods. Cloathing, quarters, caſtrametation, colours, ſtandards, and military muſick, exercile, evolutions and manœuvres.

Adminiſtration of juſtice, and the various manners of trying military delinquents. The military laws and ordonnances of different reigns. Obſervations on the preſent articles of war. Military rewards and puniſhments.

FORTIFICATION —The ancient manner of attack, and defence of towns, forts, and caſtles before the uſe of gunpowder, alterations and improvements ſince that invention Mines and infernals

The laws and cuſtoms reſpecting priſoners of war, their priſon and ranſom

Such is the diſtribution of the ſubjects diſcuſſed; and in this variety of intereſting matter, ſomething occurs in almoſt every page which may be uſeful to the ſoldier, the private gentleman, or the ſtateſman, for as all human affairs are ſubject to revolutions, and the preſent mode of levying, providing for, and ſupporting a ſtanding army of ſtipendiary or mercenary forces, may hereafter be found inconvenient, and undergo many alterations, it may not be amiſs to recur to what our anceſtors have done in former times, and to obſerve how far the conſtitutional forces of the country, the nation militia, are or are not capable of defending it from the invaſions of foreign enemies, or of preſerving the peace at home, in caſe of internal commotions

The ſyſtem of war in our day, depends upon that of the finances, but if a time ſhould come, when thoſe immenſe pecuniary ſubſidies which we have been annually raiſed by loans, can no longer be procured; though feudal tenures are aboliſhed, yet ſomething like perſonal military ſervice muſt be revived in that caſe, this work will point out ſome of the means; and, verifying the obſervation of Solomon, "that there is nothing new under the Sun," it may be found expedient to renovate ancient military inſtitutions, laws and uſages It is therefore with pleaſure that we notice the very ample account of the different modes of levying, embodying, arraying, and maintaining the conſtitutional forces of the kingdom, from the time of the Norman invaſion to that of the eſtabliſhment of the laſt militia act now in force This valuable part of the work extends to nearly one-third of the firſt volume, and amongſt many other curious hiſtorical anecdotes compriſed in it, we imagine none can afford more ſatisfaction to minds unfettered by religious ſuperſtition, than that which gives an account of the mode of rendering the clergy in former times ſomewhat more uſeful to the State than they are at preſent

Under the article, ſays Capt. Groſe, of ſummoning the defenſible men of the realm, may be placed ſome very extraordinary writs, iſſued in the reigns of Edward III and Richard II directed to the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, directing them to arm, array, and regiment all the abbots, priors, monks and other eccleſiaſtical perſons, of what dioceſe ſoever, between the ages of ſixteen and ſixty The following is a literal tranſlation of one of theſe, given by our author as a ſubject of great curioſity

"The King to the venerable Father in Chriſt, William, by the ſaid grace Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, greeting As in our laſt Parliament, by your aſſent, and that of the other prelates, nobles, and commons of our realm, it hath been ordered that all the men of our ſaid kingdom of England, as well clergy as laity, to wit, every one of them according to their eſtate, poſſeſſions and abilities, ſhould be armed and arrayed, to go forth, for the ſafety of holy church, and the ſaid kingdom, againſt our enemies, if any ſhall preſume to enter the ſaid kingdom

"Wherefore, by diverſe of our commiſſions, we have aſſigned certain of our truſty perſons in every county of our kingdom, for arraying, and cauſing to be arrayed and armed, all defenſible men there found, between the ages of ſixteen and ſixty years, and to cauſe them to be diviſided into thouſands, hundreds and twenties, ſo that the ſaid men, ſo armed and arrayed, and well furniſhed with competent arms, may be ready and prepared to reſiſt the ſaid enemy, for the ſafety and defence of the ſaid church and kingdom And becauſe our enemies the French, having broken the peace between France and England, laſt entered into at Calais, have in an hoſtile manner taken our cities, caſtles, towns, and many other places, ſlaying our faithful ſubjects reſiding therein, and taking them into their own hands, thus detaining and occupying them: And not content with this alone, they have aſſembled and are diligently preparing with the utmoſt expedition, in diverſe parts of the ſea coaſts, a large fleet of ſhips with a multitude of forces and armed men, in order ſhortly to invade our ſaid kingdom, and us, our ſaid kingdom and people, to conquer by force, and to ſubvert our realm, and the Church of England:

"We willing, in the moſt convenient manner, to provide for the ſafety and defence of the church and our ſaid kingdom with all our power, and adverting that you and all the other prelates, and all the clergy of the ſaid kingdom, with our other faithful ſubjects, are bound to lend an aſſiſting hand to reſiſt our ſaid enemies, for the ſafety of holy church and the ſaid kingdom: We therefore firmly enjoin and command you, by the fealty and love by which you are bound unto us, and conſidering the imminent perils and heavy damages threatened by the invaſion of our aforeſaid enemies, that you cauſe all abbots, priors, religious, and other eccleſiaſtical perſons (every delay being laid aſide) to be armed, arrayed, and furniſhed with competent arms, to wit, every one between the ſaid age, according to their ſaid eſtate, poſſeſſions, and abilities; and theſe to be arranged into thouſands, hundred, and twenties, ſo that they may be ready and prepared to ſet forth, together with our other faithful ſubjects, againſt our ſaid enemies, within our kingdom, in order, with God's aſſiſtance, to conquer, repel, and deſtroy them, and to puniſh their audacity. And this, as you eſteem us, and our honour, your own and the ſafety of holy church and our kingdom, you will by no manner omit, Witneſs the King at Weſtminſter, the 6th day of July, A. D. 1369, 43 Edw. III."

Our author indeed takes notice, that though theſe writs were ſeveral times iſſued, hiſtory does not inform us that theſe reverend battalions were ever actually called forth under arms, but the obſtacles he ſtates as militating againſt it, though they apply to the then eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, being Roman Catholic, do not appear to have been the real cauſes of their remaining inactive, on the contrary, by a careful examination of the records of hiſtory, it will be found, that they held themſelves in readineſs but their actual ſervice being required only within the realm, in caſe of an invaſion, as no invaſion took place, they were not arrayed, for it muſt be obſerved, that when Edward makes mention of his caſtles, cities, &c. having been taken by the enemy, he means in France. However, no ſuch impediments as our author mentions now ſubſiſt, and our young clergy, ſlightly armed, as they are now ſlightly dreſſed, might make a very pretty corps to face an enemy, upon any extraordinary emergency.

On a ſubject chiefly confined to the profeſſion of arms, it ſhould ſeem difficult to introduce lively and entertaining details, calculated to amuſe the gentle reader, yet Capt. Grole, with his uſual vivacity, has ſo contrived it, as to make us ſmile amidſt the horrors of war, and the tremendous deſcriptions of hoſtile engines and miſſile weapons. His account of the Courtezans who followed the Duke of Alva's army in the Netherlands, at the very time when that inexorable miniſter of perſecution was carrying fire and ſword into the country, in obedience to the commands of the tyrant Philip II. of Spain, and obliging the wretched Proteſtants to fly for ſhelter to Holland and England, is truly admirable.

The corps of harlots was divided into ſeveral ſquadrons, under captaineſſes and alferes, or ſtandard bearers, and according to their beauty allotted to the ſervice of the officers of different ranks: coarſe complexions and checks of forty grain fell to the lot of the common men.—What an army! and marching too, on a religious expedition—to extirpate heretics!

But unwilling to anticipate the pleaſure which will ariſe from the peruſal of the whole work, we ſhall only point out ſome of the agreeable anecdotes contained in the firſt volume, our preſent review being limited to that diviſion of the performance.—The ſtory of Philip de Dreux, Biſhop of Beauvais—the anecdote reſpecting bayonets—the account of the range of an arrow ſhot from a long bow, and of the force with which it will ſtrike an object—the relation of the origin of the gentlemen penſioners, yeomen, and pages, and of the various changes that have taken place in the appointment, diſcipline, laws and uſages of the army, as well as in their dreſs and armour, are very entertaining. Of the plates delineating the two laſt-mentioned articles, we ſhall give a general account, in our final review of the ſecond volume. An accurate index, with reſpect to the references, is given to each volume, but not ſo correct as we could wiſh, the ſame article being more than once repeated under different letters of the alphabet.

THE caution, and perhaps good policy with which the Chineſe ſeclude themſelves from all public intercourſe with the other nations of the earth, muſt render an accurate knowledge of their character, government, and natural curioſities extremely difficult, if not impoſſible, to attain The traffic which this country carries on at the ſea port town of Canton affords us no opportunities to judge of the general manners of the people, and all the intelligence we have received reſpecting this extraordinary monarchy, has been derived from French Miſſionaries The writings of theſe Miſſionaries on this ſubject are extremely numerous, and in many inſtances extremely incredible, nor has all the ingenuity and candour of the Abbe Groſier been able to free "The General Hiſtory of China" from an aſſertion of facts, which it muſt require great credulity to believe The exiſtence of ſtones containing natural repreſentations of landſcapes, rivers, mountains and trees (a), of crabs that periſh on being taken out of the water (b), of Tartars living wholly on fiſh becauſe their animal food is poiſonous (c), of droves of untameable wild mules (d), of the water in Formoſa communicating deadly poiſon to ſtrangers (e), of a purple fever, the ſpots of which being touched with the nib of a certain reed dipped in oil, burſt with a report as loud as that of a piſtol (f), of the population in China amounting to two hundred millions, of cauſing olives to drop from the tree by burying alive in the trunk of it (g), of the putrifaction of pine apples for the purpoſe of ſharpening tools upon (h) and the exiſtence of the half fiſh, which cannot ſwim until it be joined by its counter part (i), may admit of very rational doubt In our former extracts from this highly entertaining work, we have ſelected ſuch only as carry ſome internal evidence of truth, and we ſhall conclude our accounts of it by an extract reſpecting the knowledge which the Chineſe have attained in medicine, as an inſtance how much the probable and improbable are blended throughout the work

"The ſtudy of medicine among the Chineſe is as ancient as the foundation of their empire Their phyſicians were never ſkilful anatomiſts, or profound philoſophers, yet, in certain reſpects, they have made a progreſs ſufficient to aſtoniſh the ableſt of ours in Europe

"Vital heat, and radical moiſture, ſay they, are the two natural principles of life, the blood and ſpirits are to be conſidered only as their vehicles Theſe two principles are ſeated in all the principal parts of the body, in which they preſerve life and vigour The ſeat of radical moiſture they ſuppoſe to be in the heart, lungs, liver, and reins They place vital heat in the inteſtines, the number of which they make amount to ſix by means of the ſpirits and blood, the vital heat and radical moiſture are conveyed from theſe different ſeats to the other parts of the body The Chineſe phyſicians ſuppoſe alſo, ſays le du Halde, 'that the body, 'by means of the nerves, muſcles, veins, 'and arteries, is like a kind of lute, or 'muſical inſtrument, the different parts 'of which emit various ſounds, or rather 'have a kind of temperament proper for 'each, and fitted to their figure, ſituation, and particular uſes, and that its 'different pulſes, which reſemble the different tones and notes of theſe inſtruments, enable one to judge infallibly of 'their ſituation and ſtate, in the ſame 'manner as a cord, more or leſs tenſe, 'touched in one place or in another, in a 'ſtronger or gentler manner, ſends forth 'different ſounds, and diſcovers whether 'it be too much ſtretched, or too much 'relaxed'

"In a word, they ſuppoſe that between all the parts of the human body, there is a certain influence on the one hand, and a ſympathy on the other, and theſe form the baſis of their ſyſtem of phyſic They pretend to judge of the ſtate of a patient, and to determine the nature of his diſeaſe, by the colour of the face and eyes, by inſpecting

inſpecting the tongue, noſtrils, and ears, and by the ſound of the voices; but it is chiefly upon a knowledge of the pulſe that they found their moſt infallible prognoſtics. Their theory reſpecting the pulſe is very extenſive, and varies according to circumſtances. One of the ancient phyſicians has left a complete treatiſe upon this ſubject, which ſtill ſerves as a guide. This work was compoſed about two hundred years before the Chriſtian æra, and it appears certain that the Chineſe were acquainted with the circulation of the blood long before any of the nations of Europe.

"When a Chineſe phyſician is called to viſit a ſick perſon, he firſt places the patient's arm upon a pillow, after which he applies his four fingers along the artery, ſometimes ſoftly, and ſometimes with force. He employs a conſiderable time in examining the beats of his pulſe, and in comparing them difference, for it is by a quicker or ſlower, a ſtronger or weaker pulſe, and its regular or irregular motion, that he diſcovers the ſource of the diſorder, and, without aſking any queſtions, informs the patient where he feels pain, what parts are attacked, and what are moſt expoſed to danger, he alſo tells him in what manner, and in what time, his diſorder will terminate.

"From this practice, one would be apt to conclude that the Chineſe are much better acquainted with anatomy than is generally ſuppoſed in Europe. It is true, they never uſe diſſection, and that they do not even open the bodies of their dead, but if they neglect to ſtudy nature in dead ſubjects, which always leave much to be gueſſed, it appears that they have long ſtudied living nature with profound attention, and with advantage. Living nature may, perhaps, not be impenetrable to an obſervation of three thouſand years. The Egyptians did not permit the opening of dead bodies, and yet it was from their ſacred books that Hippocrates derived the greater part of his knowledge. The Chineſe phyſic is almoſt all quackery. They have the greateſt confidence in their ſimples, which indeed have ſingular virtues, but it requires no little ſkill to know them thoroughly, and to be able to adminiſter them ſeaſonably.

"It is alſo with ſimples, and a few fruits, that the Chineſe phyſicians compoſe the greater part of their cordials. Theſe they conſider as neceſſary to effect a radical cure, beſides this, they preſcribe the ſtricteſt regimen in the higheſt ſtage of the diſeaſe, and forbid entirely the uſe of water to the patient, unleſs its bad qualities have been corrected by the action of fire.

"Their herbal is very extenſive, and, according to their account, claſſed with the greateſt regularity and order. The principal work of this kind which the Chineſe have, and which is commonly called the Chineſe Herbal, is divided into fifty-two books. The Emperor Chin-nong was the firſt who wrote concerning the number and virtues of medicinal plants; and this Prince is conſidered by the Chineſe as the inventor of medicine among them. His work, in a great meaſure, is incorporated into the general herbal already mentioned.

"Gin-ſeng is conſidered by the Chineſe phyſicians as a plant of the firſt claſs, and, by way of excellence and diſtinction, is called the plant. Beſides many other virtues aſcribed to it, they aſſure us that it preſerve the body in good condition, fixes the animal ſpirits, ſtops palpitations, baniſhes malignant vapours, preſerve the light, dilates the heart, invigorates the judgment, and comforts the ſtomach, that it prevents or removes obſtructions, cures the dropſy, ſtrengthens the noble parts, and all the viſcera in general, and that it obviates weakneſs of the lungs, &c. and, laſtly, that it prolongs life. But in almoſt all theſe caſes, the uſe of Gin-ſeng muſt be frequently repeated. It is prepared ſeventy ſeven different ways, which form as many different preſcriptions.

"This valuable root is become exceedingly ſcarce. It was formerly ſold for its weight of ſilver, at preſent it coſts almoſt its weight of gold.

"Tea alſo is much uſed in the Chineſe medicine, and great and wonderful properties are aſcribed to it, eſpecially if it has been gathered upon any of the ſummits of the mount Bohea. It is recommended to thoſe who uſe tea, to drink it only warm, in ſmall quantities, and never faſting. According to the Chineſe phyſicians, the ſeeds of the tea are endued alſo with certain virtues, they cure coughs, and the aſthma, and diſſipate phlegm. When powdered, they are uſed by the ſcourers for cleaning clothes.

"The Chineſe phyſicians uſe, with ſucceſs, the fleſh, gall, ſkin, bones, and ivory of the elephant in curing various diſtempers. The fleſh, fat, milk, hair, and even the dung of the camel have alſo their peculiar properties. The ſea horſe muſt, indeed, have a very ſingular property, if, as the Chineſe aſſure us, it has that of procuring a woman, whose life is in danger, a safe and easy delivery, and of preserving the fruit of her womb. This marine insect, which is shaped like a horse, is about six inches in length. 'It is sufficient to put it in to the hand of 'a woman in labour,' says a Chinese author 'she will be then delivered of 'her burden with the same facility as an 'ewe which has gone her full time.'

"Other remedies highly esteemed by the Chinese are to follow petrified crabs, a salutary and powerful antidote against all kinds of poison, musk, useful in a variety of diseases, it counteracts bad air of whatever nature, expels wind, cures melancholy, and the bite of serpents, &c. With regard to rhubarb, they entertain almost the same opinion as our physicians in Europe, except that they never prescribe it unprepared, or in powder. Another root, on which they set a high value, is that called Tang kue. It increases the blood, assists circulation, and invigorates the whole frame. The Ni-ko-kiao, among many other virtues, has that of always mitigating, and sometimes curing, diseases of the lungs. This fact has been confirmed by repeated experiments.

"The Chinese have numberless books upon medicine, and no nation at present can boast of any so ancient. The works published by different physicians, upon the same subjects, have been incorporated, and formed into separate tracts, their prescriptions, their ideas, and their opinions, have been compared, and what would afford matter of surprise, even in Europe, is, that much order, precision, and perspicuity, appear in all these collections. The result of the general principles laid down by the Chinese is, that every disease successively acts upon the heart, the liver, the lungs, the stomach, the entrails, and the kin, that its passage from one of these parts to another produces a slight crisis, a general revolution, a grand crisis, and that it is of the utmost consequence to be able to determine when it is proper to attack the disorder by direct remedies, to check its progress, or simply to change its course, in order to weaken it, and, lastly, to be able to distinguish when it is necessary to accelerate or retard a crisis, or when it ought to be left entirely to nature.

"But one of the most extraordinary operations which can be employed in the healing art is that named by the Chinese physicians Tsa tsu, or pricking with the needle. It consists in making punctures with needles prepared for that purpose in the fine ramifications of the arteries, but without drawing blood, and burning upon them small balls of the down of the mugwort, which have the same effect as a cautery. The efficacy of this mode of treatment has been fully attested by numberless cures which appear almost supernatural. The whole secret of this method is, to know where to make the punctures, how many may be necessary, and the manner of pushing in and drawing out the needles. The patient is ordered at the same time to take some internal medicines.

"When a person is afflicted with numbness, spasms, pains in the limbs, &c. another singular, but a much more ancient, method of cure is adopted. The patient is placed in such a posture as may prevent a free circulation in such or such a part of the body, and he is obliged to confine his breath within his mouth, until his breathing becomes almost insensible. This simple treatment, joined to remedies no less simple, and to a proper regimen, is generally followed by a perfect cure.

"The art of discovering whether a man has hanged himself, or been strangled by others, and whether he has drowned himself, or been thrown into the water after his death, is a discovery which belongs to the Chinese only. In certain criminal cases, it tends greatly to ease the embarrassment of their tribunals, and might in the like circumstances often serve to clear up the doubt of ours.

"Inoculation was practised in China a long time before it was known in Europe, this, however, does not prove that the Europeans are indebted to the Chinese for it. The Chinese, indeed, place less confidence in it than the Europeans, and for this reason, because the former are convinced, by numberless instances, that it does not prevent a return of the small-pox when it becomes epidemical. They are of opinion, also, that this disease has not existed always among them, and they fix the date of its origin at a period about three thousand years back. The name given it in China is tai tou, which means, poison of the mother's breasts. They distinguish it into forty different kinds; but experience plainly demonstrates that the small-pox is not dangerous in the warm provinces of China, in the cold, it produces little eruption, it is in the temperate that it extends its ravages widest. The Chinese physicians, therefore, regulate their mode of treating this distemper according cording to the climate, and to the age and habit of the patient

"We have already given a hint of the great ſagacity diſplayed by the Chineſe tribunals in diſcovering whether a perſon has died a natural death, or in conſequence of ſome violence, and even after the body has begun to corrupt. As the importance of this ſubject requires a fuller detail, we ſhall here give it, to terminate the chapter. The body is firſt taken from the earth, and waſhed in vinegar. After this, a large fire is kindled in a pit dug on purpoſe, ſix feet long, three wide, and the ſame in depth, and this fire is continually augmented, until the ſurrounding earth becomes as hot as an oven. The remaining fire is then taken from the pit, a large quantity of wine is poured into it, and it is covered with a hurdle, made of oſier-twigs, upon which the body is ſtretched out at full length. A cloth is thrown over both, in the form of an arch, in order that the ſteam of the wine may act upon it in every direction. At the end of two hours, this cloth is taken off, and if any blows have been given, they then appear upon the body, in whatever ſtate it may be.

"The ſame experiment is even extended to bones, ſtripped of their fleſh. The Chineſe aſſure us, that if the blows given have been ſo ſevere as to occaſion death, this trial makes the marks appear upon the bones, although none of them may be broken, or injured. We muſt here remark, that the wine, of which we have ſpoken, is nothing but a kind of beer, made from rice and honey. This obſervation we conſider to be of importance, ſhould any attempt ever be made in Europe, to prove the truth of this expedient, which deſerves ſo much to be verified."

THE author of this very elaborate Eſſay, having fixed the ſeveral parts of ancient Iriſh dreſs, and of which we gave an account in our laſt Review, proceeds with the zeal of a profeſſed Antiquary to enquire into the ſeveral innovations which they have undergone by time and faſhion; but conſcious that the nature of his ſubject might appear light and trifling, he has endeavoured, by a well-imagined conſequence, to raiſe it into high importance. "The hiſtory of the dreſs of any nation," ſays Mr Walker, "does, in ſome degree, involve that of the manners of its inhabitants. It is a mirror in which we can diſcern the progreſs of ſociety. At one time we may ſee her falling into the depths of barbariſm, and again emerging into the light of civilization. When we behold the Iriſh wrapped in ſkins, or concealing a naked form under a coarſe woollen mantle, we naturally conclude that we are looking on a race of barbarians, but when we ſee the ſame people, in other periods, clad in ſilk, fringed with gold or ſilver lace, and their perſons glittering with elegant and coſtly ornaments, we cannot deny them the reſpect which is due to a wealthy and a civilized, if not a poliſhed people."

The firſt innovation in the Iriſh dreſs, after the Mileſian invaſion, took place in the reign of Tighermas, Anno Mundi 2815, but to this fact Mr Walker adds, rather with the true caution of an Hiſtorian, than the credulity of an Antiquary, "if our annals are to be credited," and he therefore hurries over the Pagan ages of Ireland, and proceeds to the more authentic information which has been given on the ſubject of Iriſh dreſs by Benin, the diſciple and ſucceſſor of St Patrick, in his book of GLENDALOUGH, from the commencement of the Chriſtian Æra. In the year of our Lord 192, under the reign of Mogha Nuadhad, a code of ſumptuary laws reſtrained the extravagance of the Brehon, ſervants cloaths, needle work, embroidery, and regulated the value of the cloathing of a Poſſeſs.

From this period the hiſtory proceeds, quaſi per ſaltum, to the tenth century; and it is diſcovered by the will of Cormac, King of Munſter, that ſilk was in uſe in Ireland before it reached England; and that gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones were the deareſt objects of excluſive property. Murkertach, the ſucceeding Prince, more jealous to protect than adorn the perſons of his ſubjects, invented leaſt rich jackets of ſuch "impenetrable ſtuff."

ſtuff," as to reſiſt the ſharpeſt arrows of their enemies The habits of the next age flowed, as the habits of faſhion generally do, into the contrary extreme, and the uſe of golden collars and rich embroidered robes became the types of ſuperiority and diſtinction "About this time, ſays Mr Walker, a daring attempt was meditated, by Ed, an eminent Monk, to introduce the tonſure among the young females committed to his tuition Warned by their ſylphs, the ladies aroſe in defence of their hair, and poor Ed, to eſcape the fate of Orpheus, was obliged to ſeek ſhelter in exile In a fit of deſpair, however, the Iriſh, it ſeems, abandoned all their finery on the approach of the Engliſh, and when the Princes did homage to King John, they had nothing to lay aſide but their girdles, their ſkeans, and their caps, except their beards, which were wantonly plucked by ſome of John's attendants, and from this circumſtance Mr Walker concludes, that beards were not then worn in England but this wantonneſs might ſurely as well ariſe from the inſolence of proſperity, as from a contempt of a foreign faſhion King John made an attempt to introduce the Engliſh dreſs among the Iriſh, but John's policy failed on this as well as on many other occaſion

Amidſt the darkneſs of the two ſucceeding reigns, the acumen of our author has diſcovered annuli aurei cum ſuppro ſparkling on the finger of the Archbiſhop of Dublin Scarlet cloaks and gorges made their appearance in Ireland during the reign of Edward the Second, and by the management of his ſucceſſor, the rudeneſs which ſtill remained in dreſs began to partake of the fancy of the Engliſh ſettlers The dreſs, or rather appearance, of an Iriſh Prince, about the cloſe of the thirteenth century, is deſcribed by the relation of an interview, which paſſed between M'Morough and Richard the Second: "Between two woods, not far from the ſea, M'Morough (attended by multitudes of Iriſh) deſcended from a mountain, mounted upon a horſe without a ſaddle, which coſt him (as it was reported) four hundred cows —His horſe was fair, and in his deſcent from the hill to us, he ran as ſwift as any ſtag, hare, or the ſwifteſt beaſt that I have ſeen In his right hand he bears a great long dart, which he caſt from him with much dexterity.—He was tall of ſtature, well compoſed, ſtrong and active, his countenance fierce and cruel

The female dreſs of this period has alſo been happily preſerved on a tomb in the priory of Athaſſel "The hair is reticulated round the forehead in a manner as formal and unbecoming as the dead-dreſs of the old maid in Hogarth's MORNING On her breaſt appears a ſolitaire, from which an ornament is pendant Her right hand holds her glove, and with her left ſhe ſupports her train"

The faſhion of the beard was worn in Ireland during the reign of Henry VI and in the year 1446 the natives had arrived to ſuch a degree of luxury, that they were reſtrained by a public law from wearing ſhirts ſtained with ſaffron, but notwithſtanding this inhibition, they continued in this enjoyment till the reign of Queen Elizabeth. In the reign of Edward IV it was the intereſt of an Iriſhman who was inclined to rob or murder his neighbour, to wear the Engliſh apparel for the purpoſe of avoiding puniſhment, for it appears to have been ordained, "that it ſhall be lawful to kill any that is found robbing by day or night, or going or coming to rob or ſteal, having no faithful man of good name or fame in their company in Engliſh apparel" but this act was not ſufficiently ſtrong to conquer the prejudice which the Iriſh entertained for their native dreſs, and another act was made directing that Iriſh men of Dublin, Meath, Uriel, and Kildare ſhould go apparelled like Engliſhmen, and wear their beards after the Engliſh manner, ſworn allegiance, and take Engliſh ſurnames The ladies however were permitted to indulge their fancy, and they exerciſed it in dreſſing with elegance and taſte

In the reign of Henry VII the Lords of Ireland were ordered to appear in the like Parliament robes as the Engliſh Lords The rich wore their whole cloth extremely fine, ſuch as had paſſed the alnage, they had alſo their cloth of gold, their bodkins or tiſſues, their ſilks and taffaties, and their girdles, and their garments were made looſe and flowing The poorer ſort had their Iriſhtuffs called fulewyche, and ſeyrſeth, their canvas linen, their phallangs, mantles, and felt caps

Henry the VIIIth, ſtimulated by his ridiculous, cruel, and unjuſt extravagancies in England, at length turned his mind towards Ireland, and conceiving, or pretending to conceive, that it was for the heavenly intereſt of "that rude and ignorant people" to be inducted into a conformity, concordance, and familiarity in language, tongue, manners, order, and apparel with them that be "civil people," he directed an act to be paſſed that none of his Iriſh ſub-ſubjects "ſhall be ſhorn or ſhaven above the ears, or uſe the wearing of hau upon their heads, like unto long locks called glibbes," or have or uſe any han growing on their upper lips called or named a crommeal; or uſe or wear any ſhirt, ſmock, kerchour, bendel, neckerchour, mocket or linnen cuppe, coloured or dyed with ſaffron, nor yet uſe or wear in any of their ſhirts or mockes above ſeven yards of cloth, to be meaſured according to the King's ſtandard, and that alſo no woman uſe or wear any kyrtell or cote tucked up, or in broyded or garniſhed with ſilke, or cochered nere layd with uſker, after the Iriſh faſhion, and that no perſon or perſons of what eſtate, condition, or degree they be, ſhall uſe or wear any mantles, cote or hood made after the Iriſh faſhion." It appears from this act, that the art of embroidery, ſo much encouraged by the Iriſh legiſlature at the commencement of the Chriſtian Æra, was ſtill cultivated, and that the uſe of ſilk, ſo often mentioned in the BREHON LAWS and in the ſongs of the early Bards ſtill prevailed.

After the reign of Henry VIII the Iriſh dreſs ſeems to have been no longer the object of parliamentary concern, but was left to the influence of faſhion, and the guidance of taſte and fancy. Camden, however, in an account of the reception which attended O'Neal, Prince of Ulſter, to the Court of Elizabeth, A. D. 1562, ſays, "He appeared at Court with his guards of Galloglachs, bare-headed, armed with hatchets, their hair flowing in locks on their ſhoulders, on which were yellow ſurplices dyed with ſaffron, with long ſleeves, ſhort coats, and ſtrait jackets, at which ſtrange ſight the Londoners marvelled much."

Some ſumptuary bye-laws were alſo made by the Corporation of Kilkenny, in 1537 and 1565, touching the dreſs of the inhabitants of that town, to reſtrain the exorbitant prices which were then paid for making cloaths. A quilted doublet, with a new-faſhioned bellire, was ordered to be made for one ſhilling; a pair of gally-emiſhes, for eight pence; a pair of cloſe hoſe, for ſix-pence; a woman's coat, double ſeamed, but not wrought with ſilk, for ſeven-pence. The Corporation of Iriſhtown, following the example of Kilkenny, reſtrained their women from wearing caps, and obliged every freeman and burgeſs to wear his cloak, and every inhabitant to dreſs after the Engliſh faſhion.

Sir John Harrington, one of the brighteſt ornaments of the Court of Elizabeth, in a note on his tranſlation of ORLANDO FURIOSO, illuſtrates the notions which prevailed in Ireland with reſpect to their wearing magic girdles, with a little narrative, which, ſays Mr. Walker, "as it preſents us with a picture of the times, in ſimple colouring, I ſhall make no apology for tranſcribing here. "Rôme Oge (a notable rebell of Ireland) having taken, in a vile and treacherous parlee, my valiant coſin Sir Henrie Harington priſoner, had one night his caben or little hovell where he lay, beſet with one hundred ſouldiers of the ſaid Sir Henrie his band, meaning to reſcue their captaine by force, ſith the rebels demaunds for his delivery were ſuch as Sir Henrie himſelfe (being his priſoner) would not condeſcend unto, but would rather hazard his life, as he knew he ſhould: I ſay theſe hundred men well appointed, beſet the houſe ſtrongly, being made of nothing but hards and durt, yet the villain, ere they could get in, ſet up in his ſhirt, and gave the knight xiiij wounds very deadly, and after gat thorough them all without hurt, where a mouſe almoſt could not have got betweene them: and I have heard it affirmed in Ireland, that it was with meere witchcraft."—It may be preſumed that Rôme, though ſurpriſed, did not forget his girdle, and that his miraculous eſcape is ſilently attributed by our author to its watching powers."

In the reign of James I the Iriſh dreſs began to feel the influence of faſhion, and to aſſume a new form. The ladies cut-preſſed their heads with ornaments, and courted the amorous glance by expoſing their boſoms. In the unfortunate reign of his ſucceſſor, Charles I the beard was permitted once more to flouriſh on the upper lip, and they were again privileged to uſe bridles, Peytrels, and other gilt Harneys, and let at liberty to wear either their own nation's dreſs or the Engliſh apparel.

"The ſword of rebellion, continues Mr. Walker, having drank to ſatiety of the blood of the proteſtants, and the ruins of the eſtabliſhed church being again repaired, the banners of peace waved once more o'er our enſanguined fields, and a friendly intercourſe began to ſubſiſt between the Engliſh and the Iriſh. United now in the bands of friendſhip, both nations aſſumed the ſame garb: but Faſhion continued to hold her throne in England. Hence I conclude—and the voice of tradition ſupports me—that open-ſleeves, pantaloons, ſhoulder-knots, Flanders-lace, neck cloths, and that moſt ridiculous of all faſhions, the Perriwig, were worn by the Irish nobility and gentry at this period, and that the ladies began to frizzle and curl their hair But wanting the information of portraits, I cannot descend into all the minutiæ of the dress of those times I can indeed describe a Fan that was then worn by one of our country-women, for it now lies before me The mount is a thin kind of silk, the ground deep blue, and the figures fanciful and rude The sticks are of ivory stained brown, those on the outside covered with elegant silver filigreen work, and studded with amethysts

"Of the dresses of the turbulent reign of James II I cannot speak with certainty, for little is certainly known If any particular fashion prevailed at that time, it was probably of English origin Some of the female peasantry, however, still continued attached to their old habits Of these I will here describe one, as worn to the hour of her death by Mary Morgan, a poor woman, who was married before the battle of the Boyne, and lived to the year 1786 —On her head she wore a roll of linen, no unlike that on which milkmaids carry their pails, but with this difference, that it was higher behind than before, over this she combed her hair, and covered the whole with a little round-eared cap, or coif, with a border sewed on plain,—over all this was thrown a kerchief, which, in her youth, was made fast on the top of her head, and let to fall carelessly behind, in her old age it was pinned under her chin —Her jacket was of brown cloth, or pressed frize, and made to fit close to the shape by means of whale-bone wrought into it before and behind, this was laced in front, but not so as to meet, and through the lacing were drawn the ends of her neck kerchief The sleeves, half way to the elbows, were made of the tape kind of cloth with the jacket, thence continued to the wrist of red cloth unlet striped with green ferreting, and there, being turned up, formed a little cuff embroidered with three circles of green ribband Her petticoat was invariably of either scarlet frize or cloth, bordered with three rows of green ribband Her upper green serge, striped longitudinally with scarlet ferreting, and bound with the same Her hose were blue worsted, and her shoes of black leather, fastened with thongs, or strings

"This fashion of habit, however, had not been always peculiar to the peasantry; it appears to have prevailed formerly in the principal Irish families About the close of the last century, there lived at Cradan, near Waterford, a Mrs Power, a lady of considerable fortune, who, as being lineally descended from some of the Kings of Munster, was vulgarly called, The Queen of Cradan This lady, proud of her country and descent, always spoke the Irish language, and affected the dress and manners of the ancient Irish Her Dress, in point of fashion, answered exactly to that of Mary Morgan as just described, but was made of richer materials The border of her coif was of the finest Brussels-lace, her kerchief of clear muslin, her jacket of the finest brown cloth, trimmed with narrow gold lace, and the sleeves of crimson velvet striped with the same, and her petticoat of the finest scarlet cloth, bordered with two rows of broad gold lace

"The Hugonots who followed the fortunes of William III brought with them the fashions of their country But I cannot find that these fashions were infectious, at least it does not appear that the Irish caught them

"The Hat was now shaped in the Ramillie cock The Perriwig, which had been of several years standing in Ireland, was not yet generally worn it was confined to the learned professions, or to those who affected gravity "Our ignorant nation (says Farquhar, in a comedy written in this reign), our ignorant nation imagine a full wig is infallible a token of wit as the laurel"

"The head-dress which, the Spectator says, "made the women of such an enormous stature, that we appeared as grasshoppers before them, now prevailed here This information I owe to the inquisitiveness of Lucinda, in the comedy which I have just quoted

"Lucinda —Tell us some news of your country, I have heard the strangest stories, that the people wear horns and hoofs

"Roebuck —Yes, faith, a great many wear horns, but we have that, among other laudable fashions, from London, I think it came over with your mode of wearing high top knots for ever since, the men and wives bear their heads exalted alike. They were both fashions that took wonderfully"

"The reign of Queen Anne seems to have been an age of gay attire the single Dress of a woman of quality then, was the product of an hundred climes Swift, in a poem written in 1708, thus metamorphoses the Dress of his Goody Bauces into the Dress of the day

Instead of home-spun coifs, were seen
Good pinners edg'd with Colberteen,

Her

Her petticoat transform'd apace,
Became black jattin flounc'd with lace.
Plain Goody would no longer down,
'Twas Madam in her Grogram gown

"Beſides the different articles of Dreſs enumerated in thoſe lines, the Iriſh ladies wore ſhort jackets with cloſe ſleeves, made of Spaniſh cloth, each ſide of which was dyed of a different colour; theſe jackets were faſtened on the breaſt with ribbands. Their petticoats were ſwelled to ſo monſtrous a circumference by means of hoops, as muſt have alarmed the oppoſite ſex for their chaſtity. High ſtays, piked before and behind, gave an awkward ſtiffneſs to their carriage. Their ſhoes were of red and blue Spaniſh leather, laced with broad gold and ſilver lace at top and behind, the heels broad, and of a moderate height; ſome were faſtened with ſilver claſps, others with knots of roſes. Their ſtockings were generally of blue or ſcarlet worſted or ſilk, ornamented with clocks worked with gold or ſilver thread; neither thread nor cotton hoſe were then known. And their necks were uſually adorned with black collars, tied in front with ribbands of divers colours.

"I cannot find that the riding coat, in ſuch general uſe among the Engliſh ladies in this reign, and ſo juſtly reprobated by the Spectator, was now worn here. Dreſs had not yet mingled the ſexes. A lady, in thoſe days, mounted her horſe in the ſame dreſs in which ſhe entered the drawing-room,—nay, ſhe did not even forget her hoop.

"There is not (ſays Addiſon) ſo variable a thing in nature as a lady's head-dreſs." The juſtneſs of this obſervation deters me from attempting to deſcribe the head dreſs of the ladies of thoſe days. I ſhall be content with concluding, that it roſe and fell with the head-dreſs of the Engliſh ladies, which, within Addiſon's memory, roſe and fell above thirty degrees. I muſt however obſerve, that I cannot learn, on the ſtricteſt enquiry, that the lovely treſſes of nature were then permitted, as in the preſent day, to wanton on the neck, where (to borrow the language of Hogarth) "the many waving and contraſted turns of naturally intermingling locks ravith the eye with the pleaſure of the purſuit, eſpecially when put in motion by a gentle breeze."

"But though I wave any attempt to deſcribe the faſhion of the ladies' hair at that time, I ought not to omit to mention, that they wore Hoods of divers colours, and beaver Hats trimmed with broad gold and ſilver lace, and a buckle in front.

"Wafted by the breath of faſhion, the maſk alighted in this iſland. Immediately the ladies took it up, and appeared in it in the ſtreets, public walks and theatres. Under this diſguiſe, they could now, without fear of diſcovery, rally their lovers or their friends, and ſafely ſmile at the obſcenity of a comedy. Patches too were much worn; but whether or not their poſition was determined, as in England, by the ſpirit of party, I cannot ſay.

"I have been informed that ſome Iriſh ladies of this reign dreſſed the dreſs in which the unfortunate Queen of Scots is uſually depicted; ſo that we may preſume the ruff now occaſionally roſe about the neck of our lovely countrywomen.

"The dreſs of the gentlemen of this reign was more uniform than that of the ladies. Their coats and waiſtcoats were laced with broad gold or ſilver lace; the ſkirts of each were long, and the ſleeves of the coat laſhed. Inſtead of ſtocks they wore cravats, edged with Flanders or Bruſſells lace, which, after paſſing ſeveral times round the neck, wandered through the button holes of the coat, almoſt the whole length of the body. Their hoſe, like thoſe of the ladies, were blue or ſcarlet worſted or ſilk, worked with gold or ſilver clocks. Their ſhoes in this (and in the following reign) had broad ſquare toes, ſhort quarters, and high tops, and were made faſt with ſmall buckles. Their heads—even the heads of youthful beaux—were enveloped in monſtrous periwigs, on which perched a ſmall felt hat. And through the ſkirts of their coats, ſtiffened with buckram, peeped the hilt of a ſmall ſword.

"Long cloaks too of Spaniſh cloth, each ſide dyed of a different colour, were now worn by the gentlemen.

"With the line of the Stuarts I ſhall cloſe this crude Eſſay. For, from the acceſſion of George I. to the preſent day, Faſhion has been ſuch a wayward goddeſs in this country, that neither hiſtory, tradition, nor painting, has been able to preſerve all her mimic forms. Like Proteus ſtruggling in the arms of Telemachus on the Pharian coaſt, ſhe paſſed from ſhape to ſhape with the rapidity of thought."

Letters on Greece, being a Sequel to Letters on Egypt, and containing Travels through Rhodes, Crete, and other Iſlands of the Archipelago, with comparative Remarks on their ancient and preſent State, and Obſervations on the Government, Character, and Manners of the Turks, and modern Greeks Tranſlated from the French of M Savary 8vo 7s Robinſons

FROM the narrative of the manners and cuſtoms of the inhabitants of Caſos, which we gave in our laſt Review from this entertaining work, neither Mr Savary nor his readers have any reaſon to complain of the contrary winds which forced him on that iſland circumſtance, that travellers in general ſo frequently derive more advantage and improvement from adverſe winds than from proſperous gales

Candia, the ancient and famous iſland of Crete, in the middle of which ſtands MOUNT IDA and the CAVE of GORTYNA, is the next object of Mr Savary's inſpection He deſcribes the fabulous accounts of its origin, the real hiſtory of its foundation, and the ſubſequent eſtabliſhment of its republic, which excited the praiſe of Plato, and the imitation of Lycurgus, with great gravity, and from the picture here repreſented Monarchs might copy with equal honour to themſelves and benefit to their people But a prodigious difference is eaſily diſcoverable between the principles on which this renowned Commonwealth was founded, and thoſe of the greateſt part of modern Governments

"You will ſee with pleaſure," ſays Mr Savary to his correſpondent, "a legiſlation whoſe ſole object it was to ſow the ſeeds of virtue in the heart of infancy, and to nouriſh them in youth, to inſpire into the ripened man the love of his country, of glory, and of liberty, and to conſole old age by the eſteem and reverence due to its wiſdom and experience, you will find all its inſtitutes directed to form faithful friends, patriotic citizens, and wiſe ſtateſmen Do not imagine a multitude of laws and edicts were neceſſary to procure theſe ineſtimable advantages They naturally flowed from one ſingle ſource— the public education of youth under wiſe regulations

"The examples placed before the Cretans in their early years, the virtues to which they were witneſſes, the memorable deeds which they heard recited, and the applauſes beſtowed on them, the honours which rewarded courage and noble actions, and the ſhame and opprobrium which ſtigmatized vice, were the only ſprings ſet in motion by their legiſlator, to render them warlike, virtuous and wiſe nation I will be bold to add, that the ſame regulations, founded as they were on a juſt knowledge of the human heart, would have the ſame happy effect on the morals of a people under every form of government but morals are what modern governments are leaſt ſolicitous concerning, our cold politics deſpiſe them, and condemn the man who dares to proclaim their importance Taxes are levied on the depravation of manners; and the corrupt politician, inſtead of promoting what conſtitutes the true happineſs of a nation, is wholly occupied in increaſing the wealth and power of Kings"

This iſland at length became a province to the Roman empire, and its remaining liberties and laws were overwhelmed while Balbus poſſeſſed the throne of Conſtantinople, by the incurſions of thoſe barbarians, which ultimately deſtroyed the exiſtence of the empire It continued in poſſeſſion of the mild ſway during one hundred and twenty-ſeven years, and was again reſtored to its dependency on Rome by the intrepidity of Phocas, from which time it remained ſubject to the Emperors of Byzantium, until Baldwin Earl of Flanders created Boniface Marquis of Monferrat King of Theſſalonica, and added the iſland of Crete to his dominions This Nobleman, more greedy of territorial than ambitious of glory, ſold it to the Venetians in the year A D 1194, and it continued in their poſſeſſion five centuries and a half, when the Turks, in the year 1645, in the midſt of profound peace, ſuddenly invaded the iſland with a fleet of four hundred ſail and ſixty thouſand ſoldiers

We ſhall conclude our preſent extracts from this work with the account of this extraordinary ſiege

"The Emperor Ibrahim, who gave orders for this expedition, had no plea for undertaking it He, however, had recourſe to the uſual arts of Eaſtern perfidy To compoſe upon the Venetian Senate, he loaded their Ambaſſadors with preſents; ordered his fleet to proceed as far as Cape Matagan, as if quitting the Archipelago, and poſitively aſſured the Governors of Ime and

Cerigne,

Cerigne, that the Republic had nothing to fear for her poſſeſſions, yet, at the very moment the Porte was making theſe proteſtations, the fleet ſailed into the gulph of Canea, and paſſing between that place and Saint Theodore, proceeded to form a landing below the river of Platania. Such indeed has ever been the manner in which the Turks have acted towards the people they willed to ſubjugate. Fraud and force are the two means they employ to accompliſh their deſigns, but the time is certainly not far diſtant, when they will be compelled to reſtore their unjuſt conquests.

"The Venetians not expecting this ſudden invaſion, had made no preparations for defence, and the Turks landed without the leaſt reſiſtance. The little iſland of St Theodore is but a league and a half from Canea, and only three quarters of a league in circumference. Here the Venetians had erected two forts, one called Fortuna, on the top of the higheſt cliff, and the other named St Theodore, lower down. It was of the utmoſt importance for the invaders to poſſeſs themſelves of this rock, which might have greatly incommoded their ſhipping. They loſt no time, therefore, in commencing the attack, which they carried on with vigour. The forms of theſe fortreſſes had neither cannon nor ſoldiers, and was taken without firing a gun. The ſecond had only a garriſon of ſixty men, but bravely defended themſelves to the laſt extremity, and when the Turks entered it, they found only ſeven ſoldiers remaining, whoſe heads were barbarouſly ſtruck off by order of the Captain Pacha.

"Maſters of this important poſt, as well as of the Lazaretto, a rock ſituated half a league from Canea, the Turks blockaded the city by ſea, and ſurrounded it with lines of circumvallation by land. General Cornaro was thunder-ſtruck on learning that the enemy had made a deſcent. The whole iſland contained only a body of three thouſand five hundred infantry, and a ſmall number of horſe; and he knew that the beſieged town had only a thouſand regular troops for its defence, and a few citizens able to bear arms. He ſent inſtant advice of his diſtreſs to Venice, and took his poſt at the harbour, that he might be more at hand to ſuccour the beſieged. He threw about two hundred and fifty men into the town before the enemy could get their lines completed, and often attempted, but in vain, to introduce new reinforcements. The Turks approaching the body of the place, had carried a half moon which covered the gate of Retimo; and availing themſelves of their numerous artillery, continued daily to batter the wall in breach. The beſieged bravely returned their fire, and made them pay dearly for a few doubtful ſucceſſes. General Cornaro deſcended to arm the Greeks, and eſpecially the Spachoti, who boaſted of their bravery. He formed a battalion of them, but their days of proweſs were no more than moments: they ſaw the enemy, and heard the thunder of the artillery, they diſmayed took flight, nor was it poſſible to make a ſingle man of them ſtand fire.

"While the Senate of Venice were deliberating on the means of ſaving Candia, and buſied in fitting out a fleet, the Mahometan Generals ſtained the blood of their ſoldiers to bring their enterprize to a glorious concluſion: they had already loſt ſeventy days and warriors in the different engagements, but they had decided into the foſſe, and dug under the ramparts thoſe fougaſſes or mines, in which the powder confined Turks with an horrible explooſion, and overturns parts of the greateſt conſiſtence. They played off one of theſe mines under the baſtion of St. Demetrius, which threw up a great part of the wall, and allowed all its defenders. The aſſailers inſtantly mounted the breach, fabre in hand, and, profiting by the general conſternation, made themſelves maſters of that poſt. The beſieged, recovered from their fright, fell upon them with unexampled intrepidity. About four hundred Venetians routed even two thouſand Turks, already maſters of the wall, and puſhed them with ſo much ardour to the maſs, as to make a prodigious ſlaughter, and force the remainder into the trenches. In the ſeverity every body fought, the monk carried the muſket, women, forgetting their delicacy of their ſex, appeared in the midſt of the combatants, either to aſſiſt in ſupplying them with arms, or to wield them themſelves againſt the enemy, and ſeveral of theſe glorious heroines loſt their lives.

"During nine days the place held out againſt the whole forces of the Turks, and even to the laſt moment, if the Venetians had ſent aſſiſtance, the kingdom of Candia would have been ſaved. They could not, undoubtedly, be ignorant of the following fact. The north wind blows full into the gulph of Canea, and when ſtrong, the ſea runs very high. It is then impoſſible for any ſquadron, however numerous, to form in line line of battle to want an enemy. Had the Venetians set sail from Cerigne with this favourable wind, they would have reached Candia in five hours; still entered the harbour in full sail, without firing a shot, or the possibility of being opposed by a single Turkish vessel, which could not move without endangering their fifty on the coast, and dashing to pieces on the surrounding shoals. Instead of executing such a plan, suggested by the very nature of the situation, they sent a few galleys, which ran during to double Cape Spada, coasted along the southern shore of the island, and failed of effecting the purpose intended.

"The garrison of Candia, despairing of succour which had been long delayed, seeing three breaches open, by which the infidels might easily mount to the assault, overcome with fatigue and covered with wounds, reduced to five hundred men, whom it was necessary to dispose over walls of half a league circumference, every where undermined, thought demanded a capitulation, and by obtained the most honourable conditions, and after two months honourable defence, which cost the Turks five and twenty thousand men, marched out of the place with all the honours of war. The Turks who did not choose to remain behind, embarked to withdraw, and the Turks, eager to their custom, exercised their cruelty upon the feeble sick.

"The Venetians after the capture of Canea retired to Retimo, while the Captain Pacha proceeded to lay siege to the Castle of La Suda, in the middle of the bay, on a rock about a quarter of a league in circumference. He erected batteries, and endeavoured but without effect, to make a breach in the rampart. Despairing to carry it by force, he left troops to continue the blockade, and marched towards Retimo. This town, without walls, was defended by citadel, built on an eminence that commanded the harbour, to which General Cornaro had retired. At the approach of the enemy he drew his men out of the citadel, and waited for them in the open field. During the action he expected his person without reserve, and fought in the ranks to encourage his soldiers. A glorious death was the reward of his bravery, but his fall was followed by the loss of Retimo.

"The Turks, by landing fresh troops in the island, introduced the plague, which almost constantly accompanies their armies. This dreadful distemper made a rapid progress from day to day, and, like a devouring flame, exterminated the greatest part of the inhabitants. The remainder, terrified at its ravages, escaped into the Venetian states, and left the island almost a desert.

"In 1646 commenced the siege of Candia, of a much longer duration than that of Troy. Were a fertile and brilliant imagination, like that of Homer, to collect into one poem the extraordinary events of this celebrated siege, posterity would be presented with noble deeds of arms, magnificent scenes, and heroes not inferior to those of the Iliad. Memorable actions are not wanting in the history of nations. Every age produces new ones, but a genius like that of the father of poetry, does not arise in many ages. It would be inconsistent with my intention, in these letters, to enter into long details. I shall confine myself, therefore, to a cursory description of the principal events which occurred during the siege of Candia. The Turks, in 1648, had made but little progress before that place; they were frequently defeated by the Venetians, and sometimes compelled to retire to Retimo. At this period Ibrahim was solemnly deposed, and his eldest son, only seven years of age, placed on the throne, under the name of Mahomet IV. But the Sultan, in the midst of his pomp, still continuing an object of contempt and alarm to the authors of the revolution, he was strangled on the 18th of August of the same year. The young Emperor, whose advancement to the throne was thus checked by the hand of traitors, was himself, in the sequel, compelled to pass the remainder of his days in the obscurity of a prison.* The whole Ottoman history is nothing but one continued tissue of such murders and treasons, but how important are its lessons for all despots!

"In 1649, Uslan Pacha, who continued the blockade of Candia, receiving no succours from the Porte, was obliged to raise the siege, and fly to Canea. The Venetians now kept the sea with a strong squadron, and attacked the Turkish fleet in the Bay of Suda, burnt twelve ships, and killed six thousand men. But the infidels, some time after,

* After a reign of thirty-seven years, Mahomet IV was deposed, and confined in a prison.

having

having found means to land an army in Candia, recommenced with ſtill greater fury the ſiege of that city, and having gained poſſeſſion of an advanced work, which greatly incommoded the beſieged, reduced them to the neceſſity of blowing it up.

"From 1650 to 1658, the Venetians, continuing maſters of the ſea, waited every year for their enemies at the ſtraits of the Dardanelles, and defeated their numerous fleets in four ſea fights, in which they ſunk a great number of their ſhips, took many others, and ſpread conſternation to the very walls of Conſtantinople, which was filled with tumult and diſorder. The Grand Signior in diſmay, not thinking himſelf in ſafety, abandoned his capital with precipitation.

"Theſe glorious ſucceſſes raiſed the hopes of the Venetians, and depreſſed the courage of the Turks. They converted the ſiege of Candia into a blockade, in which they inflicted conſiderable loſſes. In 1659, the Sultan, to drive the Venetian fleet from the Dardanelles, and ſecure a free paſſage for his ſhips, ordered two new caſtles to be built at the entrance of the ſtraits. He commanded the Pacha of Canea to renew the ſiege of Candia, and make every effort to obtain poſſeſſion of that important fortreſs. In the mean time the Republic of Venice, profiting by the advantages already gained, made ſeveral attempts upon Canea, which city, in 1660, being vigorouſly preſſed, was on the point of ſurrendering, when the Pacha of Rhodes, haſtening to its ſuccour, threw into it a reinforcement of two thouſand men. He ſafely doubled the point of Cape Melec, in ſight of the Venetian fleet, which, lying becalmed off Cape Spada, was unable to make the ſmalleſt motion to give battle to an inferior enemy, and rob him of his conqueſt.

"Kiopruli, the ſon and ſucceſſor of the Vizir of that name, who had ſo long upheld the declining fortune of the Ottoman empire, knowing that the people murmured loudly at the length of the ſiege of Candia, and dreading a general revolt, which muſt have proved fatal to him and to his maſter, left Conſtantinople about the end of 1666, at the head of a formidable army. Having eluded the vigilance of the Venetian fleet, which was waiting for him off Canea, he effected his landing at Palio Caſtro, and formed his lines round Candia. He had under him four Pachas, and the flower of the Ottoman forces. Theſe troops, encouraged by the preſence and promiſes of their commanders, and ſeconded by a numerous train of artillery, performed prodigies of valour. All the out-works were entirely deſtroyed, and nothing remained to the beſieged but a ſimple line of walls, which, continually ſhaken by the cannon, were falling into ruins on every ſide; yet, though it will with difficulty be believed by poſterity, they ſtill held out for three years, againſt the whole forces of the Ottoman empire. At length they were about to capitulate, when the hope of ſuccours, ſent from France, again revived their valour, and rendered them invincible. Theſe ſuccours arrived on the 26th of June 1669, under the command of the Duke de Navailles, who brought with him a great number of French noblemen, who came to try their arms againſt the Turks.

"The day after their arrival the impatient French made a general ſally. The Duke de Beaufort, Admiral of France, put himſelf at the head of the forlorn hope. He marched the firſt againſt the infidels, and was followed by a numerous body of infantry and cavalry. They raſhly hurried upon the enemy, attacked, forced them in their entrenchments, and would have obliged them to abandon their lines and artillery, but for an unforeſeen event which checked their courage. In the midſt of the action a powder-magazine blew up. The moſt advanced loſt their lives. The French ranks were broken, and ſeveral of their leaders, among whom was the Duke de Beaufort, were never ſeen more. The ſoldiers took to flight in confuſion. The Turks purſued them, and it was with the greateſt difficulty that the Duke de Navailles regained the walls of Candia. The French accuſed the Italians of having betrayed them, by directing them to ſally ſooner than they ſhould have done, and reimbarked, in ſpite of all the entreaties of the Governor. Their departure decided the fate of the city, as only five hundred men remained for its defence. Morozini capitulated with Kiopruli, to whom he gave up the whole iſland of Crete, excepting Sude, Grabuge, and Spina Longa. The Grand Vizir made his entry into Candia on the 4th of October 1670, a little more than eight months, to repair the fortifications.

"The three fortreſſes, left by treaty to the Venetians, remained long in their poſſeſſion, but at length fell ſucceſſively into the hands of the enemy. Thus, after upwards of thirty years war, after ſacrificing more than two hundred thouſand ſand men, after deluging the iſland with rivers of Mahometan and Chriſtian blood, the Porte is at preſent in undiſturbed poſſeſſion of Candia."

FROM an expectation of being able to glean ſomething of the real character of the Writer, the ſpirit only of preſumption and indecorum of ſome parts of this work, on a ſubject of public concern, will induce the Letters now before us to be read; but an eaſy and elegant diſpoſition of the ſenſible and noble author will certainly diſcernible She profeſſes in the dedication, that one great motive to their publication was to inform her friends "where the real Lady Craven is to be found," but her Ladyſhip has diſcovered ſuch "a mania of ſcribbling," as has like another Cranbrook put the good-natured Hops ſo much right, for the impertinence, that we much doubt whether the chance of having her locality aſcertained now rendered more uncertain than ever

In our laſt Review we left her Ladyſhip exploring ſubterraneous curioſities in the celebrated GROTTO OF ANTIPAROS, in one of the iſlands of the Archipelago, but ſhe is no ſooner relieved from the dark abode to which "no wonder ſo delicate a lady," than THE LITTLE TARTOR conveys her, by a ſtormy paſſage to the port of Athens, from whence ſhe immediately proceeds, with the ſplendid of a political Courier, to Smyrna, go ſtick to Conſtantinople, paſſes through Rumania*, Sciſtria†, Bucareſt‡, and Hermanſtadt‖, and arrives ſafely and peaceably at Vienna The fever of the moment which ſeems continually to impel the ſteps of the fair wanderer, has, as ſhe acknowledges, left her "no opportunity for the profound obſervation," and therefore nice and ſubtle diſcriminations of the characters of men, of the manners and cuſtoms of nations of the modes and principles of governments, of the natural properties of things, are not to be expected, but theſe defects are abundantly ſupplied by unconnected anecdotes of other travellers, and a detail of the forms of bowing and polite reception — At Smyrna her Ladyſhip paſſes a viſit to the very lively and civil young wife of the French Conſul

"I was ſtanding by Mr de Lygonde and talking to him—the other Frenchmen were laughing with the Conſul's wife —when a little man came into the room and addreſſed himſelf to me, but ſo low that I could not diſtinguiſh what he ſaid, and took him to be ſome interpreter (of which I believe I had ſeen a dozen in the morning), who complimented me upon my arrival; but he ſeeing that I miſtook the purport of his ſpeech, raiſed his voice, and in good Engliſh ſaid, My Lady, hearing that you were here, I would not depart without offering you any ſervices in my power —I anſwered I was much obliged to him, he made his bow and went out again—upon which the gaiſty part of the company laughed very much, none of them knowing either the perſon or the language —I ſent after him, and found out that it was the worthy Mr Howard, who has ſacrificed ſo much of his time to the moſt humane purpoſe I begged he might be informed I intended to Conſtantinople and from thence to Vienna, and if I could be of the leaſt uſe to him in his return, I begged he would command me, but he ſent me word his route lay to Venice—meaning to viſit all the lazarettos and priſons on the coaſts"

On her return to Conſtantinople, the Duc de Choiſeul introduces the celebrated Turk "Iſaac Bey," who ſome few years ago made his appearance in London He is not ſingular in the ſentiments he entertains of the incivility with which the Engliſh canaille are too apt to treat ſtrange folks, and foreigners in general are not inclined to recollect that it is the unavoidable ſpray of national liberty

"Have you never heard at Paris of one Iſaac Bey, a Turk, that was much there? Mr de Choiſeul brought him to me the other morning, he entered my room followed by this Iſaac, a lively, and rather well-well-looking man, who, after being ſeated a few minutes, proſtrated himſelf at my feet, kiſſed the hem of my garment, and laid a fine embroidered muſlin handkerchief there for my acceptance.—He has been at Peterſburgh, and in London, which he diſlikes of all places in the world, becauſe the common people would not let him walk along the ſtreets without calling him, French dog of a Turk—He ſays he will never go there again—but Paris Paradis—Paradis Paris—there he will return; you may imagine, Sir, he was enchanted by the ſyrens of the Opera, upon aſſid off the ſtage—He diverted me very much He ſtaid and dined, and converſed very freely, as well as he was able"

From Conſtantinople her Ladyſhip paſſes into the fertile country of Wallachia, and at Buccoreſt is called to have an audience of the Princeſs of that country, and with her deſcription of this interview we ſhall cloſe our extracts from this publication, obſerving only, that if the ſtyle in which it is written ſhould appear to deſerve greater commendation than the matter it contains, the merit of it is attributed to the Rev Mr Seddon, miniſter of the Preſbyterian church at Amſterdam

"The Princeſs was ſitting à la Turque, with three of her daughters by her, they were about nine, ten, and eleven years old—The Princeſs might be about thirty, a very handſome face, ſomething like the Ducheſs of Gordon, only her features and countenance had more ſoftneſs, and her ſkin and hair were fairer—Her perſon was rather fat, and ſhe was above ſix months advanced in her eighth pregnancy—She took my hand and ſeated me by her—The Prince, to ſhew me an extraordinary degree of reſpect, had ſuffered Mr V—— to come into the Harem, and he ſat down by him There were near twenty women in the room, one of whom, inſtead of a turban, had a high cap of ſable put behind her hair, that was combed up ſtraight over a kind of roll—This head-dreſs was far from being ugly or unbecoming—The Princeſs told me it was a lady of Wallachia, and that the cap was the dreſs of the country—After the Princeſs had aſked me all the ſimple queſtions generally aſked by the Faſhion females—ſhe aſked me if I was dreſſed in the French faſhion, and told me ſhe ſhould be happy to know any thing ſhe could do to detain me in Wallachia a whole year The Prince ſeemed to deſire it as much as ſhe did—but I aſſured them I ſhould not ſtay four-and-twenty hours in Buccoreſt. They then deſired me to ſup with them, which I conſented to, but deſired I might return to my lodgings to write to Conſtantinople, as I had promiſed immediately upon my arrival to this place—I was conducted back to my coach and through the courts with the ſame ceremony as I came—and being ſeated, the ſecretary told me he was ordered to ſhew me a fine Engliſh garden, belonging to an old boyard, which we went to A country curate's kitchen-garden in England and that were the ſame—But the maſter of it was a venerable figure with a beard as white as ſnow, dreſſed in a long muſlin robe, ſupported by his ſervants, as he walked with difficulty—He preſently ordered all the fruit in his garden to be preſented to me; and when I was going out of the garden, I met the very lady, with her fur cap, I had ſeen in the palace.—She ſhewed ſuch tranſports of joy upon finding me at her father's houſe, that it was with difficulty I could get from her, ſhe had taken me in her arms, and almoſt ſmothered me with kiſſes

"The reſpectable father's name is Bano Dedeſcolo, and one of the principal noblemen in Wallachia however, I got to my lodgings at laſt, and ſcarcely had finiſhed a letter to Mr de Choiſeul, when two of the Prince's people with the ſecretary came in, followed by many more of his houſehold The ſecretary deſired me to go and look over a gallery that ſurrounded the back court of the houſe, I did ſo, and I ſaw a beautiful Arabian horſe, in the midſt of a great mob; two Turks held his bridle—The ſecretary told me the Prince hearing that I was fond of horſes deſired me to accept that, which a Pacha of three Tails had given him a few days before—and he hoped I ſhould accept of it with the regard with which it was preſented—I gave him as civil an anſwer as I could imagine, and very handſome preſents in money to the grooms that brought him, and to the whole ſet of ſtable-people—The ſupper was ſerved in a more European manner than I ſhould have imagined, a table upon legs and chairs to ſit on were things I did not expect The Prince ſat at the end of the table, his wife on one ſide, and I on the other Mr V—— was likewiſe invited, and ſat at my left—Several women ſat down to ſupper with us The Princeſs had nine females behind her chair to wait upon her—ſeveral ſilver things, evidently the produce of England, were ſet upon the table, ſuch as ſalt ſellers, cruets, &c &c but there were four candleſticks that ſeemed to be made of alabaſter, ſet with flowers compoſed of ſmall rubies and emeralds, that were very beautiful.—Deteſtable Turkiſh muſic was played during the whole ſupper — but relieved now and then by Bohemians, whoſe tunes were quite delightful, and might have made the heavieſt clod of earth deſire to dance The Prince ſaw the impreſſion this muſic made upon me, and deſired they might play oftener than the Turks —It ſeems theſe Bohemians are born ſlaves, the property of the reigning Prince of Wallachia, while his power laſts —There are, as he told me, five thouſand of them left, formerly there were five-and-twenty thouſand — After the ſupper was over we ſat ſome time in the large room the Princeſs firſt received me in, but the Prince and Mr V—— ſat on one ſide, and the Princeſs, myſelf, and the other women on the other The Princeſs, I believe, thought I gave myſelf the liberties of a traveller, when I told her the ladies with us learned to dance and write—with ſome other things which ſhe doubted of, likewiſe —— —— —— —— —— —— —— —— —— —— —— ——

" Her huſband ſmoaked his pipe, and I was ſorry ſhe did not too, for I ſaw that it was her civility to a ſtranger that prevented her —The Prince aſked me if I knew the Emperor and Prince Kaunitz—and upon my anſwering in the affirmative, he aſked me —" Should I ſee " them?"—" Probably"—" Why then " (ſaid he) do you tell the Prince I am " devoted to his commands —and tell " the Emperor, I hope now we are ſo " near one another, we ſhall be good " friends "—The oddneſs of theſe meſſages was very near making me laugh — but I gravely aſſured him I ſhould deliver them faithfully, if I had an opportunity —About half paſt eleven I roſe to take my leave, and received from the Princeſs ſome very beautiful embroidered handkerchiefs, and was obliged again to excuſe myſelf from ſtaying only a twelvemonth with her, which ſhe ſaid would be a great amuſement to her, as my preſence was full of graces —I retired with all the attendants I had before, only with the addition of I believe a hundred flambeaux, and all the Turkiſh and Bohemian muſic playing by the ſide of the large gold coach —The horrid diſcord and comical proceſſion got the better of all my gravity, and though the ſecretary was there, I laughed all the way to the French Conſul's houſe, where I now write, the civil man and wife inſiſting upon giving me a bed Mr V—— ſides of good-breeding were ſo diſcompoſed by my laughing, that he aſſured the ſecretary the perfection of my ear for muſic was ſuch, that the leaſt diſcord in it made me laugh —and he repeated this in all the ways he could turn it —I ſaid, On l'aura, c'eſt bien vrai, but between whiles I ſaid in Engliſh, What would you have me do I feel like Punch parading through the ſtreets, with all theſe trumpets and this mob about me —However, the ſecretary and Mr V—— at laſt caught the infection, and we arrived laughing all three at the houſe, where the Conſul's wife had prepared me a comfortable bed, and I got rid of my muſic by giving them a handful of money

" It is ſo hot that I cannot ſleep and I am writing to you, dear Sir —— This is no inconſiderable town, the ſituation of it is very beautiful — indeed in this country it would be difficult to find an ugly ſcite —Wallachia pays to the Porte a tribute of four hundred * purſes yearly, excluſive of grain, wool, and many thouſand ſheep — Shepherds pay an annual tribute beſide, of eighty thouſand ſkins of the cattle, with butter, cheeſe, and tallow

" If the grain fails from Egypt, this country is obliged to ſupply the deficiency at Conſtantinople — Still I affirm that upon earth, Sir, all things ſuperior in their nature, either animate or inanimate, are taxed cruelly —This beautiful country, the ſoil and climate of which makes every produce luxuriant, is by the hand of fate under a power which extorts unmercifully from the natives, through the neceſſities of the Porte, if not by the rapine of the Princes, and preſſes Plenty from her ſource, driving often the wretched Wallaques to fly into the mountains, where, at leaſt for a time, they avoid the cruelties they find from a tyrannical government, which puniſhes them for the deficiencies the extortions of that very government have occaſioned "

COLLECTIONS of Poems have been very frequent, but either from negligence, want of taſte, or inability in the ſelectors, they are not generally ſuch as can be recommended, without ſome drawback In many, the pieces are liable to exception, on account of their bad tendency, in others, from their mediocrity In ſome, friendſhip to individuals obtains admiſſion for improper performances, and in others, the deſpicable traſh which is preſerved, contaminates their wholeſome brethren, and renders the work contemptible The compiler of this volume is liable to no exception of this kind: the Poems he has ſelected are excellent, and the mode of offering them to the public is liberal and ſpirited By claſſing them, he has furniſhed the reader with productions which may be read in their order with entertainment and advantage No rubaldry is here retained; every piece breathes the air of piety, and every piece is calculated to produce ſuch ſentiments as are favourable to virtue and devotion This volume may alſo be recommended as containing a great quantity of matter at a very moderate price

THIRTY-SIXTH DAY
TUESDAY, APRIL 22

THIS day the proceedings in this Trial were reſumed At twelve o'clock the Peers in their robes took their ſeats in the Court, and ordered the Serjeant at Arms to ſummon Mr Haſtings to appear That gentleman was ſoon brought to the bar by the Uſher of the Black Rod, and the Serjeant at Arms having, by order of their Lordſhips, called upon the Commons to proceed in ſupport of the Charges brought by them againſt the priſoner,

Mr Burke, chief Manager of the Proſecution, immediately roſe, and addreſſed the Court

The melancholy event, he ſaid, of his Majeſty's illneſs, which had ſo deeply affected the nation, and ſuſpended the functions of government, had occaſioned a delay in the proſecution of the impeachment, which was to be regretted not only on account of the melancholy cauſe that had produced it, but alſo of public juſtice, the cauſe of which, at leaſt in the preſent caſe, had been unavoidably checked for a conſiderable time

The cauſe of the delay was now happily removed, and their Lordſhips were again enabled to proceed in the important trial, which had already taken up much of their attention.

He truſted, that in the tumult of joy occaſioned by his Majeſty's recovery, which now filled the breaſts of all his ſubjects with exultation equal to the depreſſion which they felt whilſt his Majeſty was afflicted with ſickneſs—he truſted, he ſaid, that in this tumult of joy, their Lordſhips would not forget that juſtice was due of right to the injured, and that they could not voluntarily ſuſpend it without a breach of their public duty

He ſaid, he was juſt come from a place (the Houſe of Commons) where regulations had been made for ſeconding his Majeſty's wiſhes, in giving ſolemnity to the public thankſgiving that was to take place on Thurſday, and paying due homage to the Almighty for his happy recovery

But it was not by prayer alone that becoming homage was to be paid to Heaven Courts of Juſtice were links of that great chain, of which the firſt and great link was DIVINE JUSTICE. this was an attribute eſſential to the Deity, and man, by endeavouring to approach as nearly as the nature of man would admit, to a reſemblance to his Maker, might be aſſured, that in exerciſing repreſentative juſtice, he was performing a ſervice and an homage not leſs acceptable to Heaven, than the moſt fervent prayer.

Having premiſed this, he ſaid, there were ſome difficulties, under which the impeachment had of late begun to labour, which he would endeavour, with their Lordſhips' leave, to remove

Some perſons, no doubt leſs friends to public juſtice than to Mr Haſtings, had of late begun to aſk, when this trial would terminate? To their queſtion he would give this ſhort anſwer—"As ſoon as the ends are attained for which it was inſtituted"

It would be ſtrange indeed, if, becauſe a priſoner had contrived to render it difficult for his proſecutors to diſcover all the mazes of his corruption and crimes, if, becauſe he was watchful to ſeize every opportunity that might occaſion delay or trouble, and was ready to improve it, that his proſecutors ſhould abandon the duty they owed to the public and to their country, and ſuffer a criminal to eſcape puniſhment, merely becauſe it was likely to be a work of labour and of time to proſecute him to conviction If a priſoner was watchful, active, laborious and perſevering, it would be ſhameful for thoſe to whom the care of bringing him to juſtice was committed, to be wanting in vigilance, activity, labour and perſeverance

If the length of time that a trial was likely to laſt was a reaſon for putting an end to it, it was equally a reaſon for not beginning it But as both Houſes of Parliament had entered upon this trial, which they knew beforehand muſt, from its nature, run to great length, he made no doubt but they would feel it to be a duty, both to the nation and to the priſoner, not to drop it, but to carry it on until it ſhould terminate, where alone it ought to end, in the acquittal or condemnation of the party accuſed

He was well aware, he ſaid, that their Lordſhips muſt find it a work of labour and fatigue to ſit out ſo long a trial, but he would ſay, at the ſame time, that the COMMONS would not call upon their Lordſhips to undertake any thing of which they were not ready to ſet them an example The COLCHESTER Committee had been kept ſitting within a day or two of the time which their Lordſhips had hitherto devoted to this trial And yet the Committee had to enquire into little more than paltry acts of bribery, amounting only to odd pounds, ſhillings, and pence, and into the conduct of a Returning Officer, who was no more than a MILLER But their Lordſhips had before them a Governor General of Bengal, who was charged with enormous crimes, and with having taken bribes, and plundered the defenceleſs people of his government of ſums amounting to MILLIONS.

But the length of the trial was not the only objection that he heard againſt it, he had been informed that the priſoner had complained to their Lordſhips of the great expence to which it expoſed him, and threatened him with the total ruin of his fortune, as his defence had, even in this early ſtage of it, coſt him already near 30,000l This was certainly a very large ſum; and it was by no means his wiſh to exhauſt any man's fortune merely by his defence How ſo great a ſum could have been poſſibly expended by him already, he could not comprehend; but this he would venture to ſay, that the fortune of Mr Haſtings was not likely to be exhauſted by the expence to which he was ſubjected by his defence The immenſe bribes he had received whilſt he was in office had ſo ſwelled his fortune, that he might conſider the loſs of 30,000l as a trifle, He had received from one ſingle Zemindary at one time, a bribe to that amount And therefore, as their Lordſhips would find, that the immenſe fortune of the priſoner had been acquired by PECULATION, they would not think it very hard that wealth ſo acquired, ſhould be diminiſhed, nor would they feel any compaſſion for the loſſes of a perſon, who was obliged to take from the ſtores which extortion and oppreſſion had enabled him to accumulate

Having made theſe preliminary obſervations, Mr Burke ſaid, he hoped, that notwithſtanding all the difficulties which had been thrown in the way of the trial, it was now going to be reſumed, under auſpices as favourable as thoſe under which it had begun.

He then informed their Lordſhips, that the charge which he intended to open, was the 7th, which related to PRESENTS, or in plain Engliſh, BRIBES.

But before he opened the charge, he begged leave to make ſome few remarks upon ſomething that had happened ſince the laſt time he had had the honour of addreſſing their Lordſhips. Packets had been brought over from India, containing atteſtations from perſons, from whom Mr. Haſtings tings was charged with having taken or extorted money, the purport of which atteſtations was to exculpate the accuſed, and to declare that with reſpect to them, he had not acted rigorouſly or unjuſtly, or ſpoiled them of any part of their property, but had behaved to them with kindneſs, moderation and juſtice

At firſt ſight the Commons, he ſaid, might appear in an aukward light, by being thus diſavowed by thoſe very perſons, on account of whoſe ſufferings and wrongs occaſioned by the priſoner, they had brought him to their Lordſhips' bar to anſwer for his adminiſtration. It was odd that the parties in whoſe behalf the proſecution had been commenced, ſhould come forward and declare that they had received no injuries from Mr Haſtings, that he had done them no wrongs.

But ſo far were the Managers for the Commons from being diſconcerted by theſe atteſtations, that they would be themſelves the firſt to offer them in evidence—their Lordſhips would then ſee what little dependence ought to be placed upon atteſtations ſigned by perſons whoſe fingers were ſtill ſhooting with the pain occaſioned by THUMB-SCREWS, and who nevertheleſs could be prevailed on to declare under their hands that the man who had wronged, tortured, plundered them, was their benefactor Theſe atteſtations, accompanied by the other evidence which the Commons would produce, would ſerve to ſhew the deplorable ſtate to which the wretched natives of India were reduced, who were ſo much in awe of their rulers, that fearing to complain, they even beſtowed praiſes upon their undoers, or, as the Poet ſaid,

" They pay that HOMAGE with the
" MOUTH which the HEART would fain
" DENY, but DARES not

Theſe atteſtations would ſerve at the ſame time to ſhew the influence which Mr Haſtings ſtill poſſeſſed in India, through the means of his creatures, who fill all the ſubordinate offices of government in that country. This influence was ſufficient to procure ſignatures to any kind of inſtruments framed by the friends of Mr Haſtings, in his defence; inſtruments which, however, unfortunately for the priſoner, would defeat the very purpoſe for which they were procured; for they actually denied ſome important points which Mr. Haſtings himſelf admitted; and therefore they might be ſaid to mean this, " If Mr. Haſtings accuſes himſelf of " having taken any money from us, " don't believe him, though he ſpeaks " againſt himſelf; for he has not plun" dered us, or behaved otherwiſe to " us than kindly." That this might not be thought a forced conſtruction, Mr Burke read from one of theſe atteſtations a declaration made by a native of great rank in India (from whom Mr Haſtings admitted he had received money) to this effect- "that the Governor General had never taken any from him"

Mr Burke remarked humorouſly upon the ſtile of theſe atteſtations, which, he ſaid, all bore evident marks of European birth It was clear, he ſaid, that they had been firſt written in Engliſh, in all the ſimplicity of a Weſtern ſtile, that they were afterwards tranſlated into Perſian, and adorned with the lofty metaphors of the Eaſt; and then turned once more into Engliſh for the benefit of their Lordſhips. The ſame ideas, the ſame arrangement ran through them all the firſt that was ſeen was liked, and being liked was adopted by all, which ſhewed that they were extremely well calculated to convey the ideas of the priſoner's friends, and were therefore re-echoed from every part of India, and thus was verified what Voltaire had juſtly ſaid,

" Les BONS MOTS ſont toujours REDITS "

Having thus far cleared his way, Mr. Burke went into the conſideration of the 7th charge

To ſhew that the Government of India was in a peculiar manner expoſed to temptation and corruption, he cauſed to be read by Mr Grey, one of the Managers, a minute entered in the council book of Calcutta, by the late Lord Clive, which pointed out the exiſtence of this evil, and the neceſſity of oppoſing a barrier againſt it His Lordſhip recommended it in ſtrong terms to the Court of Directors to ſettle upon the Governor General, and upon the Councillors, ſuch ſalaries as might place them beyond the reach of temptation; and to ſtrictly forbid them to receive any preſents from the natives

The Court of Directors felt the propriety of what was thus recommended; they ſaw the extent to which corruption had prevailed among their ſervants, who to their own private emolument had ſacrificed the intereſts of the Company, and the character of their country. They, therefore, resolved to form a new government, upon the plan recommended to them, and reposing in Mr Hastings the highest trust that had ever been placed by them before in any of their servants, sent him to Calcutta, and granted him a splendid support for his new dignity.

By the covenants into which he entered with the Company, Mr Hastings had bound himself never to receive any present from the natives, above the value of 400l.

In proportion as the trust thus reposed in Mr Hastings and the confidence placed in him were great, so in proportion was his guilt in violating them. He maintained the system of corruption which he was sent to destroy, and he took PRESENTS, though he was bound not to receive much as PRESENTS.

With respect to his receiving money, he had admitted, in his defence, that the fact had often happened, but then he justified his conduct in some cases by saying, that money given in this form often given as a tribute, and that in that light and that only he had received it. But this defence could not bear him out.

There were in India, Mr Burke said, but two species of payment, except for goods bought and sold, that could be called legal. One was called PESCUSH, and was the consideration which was given for a grant of certain lands, &c. The amount of this pescush was always specified in the grant, and was always paid into the Exchequer. The second species was called a nuzur or nuzzerana, and was given as a token of acknowledgment of dependance from an inferior to his superior. The nazir was always trifling; the highest he had ever heard of in India, given to a nabob, consisted of 100 pieces of a gold coin worth about thirty-six shillings each, and this nazir was to no less a man than the Sovereign of Indostan, the Great Mogul himself.

But what might be a proper present to the King of Delhi, would be too trifling for Mr Hastings, who took whole lacks of rupees at a time.

Of the first of these two species of payments Mr. Hastings could not avail himself, because the pescush formed a part of the public revenue; and the second could be no gratification to him, because the money that could be fairly taken under the denomination of a nazir, must necessarily be only a small amount, and therefore when he took large sums from the natives, for his own private use, they could be considered, let them be coloured by what they might, only in the light of bribes.

As to the PROOFS which he intended to produce of the RECEIPT of PRESENTS, Mr Burke said they were of two kinds—one presumptive, the other positive; and both, he hoped, would be found fully sufficient by their Lordships.

He begged leave here to discriminate the particular charge to which he intended to apply the presumptive evidence.

Mr Hastings was directed by his superiors in Leadenhall street to remove Mohammed Reza Khan from the offices which he held under the Nabob of Bengal, and to enquire into his conduct during his administration, which was suspected to be corrupt.

Mr Hastings executed the order, but with a degree of rigour not enjoined, and not warranted by his instructions.—He had carried Mohammed Reza Khan to be arrested, and carried under a military guard to Calcutta, where he was kept a prisoner for near two years, under a severe restraint, for he was not only not suffered to pay a visit, but was not permitted even to receive one.

This treatment of a man of illustrious rank resulted the native, who beheld with indignation a man confined under a military guard, who had filled the highest offices in the state, who had been a kind of Viceroy of a great kingdom, under the Nabob of Bengal, and who, Mr Burke said, if he could compare situations in India with those which were in some degree similar in England, united in his own person the several high offices of First Lord of the Treasury, Lord High Chancellor, Lord Chief Justice, and Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, and who, for the support of his great dignity, had a salary or income of 100,000l.

Though it might have been proper to enquire into the conduct of a man suspected of mal-administration, yet Mohammed Reza Khan was not a person to be treated with indignity, all that could be necessary on the occasion was, to secure him that he might be forthcoming when his judges were ready to try him. The rigour used by Mr Hastings was employed for corrupt purposes, namely, to compel that Minister to purchase the indulgence of the Governor General.

Mr Hastings practised upon his fears more ways than one. He acted as if he was going to proceed againſt his priſoner with unrelenting rigour, and with this view he did a moſt cruel thing, for he turned out of office every native in the whole kingdom of Bengal, who was indebted for his appointment to Mohammed Reza Khan, and filled up all the vacancies with perſons known to be enemies to that unfortunate Miniſter In conſequence of this meaſure, great numbers of poor people were reduced to poverty by the loſs of places which they had long held, and which were their only ſupport

Mr. Haſtings had juſtified this meaſure to the Court of Directors by ſaying, that if it had not taken place, the influence of Mohammed Reza Khan would have ſtifled all evidence of his guilt, through the means of his creatures in office

Who would not think, ſaid Mr Burke, after ſuch ſteps as theſe, that Mohammed Reza Khan was going to be put to a ſevere trial? Who would not think that he was to expect nothing but inexorable juſtice? But thoſe who might think ſo, knew little of Mr Haſtings, for in fact, Mohammed was diſmiſſed not only without puniſhment, but without trial So that it might fairly be preſumed, all things conſidered, that as he was not the guilt of this man which had cauſed him to be treated with ſo much unjuſtifiable rigour at firſt, ſo it was not to his innocence that he was indebted for the reſtoration of his liberty, and the end that was put to all proceedings againſt him It might be fairly inferred he had made his peace with Mr Haſtings, and given proofs of his innocence with which a Court of Juſtice would not have been ſatisfied

He truſted their Lordſhips would agree with him, that in this whole proceeding there were ſtrong preſumptive proofs that Mr Haſtings ſold this Muſſulman his liberty, and the latter actually paid the price for it

There was ſomething in circumſtances, which he conſidered in evidence as infinitely ſtronger than the moſt poſitive oath And as acculations might fairly be repelled in ſome ſituations by the characters of the parties accuſed, ſo they might be ſupported by them and by circumſtances

HOUSE of COMMONS.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17.

MR St John preſented a petition againſt the County Election Bill, from the Freeholders of the county of Bedford

The report of the Committee of Supply was brought up by Mr Gilbert.

The reſolutions which it contained were read a firſt time, and on the ſecond reading of them,

Mr Dempſter, after deſiring the Clerk to read that part of his Majeſty's ſpeech which mentions the pacific intentions of the European potentates with reſpect to this country, objected to the vote of 20,000 ſeamen, that number being, in his opinion, too large for a time when his Majeſty had aſſured us of his having no reaſon to apprehend any interruption of the peace of his dominions. Some cogent reaſon ought to be aſſigned for keeping up 2000 more ſeamen than we had laſt year, and 4000 more than we uſually had in time of peace He hoped the Miniſter would ſtrictly adhere to thoſe profeſſions of œconomy with which he had commenced his political career, and not countenance any grant that bordered on extravagance

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that 1200 or 1,300 ſeamen had gone out in the ſquadron lately ſent out to India, and that ſome hundreds more were employed in the Mediterranean ſervice, for which reaſon it became neceſſary to ſupply the deficiency thus produced He was as willing as the Honourable Gentleman to promote œconomy, but that œconomy ought not to be carried to an extreme that was inconſiſtent with prudence, or a due regard to the ſafety of the kingdom It was true, that we had the moſt pacific aſſurances from foreign powers, but we ſtill ought to keep the realm in ſuch a ſtate of defence as was moſt likely to enſure the continuance of that peace which we now enjoyed He truſted that the generality of the Houſe would not, after what he had juſt ſtated, conſider the number of ſeamen now propoſed to be voted as too great, and that they would not accuſe his Majeſty's Miniſters of want of œconomy, ſince they took every precaution in their power to reduce the national debt, and bring the expenditure as low as was compatible with the public ſecurity

Mr. Huſſey wiſhed to know whether this augmentation of the number of ſeamen would be attended with any additional burthens on the people

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could no anſwer this queſtion decively. He would only ſay, that the firſt duty was to provide for keeping the kingdom in an adequate ſtate of defence, and the ſecond, to make the revenue equal to the expenditure, with as little burthen on the public as poſſible.

The reſolution for 20,000 ſeamen was then agreed to

The reſolution for 17,448 land forces brought up

General Burgoyne, who was deſirous of ſtating his opinion on ſome points relative to the army He firſt entered into ſome military minutiæ, the detail of which would not intereſt the general reader He then adverted to the reduction which had been made laſt year in the houſhold troops, and obſerved, with regard to the penſions given to the reduced officers to ſell their commiſſions, that it was a novel and extraordinary affair After dwelling on this and other points, he ſaid there would be no ſecurity for the good government of the army, till ſome reſponſible military miniſter ſhould be appointed, and that the miniſter ought, in his opinion, to be commander in chief. He touched, with ſome warmth, on the diſmiſſion of the Marquis of Lothian from his regiment of life-guards, by which, he ſaid, that nobleman had been unjuſtly diſgraced for his late parliamentary conduct, which had rendered him obnoxious to the miniſtry, who had probably impoſed upon his Majeſty by fallacious and exaggerated account. He remembered that the late Earl of Chatham had once propoſed a clauſe in a Bill, by which every Miniſter would have been obliged to ſign his name to the advice given by him to his Majeſty "Would to God (ſaid the General) that a proviſion of that kind were now in force! we ſhould then know who had adviſed his Majeſty to treat the noble Marquis in this manner" Military officers ought to hold their Commiſſions by other tenures than thoſe of political ſervice; and it was an invaſion on the independence of Parliament to remove or diſgrace them for their political opinions.

The Secretary at War ſaid, he never would ſhrink from reſponſibility while he continued in office, and was ready to anſwer at any time for what advice he had given his Majeſty After a ſhort preface, he replied to the General's ſpeech As to the reduced officers ſelling their commiſſions, he thought they had ſome claim to that indulgence, as they had purchaſed thoſe commiſſions. This would, indeed, continue the expence of their pay ſome time longer; but that would gradually decreaſe, by death or proviſion of another kind With regard to the Marquis of Lothian, he would not pretend to ſay that the political conduct of that Nobleman had been the cauſe of his removal from his regiment; and though he was removed, yet another regiment had been offered him It was the undoubted prerogative of his Majeſty to make what changes he pleaſed in that or any other eſtabliſhment, and if Parliament were to interfere on ſuch occaſions, it would produce endleſs diſcuſſions

Mr. Fox took notice of the army eſtimates, as being, he conceived, unneceſſarily augmented in the preceding year; a meaſure which, however, he ſhould not now debate He animadverted on the diſmiſſion of the Marquis of Lothian, which he was not inclined to regard as a diſgrace, in the common acceptation of the term, for a treatment of this kind could not affect diſgrace on the character of the individual thus treated The character of the Marquis remained wholly unimpeached, and was, he believed, above all impeachment He was ſorry to find, that his Majeſty's breaſt had been ſo abuſed, as to induce him to ſhew ſuch a mark of diſfavour to another Lord, whoſe ſole offence was his not having concurred in the late meaſures of his Miniſtry, and he was confident that his Majeſty's known moderation would have prevented him from taking ſuch a ſtep, if he had not been groſſly impoſed upon At a time when his Majeſty had juſt recovered from a ſevere indiſpoſition, which ought to have prompted his Miniſters to keep every thing from him that would be likely to agitate his feelings, they had taken care to make their influence over him ſubſervient to their political malice and party vengeance They had filled their Sovereign's ears with partial accounts of the conduct of their parliamentary opponents, and had urged him to certify his diſapprobation of what they themſelves had diſliked, in being averſe to their political intrigues Was it fair or honourable to act in this manner? Was it proper to give ſuch leſſons to military officers, as implied that they muſt be ſubſervient to the Miniſter of the day, or muſt ſubmit to a removal?—If the Marquis was culpable, an equal degree of blame would reſt on many other noble Lords, who were as much diſtinguiſhed by their great abilities, their moderation of temper, and the juſtneſs of their views, as they were by the elevation of their rank He concluded with obſerving, that though his Majeſty had a right to exert his prerogative in diſmiſſing any individual from his ſervice, yet when it was abuſed in conſequence of miniſter advice, ſome notice ought to be taken of the abuſe.

This reſolution, and thoſe which followed it, were then put and agreed to

The Secretary at War brought up the Mutiny Bill, which was read a firſt time, as was alſo the Bill for regulating the conduct of marines when aſhore Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18

The order of the day being read for a Committee of Supply, Mr Gilbert took his ſeat as chairman

Mr Aldridge roſe to make ſome motions relative to the ordnance eſtabliſhment A miſtake having been made on a former day, with regard to the ſum to be voted for the payment of the ordnance artificers, he would reſtate that motion correctly He would therefore move, that 19341 be granted for the pay of 500 military artificers belonging to the Board of Ordnance

This motion was agreed to, and was ſucceeded by another from the ſame Gentleman, purporting that 93061 4s 1d be granted for the ſervices performed by officers of Ordnance, not ſettled by the year 1783, to which no oppoſition was made

Mr Aldridge then ſtated, that, on account of the additional works to be erected, in purſuance of the plan of re-fortifying the Weſt India iſlands, the Ordnance eſtimates of the preſent year exceeded the former The ſum he would now move for was 215,071l 6s 4d for the Ordnance extraordinaries of the current year

Sir Grey Cooper thought the ſum by much too large, and expreſſed his wiſh that ſome data would be aſſigned by the Gentlemen on the other ſide of the Houſe, upon which they had grounded their ſuppoſition that the ſyſtem of fortification would require ſuch a ſum for this year. It exceeded by 111,000l the eſtimates of 1786, and by 40,000l that of 1788 If extravagance of this kind ſhould be perſiſted in, he was apprehenſive, that the year 1790, which had been predicted by Miniſters as a time when our expenditure would be brought within ſuch a compaſs as to give favourable hopes of a rapid diſcharge of the national debt, would not prove that happy millennium which ſome ſuppoſe it would be.

General Burgoyne was ſorry that this important buſineſs was brought forward in ſo thin a Houſe With reſpect to the ſcheme of fortifying the Weſt India Iſlands, he thought it unneceſſary and injudicious. The expence would be enormous, as it not only involved the immediate charges of erection, but alſo the maintenance of thoſe troops that were requiſite for the defence of the fortifications.

fications. He wished that some gentleman would state the supposed final expence of this plan of fortification, a plan which he had always disapproved, from an idea that the grand defence of the West-Indies depended on a fleet

The Chancellor of the Exchequer vindicated the necessity of keeping our West-India Islands in an adequate posture of defence, not only by means of an occasional fleet, but also by strong fortifications With all submission to the Hon General, he thought that the aid of a fleet, without the co-operation of fortifications, would be absolutely inadequate to the preservation of those islands It might happen that ships might be prevented from coming in time to the protection of an island that was attacked, in which case it might be taken, provided there were no fortifications at all, or only such as were weak and inefficient His Majesty's Ministers had taken care that this business should not be carried beyond the limits of prudence, or the attention due to an actual state of defence

Sir William Molesworth spoke of an extensive wall now erecting at Mutton Cove, near Plymouth Dock, which he did not consider as a necessary measure

The Hon Capt Berkeley replied to General Burgoyne and Sir William Molesworth A fleet alone would be insufficient, he said, to preserve our West-India Islands, from being subdued and this had particularly appeared in the case of Dominica, and St Christopher's, the reduction of which Lord Rodney's fleet had been unable to prevent As to the wall of Mutton Cove, he would refer the Hon Baronet to a friend of his who often amused the House on ordnance subjects (Mr Courtenay), for that gentleman held one of the offices of the Board of Ordnance when this wall was commenced

Mr Bastard, not knowing much of the situation of the West-India Islands, or what fortifications they required, would not oppose the present motion, but was willing to give Ministers credit for the honesty of their intentions The motion was then put, and agreed to

On the resumption of the House, the report was ordered to be received on the morrow, and then the House adjourned

THURSDAY, March 19

Mr. Gilbert brought up the report of the last Committee of Supply, which was read a first time; and, on the second reading of it,

General Burgoyne rose, and declared that he could not conscientiously give his vote in favour of the resolution for the ordnance extraordinaries, before a regular estimate was produced of the ultimate supposed expence of the fortification system. He condemned the whole plan as absurd, enormously expensive, and tending to diminish those real forces which our navy required. He concluded with observing, that in calling for these estimates, he stood upon a fair Parliamentary ground, being unwilling to vote away the public money without knowing the specific grounds on which such money was demanded. Before he moving for the estimates, he would move, in compliance with form, that the report be re-committed

Colonel Hippy was averse to the idea of submitting the plans of the engineers to a Board of General Officers, who might not be so well acquainted with the exact situation of the islands proposed to be fortified He defended the scheme of fortifying the West Indies as highly proper Far from diminishing the resources of men, it would even be a saving in that respect, for a small body of troops, in a fortified place, might defend themselves a considerable time against a large army; as was the case in the island of St Vincent, which was maintained, for the space of three months, by only 800 men against 15,000; whereas, if a place be either unfortified, or very badly fortified, a large number of men will make, comparatively, a very indifferent defence

Mr Courtenay supported the motion of the Hon General, as what the House could not refuse with the least propriety

Mr Steele did not see the necessity of producing the estimates in question, which could not state the probable total amount better than the House already knew it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer maintained, that the system recommended was very prudent, and ultimately economical

The question was put for the second reading of the report, which was agreed to, and General Burgoyne's motion was rejected without a division

All the resolutions in the report were severally assented to

FRIDAY, March 20

Petitions were presented against Mr. Bencroft's County Election Bill, from the counties of Suffolk, Carmarthenshire, and the isle of Anglesea

Sir George Yonge moved, that the Mutiny Bill be now read a third time, which was immediately done This Bill then received the assent of the House, as did also the Bill for regulating the behaviour of Marines while on shore, and the bill for erecting a new Shire-house for the County of Essex

A Committee of Ways and Means was now formed, Mr Gilbert in the chair

Mr Rose moved, that it is the opinion of this Committee, that, towards raising the supplies to be granted to his Majesty, the sum of four ſhillings in the pound be aſſeſſed on the rent of land

This motion was aſſented to, which was alſo the caſe with Mr Roſe's next motion, viz that the duties on malt, cyder, and perry, be continued for the preſent year

An adjournment then took place, till

MONDAY, March 23

The report from the Committee of Ways and Means was received and agreed to

Mr Wilberforce deſired the reſolution of the 6th of May 1788, that the Houſe would early in the next Seſſions of Parliament adopt ſome final regulations reſpecting the abuſes of the Slave Trade, complained of in various petitions on the table, to be read; which was done accordingly.

Mr Wilberforce then ſaid, it was much to be regretted that the peculiar circumſtances of public buſineſs had prevented a matter of ſo much importance from being taken up earlier It would hardly be poſſible to do any thing concluſive in it before the Eaſter receſs; he ſhould therefore move that the reſolution and the petitions be referred to a Committee of the whole Houſe on Thurſday the 23d of April, againſt which time he ſhould move for ſuch information as appeared to him neceſſary to aſſiſt the deliberations of the Committee, and hoped other gentlemen would do the ſame He thought it fair alſo to inform the Houſe, that the reſolution he ſhould ſubmit to the Committee on that day, would go to a complete abolition of the Slave Trade

Lord Penrhyn ſaid, the Hon Gentleman had not explained whether or not it was his intention to propoſe any compenſation to the perſons whoſe property was ſo involved in and connected with that trade, that they muſt ſuffer materially by the abolition of it The Weſt-Indies could not be cultivated if the Slave Trade were abolished The lands in the Weſt-Indies were in a great meaſure mortgaged for money advanced from this country, or payable out of their produce as dower or portions to widows and orphans If the Lands could not be cultivated, all perſons whoſe property or ſubſiſtence depended on their produce muſt be ruined, ſo that the Hon Gentleman, while he ſeemed to be acting on principles of humanity, was laying the ground-work of much greater inhumanity than that which he propoſed to remedy

Mr Wilberforce ſaid, any diſcuſſion of the ſubject was at preſent premature, and he ſhould not preſume to ſay more upon it, than that he was perſuaded he ſhould be able to convince the Houſe and the public, that the reſolution he meant to propoſe would be productive of none of thoſe ill conſequences, either to this country or the Weſt-Indies, which the noble Lord apprehended.

Mr Gaſcoigne ſaid, the Hon Gentleman had not explained the nature of the information which he meant to move for, and by acceding to the preſent motion, he ſhould not think himſelf precluded from objecting to coming to any concluſion, till the Houſe ſhould be in poſſeſſion of all the information, whether written or verbal, which might appear neceſſary

The motion was agreed to, and the Houſe adjourned

TUESDAY, March 24.

Mr Beaufoy roſe to make his propoſed motion for the inſtitution of a day of thankſgiving in memory of the Revolution He roſe under ſome anxiety, he ſaid, from an apprehenſion that juſtice would not be done to ſo glorious a ſubject by the obſervations of ſo humble an individual as himſelf The principle on which this motion was grounded, had been long recognized by the people of this country It was a principle conſonant to the feelings of every lover of liberty, to expreſs the warmeſt gratitude for a fortunate deliverance from arbitrary power, for a reſtoration of the juſt rights and privileges of the ſubject, and for the firm eſtabliſhment of our civil and eccleſiaſtical conſtitution This principle had prompted our forefathers to appropriate a day of thankſgiving for the Reſtoration, as that event had delivered us from the pernicious effects of Republican deſpotiſm The ſame principle of gratitude to the Almighty for mercies received, and dangers eſcaped, had been the baſis of other anniverſary inſtitutions which there was no occaſion to enumerate What he would next ſubmit to the Houſe, was, whether the propoſition he was now bringing forward was a juſt application of that principle, or otherwiſe; whether the Revolution was an event of ſufficient magnitude and importance to juſtify the grateful commemoration of it in a ſolemn act of thankſgiving If he had been of opinion that the Revolution differed not from ordinary public occurrences, or that it did not eſtabliſh our liberties on a firmer baſis than that on which they had before ſtood, he ſhould have been one of the laſt perſons to ſtand forward on this occaſion But confident as he was, that to this great event we owed all our preſent bleſſings, the ſecurity of our rights and properties, the extenſion of our commerce and manufactures to a degree unknown to other nations, and the conſequent increaſe of our opulence and reſpectability, he was impelled by the ſtrongeſt motives to exert his endeavours towards perpetuating in the minds of the people a due ſenſe of the ineſtimable benefits derived from the Revolution, by the appropriation of a particular day in every year to a regular thankſgiving for thoſe benefits.—He proceeded to ſtate the great advantages

vantages flowing from this ſource, but as the majority of our readers are doubtleſs well acquainted with a ſubject that maintains ſo conſpicuous a rank in the Britiſh annals, and Mr Beaufoy did not exhibit this intereſting picture in any new light (which, indeed, would be very difficult, as every part of this ſubject has been ſo frequently diſcuſſed in print), we feel it unneceſſary to follow the Hon Gentleman, by reporting his ſpeech in detail The bleſſings he alluded to were the following, viz a juſt adminiſtration of the laws, the perſonal liberty and ſecurity even of the humbleſt individual, the confirmation of thoſe rights and privileges which Magna Charta had before held out to us, the increaſe of national ſplendour and private happineſs, the preſidence of religious toleration, &c No one, he thought, who formed a juſt eſtimate of the value of theſe advantages, could refuſe his aſſent to the motion he ſhould now make, purporting, that leave be given to bring in a bill to eſtabliſh a perpetual anniverſary of thankſgiving to Almighty God for the glorious Revolution, and to commemorate the confirmation of the rights and liberties of the people

Lord Muncaſter ſeconded the motion, which, he ſaid, had been ſo ably ſet forth by his Hon Friend, that he deemed it ſuperfluous for him to enter into the ſubject

Sir Richard Hill was aſtoniſhed that a motion of this kind ſhould not have been made till a hundred years after the occurrence which it profeſſed to commemorate It reminded him of that ordinance in the Romiſh church, by which a ſaint was not canoniſed till a century had elapſed from the time of his death For his part, he did not wiſh to undervalue the benefits for which we were indebted to the Revolution, but he did not perceive any neceſſity for the propoſed thankſgiving, as there was already in our church ſervice a form of prayer in which this very event was commemorated, and proper returns of gratitude made for it To exemplify this remark, he deſired the clerk to read the title of the form of prayer for the 5th of November, and ſome paſſages in thoſe prayers which expreſſed a due return of thanks for the deliverance we procured by means of the Revolution, as well as the deliverance of King James I. and his Parliament from the gunpowder plot He then expreſſed his apprehenſions that this day of thankſgiving would not be ſolemniſed in a proper way by the multitude, but would be paſſed in debauchery and profaneneſs He alſo ſaid, that perhaps the Speaker and the Lord Chancellor would not be well pleaſed with the unneceſſary appointment of another day on which they would be obliged to attend divine ſervice in pontificalibus, one at the Abbey, and the other at St Margaret's church.

Mr Beaufoy replied to Sir Richard Hill, by obſerving, that this motion was now brought forward preciſely becauſe a hundred years had paſſed ſince the Revolution; for we had now the experience of a century to prove, that the bleſſings expected by the people at that period, were not viſionary, but real and ſubſtantial

The motion was then put and agreed to.

Adjourned till

FRIDAY, March 27.

Capt Stanley moved the order of the day, for the ſecond reading of the Bill for repealing the County Election Bill the numerous abſurdities of this Bill, and the impracticability of putting it in execution, were ſo evident, that he thought it ſuperfluous to inſiſt upon the particulars

The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not oppoſe the ſecond reading of the Bill of Repeal, but he did not wiſh it to be underſtood that he meant to concur in that repeal, unleſs further reaſons appeared for it The principle followed in the Bill that gentlemen now wiſhed to repeal was, he find, ſo judicious, and would ſo much contribute to the diminution of the expence, delay, and confuſion attendant upon county elections, that he hoped it would be adopted At the ſame time, he was willing to agree to any meaſures by which this principle of regiſtering the names of freeholders might be rendered as little burthenſome to the electors or expenſive to the public as poſſible He admitted that this Bill was burthenſome in thoſe counties where there were many freehold leaſes; and that another objection againſt it was of ſome weight, namely, the incompetence of many of the collectors of the land-tax appointed to act under it On account of theſe and other objections to the old Bill, he hoped that the commitment of the new one would be fixed for a diſtant day, that Members might have ample time to revolve the ſubject in their minds, and deviſe ſome mode of enforcing the principle above-mentioned in the moſt judicious and equitable way; by which means a very important ſervice would be done to the kingdom at large

Mr Rolle, Mr Manwaring, Mr Powney, Mr Crewe, and Sir Richard Hill, ſpoke in favour of the Bill of Repeal, and Sir Richard remarking upon the expence that would be occaſioned by the Election Bill, ſaid that he wiſhed to inform the framer of it, that the county of Salop would be very glad to be relieved from their ſhare of the incumbrance

Mr Bearcroft defended the Election Bill, as being founded upon juſt and liberal principles; ſaid it would eaſe the expence, and ſhorten shorten the time of elections, by determining who were and who were not electors, and though some objections might be made against it, these might easily be done away by amendments

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and others proposed at length a bill to suspend the election bill for the present, and to indemnify those individuals who had not conformed to it

Upon the expediency of this measure, a variety of opinions were offered by a very great number of the County gentlemen, interspersed with animadversions on the bill intended to be repealed, the consequence of which was an agreement to introduce a Bill of temporary suspension and indemnification in respect to the bill now in existence

The Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Wednesday, April 22 — Adjourned till

MONDAY, March 30

Sir William Yonge moved for leave to bring in a bill for preventing vexatious removals, and supplying the defects in the laws relating to the poor of this kingdom He said, it would be premature to enter into the merits of this bill at present, and that it would be advisable to wait till gentlemen had examined the contents of it He did not wish to press it to a second reading before the expiration of the Easter adjournment, by which time the opinions of the Magistracy at the different quarter sessions might be procured on the subject

Mr Rolle wished to be informed by the Hon Baronet whether the Bill now moved for was the same with that which he had proposed in the preceding session

Sir William Yonge replied, that it was in substance the same, but that he had since incorporated into it several amendments which had been suggested to him from various respectable quarters

The motion being agreed to, Sir William immediately produced the Bill, and it was read a first time

Petitions from the counties of Northumberland and Derby against the County Election bill were presented and ordered to lie on the table

TUESDAY, March 31

Sir William Molesworth rose to move for the production of an estimate of the expences incurred by the Board of Ordnance, in the erection of a wall in the parish of Stoke in Devonshire No specific sum had been voted for this wall in any of the Ordnance estimates It being included, therefore, in one aggregate sum, there was no improper view in his wishing to know how much was to be appropriated to the particular expences of the wall If it was voted under the head of Repairs, it was manifestly irregular so to include it; for it was a new wall As a petition was soon to be presented against this wall, by an Hon Friend of his (Mr Bastard), he would not now enter into the question, whether it was useless or otherwise, but would merely express his wish, that no public money should be voted without the production of specific estimates of expence If a watchful eye was not kept on the Board of Ordnance, such sums might be required under general heads from time to time, as might fiddle the public unknowingly with that extravagant system of fortification which the House had some years ago justly exploded He concluded with moving to the purport above-mentioned

Captain Macbride seconded the motion, without entering into any particulars

The question being put, the motion was agreed to without a division

The order of the day was read, for a Committee to consider of the Bill for suspending the operation of the County Election Bill, and Captain Stanley took his seat as Chairman

Mr Crewe proposed the 1st of June, as the time till which the said Act should be suspended

Mr Sumner said, that he had intended to propose the end of this session as the time when the suspension should expire, but he now thought it more advisable to fill up the blank with these words, viz "forty days after the commencement of the succeeding session" He also suggested the propriety of inserting a clause in the suspending Bill, for the indemnification of the King's Printer, for the expences which he has incurred in consequence of the County Election Bill

Sir Grey Cooper observed, that it was informal to insert a pecuniary clause in a Bill of suspension

A short conversation took place on the occasion, which was sustained by Mr Wilbraham, Mr Medley the Master of the Rolls, Mr Pelham, Mr Ord, Mr Grenville (the Speaker), Sir Grey Cooper, and Mr Sumner

This conversation terminated in the assent of the Committee to Mr Sumner's motion for fixing the time at forty days after the beginning of the next session. It was deemed unnecessary to insert a clause respecting the indemnification of his Majesty's Printer, as that business might be settled in another mode

A clause was brought up, providing that nothing in this suspending Bill shall prevent the House from either amending or repealing the County Election Act in the course of the present session.

The

This clause was added to the Bill, and the report being now made, the Bill was ordered to be engrossed

Adjourned

WEDNESDAY, April

Earl Gower presented a petition from the freeholders of the county of Stafford against the County Election bill

The Bill for suspending the County Election Act was read a third time on the motion of Mr Sumner, and passed

The Mutiny and Land Tax Bills were also read a third time, and received the final assent of the House

THURSDAY, April 2

As soon as the private business of the day was dispatched, Mr Fox rose, according to notice, to move for a repeal of the Shop Tax He said, that the experience of three years might convince the most hard of belief that the tax was personal, that it fell solely on the shopkeepers, and that the customers were not, or could not, be charged with it This appeared from the description of persons who had repeatedly petitioned Parliament for a repeal of it If any man who ever was of opinion that the shopkeeper could charge the tax to their customers still retained that opinion, this one single observation ought to overturn it That the perseverance of the shop keepers in praying for a repeal of it, was a strong presumption that the tax was not justifiable for men would not give themselves and Parliament so much trouble, if it were not to seek relief from the burden of a tax, which it was not in their power to throw upon the shoulders of others Abstracted from this consideration, the tax, whether personal or no, was partial and oppressive, because it fell not equally upon all persons of the description of shopkeepers The city of Westminster, exclusive of its purlieus, contributed more to this tax than the city of London, and both London and Westminster, together paid near five sixths, certainly more than three-fourths, of the whole produce of the tax from every part of the kingdom It was generally urged against the repeal of a tax, that Parliament ought to give way to clamour, lest it should establish a precedent that would produce opposition to every tax He was ready to admit that in general it was wise in Parliament to resist clamour, but, on the other hand, he maintained that it would be unwise to resist the petitions of a body of men, whose opposition to a tax arose solely from this circumstance, that it was found to be partial and oppressive, and that it could not be levied according to the principle on which alone it was imposed To give way to clamour would be weakness, but to withstand the general sense of the people would be madness and folly After some other observations he moved, that the Acts of the 24th, chap 30, and 27th of his Majesty should be read By the former the shop tax was imposed, and by the second some alteration was made in it The Clerk having read the titles of these Acts pro forma, Mr. Fox moved for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the same

Mr H Thornton seconded the motion, and Lord John Townshend followed the same line of argument with Mr Fox

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a short speech, said, it was undoubtedly true that the only ground on which he had ever thought the tax defensible was this, that the shopkeeper was to be reimbursed by the customer, on whom the tax was ultimately to fall If this could not be done, and the shopkeeper could not reimburse himself, the tax could not be defended one moment On former occasion he had differed in opinion from the Right Hon Gentleman respecting the question of fact, whether the burden of the tax could or could not be transferred to the customer and had maintained the affirmative of that proposition But he was now ready to admit that the repeated applications of the shopkeepers for the repeal of the tax, amounted to a pretty strong presumption, that it fell solely upon them, and could not be transferred to their customers He agreed also with the Right Honourable Gentleman, that though it would be highly proper for Parliament to withstand clamour, it would be highly improper to resist the sense of a very numerous and respectable body of men, who all concurred, without distinction of party, in representing the tax as burthensome, and praying for its repeal Those who had always honoured him with their support, as well as those who had uniformly opposed his measures, concurred in these two points, and therefore he could not ascribe to [illegible] motives, or stigmatize with the name of clamour, the opposition that was given to this tax If, independent of any evidence upon the subject of the tax, he was to discuss it in his own mind, he was sure he could find reasons that could prove the practicability of levying it upon the principle on which it was imposed, but he would not adhere so strongly to his own opinion as upon conclusions drawn in his own mind to resist an application for the repeal of a tax, which the parties concerned all assured him fell solely upon those whom he never had it in contemplation to subject to it Having said

ſaid thus much, he concluded by ſaying, that he would give no oppoſition to the motion then before the Houſe

The motion was then carried nem. con

Mr Dempſter gave notice, that the ſhop-tax being now to be repealed, he ſhould move to repeal the additional duties and reſtrictions on hawkers and pedlars, impoſed in conſequence of that tax

FRIDAY, April 3

A few minutes before four o clock, a ſufficient number of Members had aſſembled to conſtitute a Houſe for the Weſtminſter ballot They were locked up in the Houſe for a complete hour, after which the doors were opened, and they retired to ſelect 15 Members for the Election Committee

Mr Dempſter gave notice, that he would move for a repeal of the late Act for impoſing an additional duty, by way of annual licence, on hawkers and pedlars

The Houſe waited half an hour before the liſt of the Committee was reported

The gentlemen nominated to form this Committee, were the following, viz

William Pulteney, eſq Chairman,

R P Carew, eſq	Mark Pringle, eſq
Wm Drake, jun	Charles Long, eſq
Sir Sam Hannay, bt	James Martin, eſq
Richard Ford, eſq	A S W Boſcawen, eſq
J G Phillips, eſq	Tho Maſter, eſq
The E of Wycombe,	Sir C Preſton, bt.

NOMINEES

Hon H Phipps, for Lord Maitland, for L
Lord Hood John Townſhend

The only other buſineſs that was done, was the firſt reading of the bill for repealing the ſhop-tax, now brought in by Mr Fox It was ordered to be read a ſecond time on Monday next, till which day the Houſe adjourned

MONDAY, April 6

Mr Neville reported, from the Colcheſter Committee, that George Jackſon, Eſq was not duly elected for Colcheſter, that George Tierney, Eſq was duly elected, and ought to have been returned, and that neither the petition of Mr Jackſon, nor that of Mr Tierney, appeared to be frivolous or vexatious

The Deputy Clerk of the Crown was then ordered to inſert the name of Mr Tierney in the return

Lord Newhaven obſerved, that his motion for an account of the arrears of the land tax had not been properly attended to by thoſe whoſe duty it was to enforce the orders of the Houſe

Mr Roſe vindicated himſelf and his colleagues in office from all neglect of duty

Lord Newhaven replied, and then reſtated his former motion in a more perſpicuous manner, which was agreed to

The Bill for repealing the ſhop tax was now read a ſecond time

Mr. Pulteney moved, that the Weſtminſter Committee ſhould have permiſſion to adjourn from Thurſday next to the Monday following, but he was deſired to defer this motion till Wedneſday.

Mr Dempſter roſe, and ſaid he would defer his motion for a repeal of the tax on hawkers and pedlars till to-morrow, on account of the abſence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

At half paſt four o clock the Houſe adjourned till the ſucceeding day

TUESDAY, April 7

George Tierney, Eſq took the oaths and his ſeat for Colcheſter

Accounts of taxes were preſented by the proper officers

Mr Dempſter roſe, and deſired the clerk to read the Act for impoſing an additional duty, by way of licence on hawkers and pedlars He then obſerved, that though it had been ſuppoſed by many that this impoſt would tend to the increaſe of the revenue, yet a contrary effect had reſulted from it, for it appeared from the papers now on the table, that 1000 or 1200 leſs per annum, had been ſince raiſed by the duty on hawkers and pedlars than before the additional duty took place It could not therefore be ſaid to be an aid to the revenue, for it had even contributed to the diminution of it Beſides it operated as a great grievance on an induſtrious body of people and deprived many of them of the only means of getting their bread that they could conveniently exerciſe It was alſo, he believed, prejudicial to the manufactures of the country, which were not ſo much circulated as before He concluded with moving for leave to bring in a Bill for repealing the late Act for licenſing hawkers and pedlars

Sir William Conyngham ſeconded the motion

Mr Roſe ſaid, the Act in queſtion had not been framed with a view of augmenting the revenue, but for the purpoſe of preventing the body of people alluded to from injuring or entirely deſtroying the trade of the ſhopkeepers ſo much as they otherwiſe would have done.

Sir John Swinburne thought theſe itinerant traders ought to receive encouragement for they generally ſupplied upon their cuſtomers by ſelling [illegible] and they alſo contributed to the ſuppreſſion of ſmuggling He was [illegible] to the motion

Mr [illegible] was of opinion, that it would be [illegible] in the Act that would [illegible]

Mr.

Mr. Hawkins Browne ſpoke in favour of the motion An act that tended to deprive many honeſt and induſtrious perſons of their livelihood was certainly cruel and oppreſſive, and ought to be repealed

Mr Pulteney propoſed, that the Hon. Gentleman ſhould alter his motion, by inſerting the words "explain and amend," inſtead of the word repeal

The Chancellor of the Exchequer obſerved, that he believed it was the general wiſh to lower the duties on Hawkers and Pedlars But for this purpoſe it would be ſufficient to bring in a Bill to amend the late act, not to repeal it

Mr Dempſter agreed to alter his motion ſo as to make it run as follows that leave be given to bring in a Bill to explain and amend the late act concerning hawkers and pedlers

This motion was put and aſſented to

Mr. Alderman Sawbridge now took his ſeat at the table, as Chairman of the General Committee on the Bill for repealing the ſhop-tax

Mr Fox moved to fill the blank for the commencement of the Bill with the words, "the 5th of April"

After having filled up the other blank, the chairman read the preamble

The Chancellor of the Exchequer ſaid, he ſhould not imagine it to be the object of thoſe who wiſhed for a repeal of the Shop-tax to inſiſt on the words of the preamble as it ſtood, becauſe as that muſt neceſſarily create a difference of opinion, and as much unanimity as poſſible was deſirable on the preſent occaſion, he preſumed they would concur in endeavouring to avoid all difference The preamble, as it ſtood, contained ſomething more like the language of invective, than the ordinary language of a Bill of Repeal In fact, the preamble, by pronouncing that the tax on ſhops was a partial and oppreſſive tax, and contrary to the juſt principles of taxation, contained a cenſure on the tax, and conſequently a cenſure on a former act of their own The uſual language of a Bill of Repeal was, to declare, that whereas it was expedient to repeal an act paſſed for ſuch a purpoſe, at ſuch a time, &c He ſhould therefore move an amendment to the preamble, to leave out the words after the eleventh line, and inſert the words, "Whereas it is expedient to repeal an act of the 25th and an act of the 26th of his preſent Majeſty, impoſing a duty on ſhops, &c

Mr Fox ſaid, he was extremely ſorry that the words he had inſerted in the preamble of the Bill, for the expreſs purpoſe of maintaining the dignity of Parliament, and ſupporting the regularity and conſiſtency of their proceedings, ſhould be conſidered as an invective. That the tax was inexpedient was undoubtedly true, but it was not for that reaſon that it was deemed right to repeal it: to make that the plea for its repeal was to confeſs that they removed the tax on the mere ground of clamour, without being ſatisfied of its partiality, oppreſſion and injuſtice, whereas the contrary was notoriouſly the fact. He concluded with ſaying, that although he ſhould certainly give his negative to the amendment, he would not give the Committee the trouble of dividing upon it

The amendment was then moved and agreed

The order of the day was read for the ſecond reading of the Bill for lowering the duties at Shoreham Harbour, when Counſel was heard againſt it—but it being paſt eight o'clock, and not forty Members remaining in the Houſe, the debate was adjourned till next day

WEDNESDAY, April 8.

The bill for repealing the Shop-Tax was, on the motion of Lord John Townſhend, read a third time, paſſed, and carried to the Lords

Mr Mainwaring moved, that the order for conſidering of the Slave Trade be diſcharged from the 23d to the 27th inſtant, which was agreed to

Mr Drake, jun moved, that the Weſtminſter Committee have power to adjourn from to-morrow to Tueſday next —Agreed to.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer preſented a meſſage from the King, of a ſimilar purport to that which Lord Sidmouth preſented in the Houſe of Peers (See p 312)

He then moved, that the thanks of the Houſe be returned to his Majeſty for this communication, and be conveyed to him by ſuch Members as are Privy-Councillors

This motion was agreed to, as were alſo the following motions from the ſame quarter, viz that this Houſe do attend his Majeſty in St Paul's cathedral on the 23d inſt and that a Committee be appointed to enquire into the uſual mode and forms of the attendance of this Houſe at St Paul's on Thankſgiving-days

The Gentlemen appointed to compoſe this Committee were, the Earl of Mornington, Lord Weſtcote, Sir Harry Houghton, Mr. Stanhope, Mr Hobart, Mr Villiers, and Mr. Addington.

The order of the day being read, for the ſecond reading of the Weſtminſter annuity bill, counſel were called to the bar, namely, Mr Graham againſt the bill, and Mr Piggot for it

After the pleadings were concluded, a ſhort converſation aroſe to the following effect:

Mr Huſſey thought the bill an improper one, for it ſeparated an hundred perſons from the common rank of citizens, and rendered them a corporation, without making them anſwerable with their private fortunes for the juſt demands that might be made upon them by the inſurers Not being ſufficiently reſtrained by this bill, they might make the whole ſcheme end in a bubble, to the great detriment of the public He would therefore give his negative to it

Mr Robert Burton did not wholly approve of the bill, but the objections which he or any other Gentleman might have to it in its preſent form, might be obviated in the Committee

Mr Stanhope conſidered the principle of the Bill to be a good one, and ſuch as ought to be carried into effect, as it tended to facilitate inſurance, for that reaſon he wiſhed it might go to a Committee, where the objectionable clauſes might be obviated

Sir Harry Houghton was of the ſame opinion, wiſhing the Bill to go to a Committee, in which a clauſe might be brought forward that would make the Society give ſufficient ſecurity for all demands that might be made upon them

Mr Huſſey ſpoke again, he ſaid, he would certainly have divided the Houſe upon the queſtion, had there been a ſufficient number of Members, he would not, however, take advantage of the thinneſs of the Houſe, but content himſelf by moving, "That the debate be adjourned to this day "fortnight"

Mr Pulteney was of opinion, that the Bill required amendment; he was agreeable to its going into a Committee, where the neceſſary amendments might be made

Lord Newhaven wiſhed the Houſe to proceed immediately, it being uncertain when a full attendance could be procured

Mr Huſſey propoſed to alter his firſt motion, by moving to have the debate adjourned to Tueſday the 28th inſtant,

The queſtion was put and agreed to

The Order of the Day being read for reſuming the adjourned debate on the Shoreham Harbour Bill, a motion was made, That this Bill be committed —Noes 50—Ayes none (except the two Tellers) It was carried in the negative

The Order of the Day was next read, for the ſecond reading of the Shoreham Harbour Improvement Bill

Motion, That this Bill be read a ſecond time on Tueſday the 12th day of May next

Amendment propoſed to leave out 12th of May, and to inſert this day ſix months, which upon the queſtion put was agreed to

At ſix o'clock, the Houſe agreed to adjourn to the 20th of April

IRISH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF LORDS

MONDAY, March 23

AFTER his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant had ſignified the Royal Aſſent to the Money Bills and retired, his Grace the Duke of Leinſter roſe and read to the Houſe his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales's Anſwer to the Addreſs of both Houſes, preſented by his Grace and the other Commiſſioners

Lord Portarlington roſe, and moved that an Addreſs of Thanks from this Houſe be preſented to his Royal Highneſs, for his moſt gracious Anſwer to the Addreſs of both Houſes.

This was oppoſed in a ſpeech of ſome length by Lord Mountmorres

Lord Earlsfort thought his Royal Highneſs's Anſwer was fraught with reſpect, affection, and attachment to the country, and therefore highly merited the thanks of their Lordſhips

Lord Portarlington ſupported the motion with energy

Lord Mountmorres replied in oppoſition

Lord Earlsfort endeavoured to conciliate all oppoſition and warmth on the queſtion, he obſerved that the Houſe were bound to return their thanks to his Royal Highneſs in a dignified and proper manner, inaſmuch as his Royal Highneſs by his Anſwer had treated this country with affection, politeneſs, and regard

The queſtion was at length put and carried, and a Committee appointed to prepare the ſame

As ſoon as they returned, Lord Portarlington reported the Addreſs, which his Lordſhip read, and preſented to the Lord Chancellor

It conveyed to his Royal Highneſs the thanks of their Lordſhips for his gracious Anſwer to the Addreſs of both Houſes, and his affectionate profeſſions of attachment to the intereſts and the happineſs of this country it congratulates his Royal Highneſs on the happy recovery of his Royal Father from his recent indiſpoſition, to the reaſſumption of his Royal Authority, aſſures his Royal Highneſs of the reſpect, the loyalty, and the attachment of the Houſe to his perſon, and that of his illuſtrious family, profeſſes, that the motives on which they had proceeded to vote to his Royal Highneſs the former Addreſs, were founded upon the moſt conſtitutional principles, and concludes with aſſurance rances of their good wishes for the happiness and prosperity of the House of Brunswick, and for promoting the harmony and mutual interest between both countries.

The first and second paragraphs were read and agreed to, but the third, which professes the former Address to be grounded on constitutional principles, was opposed by Lord Erlsfort, as an unnecessary recognition of the principles on which the former Address had been opposed by him and other noble Lords. This produced a debate of some length, in which the paragraph was further opposed by Lord Carhampton, Lord Tyrone, and Lord Mountmorres, and supported by Lord Fort arlington, Lord Donoughmore, Lord Farnham, and the Bishop of Cashel.

The question was at length put, and the House divided, when there appeared,

The remaining paragraphs were read and agreed to without opposition*.

The thanks of the House were then voted to his Grace the Duke of Leinster and the Earl of Charlemont, for their faithful discharge of the commission imposed on them by the House, in delivering the Address of both Houses to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

* The following PROTESTS were afterwards entered on the Journals.

DISSENTIENT,

Because, although desirous to express our humble thanks to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, for his gracious Answer to the Address of both Houses of Parliament, and that to a degree which might induce us to pass over the departure which there seems to be in the mode and form of this Address from the usual course and proceeding of Parliament, yet we cannot agree to this Address, which doth not consist, as we conceive, with those constitutional principles which are maintained in our Protests of February last, and to which we adhere

DISSENTIENT,

1st, Because the uniform and regular practice in this House has been, as appears from its earliest records, to pass a short vote of thanks for answers from the King to addresses of this House, to be laid before his Majesty by the Lord Lieutenant.

2dly, Because that, on the 12th of December 1715, a Committee which had been appointed to draw up an address of thanks to his Majesty King George the First, for his gracious answer to a congratulatory address upon his accession, were discharged from that duty, and a short vote of thanks for his Majesty's gracious answer was passed, to be transmitted by the Lord Lieutenant, since which time this method of proceeding has uniformly prevailed, except in the instances of answers which complied with requests from this House, or where Royal assurance had been given of some great national benefits bestowed, or intended to be conferred, upon this country, in which cases, addresses of thanks have been presented, of which only eight instances appear upon the Journals of this House.

3dly, Because the first instance of an address of this description, the 18th of August 1709, was in consequence of her Majesty Queen Anne having complied in her answer with a request of this House conveyed by an address, and on the 12th of December 1723, another instance occurs of a similar address of thanks upon the Royal assurance of the intended revocation of Wood's patent.

5thly, Because, although his Royal Highness's answer to the address of this House is most polite and gracious, yet it cannot be proved that any solid national benefit could be derived from it, and though it must be the wish and desire of every loyal subject to pay every mark of respect to his Royal Highness, and to every branch of the Royal Family, I cannot agree to a mode of proceeding which indicates a greater compliment and a greater degree of attention, than have usually been paid to his Majesty and to his Royal predecessors.

6thly, Because the supposed exigency of the State which originated the proceedings upon a Regency, is no more—and consequently the measure should no longer be preserved in public contemplation by addresses from Parliament, which may have a mischievous tendency in future.—And because, lastly, that the late wise, political, and judicious proceedings of the Parliament of Great Britain afford a memorable example well worthy of regard and attention, where proceedings upon the Regency were suspended, upon the report of his Majesty's convalescence, and discharged and done away upon the happy and satisfactory confirmation of his Majesty's perfect recovery and complete re establishment. MOUNTMORRES.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 20.

MR Conolly, Mr O'Neill, Mr Stewart, and Mr W Ponsonby, the Commissioners deputed by the House to wait on his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with the Address of both Houses, entered, and having taken their places, Mr Conolly rose, and addressed the Speaker thus

"In pursuance of the orders of this House, we have waited on his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with the Address of this House, and had the honour to receive from his Royal Highness his Answer"

He then read his Royal Highness's Answer, which is as follows

The ANSWER of the PRINCE of WALES to the IRISH COMMISSIONERS

"THE happy event of the King's recovery, and the consequent resumption of the exercise of his auspicious government, announced by his Royal Commission for declaring the further causes for holding the Parliament of Great Britain, has done away the melancholy necessity which gave rise to the arrangement proposed by the Parliament of Ireland,—but nothing can obliterate from my memory and my gratitude the principles upon which that arrangement was made, and the circumstances by which it was attended

"I consider your generous kindness to his Majesty, Royal Family and the provision you made for preserving the authority of the Crown in its constitutional energy, as the most unequivocal proof which could arise of your affectionate loyalty to the King, at the time when, by unfortunate dispensation of Providence, his government had suffered an interruption, and his house was deprived of its natural protector

"I shall not pay so ill a compliment to the Lords and Commons of Ireland, as to suppose that they were not led to their reliance on the moderation of my views and the purity of my intentions A manly confidence, directing the manner of proceeding towards those who entrust sentiments becoming the high situation to which they are born, furnishes the most powerful motive to the performance of their duty, at the same time that the liberality of sentiment, which in conveying a trust confers it honour, can have no tendency to relax that provident vigilance and that public jealousy which ought to watch over the exercise of power

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Though [illegible] for the event which enables me to take leave of you in this manner, personally, I cannot but regret your departure I have had the opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of your private character, and it has added to the high esteem which I had before entertained for you on account of your public merits—both have made you the worthy representatives of the great bodies to which you belong

"I am confident that I need not add my earnest recommendation to the Parliament and people of Ireland to continue to cultivate the harmony of the two kingdoms, which in their mutual perfect freedom will find the closest as well as happiest bond of their connexion"

The Answer being read by Mr. Conolly, that Right Hon Gentleman came round and presented the copy to the Speaker, who handed it to the clerk

Mr O'Neill then moved, that his Royal Highness's Answer be read from the chair

The Speaker objected to this, by alledging it was not customary for Answers to Addresses from that House to any person except the King, to be read from the chair, but only by the clerk, he said however, if it was the sense of the gentlemen, that he should not think it the least trouble

Mr Grattan thought, when there were more forms than one of reading his Royal Highness's Answer to the House, that which was most honourable should be adopted

Here there was a loud call of "Chair, Chair," and the Speaker proceeded to read the Answer as required, which being done the Secretary of State moved, that his Royal Highness's Answer be entered upon the Journals of the House

This motion the Speaker said was unnecessary, as the Answer having been read by him, would be entered on the Journals of course

The Secretary of State nevertheless contended for the propriety of the motion, which was put and carried

Lord H Fitzgerald moved, that an address of thanks be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, for his gracious Answer to the Address of both Houses, and that a Committee be appointed to prepare the same

Mr Grattan moved, that the thanks of this House be given to Mr Conolly, Mr O'Neill, Mr Stewart, and Mr Ponsonby, for the faithful execution of the commission imposed on them by this House, of presenting the Address of both Houses of Parliament to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales

Carried

Carried unanimouſly—and the thanks were accordingly given to the Commiſſioners by the Speaker

FRIDAY, March 20

Lord Henry Fitzgerald reported from the Committee appointed to draw up an Addreſs of Thanks to be preſented to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, for his gracious Anſwer to the Addreſs of this Houſe, that they had drawn up an Addreſs accordingly, which he read in his place, and after delivered it at the table, where the ſame was read, and afterwards read paragraph by paragraph, and is as follows

To his Royal Highneſs GEORGE PRINCE of WALES, the humble Addreſs of the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, in Parliament aſſembled

"May it pleaſe your Royal Highneſs,

"WE, his Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the Commons of Ireland in Parliament aſſembled, beg leave to offer to your Royal Highneſs our warmeſt thanks for your Anſwer to our Addreſs

"With hearts overflowing with the livelieſt joy, we congratulate with your Royal Highneſs upon the happy event of the King's recovery, and the conſequent reaſſumption of his auſpicious government, an event highly pleaſing to the ſubjects of the whole empire, but peculiarly grateful to a nation ſo highly indebted to their moſt excellent Sovereign during the whole courſe of his reign, and we rejoice in reflecting that the Father of his people is bleſſed with a ſon who is likely, in the fulneſs of time, to continue to his Majeſty's loyal and affectionate ſubjects of Ireland the bleſſings of his government

"Thoroughly conſcious that nothing can add more to that eſteem which your Royal Highneſs has been pleaſed to expreſs for the two Houſes of Parliament than their loyal and affectionate attachment to the perſon and government of the King, we will ſteadily perſevere in thoſe principles of duty, loyalty and affection which have ſo happily recommended them to the favourable opinion of your Royal Highneſs

"We feel the higheſt ſatisfaction in finding that what we have done, and our manner of doing it, have received your approbation, and that your Royal Highneſs is pleaſed to conſider our conduct as a proof of our undiminiſhed duty to his Majeſty, our uniform attachment to the Houſe of Brunſwick, and our conſtant care and attention to maintain inviolate the concord and connection between the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, which we conſider as indiſpenſibly neceſſary to the proſperity, the happineſs, and liberties of both, and we beg leave to aſſure your Royal Highneſs that from theſe principles we ſhall never depart.

"We are happy to find that your Royal Highneſs conſiders our juſt attention to his Majeſty's Royal Family, and the proviſion made by us for preſerving the authority of the Crown in its conſtitutional energy, as the moſt unequivocal proofs which could be given of our affectionate loyalty to the beſt of Sovereigns, at the melancholy period when, by an afflicting diſpenſation of Providence, his government had ſuffered an intermiſſion, and his illuſtrious houſe was deprived of its great and natural protector

"We have the juſteſt reliance on the moderation of the views and the purity of the intentions of your Royal Highneſs, and we have the fulleſt conviction in our minds, that any truſt which could have the moſt diſtant tendency to relax that provident vigilance and public jealouſy which ought to watch over the exerciſe of power, would not have been acceptable to the exalted ſentiments of your Royal Highneſs, whoſe underſtanding and principles are rendered more valuable by the generous and affectionate heart which animates their dictates

"We can with the greateſt truth moſt ſolemnly aſſure your Royal Highneſs, that it is the ardent wiſh of the Parliament and people of Ireland to continue to cultivate the harmony and inſeparable intereſts of the two kingdoms, firmly convinced that in their mutual perfect freedom, they will find the cloſeſt as well as the happieſt bands of their connection; and we offer our warmeſt acknowledgments to your Royal Highneſs for your recommendations to us, to perſevere in ſuch a conduct, and conſider your Royal Highneſs's recommendations, ſo worthy the high ſtation in which you are placed, as an additional proof of your attention to the welfare of both countries

"We aſſure your Royal Highneſs, that if any thing could add to the exultation of our minds at the happy event of the recovery of our moſt beloved Sovereign, it would be the pleaſure which we feel in reflecting, that the Heir to his Majeſty's Crown inherits the virtues of his Royal Father—virtues which every part of your Royal Highneſs's conduct, during the late melancholy and trying occaſion, has placed in the moſt illuſtrious point of view, and the repeated marks of graciouſneſs and condeſcenſion with which your Royal Highneſs has been pleaſed to honour the two Houſes of Parliament muſt ever remain impreſſed in the moſt indelible characters of affection and gratitude on the hearts of the people of Ireland"

Reſolved, nem. con., "That the ſaid Addreſs dreſs do ſtand the Addreſs of this Houſe to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales'

Reſolved, nem con "That Mr Speaker do tranſmit into Great Britain the ſaid Addreſs, to be laid before his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales"

Lord Henry Fitzgerald then moved, "that the Speaker be requeſted to tranſmit this the Addreſs of the Commons of Ireland to his Royal Highneſs'

The Secretary of State took the liberty of ſuggeſting to the noble Lord, that the more reſpectful motion would be, "That this Addreſs be tranſmitted to England, to be laid before his Royal Highneſs"

Lord Henry Fitzgerald immediately adopted the ideas of the Secretary of State, and made his motion accordingly, which being unanimouſly agreed to,

The Right Hon the Speaker roſe, to requeſt the Houſe would pleaſe to inſtruct him on an occaſion of much importance, in what manner he ſhould proceed

A ſhort converſation now took place between the Speaker, the Secretary of State, and Lord Henry Fitzgerald, when it was agreed, that as the principal Serjeant at Arms was through indiſpoſition unable to perform the orders of the Houſe Mr Leſtrange, the Deputy Serjeant at Arms, ſhould be ſent into England with the Addreſs, which he ſhould deliver into the hands of Lord Southampton, to be laid before his Royal Highneſs

Right Hon Mr Fitzherbert then moved, That the Houſe do adjourn to Monday the 3th of April, which being agreed to, the Houſe adjourned accordingly

OF modern Tragic Birds how few are found
Who dare to truſt themſelves on open ground;
In Fiction's Fortreſſes they love to lie,
To coin them ſlimſy tales and vainly try
To move your paſſions by an idle ſhew
Of fancied Sorrows, and ideal Woe
To Greece, to France, to Italy they roam,
To lead you as they pleaſe, when far from home.

Our AUTHOR moves not from his Native Land—
Here, in this LITTLE ISLE, he takes his ſtand, Convinc'd of Tragic as of Comic Store,
No other Nation ever yielded more,
And FRIEND to FREEDOM, he diſdains the rules,
The narrow precepts, of the FOREIGN SCHOOLS,
No labour'd ſtratagems theſe ſcenes preſent,
No ſudden change, nor unprepar'd event!
With chaſter art, he writes not to the eyes,
Nor would he ſtoop to win you by ſurprize,
Yet hopes, with names ſam'liar to your ears,
To raiſe your horror, and draw down your tears,
To prove that Injur'd MARY owed her fate
To love of Juſtice, not to JEALOUS HATE!

'Tis true, ELIZABETH's victorious hand
From Spaniſh Tyrants ſav'd the threaten'd land
Wiſe were her Counſellors, her Warriors brave,
But ſhe was WOMAN ſtill, and PRIDE's ſlave!
From this ſhe was for policy and arms,
She vainly claim'd pre-eminence of charms!
See her with JEALOUSY then frantic grown,
Dread MARY's SMILES, far more than PHILLIP's FROWNS!

Is there amongſt you, who with ſtedfaſt eye
Can MARY's ſufferings view, nor heave a ſigh?
From kinder Skies, and from luxurious Courts,
From Tilts and Tournaments, and Feaſts and Sports,
She came to govern, (oh! too hard a part)
A turbulent Nation, and a tender Heart,
And fell a victim in that fallen age,
To FACTION's fury, and FANATIC rage
Oh, had ſhe lived in more enlighten'd times,
When Graces were not ſins, nor Talents crimes,
Admiring Nations had confeſs'd her worth,
And SCOTLAND ſhone the ATHENS of the NORTH!
Too long has Malice ſported with her Fame,
And Juſtice ſlumber'd o'er her injur'd Name—
Truth to the Heart at length ſhall force its way,
And Reaſon juſtify the Paſſions ſway

EPILOGUE

TO

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS,

By Mr ST JOHN

WERE you not told, before the Play began,
Our Author ventur'd on a daring plan?
A tale of woe, replete with griefs hiſtoric,
Told in an age of levity and frolic!

Was

Was this a place to set up a defence,
And talk of injur'd MARY'S INNOCENCE?—
Of late discoveries, drawn from dates and words,
Old rotten parchments, musty dull records!
No—all is now tinsel show!—This age
Turns a deaf ear—but keenly views the Stage!
THE TRAGIC MUSE, with all the Sisters Nine,
Are now eclips'd—Aladin's Lamp doth shine!
Exulting o'er their tomb—see BOXERS SPAR!
And beaux, in rapture, envy every scar!
Learning was valued once, and will—What then?
The Stage could boast Ben Jonson—now, Big Ben!
Shakspere make room for Humphries—that's the way
To bring the men of fashion to the Play!
But to our Bard—How shall we judge his case?
He scorns the unities of time and place
Critics, what say ye—Must he sue for peace
To wits of modern France, and ancient Greece?
The great Voltaire has told us, that a Play
Should be within one house, and one day—
But in one evening, how can it be right
To represent the morning, noon, and night?
To hail Aurora, swear the sun beam glows,
While those vile lamps full shine beneath my nose
And as to place—deception will in vain—
All might we've known, that this is Drury-Lane
Thus English Johnson's sterling art and sense
Treats the French rule as a poor, weak pretence
To check their narrow genius—an expedient
To make them sober, like themselves, obedient
When action, uniform in every part,
Guides the clear tale directly to the heart,
In vain dramatic pedants may combine
The free born Muse, by weak rules, to refine,
Where'er she mounts, them damp, cold veil to fling,
And clip the master feather of her wing
No, let the Tragic Muse range far and wide,
Bind not in chains the Passions faithful guide,
Let the full heart expand, and seek relief
From the sweet luxury of virtuous grief
May no stern critic in false shame controul
The noble weakness of each generous soul
Dare here to feel, let Nature stand confest—
The BRIGHTEST SPIRIT fills the TENDEREST BREAST

MARCH 31

Such Things Have Been, a Farce, by Mr Ryder, was acted at Covent Garden for the benefit of the Author. This is one of those performances which can scarce be considered as objects of criticism. Having been seen once, they are thought to have done their duty, and neither solicit nor in general deserve any further notice Mr Ryder's piece is no exception

APRIL 4 The Pharo Table, a Comedy, was acted for the first time at Covent Garden for Mr Lewis's benefit This piece was an alteration of Mrs Centlivre's Gamester, with the addition of some new characters, (particularly one of a Pugilist) adapted to the present times The alterations were not inferior to the original performance, and were very well connected with it

The same evening, Miss Raymond, a young lady who had performed a few times at Bath, appeared at Drury Lane, in the character of Miss Biddy, in Miss in her Teens She appeared to have made Mrs Jordan's manner her model, and from her youth and vivacity give some promise of improvement.

APRIL 14 The Little Hunchback, or, a Frolic at Bagdad, a Farce, by Mr O'Keefe, was acted at Covent Garden for the benefit of Mr Quick The characters as follow

The Hunchback	-	Mr Quick
Taylor,	-	Mr Blanchard
Jew Purveyor,	-	Mr Wewitzer
French Doctor,	-	Mr Cubitt
Englishman,	-	Mr Booth
Doctor's Man,	-	Mr Rock.
Jew's Man,	-	Mr Milburn
Black Aga,	-	Mr Painter
Cadi,	- - -	Mr Evatt
Bassa of Bagdad,	-	Mr Davies
Dora,	- -	Miss Rowson.
And Taylor's Wife,	-	Mrs Webb

The story is almost literally taken from the Arabian Nights Entertainments, as far as relates to the misfortunes of Hunchback The Bassa, whose favourite he is, has his life endangered by the negligence of his Purveyor, who loses a letter containing a pardon, but delivers that from the Porte, which orders the immediate death of the Bassa The pardon is found, and delivered by the Purveyor's nephew, a barber, who, with an ample reward, obtains also the fortieth life of his uncle At the wedding supper of this barber, who is married to a taylor's daughter, the Hunchback Jester is choaked by a fish-bone. The taylor alarmed conveys him to a Jew doctor, whose servant throws the body of the supposed patient to tumble down stairs The doctor, in a similar affright, lets it down the chimney by a rope into the purveyor's counting house, who on hearing the intruder, becomes also, in his opinion, the murderer. The purveyor takes him to the quay, and setting him against a pillar, Hunchback is accosted

accoſted by an Engliſh ſailor, and not anſwering him, is again knocked down for his impertinence!—The Baſſa and all the partie entering, the ſailor is at firſt apprehended, but on the Baſſa offering a reward for the murder, the taylor, his wife, and the Jews, all ſeverally claim their ſhares They are inſtantly ordered for execution, when Hunchback ſtarts up, proclaims the whole a jeſt, and that he had undergone all theſe ſufferings merely for the ſake of entertaining the Baſſa with a good ſtory

From ſuch materials little could be drawn, and what laughter is obtained, ariſes of courſe from the ſurprize of the ſcene, not from the points of the dialogue

20 Falſe Appearances, a Comedy tranſlated from the French by Gen Conway, and formerly acted at Richmond Houſe, (ſee Vol XIII p 451) was performed at Drury Lane The characters as follow

Baron,	-	Mr Wroughton
Monſ de Foiles,	-	Mr Parſons
Marquis,	-	Mr Kemble
Abbe	-	Mr Bannifter, jun
Robert,	-	Mr R Palmer.
The Counteſs,	-	Miſs Farren
Celia,	-	Mrs Kemble.
Liſette,	-	Miſs Pope
Lucile,	-	Mrs Crouch

Having already given the plot of this piece as acted at Richmond Houſe, we ſhall only obſerve, that on its repreſentation at Drury Lane, the characters of the Abbe and Robert were added, together with an underplot, formed from the paſſion of the Abbe, whoſe recommendations are clerical conceit and vile poetry, for Celia, the ſiſter of the Baron He is perſuaded by the arts of Robert and Liſette to change his clerical for a military dreſs, for the purpoſe of conciliating his miſtreſs, and is expoſed and diſmiſſed with ridicule

The dialogue of this play is elegant, the incidents but few, that on which the piece turns, the impoſition on the Marquis, is ſource probable enough even for the Drama The two plots are not ill connected, and the characters were all excellently performed

POETRY.

EDWIN and ETHFLIND
A POEM
Written in the ANCIENT MANNER
IN TWO CANTOS
By Mr WATKINS

CANTO THE SECOND

A plaiſing ſcene, wherein we view
A venerable age
Then happineſs and mortal too
Both cloſe our humble page.

WHEN full recover'd from her ſwoon,
Ethelind look'd around,
But when young Edwin ſhe beheld,
Her eyes ſalute the ground

While ſeveral thoughts her boſom heav'd,
And crimſon dy'd her face,
To her with tender looks approach'd
The maſter of the place

White were his locks as winter ſnow
On Snowden's ancient head,
And on his venerable face
Religion was diſplay'd

His eyes were bright, and darted rays
Of ſweet celeſtial force,
Tho many a diſmal year they'd ſeen,
And many a mournful courſe.

In piety he long had liv'd,
Hid from the world and fame,
Tho by the honeſt ſwains rever'd,
Father Pernard was his name

He took the maiden by the hand,
And aſk'd, with gentle grace,
How, at ſo dark and late an hour,
She came in ſuch a place

Her tale was ſhort, the holy man
Spake comfort to her breaſt,
Then led her to his inmoſt cell,
In innocence to reſt

There down upon the humble floor
A ruſhen bed was laid,
And after benediction meet,
He bow'd and left the maid

The hermit and the youth alone
(Whom love had ſilent kept)
In free diſcourſe the night beguil'd,
While the fair maiden ſlept

Edwin unto the holy man
Did all his ſoul unfold,
And all his love for Ethelind
To him he freely told

Nor did he aught from him reſerve
Thro vanity of youth,
But told her cold ſeverity
In ſimpleneſs of truth.

The

The hermit paus'd, then, with a ſmile,
Unto the youth he ſaid,
"I ſee the hand of Providence
"Continually diſplay'd

"For wiſeſt ends did Heav'n, my ſon,
"Lead Ethelind aſtray,
"And with the ſame peculiar care
"Did hither point your way

"You've nought but virtue's rule for your boaſt,
"But be aſſur'd from me,
"This always gives the beſt reward,
"As you in time ſhall ſee

"But lo! young day in bloom aſcends,
"And ſpreads throughout the ſky,
"Soon will the ſun himſelf ariſe
"In all his majeſty

The hermit's words on Edwin's heart
Did drop conſoling pow'r,
So doth the freſh morning in revive
The mournful drooping flow'r

Soon did fair Ethelind ariſe,
And join'd her gen'rous hoſt,
Who, with the brave but modeſt youth,
The maiden did accoſt

The good old man then took his gueſts
Into a little cell
Which for a holy chapel ſerv'd,
And ſerv'd the purpoſe well

Beneath the croſs an altar ſtood,
Whereto the hermit kneel'd,
And near it ſtood a little vaſe,
With holy-water fill'd

His oriſons with ſacred warmth,
Felt but by grateful minds,
To Heav'n he offer'd for himſelf,
And for his youthful friends

Soon as a light repaſt they'd made,
He with them left his cell,
And bent their ſteps towards the place
Where Ethelind's ſire did dwell

On Edwin's arm the maiden lean'd,
With ſweet enchanting grace,
And when her eyes did meet with his,
The bluſhes dy'd her face

The good old man with ſweet diſcourſe
Their eager ears did charm,
Until they reach'd the caſtle gates,
Where all was in alarm

But ſoon as Ethelind they ſaw,
The ſervants eager ran,
And brought their mourning maſter forth
To view his child again

In warm embrace they faſt did weep,
The pureſt joy was theirs,
And Edwin and the hermit too
Dropp'd ſympathetic tears,

When their exceſs of joy was faſt'n
Into a calm delight,
She told her father all the ſcenes
Of the preceding night

Sir Henry then (for ſo his name)
His gratitude declar'd,
And gallantly bade the youth at once
Demand his own reward

But Edwin with a downcaſt eye
In faultering accents ſaid,
"Sure 'tis reward enough that I
"Have ſav'd ſo fair a maid"

With jealouſy Sir Henry mark'd
His much-confuſed look,
But ere he could an anſwer frame,
To him the hermit ſpoke

"I ſee your joy begins to damp,
"From whence the ſtripling ſaid,
"But let not fooliſh paſſion thus
"Your ſoul to error lead.

"You find from worſe than cruel death
"He did your daughter ſave,
"And high rewards ſhould e'er attend
"The virtuous and the brave

"'Tis plainly ſeen the youth doth love,
"And, Sir, is love a crime?
"Or are you ſet againſt the youth,
"That he ſo high ſhould climb?

"Conſider that our hearts nor minds
"Are at our own diſpoſe,
"But by a pow'r divine are turn'd,
"Experience daily ſhews

"And what is Honour, ſo rever'd?
"A mere unmeaning ſound
"And what is Wealth, but uſeleſs ore
"Dug from the uſeful ground?

"Put virtue into reaſon's ſcale
"Againſt thoſe trifling toys,
"And ſee how this will ſtand unmov'd,
"While thoſe in air do riſe

"But ſtill I ſee your pride remains,
"Nor will ſubmit to truth,
"I'll ceaſe here then to reaſon more
"In favour of the youth

"You had an elder brother once,
"To whom you did ſucceed
"In title and in lands, as law
"In proper right decreed

"The raſhneſs of unheeding youth
"Sent him to foreign lands,
"Where Hubert (ſo the Knight was call'd
"Fell by a ruffian's hands —

"Why mention this? Sir Henry ſaid,
"All this I know is true'
"I am that Hubert, then, ſaid he,
"My deareſt brother you"

"Beware, old man!" Sir Henry said,
"Nor tempt with artful lies,
"For in a midnight fray abroad
"He fell a sacrifice

"I cheat you not, he quick reply'd,
"For there, with many a wound,
"I full beneath the ruffian's sword,
"Who left me on the ground

"Some pious men, who heard my groans,
"Came where I welt'ring laid,
"And to a convent near the place,
"With care I was convey'd

"In tedious time my wounds were heal'd,
"And my composed mind
"Determin'd now the path of bliss
"In solitude to find

"I sent the tidings of my death,
"Then hither bent my way,
"And in a sweet and calm retreat
"Have dwelt unto this day

"But ere I went my foreign tour
"I love o'er my heart did reign,
"A maid I lov'd, chaste but fair,
"And was belov'd again

"When love I tore, fate on my breast
"Hung like a drooping flow'r,
"For fear had bolted to her mind,
"She ne'er should see me more

"In grief she pin'd till death approach'd,
"And took her from the earth,
"But in the wilful dying hour
"She to a child gave birth

"All this I learnt when home I came,
"Is't no one could divine,
"(As secret had our meetings been)
"That the poor babe was mine

"I mark'd him with paternal care
"As he grew up to youth,
"And, tho' unknown, inspir'd his mind
"With love of virtuous truth

"Oft to my cell would he repair,
"And catch, with eager joy,
"The lessons from my lips, while I
"Delighted in my boy

"But still my mind determin'd was
"To keep myself unknown,
"Until, upon some meeter time,
"Occasion might be shewn

"And now the hand of Providence
"Has brought the whole to view,
"For this my son doth stand confess'd,
"And my dear brother you

"I see! I see!" Sir Henry said,
"I see my Hubert's face,
"Thus let me, with sincerest joy,
"My brother dear embrace!"

Upon his knees did Edwin fall,
And to his lips did press
His father's hand, nor could his tongue
His feelings then express

Sir Henry turn'd to Ethelind,
And cheerfully he said,
"Can you a boon to Edwin give,
"A grateful, lovin, maid?

Her hand, with blushes, then she gave
Unto the raptur'd youth,
And to each other they did plight
Their everlasting truth

Then in Sir Henry's castle hall
Did waffail mirth abound,
And all was joy and revelry
Full many a smile around

Sir Hubert and Sir Henry liv'd,
Both in their children bleft,
And full of piety and years
They rose to endless reft

One truth of moral force may be
Learnt from this simple tale
Virtue will still her own reward,
Like Edwin of the dale

By Mr COWPER

THE poplars are fell'd, and adieu to the shade,
And the whispering sound of the cool colonade
The winds play no longer, and sing in their leaves,
Nor the Ouse on its surface their image receives

Twelve years had elapsed since I last took a view
Of my favourite field, and the bank where they grew,
When behold on their sides in the grass they were laid,
And I sat on the trees under which I had stray'd

The blackbird has sought out another retreat,
Where the hazles afford him a screen from the heat,
And the scene where his notes have oft' charm'd me before,
Shall resound with his smooth flowing ditty no more

My fugitive years are all hast'ning away,
And I must myself lie as lowly as they,
With a turf on my breast, and a stone at my head,
Ere another such grove rises up in its stead

The change both my heart and my fancy employs,
I reflect on the frailty of man and his joys:

ON THE DEATH
OF A
LADY's BULI FINCH
BY THE SAME

YE Nymphs, if e'er your eyes were red
With tears, o'er hapleſs fav'rites ſhed,
Now ſhare Maria's grief,
Her fav'rite, even in his cage,
(What will not cruel Hunger's rage?)
Aſſaſſin'd by a thief.

Where Rhenus ſtrays his vines among,
The egg was laid from which he ſprung,
And, tho' by Nature mute,
Or only with a whiſtle bleſt,
Well taught, he all the ſounds expreſs'd
Of flageolet or flute.

The honours of his chon poll
Were brighter than the ſleekeſt mole,
His boſom of the hue
With which Aurora decks the ſkies,
When piping winds ſhall ſoon ariſe
To ſweep up all the dew.

Above, below, in all the houſe,
Dire foe like of bird and mouſe,
No cat had leave to dwell,
And Bully's cage ſupported ſtood
On props of ſmootheſt ſhaven wood,
Large built, and latticed well.

Well lattic'd, but the grate, alas!
Not rough with wire, of ſteel or braſs,
For Bully's plumage like,
But ſmooth with wands from Ouſe's ſide,
With which, when neatly peel'd and dried,
The Swans their baſkets make.

Right well'd the pole—all ſtand ſecure,
When led by inſtinct, ſharp and ſure,
Subſiſtence to provide,
A beaſt forth ſally'd on the ſcout, [ſnout,
Long back'd, long tail'd, with whiſker'd
And bead-like-colour'd hide.

He entering at the ſtudy door,
Its ample area 'gan t' explore,
And ſomething gueſſing wind
Conjectur'd, ſnuffing round and round,
Better than all the books he found,
Food chiefly for the mind.

Juſt then, by adverſe fate impreſs'd,
A dream diſturb'd poor Bully's reſt,
In ſleep he ſeem'd to view
A rat faſt clinging to his cage,
And ſcreaming at the ſad preſage,
A yoke and ſound it true.

For, aided both by ear and ſcent,
Right to his mark the monſter went,
Ah, Muſe! forbear to ſpeak
Minute the horrors which enſu'd,
His teeth were ſtrong, the cage was wood—
He left poor Bully's beak

Maria weeps, the Muſes mourn,
So when, by Bacchanalians torn,
On Thracian Hebrus ſide,
The Lyre enchanter, Orpheus, fell,
His head alone remain'd to tell
The cruel death he died.

The DOG and the WATERLILLY.
A FABLE.
BY THE SAME

THE Noon was ſhady, and ſoft airs
Swept Ouſe's ſilent tide,
When ſcap'd from literary cares,
I wander'd on his ſide.

My Spaniel, pretticſt of its race,
And high in pedigree,
(Two Nymphs adorn'd with every grace
That Spaniel gave to me)

Now wanton'd, loſt in flags and reeds,
Now ſtarting into ſight,
Purſu'd the Swan flown o'er the meads
With ſcarce a ſlower flight.

It was the time when Ouſe diſplay'd
His Lillies newly blown,
Their beauties I intent ſurvey'd,
And one I wiſh'd my own.

With care extended far I ſought
To ſteer it cloſe to hand,
But ſtill the prize, tho' nearly caught,
I ſcap'd my eager hand.

Beau, mark'd my unſucceſsful pains
With fix'd conſiderate face,
And, puzzling, ſet his puppy brains
To comprehend the caſe.

But with a ſharrup, clear and ſtrong,
Diſperſing all his dream,
I thence withdrew, and followed long
The winding of the ſtream.

My ramblings ended, I return'd,
Beau, trotting far before,
The floating flower again diſcern'd,
And, plunging, left the ſhore.

I ſaw him, with that Lilly crop't,
Impatient ſwim to meet
My quick approach, and ſoon he dropt
The treaſure at my feet.

Charm'd with the ſight, "The world, I cried,
"Shall hear of this thy deed,
"My Dog ſhall mortify the pride
"Of Man's ſuperior breed.

"But chief myſelf I will enjoin,
"Awake at Duty's call,
"To ſhew a love as prompt as thine
"To Him who gave me all."

VERSES

In Imitation of SPENSER, written at Santa Cruz, in the Island of Tenerife, and sent to DONNA ANTONIETTA DE R——, a Spanish young Lady, written at her Villa on that Island

By PETER PINDAR, Esq

BEHOLD in those lorn shades a damsel dwell—
I ween the fairest amongst all the fair—
Awhile doth Virtue bid her sky farewel,
To live with Sylvia passing all compare
Like Innocence doth leave her bower above,
To join her gentle sister of the grove

Yet what availeth, beauteous maid, thy mien,
To mortals driven from thy dark retreat?
Ah! what thy sparkling eyn of peerless sheen,
Sith lovers are forbidden from thy seat!
Soothly of little value is the rose,
Whose bell unseen in dreary desart blows

Soothly! the balms of Araby the Blest
Are nought, if unenjoyed their fragrance stream!
What is fair Luna in her silvery vest,
If ne'er she sheweth to the world her beam?
Then break like Luna from her cloud of night,
And glad us, lovely virgin, with thy light

For thee, the Poet heaveth his love-deep!
Yet, yet unheard they mingle with the wind—
Ah! Varo, well my artless lays may weep,
Sith Spenser hapt to plain'd for Rosalind,
Spenser, whose sweet song far surpasseth mine,
As Retinina's beauties yield to thine

Yet truth ma, fair one, I will verse indite,
And tho' the subject soft, to sing me please,
Tho' love be cruel, yet for laud I covet,
And immortality must crown my lays,
For sith thy charms so much delighten Lame,
She ill hath wrought to die that hold thy name

SONG

BY THE SAME

HOW bright were the blushes of morn,
How sweet was the cry of the grove,
Ere Cynthia thus left me forlorn,
And frowning forbade me to love!

My dreams I was wont to deplore—
Sad sights I must ponder around—
And, like the sad bird, I lov'd there no more,
Because she was pleas'd with the sound

Dear Cynthia! ah who could I chuse
A damsel with beauty so blest,
Or wish in his arms to enfold
Such charms as were never possest!

Oh! attend, thou fair cause of my woes!
Oh! refuse not to hear me complain
Thy smile hath undone my repose,
And that only can bless me again

ABSENCE

To CYNTHIA

BY THE SAME

HERE, Cynthia, let thy beauty beam,
For long yon valleys have been blest,
Too long, yon fountain's happy stream
Hath borne thine image on its breast

Oh! hither to these deserted bowers,
And hear whose sighs have pierced thy grove,
To tell what sorrows load the hours,
Whilst others strive to gain thy love

Sweet wood'n, listen to my prayer,
Return, and banish every sigh,
O! hither, if such heart be fair,
And hold a charm for Cynthia's eye!

In vain I ask—my sighs are vain,
The admiring swains withhold the MAID,
Whose smiles are sunshine to their plain,
Whose absence forms a midnight shade!

SONNET II

To the MOON

THOU, Moon, fair regent of the spangled sky,
Whose trembling orb in Rome's* soft-flowing stream
With silver'd lustre sweetly beam,
With pleasure oft thy melancholy fraught I hail!
And as I view thy glorious lamp on high
Now climb o'er each vermil'd hill and dale,
Thy sacred influence bids me heave the frequent sigh
For those in absence left, who to this heart,
This saddened heart shall ever dear remain!
But chief for her who bears a real part,
By sacred friendship taught, in all my pain,
O! tell her mind, her lover come again,
My love, whene'er she casts a look to thee,
With added tenderness remember me

EDLYNE

SONNET III

To a dear FRIEND on her RECOVERY from SICKNESS

ELIZA! thou whose sympathetic heart,
To friendship's warm emotions true,
Bids each fond idea rise to view,

* The River Rome, in Somersetshire.

With

With which my bosom beats far, far apart,
What numbers needs there, or what tuneful art,
To tell the anxious throbbings of my soul,
When busy fancy to my tortur'd mind
Shews thy pale form, to fell Disease confin'd,
Patient though sad beneath her dire controul?

But prais'd be He, the Father of Mankind,
Who bids the tides of health returning roll,
And see, bright Hope, her gay attendant nigh,
Who to those realms directs the grateful eye,
Where pain and sorrow cease, and ev'ry thought is joy

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE GALAS, &c ON HIS MAJESTY'S PERFECT RECOVERY.

PANTHEON GRAND GALA

THE Subscription Gala of the Club held at Martindale's was on Tuesday evening the 31st of March at the Pantheon, which was a blaze of illumination in the great room were upwards of 14,000 lamps, besides candles in the lustres, disposed in a style beautiful beyond conception Over the orchestra was a transparency of his Majesty, in his coronation robes, with the best of all mottos,

"Rex amatus Redux"

above which was a large Crown of lamps, suspended from the ceiling Over the entrance into the room was another transparency, with "Dieu et mon Droit, and the whole terminated by a brilliant star of lamps, in the sky-light of the dome, with the motto, "Honi soit qui Mal y Pense, in transparency

The Directors were Lords Coventry, Chesterfield, Winchelsea, Strathaven, and Stopford At ten o'clock the company began to assemble, and by half after eleven o'clock nearly 1400 of the nobility, gentry, ambassadors, &c were present

The Duchesses of Gordon and Buccleugh having publickly mentioned that ladies were expected to come in a uniform, most of them were dressed in white satin, elegantly decorated with gold fringe, gold bandeaus round the arms and waist, gold tassels at the shoulders, &c and on their heads they wore large plumes of white feathers and bandeaus, with the words,

"God save the King—Long live the King," &c

Some few had medallions of his Majesty, diamond spangles, &c The majority of the gentlemen were in the dresses in which they appeared at the Queen's Drawing room, on the 26th of March

The Duchess of Wirtemburgh was in satin blue, and wore an astonishing profusion of diamonds, she had a very large cluster of diamonds in her hair, a diamond stomacher, and a cestus of immense value

Among the company (which amounted to near 1500) were the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, and their son Prince William, the Duchesses of Grafton, Marlborough, &c. the Ladies Salisbury, Sydney, Hawkesbury, &c and it is almost needless to add, the Minister and most of his adherents

There were seven supper rooms, besides the usual room below. Eleven hundred persons supped, a number by near 150 more than were ever at the Pantheon suppers before. At the supper, before and after it, there was not a single faux pas!—The supper was Martindale's, the desert, Gunter's, all the designs, Wyatt's, the transparent paintings of the King within—the King and Queen without, by Smith

Among the memorable things of the meeting, was, "God save the King, call'd for by a Lady at seven in the morning, encored twice, played by the band, and sung by them, and all the company!

MANSION HOUSE—The Lady Mayoress's Assembly, in honour of his Majesty's Recovery did as much credit to the city as the Gala at the Pantheon to the west end of the town, though not so numerously attended. The company, which consisted of about 400 persons, partook of every elegance and convenience that liberality could supply, and good-humour and chearfulness universally prevailed The Ægyptian hall and other apartments were suitably decorated Card parties and country dances nearly divided the company, who did not begin to separate till five in the morning

QUEEN'S GALA at WINDSOR

The recovery of the King was celebrated on Thursday April 2, at Windsor in all the splendor and magnificence so applicable to the occasion The banquet was the most luxurious of any given at Windsor during the present reign The day should like wise be particularly noticed, as being the first time of his Majesty's appearance in public since his recovery.

form of blue and gold The Queen had a moſt ſuperb bandeau in her head dreſs, with letters in diamonds of Long live the King The Princeſſes had head-dreſſes nearly the ſame

In the piece, the actors introduced what moſt on the occaſion Colonel Arabin gave very happily an imitation of Garrick The ſubject of the piece was the wiſh of a gentleman how beſt to manifeſt his Loyalty, which ended in a theatric repreſentation

At the end of the play the ſcene changed, and diſcovered a buſt of the King, crowned with laurels

On one ſide was a tranſparency, with

DIEU ET MON ROI

On the other,

HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE

On the front of a very pretty decoration was another tranſparent painting, with Mrs Hobart's family-arms, and the motto

LOYAULTE MORTICE

CHORUS

Hark! the mellow flutes reſounding,
Sweet our ſentiments impart,
Every throbbing breaſt rebounding,
Speaks the feelings of the heart
Thus great GEORGE, when near expiring,
View'd by Angels with delight,
Like the Sun in clouds retiring,
Seem'd to vaniſh from our ſight
Hark, they ſhout, The King is living,
Bend the knee, and GOD adore!
He's given this greateſt bounty given,
Wafts our joy from ſhore to ſhore
Happy Monarch, who ſurviving,
Views the future by the paſt,
Feels this pleaſure even in dying,
To be lov'd unto the laſt

After the play was a very elegant ſupper.

CITY ASSEMBLY GALA

Was held at Merchant Taylors Hall, on Monday evening, April 25, and claims a rank in point of elegance with any ſtill already given

It was a teſtimony of loyal affection for the recovery of the King, with a determination that ſplendour ſhould not be checked by the apprehenſions of expence

There ſat down to ſupper at different times, the Ladies firſt, about eight hundred perſons, among whom were the foreign Ambaſſadors, and others of the great officers of ſtate

The room was hung with white callico, ſo exquiſitely calendered as to give to the eye the gloſs of ſattin, this was ornamented with a gold fringe, which, with feſtoons of flowers, flowers, gave the whole a fine richness of appearance The ribbons that tied up the festoons bore the words, "Long live the King"

The lights were an illumination of variegated lamps and wax tapers in cut glass lustres—the number of lamps three thousand This had a beautiful effect

The first object on entering the room was a likeness of his Majesty placed at the upper end, in a circle of lamps, over which was a brilliant crown, and the portrait being a transparency, caught the eye in an instant on entering into the hall

The tables were covered with a cold collation of all the season afford, and to this were added various soups, ornamented with confectionary disposed with great taste, and formed into various emblematical devices, here and there relieved by the productions of the hothouse in the richest decorations, such as cherries, strawberries, orange trees, &c &c &c

At the head of the table was a piece of confectionary, displaying a triumphal arch, supported by Corinthian pillars There were four transparencies at the base of the pillars, on which were inscribed, first, God save our hearts let us rejoice the second a French motto, expressing that George was the father and the father of the people On the third and fourth were two flambeaux G R The pillars were four feet in height, and had on the top a transparency representing the King's arms, and a figure of St George

Underneath the arch was a cut glass pyramid, in imitation of those in lustres on the summit of which appeared a very large medallion of the King, surrounded by capering cherubs

The figures of Britannia, Peace, &c had their proper stations, and the whole leaves and bunches of golden wheat, interspersed with coloured beads, added to the richness of the whole, a beauty and elegance that cannot be truly described

This elegant entertainment concluded with a ball

SUBSCRIPTION GALA, by BROOKS's CLUB, at the OPERA HOUSE

The appearance of this edifice on Tuesday April 21, impressed the mind with an effect like enchantment the splendour of the sight was beyond description striking! The aspect of every part of the building was new, and not the least vestige was to be traced of the primitive temple those who could recollect they had beheld it as an Opera House the preceding Tuesday, were the more astonished

The area of the Theatre, including all the space of the stage of the boxes, was laid out in a beautiful stile Twenty-two gilt columns, disposed at regular distances, gave to the intermediate space a form perfectly oval, these columns were formed of bundles of rods, bound together with scarlet ribbon, like the fasces used in Roman processions

From the centre of the ceiling, an expanse of azure silk extended to the limits of the cornice, in a wide sweep, that gave a most picturesque and airy effect it was attached in one extremity, of the oval to the barrier of the crown gallery, which was thus shut out from the view, in the opposite direction, it formed a beautiful drapery over the elevated stage on which Mrs Siddons delivered the prologue The appearance of the whole was that of a vaulted sky

From the center, a large lustre of gilt metal was suspended, which contained eighty-eight lamps the vibrations of its planished ornaments added to its splendour Two pyramides of like composition, were placed against each of the front columns, and the profusion of light thus produced gave amazing grandeur to the scene A platform over the pit, which was laid with great firmness, afforded very ample space to the numerous assembly, the most brilliant, we think, since the first Coronation

Above the festoons of the second and third tier of boxes, a pound of Irish Soft sarsnet was laid, over which fell, in various forms, a pound of Dutch sarsnet these were bordered with a narrow stripe of blue and silver Tassels of silver and blue foil were suspended from the drapery, wherever the space would allow

The lower range of boxes had all their interior partitions taken away, and thereby a promenade was afforded this tier of boxes were intersected by eight magnificent looking-glasses, of considerable dimensions A very beautiful glass was also placed at the back of the elevated stage, and two more, near eleven feet high, were placed at each side, in a lower direction The whole was judged space, and the brilliant assembly present, in every point to which the eye turned

On each side of the elevated stage, a space was laid out for music In one, the band belonging to the Duke of York's regiment were stationed, the other was filled with orchestra players

The company began to assemble at ten, and before twelve the Theatre was crowded Three hundred persons, comprehending the highest rank, fortune and beauty of England, were assembled The ladies were dressed in all the variety which fancy dictates to taste, and we never beheld such fascinating

aſſemation of charms, nor ſo much beauty ſo well embelliſhed To enumerate them is impoſſible, to detail the variety of their dreſſes impoſſible

After giving a time to ſalutation and to wonder, the concert began The band was all concealed from the eye, that the blaze of embroidered beauty might not be ſhaded by undreſs The muſic was compoſed for the occaſion The ſingers were Madame Storace and Mr Kelly, and their duets had much ſweetneſs and taſte The compoſer was Mazzinghi

The following are the words of the DUETS and CHORUSES

AIR,

Sung by KELLY and STORACE

CHORUS

Hark! heard you not yon joyful cry
That loudly tore the echoing ſky?
'Twas BRITAIN's voice—to Heaven her thanks aſcend,
Thank for her King reſtor'd, her Father and her Friend

DUETTO

No more, by fears oppreſs'd,
The mother beats her breaſt,
Or, loſt in anguiſh wild,
Hangs weeping o'er her child

CHORUS

Forth from the cloud, which late his face o'erſpread,
The STAR of BRUNSWICK burſts, a PURER LIGHT to ſhed

CHORUS

Come then, ſweet Minſtrelſy and Song,
And youthful Dance trip light along
Come gay-ey'd Mirth and frolic Sport,
Not the looſe joys of Comus Court.

Mrs SIDDONS next advanced, habited in the character of BRITANNIA, and recited the following

ODE

RESTORATION OF HIS MAJESTY,

Written by Mr MERRY,

Author of the DELLA CRUSCA POEMS.

RESPLENDENT from his zenith'd height,
The vaſt orb ſhow'rs the living light,
While roſeate Beauty hails the bounteous ſtream,
Greantic Ocean drinks the blaze,
Wild on his boundleſs billows plays,
And ſhakes his glitt'ring treſſes to the beam.

But ſee, engender'd in the gloom
Of ſullen Night's unhallow'd womb,
Dim clouds ariſe, and vapours fell,
Onward they ſpeed their baneful flight,
Spread o'er the Heav'ns their ſhadowy ſpell,
Deform the promis'd day, and veil the glorious light

Ah! now far off the tim'rous Pleaſures haſte,
Sad Silence ſlumbers in the liſtning waſte,
From her lorn cave poor Melancholy ſteals,
And fearful a ſigh her ſecret pang reveals,
Huſh'd are the Zephyrs, mute the tuneful groſe,
The notes that wak'd to joy, the gales that whiſper'd love
—— But ſhort the mournful change—behold
Again from high the radiant ſplendour roll'd,
See, the freſh flow'rs with brighter tints are ſpread,
And richer colours paint the mountain's head,
The wanton river more luxuriant leads
His ſilv'ry current through the laughing mead,
A ſweeter ſong the feather'd minſtrel tries,
Far ſweeter perfumes from the bloſſoms riſe,
Its Nature's incenſe fills the bright'ning ſkies

——So when thy luſtre, George, a while
Was loſt to Britain's ſorrowing iſle,
Appall'd, we ſhrunk beneath the blow,
The boldeſt heart confeſt diſmay,
Deſpair o'erca'ſt our Glory's day,
With'ring'd a Sov'reign's worth, and ſpoke a nation's woe

——But riſing now to tranſport from her fears,
Health be to George, our King, Britannia cries,
Waft the warm wiſh, ye gales that riſe,
Spread the glad ſound ye echoing ſpheres,
Where'er Britannia proud her victor-ſceptre rears
Let diſtant Continents declare
The glorious cauſe that wakes a nation's care,
When in diſaſter's heavy hour,
Dire ſickneſs clouds the Monarch's brow,
'Tis that unſhrinking from his hallowed vow,

That

That Monarch, to his free-born people juſt,
Reigns but for thoſe who gave him power,
And makes it glory to deſerve the truſt
Long reſt the ſceptre in his equal hand,
And to his ſway may Heav'n propitious be,
Long may he rule a willing land,
But oh! for ever may that land be free!

——Have we not ſeen a threat'ning world combine,
To tear the laurels from Britannia's ſhrine,
Seen countleſs navies load the weary main,
Legions on legions ſwell th embattled plain?
Yes, with diſdain have ſeen them, and they know
How quick the bold preſumption ends in woe
As when of yore, on Poictiers purple field,
Gaul's regal lord reſign'd his lilied ſhield,
When CRESSY's troops the ſable Chief rever'd,
And firſt IRIS DIRN on his plumes appear'd
So ſtill the vanquiſh'd foes of Albion find,
Nought can reſiſt th unconquerable mind,
From Elliot's thunder, Rodney's rage they fly,
Fate gives th' inſpiring word—'Tis GEORGE and LIBERTY

Fairy people! ye who dwell
In fragrant Ev'ning's vap'ry cell,
To the clear moon oft repair,
And quaff the ſpirit of the air!
Bear Britannia's votive wreath,
Where the gentleſt zephyr breathes
Lave it in the ſapphire tides,
Where immortal Fame reſides,
Mark the leaves which Valour wove,
Gather'd by the hand of Love,
Virtue bleſs'd them as ſhe view'd,
'Tis the wreath of gratitude!

——Yet ſtill a noble palm to Britain's heir
Let the fond ardour of affection bear,
Juſt ſo the favour'd PRINCE, in whom we trace
The brighteſt glories of the Brunſwick race,
Unfeign'd benevolence, grace void of art,
The mildeſt nature, and the firmeſt heart,
Feelings, that ſhare the grateful bliſs they give,
When bluſhing bounty bids the ſuff'rer live
The pride of generous worth, with parts to prove,
His deareſt birthright is the people's love,
His beſt ambition to revere that law,
Which holds the free-born heart in willing awe
Such are the virtues happy Britons own,
Diffuſe reflected luſtre on a throne
And lo! HIBERNIA, from her fertile coaſt,
Leans o'er the lucid waves to hear the boaſt,
Then gaily ſtrikes her harp melodious ſtring,
And with the fond applauſes greets the ſpring,
Greets the light blaſt which jocund ſpeeds away,
To where the Atlantic cliſps the ſinking day
Spread ye ſoft gales, our nation's honour raiſe,
And blend in kindred fame fraternal praiſe
Tho thou, ingenuous YORK, all praiſe diſclaim,
And in a brother's glory feel thy fame,
However with conſcious worth thy boſom glows,
Thou art the foe of none but Freedom's foes
Bleſt be thoſe youths whoſe love and duty wait,
To guard the public parent of the ſtate—
And bleſt the Father, who when ills invade,
From Heav'n and Nature claims the ſureſt aid

Sullen Hate and Party Spleen,
Pride and Envy quit the ſcene!
Friendſhip here, and Pleaſure bid
Flow'ry fetters on the mind
Female charms around conſpire—
Beaming love, and ſoft deſire,
Forms celeſtial, that ſurpaſs
Thoſe beheld in Fancy's glaſs,
When the youthful Poet's eye
Meets the viſion'd extacy
Sons of Freedom hither haſte,
Only you the bliſs can taſte,
Only you have pow'r to prove
What is Beauty, what is Love,
Sons of Freedom hither throng,
Join with us the loyal ſong,

'Till in glad concord ev'ry heart agree,
BRUNSWICK's blest line—BRITANNIA's liberty

On the conclusion of the Ode, Mrs SIDDONS sat down in the usual attitude, and with the emblems of Britannia, presenting a delightful figure; and while a new chorus of Long live the King was performing, three transparencies covering the stage, and the two adjoining compartments, were slowly lowered.

The transparencies were,
In the center,

A naval column, adorned with medallions of King George I and II in honour of the House of Brunswick On the right was Britannia, on the left was the Goddess of Health, supporting a medallion of his present Majesty They point to two groups of figures, who are testifying their joy at the happy event of his recovery, by every possible demonstration

The motto, Rege incolumi mens omnibus una
On the right hand,

A figure of Concord, holding a medallion of their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and Duke of York at her feet figures representing the Arts

The motto, Quis separabit?
On the left hand,

A figure of Liberty laying the banners of their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York before the bust of King William the IIId of glorious memory.

The motto, Exemplum infigne fecuti

The supper-rooms were opened soon after this The supper was superb and profuse; the ornaments were light and graceful In the ball room, the coffee room, and five or six smaller rooms, about 700 were able to sit down at once The dancing began about three o'clock in the morning There were no minuets nor cotillons The Duke of York and the Duchess of Rutland led down the first dance, which was Widow Casey, all the other dances were Scots, Gow's Medley, the Widow can Bake, the Tartan Bonnet, Keep the Country bonny Lassie, Monymusk, and the Bonny Lads Late in the morning there were several reels Between six and seven o'clock in the morning the tables in the supper rooms were new decked, and soups, ices, strawberries, jellies, shell-fish &c. furnished in profusion, and many parts singing catches and glees, preserved the festivity of the scene till nine in the morning

THANKSGIVING DAY

[FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE]

Whitehall, April 25.

Thursday last being appointed by his Majesty's Proclamation to be observed as a Day of General Thanksgiving to Almighty God for the signal interposition of his good providence, in removing from his Majesty the late illness with which he had been afflicted, his Majesty was pleased, for the greater solemnity of the day, to go to the Cathedral Church of St Paul, accompanied by the Queen, their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, the Princess Royal, the Princess Augusta, the Princess Elizabeth, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Duke of Cumberland, and his Highness Prince William; and attended by both Houses of Parliament, the great Officers of State, the Judges, and other public officers, to return thanks to God for his great mercies and blessings

The Procession was begun at eight o'clock in the morning by the House of Commons, in their coaches, followed by their Speaker, in his state coach Next came the Masters in Chancery, the Judges, and after them the Peers, in the order of precedency, as they were marshalled by the officers of arms at Westminster, the youngest Baron going first, and the Lord Chancellor, in his state coach, closing this part of the procession Such of the Peers as were Knights, wore the collars of their respective orders

Afterwards came the Royal Family, in order of precedency, with their attendants, escorted by parties of the Royal regiment of Horse Guards.

Their Majesties set out from the Queen's Palace soon after ten o'clock, in a coach drawn by eight cream-coloured horses, (in which were also two of the Ladies of her Majesty's Bed chamber) followed by their Royal Highnesses the Princesses, and proceeded through the Gate at the Stable Yard, along Pall Mall, and through the Strand, amidst the loyal acclamations of a prodigious concourse of people

The streets were lined, as far as Temple-bar, by the brigade of foot guards, the grenadier companies of which were posted in St Paul's Church, and in the Church-yard, and patrolled by parties of the Royal regiment of Horse Guards The avenues into the streets through which the procession passed were guarded by the Queen's Light Dragoons From Temple Bar to the Church the streets were lined by the Artillery Company and the militia of the City, the peace-officers attending both within and without the City to preserve order.

At Temple bar his Majesty was met by the Lord Mayor, in a gown of crimson velvet

The Sheriffs in their scarlet gowns, and a deputation from the Aldermen and Common Council, viz Deputies Leekey, Birch, Mr Wadd, and Mr Dixon, being all on horse-back, ſtate, when the Lord Mayor ſurrendered the city ſword to his Majeſty *, who having returned it to him, he carried it bare-headed, before the King to St. Paul's.

The reſt of the body-corporate paraded from Guildhall to St. Paul's church in two diviſions, preceded, the firſt by Deputy Nicolls and Haliſer, the other by Deputies Meggs and White.

His Majeſty being come to St Paul's, was met at the Weſt door by the Peers, the Biſhop of London, the Dean of St Paul's, (Biſhop of Lincoln) the Canons Reſidentiary, and the King's and other officers of Arms, the Band of Gentlemen Penſioners, and the Yeomen of the guard attending.

The ſword of ſtate was carried before his Majeſty by the Marquis of Stafford into the abour, where the King and Queen placed themſelves under a canopy of ſtate, near the Weſt end, oppoſite to the altar.

The Peers had their ſeats in the area, as a Houſe of Lords, and the Commons in the ſtalls. The upper galleries were allotted for the ladies of her Majeſty's Bedchamber, the Maids of Honour, and ſuch other ladies of diſtinction as attended on this occaſion The Foreign Miniſters were placed in the two lower galleries, next to the throne; and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen in the lower galleries near the altar

The Pſalms and Litany were read and chaunted by the Minor Canons †. The Te Deum and Anthems ‡, compoſed for the occaſion, were ſung by the Choir, who were placed in the organ-loft, and were joined in the chorus, alſo in the Pſalms, by the charity children, in number about 6000, who were aſſembled there previous to their Majeſties arrival The Communion ſervice was read by the Dean, (Dr Preſyman, Biſhop of Lincoln,) and Reſidentiaries, (Dr Wilſon, Biſhop of Briſtol, and Dr Jeffries) and the ſermon preached by the Lord Biſhop of London, from a text taken out of the 27th Pſalm, v 16 —(" O tarry thou the Lord's leiſure: be ſtrong, and he ſhall comfort thine heart; and put thou thy truſt in the Lord ")

Divine Service being ended, their Majeſties returned with the ſame ſtate to the Queen's Palace at about half an hour after three o'clock The guns at the Tower and in the Park were fired three times, firſt upon the King's ſetting out, ſecondly at the ſinging of Te Deum, and thirdly upon his Majeſty's return, after which the brigade of foot guards fired a Feu de Joye in St. James's Park, being drawn up in the front of the Queen's Palace

The public demonſtrations of joy and loyalty by the inhabitants of London and Weſtminſter, on the occaſion of his Majeſty's firſt appearance in public ſince his happy recovery, exceeded all expreſſion: and yeſterday evening the illuminations § in all parts of this Metropolis

* The Lord Mayor on preſenting the ſword of State to his Majeſty, addreſſed the King in the following words " I deliver this ſword of State into your Majeſty's hands, and with it my command in the city " To which the King replied, " My Lord Mayor, I return the ſword back into your poſſeſſion, and thank you and the citizens of London for the loyalty they have ſhown me."

† Rev Meſſrs. Moore, Hayes, and Gibbons

‡ The words as follow, from Pſalm CXXXIX (the muſic by Dr Croft)

1 O Lord, thou haſt ſearched me out, and known me: thou knoweſt my down-ſitting and mine up riſing; thou underſtandeſt my thoughts long before.

2. Thou art about my path, and about my bed: and ſpyeſt out all my ways.

3 For lo, there is not a word in my tongue: but thou, O Lord, knoweſt it altogether

6 Whither ſhall I go then from thy ſpirit: or whither ſhall I go then from thy preſence?

7 If I climb up into heaven, thou art there: if I go down to hell, thou art there alſo

8 If I take the wings of the morning, and remain in the uttermoſt parts of the ſea,

9. Even there alſo ſhall thy hand lead me: and thy right hand ſhall hold me.

ILLUMINATIONS.

§ The illuminations were not ſo general this evening as on the occaſion of his Majeſty's recovery, but in particular inſtances they were infinitely more ſuperb We may ſafely affirm, that as the art and means of illuminating houſes never were ſo compleat as at this day, from the improved form of the lamps and other circumſtances, there never were in England more ſuperb illuminations, than on the late and preſent occaſions Full time being given to prepare for the ſpectacle of this night, the devices and paintings were curious and rich, Almoſt all the public bodies, the great offices of Government, the companies, the public buildings, the palaces, and even ſome of the churches were illuminated. The total expence tropolis surpassed in splendour and magnificence all former exhibitions.

THE FOLLOWING ARE THE FORMS OF PRAYER APPOINTED FOR THE THANKSGIVING DAY

Instead of the First Collect for Morning Prayer, shall be used these two which follow

"O LORD GOD, Merciful and Gracious, the strength of those who put their trust in Thee, we adore Thy Fatherly Goodness, which hath been our support and refuge in the time of our affliction. We acknowledge with great humility, that by reason of our transgressions we are unworthy of all Thy blessings But Thou declarest Thy Almighty power most chiefly by shewing Mercy and Pity and it has pleased Thee to have regard unto the supplications of Thy servants, and to restore the voice of joy and health was not less perhaps than half a million To speak of private efforts, which, though tasteful, were lost in the superior blaze of public magnificence, would be endless There were, however, many instances of superior taste, some of which we shall point out

The Houses of Lords and Commons were superbly ornamented with lamps, but their neighbours the Ordnance office, under the direction of the Duke of Richmond, was an immense blaze of light

The Horse Guards was illuminated with taste The front towards the Park was particularly fine The Army Office had pillars green and white, supporting the crown and other emblems, very brilliantly illuminated

The Treasury had a number of lamps, and the Admiralty was very superb, the pillars were warped round with lamps In all these however there was so little variety, that the description of one is a description of the whole G R with stars and crowns blazed indiscriminately from all.

St James's-street was as luminous as ever White's had a beautiful transparency (from the Pantheon) in the centre, the King in his coronation robes, sitting in the coronation chair at the Abbey the transparency was studded round with lamps, and over on each side were stars, circles, and festoons

Brookes's had a large transparency from the Opera-House, but no lamps

The splendor in the City was superior to any thing that the City ever exhibited

Above all other transparencies of the night, that of the BANK OF ENGLAND merited principal praise The design was classical, and in point of composition and execution, it is to be lamented so temporary a fate was annexed to so much taste and skill It was placed at an elevation of about fifteen feet from the eye, and appeared from its base to its attitude, to extend about seventeen feet The centrical part of this transparency is as follows

Britannia, bearing on a staff the Cap of Liberty, is seated on a triumphal car, such as was in use in Roman Entries —four horses of an iron grey colour, harnessed abreast of each other, draw the chariot —and a little elevated in the air, Hygæia, with her arm wreathed round with the snake, expressive of Esculapian power, appeared guiding the course of the horses —two hovering cherubs, symbolic of Peace and Plenty, are over Britannia. The most distinguished figure in the foreground, is a dignified personification of the City of London, bearing in her hand the Civil Sword and Charter, and on her head the Mural Crown —The drapery of this august figure consists of gold tissue, and a blue mantle—on one side is seen a Genius representing Commerce, with a shield containing the City arms,—and on the other, the attribute of Liberality bearing two cornucopias, the one filled with fruits, the other treasure A Lion, expressive of Kingly power, is near the wheels of the triumphal car The upper device was the profile of the King, encircled with a branch of palm and olive The base of the picture has the symbol of Tellus, with proper attributes, and flowers and fruits in festoons In addition to this device, every part of the building, including the two wings, was lighted up with variegated lamps, in festoons, circles, crowns, and other ornaments

Sun Fire Office—Was very brilliantly illuminated on the end and two sides On the lower corner, in a narrow transparency, were crowns and G R alternately all the way. The different columns were all ornamented with different coloured lamps On the North side, fronting the Bank, was a transparency, representing Time and Patience supporting a portrait of the King, with a G R and Crown—The spaces were filled with circles, diamonds, &c ——On the East side was another transparent painting, representing the King and Queen on their throne, her Majesty having on her crown, and Fame and Victory holding a crown of laurel over the King's head, and below two Seraphs, with the cornucopia—In Bank-street, a grand transparency of the King and Queen, with a G. R, surrounded health in our dwellings We desire, therefore, humbly to present to thy Divine Majesty our grateful sacrifice of Thanksgiving.

"Let the Prayers and Praises this day offered unto Thee, O God, be acceptable in Thy sight. Pour into our hearts, we beseech Thee, those holy dispositions which become the solemn remembrance and devout acknowledgment of Thy Mercies, giving us grace to repent ourselves unfeignedly of our sins, and to live in true faith and constant obedience to Thy Law, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour Amen

"O GOD, whose Providence extendeth to all, even to the meanest of Thy creatures, but is most graciously visible in watching over the person of Princes; we give Thee most hearty thanks and praise for all Thy mercies vouchsafed unto Thy servant our Sovereign, so especially for his late happy deliverance from the severe illness with which he hath been afflicted Confirm, O Lord, we beseech Thee, the recovery which Thou hast wrought in him Thou hast been his succour: leave him not, neither forsake him, O Lord God of our Salvation: Give him with stars, and an angel supporting the motto of Restored Happiness Underneath was a large figure of Neptune and Britannia holding a cornucopia, a wreath of lamps extending the whole length of the buildings, and a transparency of silk intermixed with crowns and G R.

Royal Exchange—Lighted all round the office with lamps, a part of which is in the front of Cornhill, and a large crown with G. R Very handsome, but did not look so well as if the opposite corner had corresponded

East India House—In the centre at the top of the building was a brilliant star, festooned round with lamps The motto, "God save the King," extended along the front in variegated lamps A Crown, with G R On each side the King's and Company's arms Pilasters of lamps were placed between the windows of the buildings, and lamps all round the window frames A handsome row of lamps as a cornice wreathed

Phœnix Fire Office —A Crown at top A large wreath of transparency which reached the whole breadth of the building The King's bust supported by two angels with the motto, "The people shall rejoice in thy strength, O Lord," and underneath a star with G R on each side

Jews Synagogue, Leadenhall-street —G R and a profile of the King —Inscription on a transparency out of Psalms, "Mercy and truth preserve the King, for his throne is upholden by mercy"

Portuguese Synagogue, Bevis Marks —Front door, G R and Crown, transparent inscription, "The King shall joy in thy strength, O Lord, and in thy salvation how greatly shall he rejoice' Psalm xxi

The Excise Office—Was covered with lamps in various forms, with a superb crown and G R In the center they had a transparency, over which were the words in large letters "God save the King!"

A great number of private individuals also testified their joy by brilliant and elegant illuminations It is a difficult task to say which surpassed the others in beauty and taste, we shall therefore mention a few with which we were much pleased

Sir William Chambers —Illuminated in a most elegant manner a figure of Architecture supporting a medallion of the King,—and in the same street, Bowyer, his Majesty's miniature painter, exhibited one of the most brilliant spectacles ever seen in this country. The design, we understand, was his own, it represented on the top a large crown of fourteen feet in diameter, with a G R in variegated lamps—beneath the figure of Painting, at the foot of the throne, presenting the Queen a miniature medallion of Doctor Willis

A very elegant transparency was at Boydell's gallery, in Pall-Mall The subject was the revival of British Genius on the recovery of its protecting Monarch

Mr Birch's —The dining room windows hung round with lamps, and over them ovals In one a painted anchor intermixed with laurel leaves, and in the other a sceptre, with ropes intermixed, over the windows a Crown and G. R The appearance simple and elegant.

Mr. Hoffman's, in Bishopsgate-street, had in the center window a transparency of the King in his robes, surrounded with the rays of a sun. Above the window was an elegant crown, and G R In the left hand window were two neat gilt Corinthian pillars, supporting transparencies, one of which was the King's Arms, the other a George and the Dragon. In the right hand window were two similar pillars, supporting beautiful medallions of the King and Queen On the outside, upon the extremity of the leads, were erected two gilt Corinthian pillars, rising from palm branches, upon the pillars were the words, "Deep in our hearts let us record" Against the wall were placed in pots two large orange-trees, loaded with fruit, from above which to the center window, were festoons tied at each end with white ribbons.

the comfort of Thy help, and ſtabliſh him with Thy Spirit. Let Thy Wiſdom be his guide, and Thine Arm ſtrengthen him; continue him a nurſing Father to Thy Church, and Thy Miniſter for good to all his ſubjects. Grant that he may long gaſhion the hearts of his people, and that they may never be wanting in honour to his perſon, nor due obedience to his lawful authority. Let his reign be happy, and his days be lengthened and proſper all his undertakings, for Thy Glory, and the welfare of the realm. Crown him with all temporal and ſpiritual bleſſings in this life, and bring him to thine everlaſting glory in the life to come. Extend thy merciful protection, O Lord, to his Royal Conſort, to the Queen, the Prince of Wales, and all the Royal Family; perpetuate the happineſs of his government in his children's children; and let his Throne be as the Sun before Thee. Let truth, and piety, and peace, and every Chriſtian virtue, flouriſh under Bow Lane.—Mr. Schneider had in the centre window G R with a crown and ſceptre elegantly formed with a profuſion of lamps, under which was a beautiful tranſparency, having the following lines:

GOD SAVE THE KING

Still George ſhall reign—in every breaſt,
In marks of Loyal love impreſs'd,
And ſtill fair Albion ſhall proclaim
With raptures—his auſpicious name.

GOD BLESS THE QUEEN

Virtue's bright pattern—Heav'n ſupremely kind,
Heard thy fond pray'r—and heal'd thy wounded mind:
Such are thy virtues—ſuch thy ſhining parts,
That thou, like Him, ſhalt reign in all our Hearts

GOD PROTECT THE PRINCE

Health to the Royal Race, and may the Prince,
By equal Wiſdom, all the world convince,
That Virtue is his firſt—his fav'rite aim,
That there he builds his Honour—there his Fame!

Mr Neale, of St Paul's Church-yard, had three tranſparencies ſurrounded with large lamps, and ſmaller lamps forming various figures to the ſecond ſtory. The center tranſparency was a beautiful medallion of his Majeſty, under which were the following lines:

Still may our Sovereign Heav'n's protection ſhare,
And be his ſacred life th' Almighty's care!
Let following years ſucceeding bleſſings bring,
And in his people's hearts, Long live and reign the King!

The right and left hand tranſparencies were two ſtars, with G R.

Another remarkable tranſparency was in Holborn, at Mr Baldrey's, Drawing maſter and Printſeller. On the right hand was repreſented Dr Willis raiſing the King from the bed of ſickneſs, through the interpoſition of Heaven, which the Doctor is ſeen to receive from an angel; over the bed was inſcribed, Glory to God on high. On the left the Queen, Prince of Wales, and Britannia, over them a cherub ſounding a trumpet, with the words of a part of the Coronation Anthem iſſuing from it.

Mr Wheeler, of Fleet ſtreet, had a large tranſparency, repreſenting the King recovering and raiſing himſelf from his bed, and the Queen preſenting herſelf before him with the younger branches of the Royal Family. Above was an angel deſcending with the crown, ſignificant of its being reſtored on his Majeſty's recovery, and what made it more intereſting was, the angel choſen for this errand, was their Majeſties late ſon Alfred, who died of the ſmall-pox, who ſays—"Behold! and ſee how gracious the Lord is." The Princeſs Royal was repreſented as turned back and looking ſtedfaſtly at Alfred. In the back ground behind the King ſtood the Lord Chancellor, Mr. Pitt, and Dr. Willis, ſeemingly engaged in an intereſting converſation on the ſubject before them.

There would be no end in the attempt to enumerate or deſcribe all the ſpectacles of this kind. It is ſufficient to ſay, that they appeared in all parts of the town,—that variegated lamps, hung in G. R. and feſtoons, with mottos of "Long live the King," and "May the King live for ever," conſtituted the chief part of the evening's magnificence and loyalty.

The crouds that paraded through the ſtreets till a very late hour, were incredibly large; and we are happy to add, that though the number of perſons was ſo great, there ſeemed to be more of curioſity and wonder than that of riot and miſchief, and that very few accidents happened.

[With a View of it.]

It has been observed by Mr. Cumber[illegible] that a more pleasing tour than the Lakes of Westmoreland hold out to men of [illegible] and curiosity cannot be devised. "We [illegible], he adds, the Glaciers, traverse the [illegible] and the Rhine, whilst our domestic [illegible] of Ulleswater, Keswick, and Winder[illegible], exhibit scenes in so sublime a stile, with such beautiful colourings of rock, wood and water, backed with so tremendous a [illegible] of mountains, that if they do not [illegible] take the lead of all the views of Eu[illegible], yet they are indisputably such as no [illegible] traveller should leave behind him."

Skiddaw, which forms so conspicuous a part of this scene, is 3270 feet from the level of the sea. It exhibits a prospect beautiful, majestic and sublime, such as cannot but impress every beholder with awe, intermixed with sensations of the most pleasing kind.

To those who have viewed these delightful scenes, a description is hardly necessary; and to those who have not, the most elaborate one, in writing, would convey but an imperfect idea. The print which accompanies this page, taken from Loutherbourg's excellent picture, will afford our readers much more compleat satisfaction.

MONTHLY CHRONICLE.

March 5

THE ſeſſions, which began at the Old Bailey on Wedneſday the 25th of February, ended, when eight convicts received ſentence of death, 33 were ordered to be tranſported, eight to be impriſoned in Newgate, nine to be whipt and diſcharged; and 24 to be diſcharged by proclamation

13 The following diſcovery was made in St George's chapel at Windſor

The workmen employed in new paving the choir, diſcovered, this day, a door, on the ſtones which cloſed up the entrance into the vault where Edward IV had been depoſited. Two of the canons and the ſurveyor, entering the vault, viewed the royal body incloſed in a leaden and a wooden coffin, reduced to a ſkeleton, which meaſured ſix feet three inches; the ſkull reclined to the left or north ſide, with a quantity of long brown hair, which had fallen off it, but no traces of envelope or cerecloth, nor any rings or other inſignia A liquor covered the bottom of the inner coffin to the depth of about four inches, which, on examination, was found to be only the moiſture which had drained from the body. On the King's coffin lay another of wood, only much decayed, which contained the ſkeleton of a woman, who, from the marks of age about the ſkull, was ſuppoſed to be that of his Queen, Elizabeth Widville, who died three years after him in confinement at Bermondſey Abbey, and was probably buried with leſs pump The body of his fifth daughter, Mary, who died the year before him, and was the only perſon of his family buried at Windſor, was not in this vault, which, from various circumſtances, appeared to have been opened and plundered at ſome former period On the walls of the vault was written in chalk, in abbreviated characters of the times, Edward or Edwardus IV and ſeveral names of workmen or aſſiſtants at the funeral

Edward IV died April 9, 1482, and was buried the 18th following in this chapel, whoſe founder himſelf had laid.

The Recorder of London made his report to his Majeſty of the priſoners under ſentence of death in Newgate, convicted in the ſeſſions of September, October, November, and January, (46 in number) 14 of whom were ordered for execution, five of whom were afterwards reprieved

17 The Iriſh penſion bill, which was carried up to the Lords of that kingdom, was propoſed to be read a ſecond time on the Monday following, but it was propoſed by thoſe who wiſhed well to Adminiſtration, that it ſhould be read a ſecond time on this Monday ſe'nnight This motion was carried by 38 to 36

18 The nine following malefactors were executed before Newgate, purſuant to their ſentence, viz Hugh Murphy and Chriſtian Murphy, alias Bowman, for coining, Charles Meſſenger and Tredway Pocock, William Collard, and John Norrington, for burglary, James Grace and Joſeph Walker, for coining, and William Craddock, for a robbery The woman for coining was brought out after the reſt were turned off, and fixed to a ſtake and burnt, being firſt ſtrangled by the ſtool being taken from under her

20 A fire broke out at Mr Heath's in Leiceſter-ſtreet, which entirely conſumed the ſame, and in the confuſion a child of Mr Heath's had been left in the cradle, till the cries alarmed his father, who at the peril of his life recovered it from the flames. This ingenious artiſt is ſaid to have loſt property to the amount of 1500 l by this accident

23 Laſt night the purſer of the William Pitt Eaſt India ſhip, Capt Mitchell, arrived at the India Houſe with the agreeable intelligence of the arrival of the above ſhip on Sunday laſt off Dover, from Bengal, after the quickeſt paſſage ever known—having only left the Downs on her outward-bound voyage on the 5th of April 1788

25 The Prince of Wales, Moore, from Botany Bay, is arrived at Falmouth, and brings an account of the fleet being all ſafe arrived at Botany Bay The Prince of Wales buried only one convict She ſailed for England on the 15th of July, in company with the Borrowdale, and parted the 15th of Auguſt, met again at Rio Janeiro, and ſailed from thence the 24th of December Capt Mafon of the Prince of Wales, and four ſeamen, died on their paſſage home

QUEEN's DRAWING ROOM

26 Preſented ſuch a ſcene as our Court, in its brighteſt period, or any other Court in Europe at any period, never preſented to the world It was the aſſemblage of all that was gay and beautiful in the country, paying homage to the beſt of Queens, on the beſt of all poſſible occaſions—the reſtoration of the health of their Sovereign!

The Queen ſat in a chair of ſtate, under a canopy richly laced, attended by the Lords and Ladies of her houſehold

Round the Queen's neck was a medallion, tied with a double row of gold chain, and acroſs her ſhoulders was another chain of three rows of pearls, and five rows of diamonds

mond laſt ned low behind, with a fine mina ure pictu e of the King ſtuck d with dia m nd, hanging in front The tippet wa of fine lace, and faſtened with the letter G in diamonds

Her Majeſty had, in the front of her hat, God ſave the King in a very rich cluſter of diamonds

Lady Lloyd's cap had a painting, deſcribing Britannia kneeling and offering praiſes to Heaven for the recovery of the King, very richly ornamented with diamonds, band, flowers, and feathers In the front, Deus nobis hæc otia, (God reſtores him to us) embroidered in gold letters

The Ladies wore nearly the ſame kind of uniform caps They were chiefly of crape, with large plumes of white oſtrich feathers, many were ornamented with oak leaves and acorns In all head-dreſſes were band aus of embroidered velvet, with the motto of God ſave the King

The Gentlemen's dreſſes were chiefly dark ſtriped velvets, with rich embroideries The waiſtcoats were all of white ſattin, embroidered to match the trimmings of the coat

30 Three hundred and ſixty pounds was paid into the Exchequer for the uſe of the public, in conſequence of the following note received by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

"Sir, You will herewith receive Bank notes to the amount of 360 l which is the property of the nation, and which, as an honeſt man, you will be ſo juſt as to apply to the uſe of the ſtate in ſuch manner that the nation may not ſuffer by its having been detained from the public treaſury You are implored to do this for the eaſe of conſcience to an honeſt man"

31 Accounts have been received from every part of the kingdom of public rejoicings and preparations for them, upon the happy reſtoration of the King to his health and people. The limits of our Magazine will not permit us to indulge the loyal wiſh of inſerting all that has been ſent This, we hope, will be admitted as an apology for we can hardly enumerate the various places which have been moſt zealous, conſpicuously to expreſs their own and the general joy No event in the annals of this country has occaſioned ſuch univerſal exultation, nor ever did the Father of a people experience ſuch pleaſing and convincing proofs of his ſubjects' attachment and affection

Indeed the records of this kingdom furniſh no precedent of the like univerſal expreſſion of gladneſs in any degree to be compared to the preſent Not only the city and towns, but the villages have been contending in their proofs of loyalty

His Majeſty not only attended the turning out of a flag at Salt-hill, but ſaw a great deal of the chace

"His Majesty receives with the greatest satisfaction the dutiful and loyal Address of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled

"His Majesty accepts in the most gracious manner the renewal of their professions of affectionate attachment to his person family and government, and feels with the greatest sensibility the joyful expressions of their hearts upon the interposition of Divine Providence, in restoring him again to the personal exercise of his royal functions. The happiness and prosperity of his faithful subjects in Ireland are objects very near his Majesty's heart, and he confides in the wisdom of the Parliament of that kingdom, that they will pursue such measures as will enable him to fulfil his intention of promoting the general interests of all his dominions."

"His Majesty thanks his faithful Commons for their loyal and affectionate Address, and for their assurances of the sincere and cordial satisfaction which they feel on the interposition of Divine Providence, in removing from him the severe misfortune with which he has been afflicted

"Nothing can be more satisfactory to his Majesty than the disposition expressed by the House of Commons, cheerfully to proceed in making such provisions as are necessary for the honourable support of his Majesty's government

"He receives with the greatest pleasure the acknowledgments of the House of Commons of their sense of the solicitude which his Majesty can never cease to entertain for the interests of Ireland, as well as their professions of respect and attachment to his person, family and government

15 The Queen, the Princess Royal and the Princesses Sophia and Elizabeth, honoured Covent Garden theatre with their presence, for the first time since his Majesty's illness As soon as her Majesty entered the royal box, which she did a minute or two before the Princesses, the burst of acclamations was excessive At the same instant the curtain was drawn, and displayed a transparency, which the zeal and loyalty of the Manager had prepared, exhibiting the King's Arms, with a scroll supported by cherubs, of "Long live the King," and underneath, "May the King live for ever" The Queen was evidently much affected, she burst seasonably into tears, which apparently gave her relief, and the Princesses coming into the box, sympathized in her sensibility This scene of exquisite emotion continued for some time The House called for "God save the King," and the theatre being prepared, the song was immediately sung by Mr Bannister, Mr Johnstone and Mr Darley, the house joining in the chorus It was encored, and by this time her Majesty being composed, she joined in the general demonstration of joy, and beat time with her fan to the song The play was then suffered to begin, in the course of which there was a new burst of applause by the health of the King being given as a toast by Mr Edwin

At the end of the play, "God save the King" was again called for, and again sung twice

At the end of the pantomime it was again called for, and the theatre not sending forward the performers, the audience cheerfully sung it for themselves, and having sung, they encored themselves, so that all together it was sung six times in the course of the evening

21 The Purser of the Earl Talbot East-Indiaman, Captain John Woolmore, came to the India House, with an account of her safe arrival off the Isle of Wight, from China.

24. Dispatches were received at the Admiralty Office from Commodore Phillips, dated Port Jackson, the 2d of October last, they they come by way of the Cape, in the Sirius, which was ſent thither to bring a ſupply of proviſions for the colony. Nothing very material has occurred ſince the laſt accounts. The ſavages have become very atrocious. They have carried off all the ſtock they could lay their hands on, and have ſet fire to the long graſs in the neighbourhood of the camp, ſo that it is to be feared when the corn grows up, it may ſhare a ſimilar fate.

25 A memorial was lately preſented by Prince Czartoryſki Ambaſſador from Poland at Berlin, praying that his Pruſſian Majeſty would interfere in forcing the Ruſſian troops out of Poland. From the active conduct of the King hitherto on the buſineſs, it was expected he would have gladly complied, but the anſwer was, "That he recommended the Diet to temporize, until ſuch time as ſome other matters which were in negociation, were concluded on."

On receiving this anſwer, the Ruſſian miniſter immediately commiſſioned Prince Sulkowſki, Palatine of Kalitch, to repair to Berlin, where he is arrived. The object of their petition is, "to pray that his Pruſſian Majeſty would continue to perſevere in thoſe ſentiments towards the Republic, which he had manifeſted throughout their proceedings, and particularly in his firſt declaration to the Confederate States."

The anſwer to this meſſage is not yet given.

The meaſures which Denmark is at this moment purſuing, ſhew that the Court conſiders a war as inevitable.—Accordingly war taxes have been impoſed by an edict of his Daniſh Majeſty lately publiſhed, which extends to perſonal as well as real property.

The proprietors of lands in the Duchies of Holſtein and Sleſwic are to pay one half per cent. of their net produce, over and above all former taxes.

All rent charges and annuities are ſubject to a tax of four per cent.

And all perſons holding offices, civil, military, or eccleſiaſtical, are to pay five per cent. out of the produce of their offices.

Even ſervants, females as well as males, are made liable to the ſame tax: the males if their wages are 20 rix dollars, or upwards, per year, and the females, if their wages are fifteen or more.

The preamble to the edict which impoſes this tax, ſays, that though it is with reluctance his Majeſty thus increaſes the burdens of his ſubjects, he finds that the ſafety of the State renders them, at this time, indiſpenſibly neceſſary.

By a letter from France we learn, that at Apt, a ſmall town of Provence, the populace have proceeded to commit many cruel outrages. They attempted to force into the houſe of the Sieur de Montſerra, the Judge of the city, who in defending himſelf unhappily fired on the mob; they then became furious, broke open the door, ſeized his perſon, and after dragging him through the ſtreets for near two hours, cut him to pieces.

At Avignon, a city belonging to the Pope, the people have not been leſs tumultuous, though they have not committed the ſame bloody exceſſes. They have confined themſelves to the plunder of the granaries.

Provence and its dependencies are not the only places that have ſuffered from the ſcarcity of wheat, whether real or artificial. At Beſancon, the houſe of the Prudent Filbert, and that of Mr. Bourgon, Chancellor of Parliament, have been rifled. The doors and windows of many conſiderable merchants have been broken to pieces. From the extremity of Provence as far as Franche Comte, from Marſeilles to Nancy, from Normandy even to Barcelona (that is, through the whole length of France), nothing but anarchy and confuſion prevails. Thus, in the very moment when the repreſentatives of the nation are at the point of aſſembling to eſtabliſh order and good government, diſorders and tumults prevail.

The laſt letters received from Berlin fully confirm the opinion that the King of Pruſſia has abandoned the ſyſtem he has uniformly purſued for ſome months paſt, in inſtigating the Diet of Poland to an offenſive conduct towards the Empreſs of Ruſſia, and by this change has ſacrificed that party which ſo ſtrenuouſly aſſiſted his views in Poland.

27 In the Houſe of Commons of Ireland on Tueſday laſt, the order of the day being read, and the queſtion put for the committal of Mr Grattan's Bill for preventing Revenue Officers from voting at elections for members of Parliament, a debate of conſiderable length enſued. The queſtion being at laſt put, the Houſe divided, when there appeared for the motion 9, againſt it 148. Mr Maſon then moved that the Bill be rejected, which was carried without a diviſion.

The day of Thankſgiving, the 23d, was not leſs honoured in Ireland than in England.

On the morning of Thurſday, the Lord Lieutenant, and the Lords and Commons, went in their robes of ſtate to hear divine ſervice in the church of St Patrick.

28 The illuminations at the Bank, India-Houſe, Sun Fire-Office, Exciſe Office, and Royal-Exchange, coſt 25,000l.

In Coleman-ſtreet watch houſe, eight corpſes were lying dead on Saturday evening to be owned, and one at Moorgate watch-houſe.

29. To the Gala at Windsor last night about 160 of the Nobility were honoured with cards of invitation among whom were the Prince of Wales the Duke of York, the Lord Chancellor, Mr Pitt, &c &c

The passage leading from the great staircase, through which the company were to pass, was a transparent painting done by Rebecca

At nine o'clock the dances began in the great room, and at twelve the company adjourned to supper in St George's Hall

At the upper end of the hall, on the throne, their Majesties and the Royal Family sat Two tables were placed the length of the hall, at each of which sat 60 persons There was also another at the bottom of the hall

The ornaments of the table were superb beyond conception On one, three temples four feet high were placed, exquisitely done On the other table, were three large ornaments, in the middle of which was a most beautiful engraving The patterns of the ornaments was also wonderfully well executed

After supper the company returned the dance, and separated not till late this morning

THE EUROPEAN MAGAZINE, AND LONDON REVIEW,

For MAY, 1789.

For the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE
AN ACCOUNT of WILLIAM FECTOR, ESQ.
[With a PORTRAIT of HIM]

WITH no small share of satisfaction we submit to the public a few particulars respecting a gentleman with whose name they have for some time been acquainted, and of whose general character there can be but one opinion. The subject of these memoirs will be remembered for his taste, hospitality, and spirit, whilst those qualities maintain their influence amongst society. If in this age of trifling and finding, instead of following the tide of fashionable frivolity, he has endeavoured to stem the torrent, by encouraging an amusement which has ever been deemed the most rational of its species, Mr. W. Fector has certainly a claim to the approbation of those, whose praise must ever confer distinction wherever it is bestowed.

WILLIAM FECTOR, Esq. was born the 9th of December 1764, and is the third and youngest son of Peter Fector, Esq. of Dover, a gentleman eminent for the honourable discharge of the laborious but important duties appertaining to the situation of merchant, agent, and banker, and we believe the major part of our own nobility, as well as the first characters on the Continent, will readily confirm our assertions. For upwards of a century the house of MINET and FECTOR has preserved its commercial credit and pre-eminence in Dover. The transmutations they have witnessed must be numerous and entertaining. Few of the fashionable birds of passage have escaped their observation, and no one can open the budget of Anecdote with more grace and pleasantry than the worthy parent of our dramatic amateur. The family is peculiarly remarkable for its domestic felicities and concord, and we believe, that few who have visited the Dover bank will deny they ever found themselves otherwise than perfectly at home.

The Rev. Mr. Jones, at Naylind, in Suffolk, under whose care Mr. W. Fector was in his boyish days, may claim a share of the praise to which his pupil is entitled, as his talents for recitation have been long admired, and his method of instruction therein has been peculiarly successful. Lord Robert Fitzgerald, brother to the Duke of Leinster, was under Mr. Jones's tuition with Mr. Fector, and those who were fortunate enough to see his Lordship's exhibitions at the Duke of Richmond's theatre last year will allow, that this young nobleman discovered traits of dramatic excellence which would not have disgraced a veteran actor. The necessity of instilling the principles of eloquence among the rising generation cannot be too forcibly inculcated. Oratory is now the great pilot to fame. It is the most brilliant lustre which genius can receive. How many has it led to the Senate, the Cabinet, and the Seals! it laid the foundation of Chatham's political glory, and the laurels the patriot young Minister of the day has acquired from this most felicitous attribute, not only Great-Britain but all Europe must confess.

Though the orations of Cicero and Demosthenes are celebrated for their animation, perspicuity, and force, yet it will be allowed that in dramatic scenes alone we must look for that inspiration of character, sentiment, and impression, which can electrify those who see and behold. Garrick's greatest forte was manifested in the different and exact metamorphoses he could assume, and whether in Hamlet, Lear, or Richard, Garrick was not seen, but Lear, Hamlet, and Richard were the only objects that engaged the attention of his audience. Though it would be folly to assert that Mr Fector has reached that summit of theatrical fame our departed, but ever to be lamented, Roscius attained, yet those who have minutely observed his performance, will give him credit for the spirit and enthusiasm with which he enters into the character he represents. Nor is his attention ever diverted from the scene to the spectators—a compliment due to very few of those gentlemen who at present tread the stage. There are many nice touches derived from a critical examination of the author's text, which Mr Fector has yet to learn, which poor Henderson thoroughly understood, but, with nature all against him, could not happily express, and which few of the present race of actors discover.

Mr Fector's first performances took place in his father's house. For these few years past they have been exhibited where the Dover assemblies were formerly held, which building he purchased and fitted up with great taste, and at considerable expence. He generally issues 170 tickets of admission, and 190 have been present on more than one occasion. In his audiences he can boast of having been honoured with many distinguished characters, the female part thereof have been conspicuous for beauty and fashion, and generally compose a considerable majority. The assemblage might be truly compared to Cæsar's itself. In compliment to the founder of the theatre, many of the ladies have appeared in yellow ribbons. Whilst Mr Fector has such incentives to "Pursue the triumph, and partake the gale,

it is not to be imagined he will soon relinquish a part from which he has derived so much applause, and his guests so much real satisfaction. To the Queen of Taste the Dover Roscius has been most partial. He has only once made his bow to her Majesty, as will appear from the following list.

The Distressed Mother, and Barbarossa, performed at Dover in the month of January 1783.

Revenge, acted in Mr Fector's new theatre to an audience of 180, the prologue and epilogue written by Miss Mantell, Oct 30, 1783, and on Dec 16, the same play was repeated.

Tancred and Sigismunda, the prologue and epilogue by the same Lady, performed March 11, 1784.

Venice Preserved, prologue and epilogue written by Miss Burton, Oct 5, 1784.

Orphan of China, prologue and epilogue written by Mr Pratt, March 3, 1785.

Siege of Damascus, prologue by Mr Pratt, epilogue by Mr Jackson, performed Oct 13, 1785.

Zenobia, prologue by Mr Jackson, epilogue by Mr Pratt, Nov 24, 1785.

Roman Father, prologue by Mr Pratt, epilogue by Peter Pindar, Esq April 18, 1786.

Zara, prologue and epilogue by Mr Gillum, Dec 14, 1786.

Mahomet, prologue by Mr Gillum, epilogue by Capt Topham, March 5, 1787.

Matilda, prologue by Mr Pratt, epilogue by Mr Cobb, Dec 18, 1787.

Grecian, with a prologue by Mr Gillum and Device Is In Him, with an epilogue by the same, performed April 24, 1788.

Edward and Eleanora, prologue by Mr Pratt, epilogue by Mr Gillum, Nov 24, 1788.

Mr Fector required particular applause from his pathetic and animated style of delivering the last lines of this epilogue written at the time of his Majesty's unfortunate illness.

The Brothers, prologue by Mr Gillum, epilogue by Mrs Piozzi, was Mr Fector's last performance, and exhibited Feb 9, 1789.

At the dawning of the aerostatic age, Mr Fector ascended in France in the balloon of his friend the unfortunate Pilatre De Rozier, the fatal victim of Montgolfiering. A more convincing proof of the estimation in which our Dover Roscius is held among his friends cannot be adduced, than in the unsolicited, honourable, and spontaneous offer lately made to return him to the Representative in Parliament for his native town.

His exertions in behalf of his amiable friend Mr Pybus on that occasion, evinced that his zeal in the cause of merit and amicities is not exceeded even by his dramatic talents.

In person he is rather above the middle size, his countenance pensive, has great expression, the cast of his eye even now but described by those who have seen his performances, his voice is very powerful, and perfectly adapted to express the agitations of the Hero, and the tenderness of the Lover.

"Labor ipse voluptas" is the motto of Mr Fector's Theatre, the livery blue and orange, and the tout ensemble forms an elegant coup d'œil, which all must admit who have been honoured with the cards of the hospitable proprietor.

ANEC-

ANECDOTES of JOSEPH BARETTI

THE circumstances of the life of this writer, were they fully known, would, we are well assured, be both amusing and instructive. That his exertions in the cause of literature were useful, almost every Englishman who possesses any knowledge of the Italian language will bear testimony, and that some of his works are entertaining, we need refer only to his Travels and his Controversies. A full account of him would be very acceptable, but this being difficult, if not impossible at present, to obtain, we are reluctantly confined to the following anecdotes.

He was born at Turin * about the year 1716 † His father was an architect under Don Philip Invrea, the famous Sicilian, who left many specimens of his abilities in and about Turin ‡ From this parent he appears to have received a good education, and had some little property left him, which he tells us himself he gained away at play, by which means he was forced to have recourse to his wits, and thus turned author in spite of his teeth, as he phrases it, to keep them going ‖ To the early part of his life we are strangers, except that we learn from himself, that he had been employed two years at Cuneo assisting at the fortifications there, but left the place a few days before the siege of it by the combined powers of France and Spain commenced § This happened in the year 1744 What became of him after this period we are not informed, except that in 1748 he was at Venice a teacher of Italian to Fashionable gentlemen From circumstances scattered through his works we can collect, that he had travelled much, had experienced some vicissitudes of fortune, had encountered several difficulties, and at length, with little money in his pocket, with a very imperfect knowledge of the English tongue, and without any recommendations, he bent his course towards England, where he arrived in the year 1750, and where he continued to reside (with a short interval) during the rest of his life

A facility to acquire languages he possessed in a very extraordinary degree, and his perseverance was not inferior to his natural genius With these advantages he soon overcame those difficulties which stand in the way of a foreigner on his arrival in England In a short time he was sufficiently master of the English language to be enabled to write in it, and in 1759 published, what we apprehend to have been his first performance, 'A Defence of the Poetry of his native Country against the Censures of Voltaire,' who had treated it with too great contempt About the same time accident brought him acquainted with a person who was the means of introducing him to the notice of Dr Johnson, who to the end of his life regarded him with great esteem The origin of this intimacy, has been frequently mentioned by Mr Baretti to have happened in the following manner: Mrs Lennox, the authoress of "The Female Quixote," having an intention to publish a translation of the novels from whence Shakespeare had taken some of his plays, wished to acquire sufficient knowledge of the Italian language to enable her to execute the work with some degree of credit To accomplish this point Mr. Lennox, her husband, went to the Orange coffee house to learn of any foreigner who was desirous of improving himself in the English language, and by that means receive the same advantage as he should communicate Mr Baretti happened to be present when the enquiry was made, and eagerly accepted the offer After some time he was introduced to Dr Johnson An intimacy commenced between them which appears to have continued until nearly the end of Dr Johnson's life. The incident which occasioned the interruption of their friendship has been already related in Vol XII page 101

From the time of Mr Baretti's arrival in England he subsisted by teaching the Italian language, and by his writings, a list of which is to be found at the end of these anecdotes Through the means of Dr Johnson he was introduced to the family of Mr Thrale, in which he passed much of his time, and his employment of teacher, his lively conversation, and some musical qualifications, gave him access to the houses of persons of distinction As he possessed no income but what his industry enabled him to obtain, he was under the necessity of exerting himself, and his efforts were not unsuccessful What his avocations procured him his œconomy rendered sufficient, and he was never charged with meanness or servility By his writings he certainly procured both money and reputation, though he appears to have set but little value on his literary performances Very late in life he said, "Whatever I have written in the long course of my life was all done out of necessity rather than choice"—Again, "As want was incessantly pushing and pushing at my back, whatever I scribbled was always done in a most confounded hurry, and it is a miracle greater, I think, than St Anthony ever made, how I came to get bread and cheese and now and then a beef steak, by my ill chopt performances Conscious of the numberless and supreme faults and imperfections of all my poor doings that way, I wish now and to my sorrow I wish it in vain, that every page I have cut to the press in Italy or in England were at the bottom of the sea"—After this declaration, drawn "from the very core of my heart, I give you to know, I leave to massacre all my literary offspring"*

ORIGIN of the SUNDAY SCHOOL ESTABLISHMENT.

To the EDITOR of the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE

SIR,

HAVING by accident taken up your Magazine for November last, in which the world is still given to understand that the institution of Sunday Schools originated with Mr Raikes of Gloucester I am induced to-day by considerations of equity to solicit a place in your Magazine, in order to put this matter in its proper light

The intelligence conveyed through that publication imports, that Mr Raikes had himself formed a plan of instruction for the children of the poor, and then called upon the Curate of the parish afterwards to superintend his establishment, and mark the progress made by the children Now, Sir, this account by no means does justice to the character of distinguished benevolence in his parochial charge The following short state of facts will fully explain the origin of the Sunday School establishment

Mr Raikes one day mentioned to Mr Stock, the clergyman alluded to, a complaint he had just heard, from a person, respecting the disorderly behaviour of poor children on the Lord's day Upon this Mr Stock, who had himself founded Charity Schools in two parishes of which he had before been Curate, invited Mr Raikes to attend him into his parish, in order to adopt some mode of doing good to the children of the poor No previous plan had been concerted nothing was thought of, tending to the establishment of this nature, but what arose from the immediate suggestion of the moment, as they visited the houses of the poor As the complaint had been directed to the profanation of the Sabbath by the rude and riot of these untaught children, it readily occurred to these gentlemen, that proper persons should be sought for to keep them under their eye during a certain portion of the Sabbath, and that the hours of confinement should be employed in instructing them in the principles of christianity Idly therefore took the number of children, and having found as many instructors as were requisite, established two schools, immediately, for the resort of these children on the Sunday Rules were formed, by Mr Stock, for the conduct of the children; and the persons appointed to the management of the schools undertook the important charge Mr Stock thus took upon himself the superintendance, and Mr Raikes agreed to bear two thirds of the expence necessary to the support, and Mr Stock one-third

Such was the origin of Sunday Schools Whatever, therefore, may be the merit of Mr Raikes in this business, it is plain that he is not the SOLE FOUNDER, and that Mr Stock has a just, an equal share in the honour of this excellent institution

This account, Sir, I have several times heard from indisputable authority and have been well informed that Mr Raikes could not avoid, upon more occasions than one, acknowledging the justice of it

From a motive of impartiality, and a desire that the public should be acquainted with the real fact of the case, I request your insertion of this, and am,

SIR,
Your very humble Servant,
PLAIN TRUTH.

To

To CHARLES RUNNINGTON, Esq. Barrister at Law.

SIR,

ON a recent perusal of your edition of Sir Matthew Hale's History of the Common Law, I observed an egregious error, for my correction of which you will doubtless be obliged to me

In your annotations on the ninth Chapter (letter B) you observe, "At what "period the Britons were first called "Welsh, or from whence the word "Wallia is derived, is not, I believe, "any ascertained laborious may have "been the researches, and various, no "doubt, are the conjectures From what "ever origin the word may have been "derived, it is not, however, unreasonable to suppose, that it was at first a "term of reproach applied by the Saxons, "since the Welsh almost invariably denominate themselves Cymro"

Now, the etymon of the name is sufficiently obvious to preclude the necessity of laborious research, or hypothetical conjecture

When the Saxons conquered this Island, the few natives who escaped the general destruction retired to the mountainous country beyond the Severn, to which they gave the name, not of that which they had abandoned (for ever dear to them), but the generic one of their nation, Gall, which the Saxons, according to their practice, have changed into Wall, a letter peculiar to their vocabulary † Thus they who retired to the western extremity of the island, applied to the national name to their territory, preserving in which in their language, signifies (being the Latin, defertum, Cornish, Corn Gall, Cornwall, quasi

The truth of this may be illustrated by other examples About the time of Julius Cæsar the Germans made frequent incursions into Belgic Gall, from which they were separated by the Rhine; and as the Roman power declined, they got possession of the whole country, and the posterity of these men from that circumstance acquired the name of Walloons. About the 8th century, a colony of Galls established themselves in Dacia upon the Danube, and called their territory Gallacia, which the Teutonic people who surrounded them changed into Wallachia The Teutonic people on this side the Alps still call the Italians Welsh De la vient que les Germains au nord des Alpes appellent Wallath et par contraction Walsh le peuple qui fut leur frontiere habite l'ancienne Gaule Cisalpine et les Italiens en general *

Giraldus Cambr testifies that "Adulterino vocabulo usitatoque magis sed proprio minus, modernis diebus Wallia dicitur" And Wallis, literæ in g & w frequentissima est commutatio (Preface) And Spelman, Galli semper g utuntur pro Sax w † (Gloss verbo Garranire)

But the universal usage of the French nation, calling the Welsh Gales, and the Prince of that territory le Prince du Gale, were sufficient to supersede conjecture. For the etymology of Cymro, I would refer you to the Gentleman's Magazines of March and April 1788, under the title of "Observations on Pinkerton's Dissertation on the Goths of Scythians"

I have the honour to be, &c &c

LETTER XIII

Mr LOCKE to Dr MAPLETOFT.

DEARE SIR, Lyon, 8 Nov 78

IF all the world should goe to Rome I thinke I should never, haveing been twice firmely bent upon it, the time fet, the company agreed, and as many times defeated I came hither in all hast from Montpellier (from whence I writ to you) with the same designe but old father Winter, armed with all his snow and sleetes, keeps guard on Montsenny, and will not let me passe But since I cannot get over the hills, I desire your letters may not; they may now keepe their old road to Mr Charles's, where I hope in a few days to see and be acquainted with your friend Dr Bigden, and so having seen the winter over at Paris returne to you early in the spring Were I not accustomed to have fortune to dispose of me contrary to my designe and expectation, I should be very angry to be thus turnd out of my way when I imagined, myself almost at the suburbs of Rome, and made sure in a few days to mount the Capitol, and trace the footsteps of the Scipios and the Cesars, but I am made to know 'tis a bold thing to be projecting of things for to-morrow, and that it is fit such a slight buble as I am should let itself be carried at the phancy of winde and tide without pretending to direct its own motion? I thinke I shall learne to doe for hereafter this is the surest way to be at ease But hold, I forget you have quitted Galen for Plutarch, and 'tis a little too confident to talke philosophie to one who converses dayly with Xenophon I cannot tell how to blame your designe, but must confesse to you I like ouer calling the worse since you have quitted it, yet I hope it is not to make way for another, which, with more insolubile chaines, has greater cares and sollicitude accompanying it If it is not, you need be well prepard with philosophie; and you may find it not slux some time to take a dram of Tully de Consolatione. I cannot forbear to touch, e passant, the chapter of matrimony, which I tell you are still hankering after, but if ever you should chance for to be given up as to marry, and have other loving husbands tell your wife who may dislike you, that a case shall I be in? All my comfort is, that 'tis noe personal malice to the woman, and I am sure I have nothing but friendship for you, for I am, with sincerity,

Sir,

Your most affectionate humble servant,

J LOCKE.

The inclosed should have been sent from Montpelier, but I suppose it will doe well enough cold My service to our friend, and the rest of our friends, and amongst them to good Dr Witchcock, Mr Fowler, and Mr Fermin, when you see them, and all our Northumberland friends, particularly my Governesse, Mrs Beavis, and aske her what I shall doe with my Lady Bloy's gloves, since I shall not come over till Spring

LETTER IX

Mr ROBERT NELSON to Dr MAPLETOFT.

REVEREND SIR,

I WAS yesterday told that you were pleased to say in a public coffee-house, that I was slipt out of the way because I would not take the oaths I must confess I doubt the truth of it, and I am so well satisfied of your friendship, that 'tis not possible for me to imagine you designed me any hurt, if you should have chanced to have said any thing to that purpose. In times of public ferment the less one is mentioned the better. It was really a very bad cold that carried me into the country the latter end of February, though other reasons prevailed upon me to make a longer stay than I designed

I am, dear Sir,

Your most faithful humble servant,

ROBERT NELSON.

LETTER X

Mr ROBERT NELSON to Dr MAPLETOFT.

22 May, 1703.

REVEREND SIR,

THERE was no occasion to have given yourself the trouble of writing so long a letter I am very well satisfied you are my freind, and consequently that you are not capable of designing me the least mischief, but ready upon all opportunities to give me the testimony of your true affection. It is very probable the report I mentioned was founded upon the conversation you hint at, for when a story is repeated it generally either gets or loses circumstances. I must give men leave to think as they please, and provided I can keep a conscience void of offence, I am less sollicitous of their censures, for I must stand or fall at another tribunal, for which God prepare us.

I am, with great esteem and value,
Dear sir,
Your most faithful friend and servant,
R. NELSON.

My humble service to Dr Gastril and Mrs Gastril.

LETTER I.

Dr BARROW to Dr MAPLETOFT.

SIR,

I HOPE you are not so much mistaken as to suppose you left in my custody that parcell of bookes which I bought of you, and for which I pay'd sixe pounds to Mr Pulleyn, according to your order (the chiefe of which were Cuno his dictionary, a Plato, in imperfect Plutarch &c. Stephens' print). Of any other bookes of yours left with me I have neither knowledge, memory, nor footstep, excepting that I doubt of three small bookes, which are a Virgil and a Horace with Indexes, and a Greeke testament, Gr. and Lat. in octavo (with some notes of Beza), all which being out of keltred, I did conceive to be reminded, and the latter did give away to a friend, who beginninge to study Greek, desired such a one: the two former I have reason to thinke that I put to them, but being not thoroughly sure, I had rather wrong myselfe than you, and therefore, if you thinke good, shall be ready to make them good to you, although I confesse I am not willing to part with the bookes themselves. The other I find not in the catalogue of my bookes, and therefore believe that either you left it with me, or that it was overlooken when you removed your hampers and things from my chamber, and I shall make it good to you in specie or value, as you shall choose, although when I disposed of it I did not esteeme it worth consideration. I am certaine you left no other booke in my custody. I have parted with few bookes, though I have been so unwise as to purchase very many, and therefore if ever I had any of your bookes I am confident it is with me still, and if your memory doe suggest any that your doubt of, I will search for it; but I am well assured there never was any such. There are but few remaining here, I take it, of your old acquaintance, those that are, Mr Hawkins specially, and Mr Pulleyn, receive kindly and returne you salutes. So doth

Your assured friend and humble servant,
ISAAC BARROW.

SIR,

I HAVE frequently with great pleasure observed the readiness you have manifested to insert in your excellent publication every hint which has the most distant prospect of being serviceable to the community. Encouraged by that laudable disposition, I have ventured to trouble you with the result of an experiment I had an opportunity of making, which may perhaps assist in ascertaining the real utility of preparation by medicine for the Inoculated Small pox.

It has been my firm opinion ever since I had any acquaintance with the medical art, that in no instance has that art been of greater service to mankind than in the discovery and subsequent improvement of Inoculation for the Small pox. Though already convinced of the great utility of Inoculation, I have been much pleased to have that conviction strengthened by a Letter in your Magazine for last May, which gives an account of its remarkable success at Luton, in Bedfordshire. It is stated in that letter, that several of the patients who did well under the Inoculation neglected to take the preparative medicine, and even did not confine themselves to the regimen prescribed. The writer justly observes, that these are proofs of the little danger attending the disease when communicated in this manner. In the infancy of Inoculation in this country, the utmoſt circumſpection and care was employed with regard to preparation by medicine and diet, and yet the ſucceſs was not ſo remarkable under the regular and cautious practitioner, as under thoſe who were deemed inattentive, and branded with the opprobrious appellation of empirics

Sutton was the firſt, who, by a bold and deciſive practice, ſhook off the ſhackles which had hitherto confined the more regular Inoculator, and by forcing his patients into the open air, when the eruptive fever was upon them, inſured himſelf a ſucceſs almoſt miraculous, a ſucceſs long, but falſely attributed to ſome preparative noſtrum. A practice ſo novel, at leaſt in the extent to which Mr Sutton carried it, met with numerous oppoſers amongſt thoſe who called themſelves the regular practitioners. But to the honour of the medical art, a man, who is deſervedly conſidered at the head of this department of his profeſſion, was found to patronize an improvement, that appears to be a ſine qua non in Inoculation. Sutton, as far as I know, always gave ſome preparatory medicine, yet I am much inclined to believe it was often given to amuſe, than with an intent to produce any change in the conſtitution, or to influence the ſubſequent diſeaſe: at leaſt, I am certain this was the caſe with ſome of his pupils, whoſe practice had very great ſucceſs. The favourable termination of a number of caſes, where no preparatory medicine had been uſed, has induced many practitioners to entirely lay aſide every medicine of that kind, as at beſt uſeleſs †. Having often heard of the inutility of preparing by medicine perſons for Inoculation, I was determined the firſt opportunity to give it a trial. That opportunity occurred in February laſt. Being at that time engaged to inoculate 150 perſons, of various ages and conſtitutions, I give (without ſelection) to 50 of theſe the preparatory medicine, exactly as recommended by Baron Dimſdale*; and the remaining 100 had the diſeaſe without taking any medicine. From the minuteſt obſervations I was able to make, the only difference to be remarked was, that in the 50 the time of the eruptive fever's appearance after the inſertion of the variolous matter was not quite ſo certain, and in its duration not ſo regular, neither did the puſtules maturate ſo kindly as in thoſe who had not taken the preparatory medicine.

From this it ſhould appear, that the medicine had a tendency to diſturb the natural courſe of the diſeaſe. I ſay a tendency, becauſe the deviation from the natural progreſs of the diſeaſe was not ſo great (though ſufficiently evident) as to endanger the life of any of my patients. In regard to diet, and expoſure to the atmoſphere in all, the ſame precautions were obſerved with thoſe who took, and thoſe who did not take the medicine. The diſeaſe was equally mild in the 100 as in the 50, and the only apparent difference, as before obſerved, was a tendency to an anomalous appearance of the diſeaſe in thoſe who took the preparatory medicine. They all recovered. The reſult of this experiment is in favour of Inoculation without preparation by medicine, for thoſe who were not prepared in that way paſſed through the diſeaſe with as little inconvenience as thoſe who were; the diſeaſe was likewiſe in them more regular in its different ſtages, and the puſtules proceeded to maturation more kindly. I would have it underſtood, that what I mean by preparative medicine, is all given previous to the acceſſion of the eruptive fever, whether taken before or after the inſertion of the variolous matter.

The intention of the Hon. and Rev. Mr Stuart to perſuade the pariſh of Luton to adopt annual Inoculation, can never be enough praiſed, and it is to be wiſhed every Rector in the kingdom was influenced by the ſame ſpirit of humanity that dictates this gentleman's conduct. If annual Inoculations were adopted

* Baron Dimſdale

† The celebrated Profeſſor of Medicine at the Univerſity of Edinburgh ſays, "I cannot deny that mercurial and antimonial medicines may have ſome effect in determining to a more free perſpiration, and therefore may be of ſome uſe in preparing a perſon for the ſmall-pox; but there are many obſervations which render me doubtful as to their effects. The quantity of both theſe medicines, particularly the antimony, commonly employed, is too inconſiderable to produce any effect. It is true, that mercurials have been employed more freely, but even their ſalutary effects have not been evident, and their miſchievous effects have ſometimes appeared. I doubt therefore, upon the whole, if Inoculation derives any advantage from theſe pretended preparatory courſes of medicine." Cullen's Firſt Lines, 609.

throughout the kingdom, the effect produced would be nearly equal to an extermination of this dreadful disease But as long as conscientious scruples remain, and such scruples there will be as long as there are preachers to raise doubts and promulgate fatal errors amongst their ignorant hearers, such a useful regulation cannot take place in the extent every friend to society must wish The resistance Inoculation meets with from the pulpit, is at present I believe confined to the Dissenting Clergy But amongst them, the more enlightened are well-wishers to it, it is only those who from the plough, or the meanest mechanical employment, have become preachers, that decry its use But whilst such men have hearers, they will have the power to persuade numbers that Inoculation is a heinous sin This evil is not ideal, for the other day I had an opportunity of hearing a mechanic preach on the sin of Inoculation: by his discourse numbers of his illiterate hearers were persuaded to think on the subject as he did, and some of them, in consequence, fell victims to the natural disease The only probable method of restraining an evil which so materially affects the lives of mankind, is in the hands of the more enlightened teachers of the different religious sects with which this country abounds It is in their power only to give their illiterate fellow-labourers in the gospel harvest a true idea of the moral and religious nature of Inoculation

NUMBER VIII

——Ridentem dicere verum
Quid vetat? Hor.

I AM apprehensive that many of my Readers, after forming great expectations from my first Number, have become quite dissatisfied with my late labours, on account of that solemn tincture which has been spread over them

If this is really the case, my misfortune is great indeed, for my constitution is so whimsically peculiar, that if my inclinations prove perfectly disgusting to those around me, though all the rest of the creation should be dancing for joy, a chilly cold chagrin would seize all the powers of my heart, and the black clouds of melancholy spread themselves thick over my countenance—The smiling sunshine of friendly complacency alone with the power of warming the one and dispelling the other

Now, O reader (and how can'st thou art my Reader art thou not my friend? at least I consider myself as bound to thee in the cords of friendship!)—wherefore all that frown on thy forehead—that peevish accent from thy lips?—Look cheerfully forgiving—and I will tell thee why I have been thus long serious

In truth, though I at first promised a little occasional mirth at the returning follies and ridiculous fashions of the time, yet since the promise was made, fate thy has impelled me to retire from the world, and in that situation how could a man, uninspired, catch its manners?

But should this excuse be rejected, I can allege another Have we not for a considerable time been disturbed with fears for our amiable sovereign, and divided, like true Englishmen, by party-heats on the consequent state of the Government?—To have excited or indulged therefore a spirit of laughter at such a period, would have been highly reprehensible For did not even the facetious descendant of the poet of Thebes suffer his laughing Muse to take a serious nap, while he contemplated with lengthened visage and flowing eyes the distress of his King and Country?

For once then will I even bow the head to thee in gratitude, thou Power Ate revived, for dropping thy dreadful cry of sole-quil, that we might have time to compose our features and learn to weep, ere the sublimity of thy strains had entirely destroyed the feelings of humanity, and the reverence that is due to the powers ordained of GOD!

But now with seriousness we have nothing further to do—to laugh—to rejoice—, it seems, at present our whole business The great and the mighty have set the example Seriousness is banished from the palaces of Britain, and therefore

ſore in the lowly habitations of the poor ſhe dare not remain —And how is all this proved?—Why, our houſes have been artificially enlightened more than once, and we have been diſtracted for ſome time between the expectation of great ſights, and the delightful amuſement of giving the particulars to thoſe of our friends who were ſo unhappy as not to have been ſpectators of them Our Poets now ride their Pegaſus full gallop, in queſt of fame or penſions Our Parſons have racked their brains for fine periods, appoſite texts, and the extravagancies of panegyric, to ſhew their loyalty and religion

The rich have ſpent thouſands in ſhows that have left no effects behind them, and the lower orders of the people have reveled in intemperance, to ſhew their duty to their ſuperiors

"Happy Britain!" you cry, "What a "delightful country! the ſeat of happi"neſs! region of joy! favourite of "Heaven! fane of true religion! nurſe "of humanity!

Son of Thoughtleſsneſs, to heighten theſe thy raptures, enter with me into yonder cottage Behold the daughter of Sorrow weeping over her tender infants, ſerving for food —Art thou ſtartled at the affecting ſpectacle?—Do the ſounds of muſic, and the ſhouts of the rabble without, ceaſe to affect thee with pleaſure?—Let us repair from hence to yonder priſon, within whoſe gloomy walls happineſs never entered See that unhappy man ſtretched on the ſtraw, ſinking under the complicated weight of ſickneſs and diſtreſs, he is the huſband of that hapleſs female, and the father of thoſe ſtarving children we have juſt left.—Do you enquire why he groans thus under the iron rod of oppreſſion?—Becauſe Fortune, or rather Providence, hath with held from his induſtry the pittance of a few pounds.

Go, and compare this ſcene with the extravagant joy that reigns in our cities, towns, and villages, and if you think it becoming, join your riotous mirth to theirs

What a ſubject for laughter!

MEMOIRS of the late MARSHAL DE VAUX

NOEL DE JOURDAN DE VAUX, Count de Vaux, Baron de Rooke, &c &c Marſhal of France, Grand Croſs of the Royal and Military Order of St Louis, Governor of Thionville, Commander in Chief in the Province of the county of Burgundy, was born in 1705 He was of a younger branch of the family of Jourdan, a noble and ancient houſe of the Gevaudan, reduced to great poverty, and ſettled in Velay The anceſtors of Marſhal de Vaux demanded and obtained letters of nobility for military ſervices, about 220 years ago What kind of degradation obliged them to have recourſe to this method I not known, and the Marſhal, who valued nothing but perſonal merit, and whoſe own worth rendered it unneceſſary for him to wiſh to revive that of his anceſtors, never troubled himſelf about reinſtating his family in its ancient rights

Marſhal de Vaux began his military career at the age of nine ten, as Lieutenant in the regiment of Auvergne He ſerved in Italy at the ſieges of Pizzighitone and the Caſtle of Milan Made a Captain in 1734, he was preſent at the attack of the Caſtle of Colorno, and was wounded at the battles of Parma and Guaſtalla In 1738, he [illegible] his regiment to Corſica, and commanded at Corte in 1739, with a detachment of 200 men He was attacked in the Convent of Querſamuni by 2000 Corſicans, againſt whom he maintained his poſt, though he received two wounds in the action

The regiment of Auvergne having been ordered into Bohemia, in 1742 M de Vaux diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the defence of Prague He was detached with 800 men to the covered way of that place, from which he ſeveral times repulſed the enemy, nor did he quit it till the ſiege was finiſhed The proofs of courage and ability which he gave on this occaſion procured him the command of the regiment of Angoumois

In 1744, having on the ſtaff, he ſerved at the battle of Rocoux, and the ſieges of Menin, Ypres, Furnes, and Fribourg At moſt of theſe he was employed on ſeveral honourable and hazardous enterprizes He was alſo preſent at the battle of Fontenoy, and ſignalized himſelf at the ſieges of Tournay and Dendermonde With 1500 men he covered the ſiege of Oudenarde, of which place the King conferred on him the command, as a proof how well he was ſatisfied with his ſervices and zeal siege to Bruſſels, M de Vaux, under his command, was ſent at the head of 5000 men to make himſelf maſter of the paſs of the canal of Wilvorde. This he effected, taking upwards of 200 priſoners in the redoubts, and throwing a bridge over the canal. When the place was invested, he was detached to one of the ſuburbs, within two hundred paces of the ditch, and covered it with ſeveral redoubts. The zeal and talents diſplayed by M de Vaux at this ſiege, procured him the honour of being ſent by Marechal Saxe to announce the taking of the City to the King, who immediately made him a Brigadier.

When Marſhal Saxe intended to lay ſiege

In this quality he ſerved at the ſieges of the Citadel of Antwerp and of Namur, and at the battle of Rocoux. In 1747, he was charged with the inveſtment of Sas van Ghent. With 6000 men he made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions for commencing the ſiege, made himſelf maſter of a ſmall fort, and took 200 priſoners.

At the ſiege of Bergen-op-Zoom he was wounded by the burſting of a ſhell. Being detached to the village of Voulet, with the volunteers of Brittany, he was attacked by a corps of 10,000 men, whom he obliged to retreat, leaving 500 men dead on the field. As a reward for this action, he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Franche Comte.

In 1759 he was made Lieutenant-General, and ſent to take the command of the troops in Corſica. In 1760, being employed in the army of Marſhal Broglio, he was charged with the defence of Friedberg. Commanding the left column of the troops under the Count de Lutzce, he attacked the redoubts which covered the City of Caſſel, out of which he drove the enemy, and alſo out of the town. In Auguſt following, he was ordered to attack the rear-guard of a corps of 10,000 men, which he did with ſucceſs. Towards the end of this campaign he was entruſted with the command of Gottingen. This City being inveſted by Prince Ferdinand, he obliged him to raiſe the ſiege, making ſeveral ſallies on different bodies of troops poſted in the neighbouring villages, of whom he killed and took priſoners near 3000 men.

In 1763, being employed in Les Trois-Evechés, he was made Lieutenant Governor of that Province, and in 1764, Commander of the Order of St Louis.

M de Vaux returned to Corſica, as Commander in Chief, in 1769, and in three months ſubjected the whole Iſland. He was after wards employed ſucceſſively in the generalate of Paris, in the divisions of Provence and Alſatia, and in the Camp of Voſſieux.

In 1779 and 1780, he commanded the army aſſembled on the coaſts of Brittany and Normandy, and was afterwards appointed Commander in Chief of the County of Burgundy. Finally, he was rewarded with the dignity of Marſhal of France, which he had well deſerved by his courage and conduct, diſplayed in nineteen ſieges, ten engagements, and four battles.

Marſhal de Vaux died at Grenoble, the 14th of September 1788. If any thing could add luſtre to his life, it was that firmneſs of mind which enabled him to ſupport with courage and reſignation the ſlow approaches of a painful diſſolution, with which he was harraſſed for fifty three days, unattended with that 'pomp and circumſtance of glory, that hope of renown, which had ſo often led him to brave death.

M. de Vaux had never obtained, had never aſked any favours for his family. He was one of the few who think their ſervice amply rewarded. All he did was, when on his death bed he wrote to the firſt Miniſter of the war department, "M le Comte, I am extremely ill, if my taſk finiſh here, the Marchioneſs de Vauborel, my daughter, will recommend to you my relations." The greateſt part of the fortune left by the Marſhal was the fruit of his ſervices and œconomy.

A rigid diſciplinarian, ſtrict, but juſt and humane, the whole life of Marſhal de Vaux was an aſſemblage of military virtues, to which he continually added that rigid probity which failed not to procure him the profoundeſt eſteem with the army. The young ſoldier, whilſt he profited by his example, could not but feel encouragement at the rank to which he had arrived by his ſervices from that of a ſimple Lieutenant, at the ſame time his fortune, though moderate, proved, that the man who enters into the army is not neceſſarily ruined. Nothing perhaps affords a ſtronger conviction of his worth, than the regret felt at his loſs by the Province of Burgundy, which he governed, and by that of Dauphiny, where, when ſent thither under the moſt delicate circumſtances, he reconciled what he owed to the authority of the King, his maſter, with that moderation and prudence which were always the baſis of his conduct.

We muſt not quit him without an anecdote or two, which paint the man.

Three officers were brought before him accuſed of a ſerious tranſgreſſion. His firſt ſtep was to inquire whether they were young young "for," says he, "what is unpardonable in a man of a certain age may be passed over in a youth." After obtaining what information he could, he interrogated the officers themselves, and found them still more culpable than they had been represented to him. "Gentlemen," says he, then addressing himself to them with a stern air, "I perceive that you will oblige me to resume my wonted severity." At these words, thinking all was over with them, they fell on their knees, imploring his clemency. "No, gentlemen, your offence is of such a nature is must not be permitted to go unpunished. Retire to your quarters immediately, and return to me to-morrow morning, to learn what I shall have determined respecting you." The next morning, on quitting his chamber, he found them attending him, pale, dejected, and not daring to lift up their eyes. Going up to one of them, and clapping him on the shoulder, "You have spent a disagreeable night, says he with a smile. "I believe your apprehensions have punished you sufficiently, and that you will never again be in a similar situation. You shall all three dine with me to-day."

After having commanded the troops destined for the expedition which the Government had projected against England, Marshal de Vaux returned the command of those which were still kept assembled in Brittany, in 1781. At the end of the first month of this service the Treasurer of the army paid him the same sum as had been allowed him for his table the year before. "I have need but of half of it," says the Marshal, "I am no longer at the same expence," and immediately he wrote to the Minister to that purpose. The latter answered him, that he had laid his letter before the King, whose pleasure it was, that he should have the same allowance as before, as a testimony of the satisfaction he received from his services. "I cannot accept this mark of the King's bounty," replied the Marshal, "but it will be the sole order from his Majesty to which I shall not think it my duty to pay obedience."

An HISTORICAL and CRITICAL ACCOUNT of the celebrated CONTROVERSY between Mr DE CALONNE and Mr NECKER.

IN the year 1781 Mr Necker was dismissed from the office of Comptroller General of the French Finances. He had adopted the system of supporting the war, by means of loans, without any additional taxes, a system new, though popular among the vulgar, required, for the extraordinary expences of that single year, a loan of more than an hundred millions.

In order to obtain so large a sum, he brought forward, under the sanction of the royal approbation, a pompous account of the Public Receipts and Expenditure, the result of which exhibited an overplus of ten millions, which exactly paid the enormous interest of the new loan. His Compte Rendu, which was highly applauded, received the confidence of the people, which had begun to languish. In the midst of this temporary triumph, the Sieur Bourbulon, formerly a Commissary of the Treasure Royal, but at that time Treasurer to the Compte d'Artois, avowed himself the author of a publication impugning the accuracy of Mr Necker's calculations. Such however was the confidence placed by the multitude in the Compte Rendu, that a loan was opened and soon completed, the manager of interest being not less than eleven per cent. Mr Necker, after this encouraging success, [illegible] the month following to open another loan on the same plan, but at reduced interest, in which he failed.

It is reasonable to suppose that Mr de Fleurieu, who succeeded Necker in the office of Comptroller General, would inform the King, that the calculations on which Mr Necker had so amply provided, in speculation, for all the expences of 1781, were not to be depended on. We may conclude what must be the relief from which that did, from the anxiety he was under of employing extraordinary means of every kind, many of them to make up the deficiency for that year in the revenue. Mr Necker, notwithstanding these shifts, and by means multiplied on extraordinaries, has asserted, that, at the moment of his retiring from the ministry, he had left the Treasury in a flourishing condition, that the resources of the year were sufficient for all the expences of it, and the commencement of the first quarter in 1782. Mr de Calonne, in his reply to Mr. Necker, expresses a very just surprise at an allertion so contrary to facts, and at the same time of the loans in question, which he particularly enumerates. Mr Necker, on the other hand, imputes to Mr de Calonne an error of 167 millions in the account given by him of the 181 millions borrowed in 1781, since ſince the month of April And that no doubt may remain concerning the ſtate of the finances at the moment when he retired, he produces an exact copy of the Treaſury accounts on the 9th of May 1781, the day of his retirement, when they amounted nearly to 200 millions of livres

It is extremely ſingular and ſurpriſing that two Miniſters, both of them able and well informed, ſhould aſſert with equal poſitiveneſs, the one, that he had left the Royal Treaſury in the month of May 1781 in ſuch a ſtate of abundance, that there was not the leaſt occaſion for any new reſource either for the remainder of the year, or even for the beginning of the year following Mr de Calonne gives a particular account of theſe loans, agreeably to the ſtatement of them laid before the King Mr Necker, on the other hand, undertakes to prove, that there are, in that ſtatement, errors to the amount of 107 millions, and that, at the time of his reſignation, there were near 200 millions in the Treaſury If this could be proved, Mr Necker is in the right, but if the contrary can be proved, he is in the wrong It is on this point chiefly that the controverſy between theſe celebrated financiers and ſtateſmen turns It is impoſſible, in a ſketch of this kind, to enter minutely into a controverſy on which large volumes have already been written, and on which others may be written, for aught that has yet appeared, ad infinitum We ſhall content ourſelves with a few general obſervations, which may ſerve to give our readers ſome notion of the outlines of it, and to which ſide the truth at the preſent moment ſeems to incline.

Mr de Calonne clearly ſhews, that in the month of January 1782, he was under the neceſſity of opening a new loan, which was carried ſo far as 140 millions Even that ſum, he informs us, was not ſufficient for the expences of this year, ſo that he was obliged to make three other ſmall loans, the ſum total of which was from 15 to 16 millions This piece of information ſuggeſts an idea that may ſerve to clear up that confuſion in which the diſpute in queſtion is involved by the circumſtance that the loans were opened in one year, but completed only in another Let us throw the whole of the loans begun, completed, and employed in the public ſervice of both 1781 and 1782 into one maſs, and conſider this maſs as the general product of reſources found neceſſary, and appropriated to the ſervice of thoſe two years taken in conjunction.

The loans made by Mr Necker in January, February, and March 1781, inconteſtibly amount to 118 millions

The loans made in the ſame year by Mr de Fleury, to which Mr Necker makes the objection that they were completed only in 1782, amount in all to 72 millions

Without adding to this ſum the 70 millions ariſing from the extended loan of 1770, if we ſtrike a medium between the reſults of the memorials publiſhed by the oppoſite parties, we may carry about two-thirds of this ſum to the two firſt of the three years with which they are connected, 46 millions.

The loan of January 1782, with its extenſions, 140 millions

Other ſmall ſums, in the ſame year, mentioned in Mr de Calonne's general ſtatement, upwards of 15 millions

Finally, the increaſed anticipations of the revenues in 1781 and 1782, amount, according to Mr de Calonne, to 20 millions

The ſum total of all theſe 400 millions.

For the farther elucidation of this intricate matter, it is to be obſerved, that the Royal revenue of France is paid, before hand, by notes of hand on the Farmers-General, and by aſſignments on the Royal demeſnes, which the Miniſter of Finance may demand on the firſt month of every year Hence it may happen, that the Treaſury may abound in the ſigns of wealth, the receipts of a whole year, nay more than a year, and yet the ſtate be never the richer, nor the Miniſter be leſs embarraſſed Every thing depends on the nature of theſe ſigns or repreſentatives of money, the time when they become due, the certainty or uncertainty of their being paid, the period for which they are depoſited, and the different expedients employed to increaſe their number, when there is occaſion to give the Treaſury ſuch an air of opulence as may impoſe on the imaginations of thoſe not in the ſecret That recourſe was had to theſe expedients by Mr Necker, in order to reconcile multiplied loans with a plentiful treaſure, is ſufficiently proved by the avowed neceſſity of making one new loan after another

At the time when Mr de Calonne became Miniſter of Finance, namely, the month of November 1783, there was not in the treaſury ſo much as a ſingle crown, not a ſhadow of credit, and ſtill leſs any apparent poſſibility of defraying the moſt preſſing expences at the end of the current year, or of making any certain proviſion vision for that of the following. This Mr de Calonne maintained in his discourse in the Assembly of the Notables, in presence of the King; he maintained it in his Requête Justificative; he maintained it in his reply to Mr Necker; nor has he ever varied in the least in what he has asserted at all times on this subject. It also appears, by the accounts of 1783, and by those sent to the King at the commencement of 1784, that the deficiency at that period amounted to 80 millions; nor has this fact ever been denied. But it was objected to the Minister, that he did not declare this situation of affairs, the moment he discovered its existence, and the Parliament of Paris became his opponents on an alledged charge that he was at variance with himself, as the preambles to the edicts of 1784 and 1785 announced nothing but order in the Finances, and certain deliverance from the public debt.

In answer to this charge, Mr de Calonne observes, that it was necessary to ascertain the real covenants, and also to discharge the public debts, before discovering the enormity of them mass, because it was impossible to discharge them without the aid of credit, which a premature discovery of the deplorable situation of the finances must destroy. On this principle he directed the discovery till the 4th year of his Administration, when he made it with much courage.

If this was the real motive of Mr de Calonne's conduct, his country ought rather to think than to blame him for his delay. That this was in reality his motive, he relates highly probable, and on this ground he explains much of what might otherwise appear suspicious in the measure of his Administration.

Mr de Calonne, in the assembly of the Notables and presence of the King, declared, that at the accession of his Majesty to the Throne there was a considerable deficiency in the public revenue, which, from the exigencies of the war, had continued to increase from 1776 to 1781. In a Committee of the Notables, at which the king's eldest brother, who is distinguished, by way of eminence, by the title of Monsieur, presided, the Compte Rendu of Mr Necker was produced, in contradiction of the position maintained by Mr de Calonne. The Minister in those circumstances declared, that on a strict examination of the Compte Rendu of Mr Necker, he had found that in the effective revenue of 1781, all extraordinaries being out of the question, instead of an overplus of 10 millions, there was a deficiency of more than 46 millions; and that, on the whole, the sum that the real and effective revenue was under that at which it had been reckoned by Mr. Necker, was not less than 56 millions 529 thousand livres. This is the point where the celebrated controversy began between Mr de Calonne and Mr Necker. This last gentleman, in April 1787, complained warmly of Mr de Calonne in a printed publication, and endeavoured, by many arguments and calculations, to support the credit of the Compte Rendu, which, especially in minds habituated to calculation and finance, was not a little shaken. Mr de Calonne, in another publication, takes a comparative review of the public revenue and expenditure, as stated in the Compte Rendu and of the real and effective revenue and total expenditure. The vouchers of the facts alledged are annexed. Where they correspond, they are placed together in one; where they differ, the reasons of their difference are detailed at length. On the justness or unjustness of this comparative view, as is allowed on all hands, the issue of the controversy wholly depends. If the difference between the two accounts be as wide, or nearly as wide as Mr de Calonne pretends, then the dispute on the whole must be determined in his favour. If, on the contrary, Mr Necker can reconcile the difference between them, then the victory is his. This is a matter which is no more in our province to decide.

If however it were to be decided, not by the States General of France, or the more unerring exploration of time, and the eye of the world, but by the very acknowledgment candidly made by Mr Necker, the advantage would never be controvertibly in favour of Mr de Calonne.

Mr Necker, after examining the whole of Mr de Calonne's comparative view, article by article, admits them almost, with the exception of a few, which he disputes, to the amount in all of about six millions. He allows that the difference between the Compte Rendu and the effective revenue is fairly stated, but for that difference he undertakes to give reasons. But to account for the difference between any two objects, is to confirm the reality of its existence. The certificates of the Receivers general in support of the explanations of Mr Necker, prove the existence of the object which requires them.

This observation, the truth of which cannot possibly be contested, recurs to the reader of Mr Necker's Instructions of the Compte Rendu, again and again, and marks an impression of something that is vain and nugatory. What was it, that Mr Necker explains the cause why the expences of such and such a year exceeded the rate at which he had fixed them? His reasons may be good, but they do not disprove the difference in dispute. On the contrary, they confirm it. This important observation can not be too often repeated. To insist and dwell, as Mr Necker does, on the subject of giving reasons for the alledged difference between the effective account and the Compte Rendu, what is this, but to confess that it exists? and that Mr de Calonne was correct, when he maintained that it existed?

But Mr Necker pleads, that the Compte Rendu in 1781 had no relation to the accounts of any single year, and therefore, that it is unfair to bring it into close comparison with any effective account. What then is it good for? Why bring it forward on the eve of new loans? Ought a statement of revenue and expenditure to be held up to the holders of money as a security for their property which is merely speculative? which is not applicable to any fixed and determined era? which has never been, and never will be realized in any one year, past, present, or to come?

If, however, Mr Necker has failed in what he undertook relating to the French finances, he has, perhaps done the French nation and the world more essential service than that which he had engaged to perform, by diffusing a spirit of inquiry and liberty, and preparing the way for a revolution in the French government.

"There is a propensity in some to communicate their thoughts without any view at all."

SHENSTONE.

WHY this may be very true, Mr Shenstone, and perhaps in no case more so than in the present, for certainly I do write without the least visible tendency towards either good, bad, or indifferent. Not but what I sincerely wish well to virtue, and sincerely despise vice, which, had I no other proofs to bring, the late Inverted Society of my third Heteroclite would, I trust, sufficiently testify. But tout this is not quite moral connection between what I term or deny, what I applaud or condemn, I do readily admit it, were I not to admit, the Critical Review incorrect and ill-founded as my last illustrations in it was would be apt to contradict. Yet notwithstanding all these impediments, which by an exceeding scrupulous address I could and resolutely may, I trust, surely encounter be alledged, if I now and then chance to, it may be, thunder into the right path, or at least endeavour, though by [illegible] means in the world, to point others the same way, am I not, may, even Shenstone in some small measure, culpable to the welfare of my fellow-creatures?—What though I may not, with certain contemporary fame-cribbing OBSERVERS, mark out a little straight regular line, and be extremely circumspect how I deviate from that line, how by any sudden and vehement exaltation of spirits I step the little of an atom either above or below it, does this hinder me from being in my sphere of eccentricity, what they have in vain sought to be in the habit of useful perversity, universally admired by all the virtuous gods and goddesses of antiquity? If the World will not do me justice, I will do justice to myself. How inadequate, how very inadequate, the word would is! Oh! that any one could look into my soul, which is almost the same thing, the free agency being at least much greater than is suspected, could be transfused, gentle reader, into thy corporeal vision—then couldst thou give a guess at what more thou canst not possibly have any conception of. Thou wouldst there see "GORGONS, AND HYDRAS, AND CHIMERAS DIRE," perceptions hovering above the whole skies, diving beneath the deeps, flitting through the azure fields of air, penetrating the Sanctum Sanctorum of philosophers, poets, legislators, statesmen, chymists, alchymists &c. &c. &c. But alas, gentle reader! (and much is the pity) these sublime sensations are denied thee. Endowed with the mere sober faculties of distinguishing between the known objects of reason and common sense, all thou canst do is, to admire in silence, or, if thou hast so much fire in an humid, in silence to emphatize, while, for me, it remains but to exclaim with the Poet, "When a man's verses cannot be "understood, nor a man's good wit ex-"counded with the to wit child Understanding, it strikes a man more dead, "than a great reckoning in a little room."

* To my fair readers this expression will require no explanation: and as for my wise, my grave readers, they may possibly [illegible] investigation [illegible] child events

But to business ——'Living for a long time fancied myself a great being, and like most great Beings capable of most anything, having heard of the fame of that most great of all Poets Pindar, I (from whose Iliads (profanation, however, may I ever be defended) and emulous thoughts my little mark should it, if there be a publish'd,—a tedious dull one, partake the triumph, &c. &c.—I have, and for the consolation of the yellow-seed tribe, with no little pain of the penner of them, be it remembered, I ruthlessly cut up what I presume to call, and what certain gentlemen have, with this fine thought upon lyric poetry cannot otherwise term, A GENUINE PINDARIC ODE, which I shall present to my readers with a degree of satisfaction superior to the most——For the most what——Why, I know not. Could I have got through with the sentence, assuredly it would have been a most beautifully finish'd period. Be it, however, premised, that I request this said Ode may be criticised only by those chosen few to whom it is suitable, for dazzled by the brilliancy of my own conceptions, I am not unfrequently obliged, as it were, to retire within myself, consequently, in such a case no battle, even Cannæ herself, should throw me from my equilibrium. And let it not grieve the gigantic man of science, that I, a poet unknown, should thus dare to enter the lists of encomium with, with veterans who have therein performed wonders,—veterans who have astonished? Astonishment itself. No, gigantic man of science! thou shalt not weep and lament, for believe me, thou shalt find, that I am but, at best, a puny rival.

A LYRIC ODE,

ADDRESSED TO THOSE WHO CAN COMPREHEND IT.

GOOD folks! of all things upon earth,
To which the poet's mental brain gives birth,
(And few things are there upon earth
To which his brain does not give birth)
I think of all the worst,

Well, as I hope my fancied fame to save,
In sooth, I know not how I must begin.

It well behove to be aware
Of every little pimping, whining Would-be,

To the EDITOR of the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE.

SIR,

IN reading The Lounger, a work (written after the manner of the Spectator) which was published two or three years since at Edinburgh, I met with one paper which, I think, does not poſſeſs an equal ſhare of candour with the reſt. It is a Critique on Rowe's Tragedy of The Fair Penitent, and as the periodical publication of the Lounger no longer exiſts, I hope you will indulge me in my attempt to vindicate ſome paſſages, the objections to which, in my opinion, carry no great weight with them. I only wiſh to point out theſe aſſertions of His Strictures (for ſuch is the ſignature to the critique), which, I conceive, have more aſſertion than truth and preciſion in them. Speaking of the characters he ſays, that of "Horatio diſguſts us by its inſipidity, that Sciolto is the moſt intereſting as well as moſt perfect character of the piece, and that the character of Lavinia is extremely inſipid, and ſo much the leſs allowed, for that ſhe is quite unneceſſary, her preſence ſerving only to introduce two dull ſcenes of conjugal endearment between her and her huſband, &c."—I have quoted finely the writer's own words. That Altamont is rather in the back ground of the picture we are ready to allow, from the leaſt ſtrength that is given to Horatio, Calliſto, and we may add Sciolto he muſt be ſo, but ſtill a man, who,

"When ſentence of the cruel law ſhould ſeize
"His father's venerable corpſe to reſt in earth,
"Had given himſelf a ranſom for his tears, &c.

can never, in the eye of goodneſs, be inſignificant. 'Tis true, his not being preſented on the ſtage, which induces Hortenſius to obſerve, that "the encomium by his friend makes him no favourite with the ſpectator." This I beg leave to contradict, for, let us ſuppoſe ourſelves totally ignorant of the piece, and ſeated at the firſt repreſentation of it, would not this account of Altamont's filial piety (carried to the extreme, that is, even after death) make him immediately a favourite with the ſpectator? Once again, his courage we have not the leaſt reaſon to call in queſtion—far from it—in the play he gives proofs of it, and mankind ſeem generally to allow, that the poſſeſſion of this quality alone, though it may not take away from the weakneſſes of a character, does largely from the inſignificance of it. He is deſpiſed too for accepting the hand on ſuch mortifying conditions" as we read in the play. He is even taxed with puſillanimity for it, but in my opinion, Miſs Hortenſius very undeſervedly. Has Altamont the leaſt room to ſuſpect that Calliſta is attached to any other, much leſs to Lothario? of whom all he could know was, that he had offered himſelf to Calliſta, and had been immediately rejected by her father. He obſerves, indeed, that Calliſta appeared at the idea of being united to him, and previous to the marriage, honourably mentions the circumſtance to Sciolto. What is Sciolto's reply? Why, that it is merely ——"the courage of her ſex,

"One of the common arts they practiſe, &c.

To come to Sciolto. We readily grant that there are many amiable traits in his character that conciliate our eſteem, and, conſequently, intereſt our feelings, but we think that of Horatio in the perfection, and therefore more reſpectable than his. We ourſelves feel that Horatio is grateful to his benefactor, faithful to his friend, virtuous, prudent, courageous, and an affectionate huſband. The acculation againſt him for his not immediately forgiving Altamont is trivial indeed when it is remembered, that he received a blow from, and had his life attacked by, the very man towards whom he was acting in the moſt generous manner.

The objection we have to Sciolto is, his talking in ſo looſe a ſtyle concerning woman-kind, in his firſt ſcene, in which, as his own daughter is the object, there is a groſs indelicacy, it reſembles more the language of a libertine, than that of a man venerable from his years and virtues; and laſtly, the cool, deliberate reſolution of murdering his daughter (for however he may have been deceived in her, what other attempt he juſtification of his fixed determination to revenge himſelf on her for her imprudence, by ſavagely ſlaughtering her? Need I add, that Horatio was obviouſly meant by the author to ſtand foremoſt in his piece? (and perhaps the judgment of Rowe was, at leaſt, equal to that of Hortenſius) not indeed was Sciolto ever looked upon as higher than a third-rate part, until the exquiſite performance of Powel gave it a conſequence till then unknown.

With

With reſpect to Lavinia, it muſt be allowed, that ſhe does not attract the attention of the audience ſo much as Calliſta, but muſt it follow that ſhe is therefore quite unneceſſary? It is eaſy to aſſert, but often found difficult to prove the aſſertion, and altho ſic pro ratione voluntas may do very well in diſpute more uſeful, Engliſhmen do not ſo implicitly ſubmit to it. After all, what is his great objection to Lavinia? Truly, that "her preſence ſerves only to introduce two dull ſcenes of conjugal tenderneſs." But, perhaps, however, many will think a relief from the vicious intercourſe between Lothario and Calliſta, to be given them in a ſcene of conjugal tenderneſs, that have virtue for its baſis, without the leaſt fault at any rate, I will not do ſuch injuſtice to mankind, as to ſuppoſe that the generality of them would prefer vice to dull virtue, ſuppoſing for a moment that were the caſe the contrary, however, is the fact, for in the regions of the drama few conjugal ſcenes will be found better written.

But is Thettricus ignorant of the wonderful effect that is produced by contraſt? If he is however, moſt of our beſt writers in every claſs are not and was it for this only, Lavinia is not unneceſſary, for were it poſſible to repreſent the piece one night without her, the ſpectators would ſoon perceive the loſs they had ſuſtained.

I will here leave to conclude with remarking, "that a writer ought to be fully convinced of the ſtrength of his forces, and of the ſize of his commons, before he attempts to write criticiſms on ſuch an author as Rowe."

For MAY, 1789.

Quid ſit turpe, quid utile, quid dulce, quid non.

A Voyage round the World, but more particularly to the North Weſt Coaſt of America, performed in 1785, 1786, 1787 and 1788, in the King George and Queen Charlotte, Captains Portlock and Dixon. By Captain George Dixon, 4to. 11 ſh. bound. Goulding.

IN our laſt we gave the Letter writer's account of the inhabitants, &c. of Prince Mary's iſle, to which we ſhall add his deſcription of their burying-place:

"When we came into this harbour, on the 23d of May, our attention was a good deal engaged by the ſight of a number of white rails on a level piece of ground, not far from the creek, which I have already obſerved was ſituated to the ſouthward of us. Theſe rails were about a mile and half from the veſſel, and planned, in that diſtance, to be conſtructed with ſuch order and regularity, that we concluded them beyond the reach of Indian contrivance, and conſequently that they were erected by ſome civilized nation. Captain Dixon, willing to be ſatisfied in this particular, took an opportunity of going to the ſpot, and, to his great ſurpriſe, found it to be a kind of burying-place, if I may be allowed to call that ſo, where dead bodies are not depoſited in the earth.

The manner in which they diſpoſe of their dead is very remarkable: they ſeparate the head from the body, and wrapping them in furs, the head is put into a ſquare box, the body into a kind of oblong cheſt. At each end of the cheſt which contains the body, a thick pole, about ten feet long, is drove into the earth in a ſlanting poſition ſo that the upper ends meet together, and are very firmly laſhed with a kind of rope prepared for the purpoſe. About two feet from the top of this arch, a ſmall piece of timber goes acroſs, and is very neatly fixed to each pole: on this piece of timber the box which contains the head is fixed, and very ſtrongly ſecured with rope. The box is frequently decorated with two or three rows of ſmall ſhells, and ſometimes teeth, which are let into the wood with great neatneſs and ingenuity, and as an additional ornament, is painted with a variety of colours, but the poles are uniformly painted painted white Sometimes these poles are fixed upright in the earth, and on each side the body, but the head is always secured in the position already described What ceremony is used by these people in depositing their dead in this manner, we never could learn, as nothing of the kind happened during our stay in the harbour."

Our voyagers departed from this place on the 4th of June, and on the 12th anchored in an harbour, to which Capt Dixon gave the name of Norfolk Sound, situated in 57 deg 3 min N Lat and 135 deg 36 min W Long "The shore here, in common with the rest of the coast, abounds with pines there is also greater quantities of the witch-hazle here than we had hitherto met with We found various kinds of flowering trees and shrubs, amongst which were wild gooseberries, currants and rasberries wild parsley is found here in great plenty; we pick'd great quantities of it, and it eat excellently, either as a salad or boiled amongst soup The saranne, or wild lily root, grows here in great plenty The number of inhabitants here are conjectured by the Letter-writer to be about 450, and he says, that "In their shape, make, and features, they resemble pretty much the same with those in Port Mulgrave, their faces are also painted with a variety of colours the women too, for ornament, or rather distinction wear the same manner as I have already described, and it should seem that the female who is ornamented with the largest piece of wood, is generally most respected by her friends, and by the community in general This curious operation of cutting the under lip of the female never takes place during their infancy but, from every observation I was able to make, seems confined to a peculiar period of life When the girls arrive to the age of fourteen or fifteen, the centre of the under lip, in the thick part near the mouth, is simply perforated, and a piece of copper wire introduced, to prevent the aperture from closing, the aperture afterwards is lengthened, from time to time, in a line parallel with the mouth, and the wooden ornaments are enlarged in proportion, till they are frequently increased to three, or even four inches in length, and nearly as wide; but this generally happens when the matron is advanced in years, and consequently the muscles are relaxed, so that possibly old age may obtain greater respect than this very singular ornament"

"I was one day," says our author, "endeavouring to get the meaning of some words in their language from one of the chiefs; and on pointing to the sun he took great pains to make me understand, that notwithstanding our apparent superiority in possessing various useful articles which they did not, yet their origin was the same with theirs; that they came from above as well as we, and that the sun animated and kept alive every creature in the universe"

Our traders' success at this place was by far the greatest they had hitherto met with, both as to the quantity and quality of the furs they bought They sailed from thence the 23d of June, and the next day discovered an harbour, named by them Port Banks, in Lat. 56 deg 35 min N and 135 deg W Long But though they kept plying along the coast, they found no opportunity of trading till the 2d of July, when they discovered a bay, which they called Cloak Bay, on account of the number of cloaks which they purchased there

"These cloaks generally consist of three good sea-otter skins, one of which is cut in two pieces, afterwards they are neatly sewed together, so as to form a square, and are closely sewed about the shoulders with small leather strings fastened on each side"

On the 7th of July they discovered a small island called by them Lisburne Island, the inhabitants of which seemed to be in number about thirty-six from whom they purchased a considerable quantity of excellent cloaks On the 9th they were visited by five trading canoes, "amongst whom were a few women, who all seemed pretty well advanced in years, their under lip ornamented in the same manner as those of the women at Port Mulgrave and Norfolk Sound, and the pieces of wood were particularly large On of these lip-pieces appearing to be peculiarly ornamented, Captain Dixon wished to purchase it, and offered the old woman to whom it belonged a hatchet, toys, buttons, and several other articles were afterwards shewn to her, and as constantly refused On Captain Dixon's beginning to despair of making his wished for purchase, and had nearly given it up, when one of our people happening to shew the old lady a few buttons which looked remarkably bright, she eagerly embraced the offer, and was now altogether as ready to part with her ear ornament, as before she was desirous of keeping it This curious lip-piece measured three and seven eighth inches long, and two and five-eighth inches in the widest part; it was inlaid with a small pearly shell, round which was a rim of copper."

The 28th of July being entered into the Straits which divide these islands from the Continent, with an intention of circumnavigating them, "the tide setting from that land which we supposed to be the Continent, it frequently drove large patches of sea weed, long grass, and pieces of wood by the vessel, which made us conclude but there is a large river setting out from that part of the coast. The river called Los Reys by Du Fonte, is near this place, and though what he say about it is almost incredible, yet from the above circumstance it appears very probable, that there are deep inlets into the country, and it is to be lamented, that we had not an opportunity of examining that part of the coast. And much do we lament it also, since from this it highly probable that the account given in Du Fonte's Letter is true, notwithstanding it has been hitherto deemed spurious.

On this side the islands their trade was much superior than they had met with before; but the time appointed for rejoining the King George being nearly elapsed, Capt. Dixon altered his mind with respect to sailing round his newly-discovered islands, and accordingly on the 31st stood to the S. E. and on the 3d of August they were entirely clear of the islands. As these form the chief discovery made in this voyage, we shall extract some particulars from our author's concluding account of them.—"Queen Charlotte's Islands are situated from 51 deg. 42 min. to 54 deg. 24 min. N. Lat. and from 130 deg. to 133 deg. 30 min. W. Long. The land in some places is considerably elevated, but not mountainous, and is totally covered with pines, which in many places afford a pleasing contrast to the snow that perpetually covers the highest grounds. The weather, whilst we were cruizing here, was generally mild and temperate, the mean of the thermometer 54 deg."—"It was on the 24th of July when the natives visited us, principally through curiosity, that a chief and his wife were very desirous to see the ship. Captain Dixon, willing to gratify them in this particular, and thinking that a sight of the vessel would be a standing subject for them to talk about, permitted them to come on board; they had a little child along with them, of which they seemed particularly fond, and not caring to trust it with the people in their canoe, the chief came on board by himself, leaving their tender charge with his wife. When the poor fellow first came on deck, he was a good deal frightened, and began singing, and to make a number of humiliating gestures, the intent of which was to impress us with a favourable opinion of him. By degrees he grew easy, and was prevailed upon to go down into the cabin; having staid there some time, he came upon deck, and after satisfying his curiosity with looking at various things, went into his canoe very well pleased. The woman, after giving her infant a maternal kiss, came over the side without the least hesitation, and when she got on the quarter deck gave us to understand that she was only come to see the vessel, and with a modest diffidence in her looks endeavoured to beg leave and permission for that purpose. She was neatly dressed after their fashion, her under garment, which was made of fine tanned leather, fit close to her body, and reached from her neck to the calf of her leg; her cloak or upper garment was rather coarser, and sat loose like a petticoat, and tied with leather strings. Having taken notice of every thing which seemed to attract her attention, Capt. Dixon made her a present of a string of beads for an ornament to each ear, and a number of buttons, with which she was highly pleased, and made her acknowledgements in the best manner she was able. She was scarcely got into the canoe before a number of women flocked about her, and seeing the beads in her ears, began to talk very earnestly, most probably to tax her with inconstancy, for she immediately clasped her infant to her breast with unspeakable fondness, burst into a flood of tears, and it was a considerable time before the soothings of her husband and the apologies of her friends could bring back her former cheerfulness and tranquillity. Harmony being at length restored in the canoe, the chief held up his child, and endeavoured to make us sensible that it was equally dear to him as his wife, intimating at the same time, that though he had received no present, yet he hoped we should remember his little one; on this Capt. Dixon gave the child a couple of toys, which pleased the chief wonderfully, a few buttons were also distributed amongst the other women in the canoe, and they left us soon afterwards, perfectly satisfied with their presents." Conſiderations upon Wit and Morals Tranſlated from the French. 8vo 6s. boards. Robinſons.

OF the various kinds of literary compoſition which eminently tend to amuſe the fancy, intereſt the heart, and improve the mind, there is no one, perhaps, in which theſe three great qualities are more frequently united than that which has for its object a developement of the human character as it exiſts in a ſtate of ſociety The deep diſguiſe under which the ſubject lies concealed, precludes the poſſibility of demonſtration, and forces the obſerver to maintain his opinions upon the airy baſis of ingenious conjecture, or by a lively deſcription of the effect and progreſs of the paſſions: but if his conjectures be rational and his deſcriptions true, the inferences which reſult muſt be not only entertaining but uſeful; for knowledge cannot be more intereſting or important than when it furniſhes mankind with opportunities of detecting the real nature, diſpoſition, and character of the ſpecies As an inſtance of the firſt quality, we gave in our Review for March an extract from the preſent work, reſpecting the author's notions of Wit, and as a proof of the ſecond, we ſhall now preſent our readers with his obſervations "Of Women and Gallantry," and conclude by his deſcriptions of the Characters of "A Man of Accommodation—A vain and perſonal Man—and a Man of Mediocrity"

"He who has been loved by a delicate, affectionate and ſenſible woman, and one endowed with exquiſite ſenſibility, has enjoyed the moſt delicious pleaſure which life affords

"Woman is leſs perſonal than man; ſhe ſpeaks leſs of herſelf than of her lover, man ſpeaks more of himſelf than of his amour, and of his amour than of his miſtreſs

"What greater happineſs can the imagination offer to a man than the ſociety of a being whoſe ambition is to pleaſe him, whoſe pleaſure is in a certain reſiſtance, and whoſe happineſs is in yielding, who pretends to be eſteem by combating, and to loſe it by defeat

"A woman among ſavages is a beaſt of burden, in the Eaſt a piece of furniture, and in Europe a ſpoiled child

"More women have fallen by vanity than by inclination and ſenſual deſires in intercourſe where perſonal advantages are to determine, rank, dignities and grandeur incline the balance Succeſs may in general be expected with women by deſcending a degree the prince with women of quality, and the lord with the wives of profeſſional men, or thoſe of financiers * Women of ſenſibility are not ſeduced by theſe advantages

"There are women celebrated by their gallantry, who have never had an equal for a lover A man of their own rank, with all the advantages of mind and perſon, would in vain aſpire to pleaſe them; dignities, titles and decorations are neceſſary for the ſpeedy turn of their reputation A huſband ſaid to his wife, I permit you to intrigue with every body except princes and lackeys He was right, the two extremes diſhonour by the ſcandal which accompanies them.

"Men who hold great places, and thoſe who have diſtinguiſhed appointments in provinces, find many women leſs ſcrupulous than they would be to men of inferior rank Vanity has its influence in every thing †, even in the moſt lively pleaſures how greatly are the ſenſes of women indebted to this paſſion ‡

"I am of opinion that women of gallantry may be thus appreciated In a hundred there are ninety who are determined by ſplendour, exterior appearance, faſhion, intereſt, idleneſs, or the want of ſomething to engage their attention; ſix by ſenſibility, and four who are governed by impetuous paſſions

"Praiſe, admire, be aſtoniſhed in ecſtacy, and fear not to carry flattery and enthuſiaſm too far with women, make her from whom you wiſh to obtain condeſcenſion believe, if you can, that ſhe is a particular being, nearer to an angel than to a woman. You will be believed—what do I ſay? You will not have created an illuſion as ſtrong as that of her ſelf-love, and nothing can be refuſed a man endowed with ſuch exquiſite diſcernment.

"How many ſtrange things does a woman, who had appeared relieved, reveal to her lover when once ſhe has made him happy! How many times has ſhe been upon the point of yielding! What knowledge does ſhe poſſeſs of the moſt ſecret myſteries of love! She is no ſtranger even to the tongue of debauchery. Love is the whole employment, the ſole concern of woman. Nothing eſcapes their active and penetrating curioſity.

"It ſeems to be permitted to treat women more lightly in proportion to their elevation. The woman in the city attaches more conſideration to polite attention, becauſe by her ſituation ſhe has leſs right to expect it. The rank of a woman of quality is too decided to leave her the leaſt inquietude upon that which is due to her. She receives pleaſure even from a momentary forgetfulneſs in others of who ſhe is, and this to her is another proof of the exceſs of paſſion and ardour of deſire.

"There is a degree of diſorderly conduct and wickedneſs in gallantry, which can nowhere be met with but in the perſon of a woman of elevated rank. She knows that audacity aſtoniſhes, and that there is nothing which a woman of ſup rior underſtanding, added to high birth, may not riſk. But woe to the woman in the city who ſhould wiſh to follow her ſteps, ſhe would fall in to the mire of public contempt.

"Violent men ſubjugate women as ſoon as they have obtained their favours. Theſe love to be governed becauſe they have ſelf-love, which, joined to the timidity of their ſex, makes them find a certain pleaſure in the fear produced by new emotions, moreover, they attribute violence to an exceſs of paſſion. Thus they return to the ſituation wherein nature had placed them, in a ſubmiſſion to the will of man.

"The ſureſt means of being loved by a woman is not to diſcover to her your whole affection. She muſt be made to fear and deſire, and to believe ſhe has a rival which will excite her ſelf-love and make her hope for a triumph.

"The moſt intimate friend of a woman is not half ſo much beloved as the confidante of her amour.

"The ſoft intercourſe of a quarter of an hour between two perſons of different ſexes, and who have, I will not ſay an affection, but a mutual inclination for each other, eſtabliſhes a confidence and a tender intereſt which ten years of the warmeſt friendſhip has never yet produced.

"In moſt connections decorated with the name of love, the man is in general more ſincere than the woman, becauſe he has always deſires if he has not ſentiments. The woman frequently yields without one or the other.

"Self-love is generally predominant in the inclinations of women, and phyſical ſenſations in the attachment of men.

"Many falſehoods are related of women, but they have but a feeble compenſation in truths, which are unknown.

"What woman can boaſt of the power of reſiſting the emotions of the ſenſes, and the inſtances of a man who is agreeable to her, added to opportunity? The moſt virtuous is ſhe who has not ceaſed to be ſo becauſe one of theſe circumſtances was wanting.

"The moſt virtuous woman is favourably diſpoſed towards the man who is ſenſible of her beauty, and the greateſt hypocrit to thoſe whom ſhe leads into temptation."*

"A ſecret defect is a ſure guarantee of virtue. The laſt degree of love is to love the defects of a miſtreſs.

"It is not rare to find women who do not grant the leaſt favour, that of which love is the excuſe, and the value of mutual happineſs, but who procure pleaſures without partaking of them, and by which they

* Brantome relates, that a beautiful and virtuous woman, one day making her valet de chambre, [illegible] on her ſtocking, aſked him if he felt no temptation. are degraded *. They do worſe than if they did more, and think this gives no power over them

"The birth and rank of a woman, her connexions, acquaintance and magnificence, produce upon moſt men a greater effect than beauty, they miſtake the ſmoak of vanity for the flame of love

"Intereſt contains ſo active and ſubtile a poiſon, that affection, the moment it is joined to it, is corrupted, and at length extinguiſhed

"The ardour of ſentiment, be it ever ſo ſtrong, may be encreaſed by fame, ſucceſs and celebrity

"There are women whoſe ſupineneſs and goodneſs of heart are incompatible with conſtant rigour. They have neither ſtrength to reſiſt, nor courage to refuſe. It cannot be ſaid they yield; they ſuffer themſelves to be prevailed upon

"To ſeparate two men is, the intervention of a third, which has a greater affinity with one of the two, is neceſſary. The ſeparation of lovers is much upon the ſame principle. In general there is no complete rupture, but when another object has made an impreſſion either upon the lover or his miſtreſs.

"It frequently happens that he who is in deſpair at the idea of loſing his miſtreſs, wants but little courage to enable him to leave her.

"People in the country, and thoſe who know not the world, believe that all wanton women become ſo by their ſenſual paſſions, and that every man in place is open to pecuniary corruption.

"The woman moſt intereſted in ſecrecy, paſſes lightly over indiſcretions produced by exceſs of paſſion.

"That which ſhocks women moſt in the temerity of men, is the idea that their enterpriſes are determined by an opinion of their facility. But if paſſion be the excuſe, there is no audacity which a woman does not ſecretly pardon.

"Wanton women are accuſtomed to defend their ground obſtinately, they know the value of every favour, and can ſtop when they pleaſe. A virtuous woman knows not how to calculate, and thinks herſelf conquered by the leaſt advantage gained over her.

"A woman, wanton from coquetry, is accuſtomed to repel the leaſt approach of ſenſibility. She is envious, falſe, and hypocritical from the neceſſary habitude of deceitfulneſs. In a connexion wherein ſelf-love is the only ſentiment, its exploſion muſt produce tempeſts, nothing can contain a woman whoſe only deſire is ſucceſs, at the expence of every one about her.

"The actor upon the theatre gives an idea of degradation, when we reflect that a man ceaſes to be himſelf, takes a character which is not natural to him, adopts ſentiments he does not feel, and becomes a machine for the amuſement of others. The coquette, like the actor, is in the habitude of changing her own character for one conformable to the momentary part ſhe has to fill. She can imitate the accents of paſſion, and act the violence of love and ecſtaſy, ſhe ſmiles without ſatisfaction, and ſheds tears without being affected, there is not a muſcle of her face of which ſhe knows not the effect, or cannot direct the movement. Vicious without excuſe, her vanity alone is gratified by the diſorder of her conduct, and although there be nothing real in her enjoyments, ſhe is inſatiable, and knows not where to ſtop. She reſembles the tub of the Danaides.

"There are fine women without celebrity, and others who are conſidered handſome without pretenſions to beauty. Every thing depends upon their manner of entering the world, and upon the part they have taken up."

"Chryſante enjoys an immenſe income. He has had conſiderable concerns in different affairs, and has penſions, governorſhips and dignities, all theſe have come by degrees without exciting envy. People are ſurprized at his fortune. Chryſante is not known to the public by any great action; he is neither the ſon nor nephew of a miniſter or a miſtreſs, nor has he ever been in favour with the ſovereign; he is ſcarcely known to him. What has Chryſante done? He has fatigued himſelf during thirty years, and paſſed nights which young men conſecrate to pleaſure, in liſtening to the ſtories of a maid of honour of the laſt century, who had ſtill

That of riſking one's life, Chryſante ſacrifices his by piece-meal The miniſter and magiſtrate who renounce all pleaſures, and paſs a laborious life in the cloſet, are objects of admiration Chryſante alſo has abandoned pleaſure, and paſſed a part of his life ſtill more diſagreeably It was neceſſary he ſhould have another kind of merit The magiſtrate and miniſter may publiſh the reſult of their application, but Chryſante, in the midſt of the moſt fatiguing occupations, had a ſerene countenance and the appearance of being at eaſe

"Chryſis has politeneſs of manners, flexibility of character, and gentleneſs of temper There is nothing to which he is particularly attached, and if he ſhews an air of concern, it is certainly for a perſon connected with people in favour He makes one in every circle, and holds to that which takes the lead He is provided with ſome ſtories, which he gracefully relates He never diſſents from what is ſaid by others, and his attention to them is always accompanied by an obliging ſmile He never breaks with any body, and when a man in place begins to loſe his credit, Chryſis ſenſibly withdraws himſelf, and it always happens that he has ſome ſubject of complaint againſt a miniſter in diſgrace He is looked upon in ſociety as a ſafe man. Pliableneſs is no uneaſy virtue for a man who cannot be affected His morals are neither good nor bad, they are thoſe of the age in which he lives, and of the ſociety moſt diſtinguiſhed He is the friend of every man in place, and takes care never to aſk for any thing, or to ſolicit but coldly Aſk him not for his intereſt he gueſſes your wants, and his coolneſs announces that he foreſees your intention Chryſis has for forty years been cordially received by the great, by miniſters, and men in place, they are certain of never being importuned by his ſolicitations He dines with the miniſter who is diſgraced, in the evening he ſups with his ſucceſſor He ſeems to be of every family, and cannot accept half the invitations he receives Such a manner of life is ſo flattering to him, that nothing can engage him to interrupt the courſe of it All his credit is uſeleſs to his relations and friends The man of merit, the unfortunate and perſecuted, have no claim to his aſſiſtance, A word would be ſufficient to make his friend happy, he will not pronounce it Could the leaſt effort prevent the greateſt act of injuſtice, Chryſis would not make it He will never run the riſk of embarraſſing a man in place, leſt his future reception ſhould be leſs cordial"

"There is nothing remarkable in the perſon of Adraſtes He does not excel, but he is never loſt ſight of He is conſidered at court, and well received in the city It is he who is conſulted upon a marriage, an affair, and upon the conduct to be obſerved on a delicate occaſion, his circumſpection prevents him from ſolving difficulties, but never makes him an enemy, He is not one of thoſe men early announced as perſons who ſeem deſtined to fill the higheſt offices of ſtate, nor on whom public attention is fixed Adraſtes is always ſpoken of as a man who will certainly come to an higher employment than that which he now holds, and, placed at an equal diſtance between envy and contempt, he is uninterruptedly making his way to the

That would be injuſtice He has never made himſelf thoroughly maſter of any thing, he had not the means of doing it, but he has much ſuperficial knowledge, and is particularly fond of detail He has a fund ſufficient to join for a moment in the converſation of every circle, he is a Serinette upon which there are ſet a few airs. What he ſays is accommodated to the general run of ideas, his probity is exact and ſcrupulous, and there is ſomething cool and deliberate in all his proceedings. An Hiſtorical Eſſay on the Dreſs of the Ancient and Modern Iriſh Addreſſed to the Right Honourable the Earl of Charlemont To which is ſubjoined, a Memoir on the Armour and Weapons of the Iriſh By Joſeph C Walker 4to 11 1s. Elmſley

TO the Hiſtorical Eſſay on the Dreſs of the Ancient and Modern Iriſh, of which we concluded an account in our Review of laſt month, is ſubjoined a curious Memoir on the Armour and Weapons of the Iriſh.

The author informs us, in a dedication to the COUNTESS OF MOIRA, whom he addreſſes as MINERVA, that it is to the emanations which beamed from her Ladyſhip's mind, that he was induced to ſo cloſe an inſpection of this ſubject, and he adds with becoming gratitude, that "the reſult of his ſcrutiny, like a wandering ſtream, naturally returns "al mar, dov' ella nacque" This ſcrutiny, however, has not enabled our induſtrious antiquary to purſue his ſubject into the remote ages, where the armour and weapons of the early Iriſh lie, as he ſays, "hid in night" But he has divided this Memoir into the four heads of armour, weapons, archery, and fire arms, and under theſe heads has dilated ſeverally and hiſtorically on the different articles which they involve —Under the firſt diviſion are included—1ſt, THE HELMET, Caulmhion, Salet, or Scull cap, which, from its difference in form to thoſe of other nations, Mr. Walker thinks was peculiar to Ireland, and that it is alluded to in Antiquitates Celto-Scandicæ, under the title of "Pileum Hiberricum" It was firſt made of the ſkin of a beaſt, and then called Caulmhion, but as ſoon as iron was introduced, it was made of that metal. This helmet ſoon yielded its protection of the head to the Salet, the form of which is preſented to the reader in a plate, as it appeared on a monument at Liſk, in the county of Dublin To the Salet ſucceeded the Iron Scull, the ſimpleſt of all helmets They were worn by yeomen in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and ſeveral of them were extant in the Armoury of the caſtle of Dublin not many years ſince, but not one remains in it at this day two, however, are ſuppoſed preſerved in the great hall of the caſtle of Horeth, in the county of Dublin ——2dly, THE JACK, Corſlet, Hauberjeon This armour is depicted on O'Conor's tomb at Roſcommon, and is deſcribed by Spenſer as being of quilted leather, ſometimes covered with gilded leather, like the tomb of Shecklaton in which Cauter habits his Sir Tonie ——3dly, THE SHIELD, Target, Pavoise but on this ſubject the author laments that he cannot promiſe much ſatisfaction, and infers that they were not made of metal, from the circumſtance of there being but a ſingle inſtance of a metal ſhield found in the bogs, ſo replete with almoſt every other implement of war Their form, however, according to Spenſer, was long and broad, and they were made of wicker rods, and ſometimes of leather "We are told by Mr Macpherſon, that the early Iriſh and Scots ſummoned their tribes together by means of the ſound of a ſhield ſuſpended to a tree and ſtruck with the butt end of a ſpear* On ſuch an occaſion, it is natural to ſuppoſe that

* Oſſian's Poems, Vol II p 84 There is at this day a proverbial expreſſion amongſt the vulgar Iriſh, that implies ſtriking the buckler, by which a challenge is underſtood, ſo that Mr Macpherſon's aſſertion is not without foundation a brass or metal shield of some kind must have been used; yet no metal shield (save one) is I have already observed, has been found in this kingdom, nor can I learn that the Scots boast of having discovered any†. It has indeed been asserted, that silver shields were formerly not only used but forged in Ireland. But as this assertion has neither been supported by contemporary writers, nor by any specimen, we are at liberty to question it. It is, however, a well attested fact, that a golden shield, or rather a shield adorned with gold, was found not many years since by a labourer in the county of Cork, by three pennyworths, who sold it for seventy guineas to a neighbouring silversmith. By this relation I do not mean to insinuate, that golden shields were borne in common by the Irish, though it may afford good grounds for a presumption, that they were sometimes carried before the leaders of their armies, striking terror, like the ægis of Minerva: nor do I mean to insinuate that this shield was manufactured here, but am rather inclined to think that it was left by some of the northern invaders, amongst whom golden shields were frequent. Unwilling to hazard any position without proof, I shall take occasion to cite in this place, a passage from a translation of a curious inedited Icelandic manuscript of the tenth century intitled, AVOYAGE TO IRELAND AND DENMARK FROM ICELAND*, in which Olave, the hero, is introduced in the following lamentable complaint: "The vessel which conveyed Olave to Ireland in quest of his reputed father, the then reigning monarch, being stranded on the Irish coast, the neighbouring inhabitants poured down in a body on the strand, in order to capture it. It is in the act of repulsing this lawless mob that Olave is introduced in the manner I have mentioned.—"The Irish assembling themselves, proceeded to attack the vessel with an unusual shout. For a "purpose they proceeded towards her with "an intent to draw her on shore: while "those who were deputed from the main "body, or the guards of the littoral. Impossible, however, where the vessel rode, "was deep enough to keep her "afloat, at the instance of Olave, his "companions and other persons, had ranged them along the sides between the "stem and the stern, which they covered with shields, forming, as it were, "a kind of breast-work or parapet, the "lower part of which was filled with "spears, for the purpose of being in readiness. This being done, Olave ascended the prow, arrayed in a gorget; his "head invested with a gilded helm, and "a gold-hilted sword by his side, and in "his hand he held a lance formed hook-"wise, calculated as well for stabbing as "for cutting. The shield with which "he covered his breast, was blazoned "with a lion of gold."

"Before I dismiss this article I shall observe, that the loss of a shield was not less ignominious amongst the early Irish, than formerly amongst the Lacedemonians, and latterly in those nations where the spirit of chivalry prevailed‡."

Under the head of WEAPONS are included the SWORD, Skian, or Skene, the antiquity of which is so remote that the period of its being first wielded by the Irish cannot easily be determined. Before they had to contend with foreign invaders clad in armour, Mr. Wilkes remarks it probable that the Irish used wooden swords, as similar weapons have been found in nations amongst whom civilization had made but short advances. Both brass and iron swords, however, were formerly used in Ireland, as evident from several of each kind having been found in different parts of the kingdom, both of high antiquity.

"The superstitious veneration in which the sword was held by the ancient Irish, is noticed by Spenser. "When they go "about (he relates) they lay certain "pieces of swords, made "king, across the way upon the earth, "and thrusting the point of the blades "into the ground, thinking thereby to "have the better luck in fight. Also "they use commonly to swear by their "swords." To these customs Spenser gives a mystical origin, forgetting, in the warmth of his zeal to prove the descent of the Irish from the Scythians, that the former custom must have originated amongst christians, and that the latter was derived from the Danes§.

"As well in Ireland as in England and on the continent, the dagger which the Iriſh denominated a Skian was the conſtant companion of the ſword So early as the memorable battle of Clontarf we find an Iriſh prince wearing one of theſe weapons in his girdle, and in the Icelandic manuſcript already quoted, it is mentioned as an Iriſh weapon The uſe of this inſtrument, both as an ornament and defenſive weapon, continued through ſeveral ages down to very late times It appears ſticking in the girdles of the Iriſh kings who paid homage to Rich II In the reign of Elizabeth, it was forbid, by her charter to Kilkenny, to leave its ſcabbard in the time of a quarrel —"to draw a ſword or Skean in a quarrel, was puniſhable by the fine of a half a mark" —The author of Heſperi neſo graphia gives it to his hero, Gillo And in the celebrated ballad of the Pleaſaca na Ruaireach, it is given to all O'Rourke's gueſts adly, THE STAFF WEAPON, Bradhgha or Crannabh, Spear, or Dart, which they uſed for the deſtruction of their prey It is ſaid to have been then a kind of javelin about five feet long, and pointed with flint or bone To that end which remained in the hand was affixed a thong of leather, by means of which either the beaſt was returned or the ſpear recovered But in time this weapon varied in its materials and form, and was employed in ſlaying as well the rational as the irrational creation, for they hurled it "ſwifter than the dragon's ſtaff"

3dly, The LUAGH CATAH, or Battle-axe This weapon ſuperſeded the uſe of the Claid hard, or heavy long ſword It is repreſented as an iron axe, calculated as well to ſtab as cut Truly ſenſible of the deſtructive powers of the battle-axe, the Engliſh put it into the hands of the Gallowglaſſes The dexterity with which it appears the Iriſh uſed this battle-axe, evinces their fondneſs for it It was probably in order that they might deal the more deadly ſtrokes with this weapon, that, as Campion relates, they left the right arm of their children unchriſtened

4thly, The CRANNIBH, a Club, which is ſo obvious a weapon that it cannot be ſaid to be peculiar to any nation or to require a deſcription

ARCHERY can boaſt as high an antiquity in Ireland as in almoſt any other nation of the earth. The old chroniclers number archery with the exerciſes of the militia commanded by the immortal Fin Mac Cumhal, and in other periods of Iriſh hiſtory equally dark, ſays Mr. Walker, "we can ſometimes diſcern paſſing arrows piercing the gloom" But according as the uſe of fire arms advanced, archery loſt ground, till at length it ſunk into oblivion

"The citizens of Dublin had their butts for many years on a plain in the village of Hoggen's-butt (now College green), near a range of ſmall houſes denominated Fib and Tom When the city ſpread over this green, the Butts were removed to that part of the North Strand, formerly called Cunningham's rope walk, where my father remembers to have ſeen them, in the year 1734 About this time the practice of Archery totally ceaſed in Dublin, where it had been ſupported in its decline by a ſociety of gentlemen and eminent citizens, who called themſelves The Archers Club* The laſt member of this club was Mr Henry Delamain, who lived and retained all his faculties to the year 178 "

"With this venerable archer," continues Mr Walker, "I ſhall cloſe this article, and proceed to ſay a few words on the "MILITARY ENGINES and CHARIOTS of the Iriſh, whence I ſhall paſs to their fire-arms, with which article I ſhall conclude this Memoir

"CRAN-TAPHAILL, SOW, CARAB — Mr O'Connor tells us, "that in the "reign of Crimthan mac Nuſe, monarch, "in the firſt century, they (the Irish) got "the uſe of the Cran-Tabhaill, a machine from whence they ſhot ſtones on "the enemy's entrenchments, or occaſionally on their ranks, in the day of "battle" But we hear no more of this engine, ſo may conclude that its exiſtence was ſhort The next engine that obtrudes its monſtrous bulk on our notice, is the Sow, which we find placed againſt the walls of Liſchane, in the year 1599 This engine, according to Doctor Smith, was a kind of wooden houſe, that moved upon wheels, with doors opening inwards. It ſerved, he ſays, to cover the workmen, who labored with crows and pickaxes to make a breach.

* A ſheaf of arrows which belonged to this club, is now in my poſſeſſion. According to the tradition that was handed down with thoſe arrows they came from Nottingham They are made of aſp wood, feathered with a grey gooſe wing, and about twenty-ſeven inches long. I have depoſited one of them in the Muſeum of the Royal Iriſh Academy.

" Mr O'Connor ſeems to ſpeak of the uſe of the Carab or military Chariot amongſt the early Iriſh, as an undoubted fact, and ſays that great feats are recorded of ſome of our ancient charioteers And Mr Harris obſerves, that in the TAIN-BO CUAILGNE, military chariots, and the manner of fighting in them, are deſcribed much after the way that Cæſar deſcribes the Britons fighting in the ſame ſort of carriage; and the guider of the chariot is there called Aira, a page or lacquey Every reader of Oſſian's poems muſt remember the beautiful deſcription of the chariot of Cuchoulinn, the famous Iriſh chieftain, in the firſt book of Fingal But the blaze of ſplendour which Mr Macpherſon has thrown around this chariot, will not allow the eye to look ſteadily on it. In an Iriſh romance now lying before me, of which the ſubject is the death of the ſame hero, his chariot is mentioned but not deſcribed "Cuchoulinn having " put on his helmet and habiliments of " war, leaped into his Chariot without ta- " king leave of Cuſt or his gueſts, and " his weapons fell down at his feet"

" The chariot falling into diſuſe, the Iriſh were taught by the Engliſh to compariſon the horſes of their Cavalry with the ſtrong brais bitt *, ſliding reins, and ſhank pillion, and as well to mount without the aid of the ſtirrup, as to ride after the Engliſh faſhion"

" FIRE ARMS were unknown in Ireland till the reign of Henry VIII " In the " year 1489, (ſays Harris) the firſt muſ- " quets or fire arms that perhaps were " ever ſeen in Ireland, were brought to " Dublin from Germany, and ſix of them, " as a great rarity, were preſented to Ge- " rald, Earl of Kildare, then Lord De- " puty, which he put into the hands of his " guards, as they ſtood centinels before " his houſe in Thomas-court" After this period, fire-arms were no longer a rarity in this country, during the Elizabethan wars, they were liberally diffuſed through the kingdom It was for the purpoſe of carrying on thoſe wars with more terror to the natives, that pieces of ordnance were firſt introduced At this time part of the Spaniſh Armada happening to be wrecked on the Iriſh coaſt, ſome of the cannon were caſt on ſhore One of them is now preſerved in the Armoury of the Caſtle of Dublin, where it was depoſited by Colonel Villiercy, who had it brought up from Kinſale In the ſame repoſitory is preſerved the cannon which killed St Ruth, but being covered with ammunition carriages, I could not obtain a drawing of it It is, I am told, a long ſix pounder

" Thus, with a rapid hand, having completed my deſign, I ſhall diſmiſs this Memoir with a poetical adjunct O'Hoeſy, a modern Iriſh Bard, contraſting the ancient diſcipline of the Iriſh with that of late days, exclaims with indignation—

No more the foe now trembles at our name,
No more their captive numbers ſwell our fame,
No martial ſtrength is by the ſoldier preſt,
The ſword, the ſole companion of his reſt
No warriors nightly canopy'd with ſtars,
See the froſt bind the ringlets of their hair,
Our weapons idly in our ſcabbards ſtand,
Nor grow, as erſt, to every valiant hand"

The Vicar of Lansdowne, or Country Quarters A Tale By Regina Maria Dalton. 2 Volumes, 12mo 6s Johnſon

THIS elegant little Tale, which is dedicated by permiſſion to The Marchioneſs of Buckingham, diſcovers ſtrong marks of incipient genius and true taſte The common herd of novel-writers, anxious to produce ſomething extremely ſublime and beautiful, generally "outſtep the modeſty of nature," and ſoar far beyond the regions of human life, and frequently beyond the powers of common underſtanding "To bring," ſays Dr Johnſon, "a lover, a lady, and a rival into the fable, to entangle them in contradictory obligations, perplex them with oppoſitions of intereſt, and harraſs them with violence of diſtreſs inconſiſtent with each other, to make them meet in rapture and part in agony, to fill their mouths with hyperbolical joy and outrageous ſorrow, to diſtreſs them as nothing human ever was diſtreſſed, to deliver them as nothing human ever was delivered, is the buſineſs of a modern dramatiſt." and this obſervation will apply with equal truth to the modern compounders of novels The fair authoreſs, however, of the preſent work has with great judgment and good

Some of the incidents would, perhaps, have been thought more pleaſing had they been more important, but they are familiar to the ſubject, and ſuch as naturally ariſe from the conjunctures which give them birth In ſhort, the Vicar of Lanſdor ne is a work well calculated to ſhew that the human paſſions, as they are regular or exorbitant, are the grand ſources of happineſs or miſery; and we can ſafely recommend the peruſal of it, as capable of affording, to every rational and feeling mind, equal pleaſure and inſtruction

Letters on Greece, being a Sequel to Letters on Egypt, and containing Travels through Rhodes, Crete, and other Iſlands of the Archipelago, with comparative Remarks on their ancient and preſent State, and Obſervations on the Government, Character, and Manners, of the Turks, and modern Greeks. Tranſlated from the French of M Savary 8vo 7s Robinſons

THE ancient and modern hiſtory of the celebrated iſland of Crete, together with a narrative of the ſiege of Candia, formed the ſubſtance of our laſt extracts from this highly entertaining work, and the author having by theſe deſcriptions made his fair correſpondent in ſome degree acquainted with the manners of the people, proceeds on an excurſion into the iſland they inhabited, to viſit its antiquities From amongſt the many curioſities which it is ſaid to contain, we ſhall ſelect Mr Savary's accounts of "The Tomb of Jupiter—The Monaſtery of St George—and Mount Ida," and with theſe extracts we ſhall conclude our Review of this fruitful publication

THE TOMB OF JUPITER

"We were about four leagues to the ſouth-eaſt of Candia, and employed in climbing a very ſteep path, when our guides appriſed us that we were paſſing near the Tomb of Jupiter We labour'd up the mountain to view this ancient monument, but ſaw nothing but a heap of ſtones, half eaten away by time, which the inhabitants of the country call the tomb of Jupiter

"Both the fables and hiſtories of antiquity agree that a Jupiter died, and was buried in the iſland of Crete. The third Jupiter, the ſon of Saturn, was born there, and his tomb is ſtill ſhewn there Jupiter having ended his days in Crete, his relations and friends, in obedience to his laſt commands, erected a temple and a tomb to his memory This temple ſtill ſubſiſted in the days of Plato, but time, or earthquakes, have deſtroyed it. This philoſopher, who was well acquainted with the place he deſcribes, ſpeaks of it thus. "The road, which leads from Cnoſſus "to the cavern and temple of Jupiter, "is very pleaſant We continually meet "with alleys or large tufted trees, whoſe "foliage ſhelters us from the ſcorching "beams of the ſun If we proceed ſtill "further, we find woods of cypreſs-"trees, of ſurpriſing height and beauty, "by the ſide of which are delightful mea-"dows, where travellers may repoſe, and "converſe"

"From all theſe authorities we may conclude, that a man called Jupiter, who, by great actions, merited well of his ſubjects, and on whom divine honours were beſtowed, died in the iſland of Crete, tha that a temple was erected to him, which has been destroyed by time, that his tomb was shewn with an inscription on it, until the time of the Roman Emperors, and that at present there is to be seen, about three leagues from Cnossus, a mountain, commonly called Mount Jouctas, on the top of which the inhabitants of the country point out a heap of stones, which they call the tomb of Jupiter. A forest sacred to him, in which he was brought up, and to which Minos retired every ninth year, to converse with his father, and receive his laws, it may be presumed not to have been far distant from this place, but we did not see it.

THE MONASTERY OF ST GEORGE.

"We now descended from the plain, when, though it was the month of November, we found the heat considerable. We were to sleep at the convent of St George, from which we were still three leagues distant, and in our road had to pass several ridges of hills, which form the basis of Mount Ida on the east. The country presented a great variety of the most picturesque prospects. Sometimes, from the summit of a hill, we discovered an immense horizon, terminated by mountains which concealed their heads in a cloud, and presently straying along the bottom of profound vallies, adorned with fruit-trees and flowering shrubs, we seemed as if imprisoned by the vast and steep declivities on each side. At length, after having continued ascending a long time, we perceived at a distance the monastery of St George, the sight of which gave us no little pleasure, and we redoubled our pace. It was evening when we entered the court. The monks, at first, were alarmed at our number, and the superior, according to custom, concealed himself. But we had a person with us who was perfectly acquainted with the Greeks and their subterfuges. He addressed himself to some of the Fathers, telling them, that we had with us the French consul, who was going to Canea, and who, as he had great influence with those in power in that country, was able to render essential services to their bishop, and all the convents in the island. They did not fail to convey this information to the superior, who instantly came to receive and compliment us, and immediately all the doors were thrown open to our company.

"We had travelled seven computed leagues, equal to ten French ones, and our horses were very tired. As soon as we had alighted, several children came to take them by the bridle, and walked them about for a quarter of an hour, before they put them into the stable. This custom is constantly observed in Crete. They never shut up the horses when in a sweat, but always make a rule of walking them about some time in the open air. Hence the Cretan horses are strong, healthy, and scarcely ever tire. They boldly climb the steepest rocks, and descend the same into the vallies, without stumbling. The traveller's life depends on the sureness of their footing, for he frequently passes along narrow paths on the edge of dreadful precipices, where a single false step would infallibly be his destruction.

"While supper was preparing, one of the monks earnestly requested us to visit his cell. He was a lover of good wine, which indeed might be seen in his countenance, and he regaled us in the best manner he could with his beloved liquor. It is true, he had but one cup, but that was large and deep, he circulated it briskly, and seemed highly pleased with the encomiums we bestowed on his wine.

"The monks of St George possess extensive lands, on which they feed numerous flocks, and which produce corn, barley, wine, oil, wax, and honey in abundance. The Turks have left them their lands, on condition of their exercising hospitality towards all travellers, which they commonly do with a tolerable good grace. Both riders and horses are lodged and supplied with provision. These houses are of great use in a country where there are neither inns nor caravanseras, for without them, the traveller would be obliged to carry with him a load of baggage, and every necessary of life. The monks cultivate their fields themselves, and owe what they enjoy to the labour of their hands.

"A magnificent repast was served up to us: the middle dish was a roasted pig, round which were excellent mutton, pigeons, and very fine poultry; the rest of the table was covered with plates of pomegranates, almonds, grapes, fresh olives, and honey. This honey, as transparent as crystal, was delicious, as highly perfumed as the flowers themselves, as delicate as the finest sweet-meats, and equally grateful to the smell and taste. The superior set before us most exquisite wines, red, white, and orange coloured, the produce of the hills round the monastery, on which we alternately bestowed the highest commendations.

"After

"After supper we were conducted to a spacious hall, where, notwithstanding the hardness of our beds, we perfectly well enjoyed the pleasures of repose. To shew respect to the French consul, they had allotted him a separate apartment, and placed two full decanters by his bed-side. In the morning, he wished to wash his mouth, and pouring out some of the supposed water, found it to be white wine. He took the other decanter, and filled his glass, but this proved to be pure brandy. No doubt, these good monks are accustomed to make libations to the god of sleep, or to console themselves for his hours, with the bottle.

Mount Ida.

"The Turkish farmer, who had received us so kindly at our coming out of the Labyrinth, offered us the best entertainment in his power. But our bed was the carpet on which we slipped, and we had ourselves dressed, booted as we were. In the morning, therefore, we were soon dressed, and we set out at sun-rise, after having eat a hot, who accepted what we thought proper to give him.

"For some hours, our way lay along the plain, and we had an easy and pleasant road, but when we had arrived at the high lands, it became perfectly rugged. We travelled along the sides of the hills which crown'd Mount Ida, to the southward. Two chains of these hills formed, between us and that mountain, a double amphitheatre, above which it reared its majestic head. We could perceive large clouds of a thundering whiteness, ranging themselves around its summit, and crowning it with a silver crown, which, illumined by the sun, shone with a wonderful splendor. These clouds, obeying the law of attraction, after encompassing for some hours the head of the mountain, fell in imperceptible drops on all the surrounding objects, and entirely disappeared, others succeeded, and were dissipated in the same manner.

"This active power, universally diffused, which forces the clouds towards the tops of lofty mountains, is the origin of springs, fountains, streams, and all the rivers on the globe. In the higher regions of the air, where the rising vapours are condensed by cold, the water of the clouds is converted into hail and snow. But if they attain only a moderate height, where the cold is not very great, they fall in mists, rains, and copious dews. When the hills are covered with forests, the springs and rivulets become more numerous, as the leaves of trees possess the peculiar property of attracting the humidity diffused throughout the atmosphere. To procure water for a dry country, nothing more would be necessary than to plant forest-trees on the hill tops. When we find the ancients bestowing the name of rivers on the Glaucus and the Xanthus, which run through Asia Minor, and are now little more than inconsiderable brooks, we are tempted to suspect them of exaggeration. But if we reflect that the hills, where these rivers rise, are at present stript of their trees and soil, and no longer oppose barriers to the passage of the cloud, though formerly crowned with lofty forests, they attracted them around their tops, and drew from them all their moisture, we shall find no difficulty in believing that the Glaucus, the Xanthus, and many other at present insignificant rivulets, might anciently, when fed with more copious supplies, well deserve the appellation of rivers.

"While we were journeying round Mount Ida, we perceived the summit gradually overcast, and soon after vanish involved in a thick mist, nor was it long before we again perceived the naked top whitened with heaps of snow, and the sides covered with the glittering mantle of winter. We, however, who were less elevated by twelve hundred fathom, enjoyed a delightful temperature. The sky was clear and serene, and the sun moved through the azure vault in all his majesty and splendor. In the deep vallies on our left, myrtles and laurel roses skirted the channels of the torrents. Trees, in their brightest verdure, adorned the foot of the mountain; and in the month of November we found groves as green and pleasant as in the middle of spring.

"Mount Ida begins near Candia, and stretches from east to west, as far as the White Mountains. It extends from the northern to the southern sea, and is the highest in the island. In many parts of it the snow lies all the year. From its summit we may discover the sea of Crete, and that of Lybia. The eye wanders over an immense horizon, and discerns many of the scattered islands of the Archipelago, such as Cythera, Milo, and Argentiera. If we confine our attention to the view of the objects before us, they appear as in an immense perspective, and present prospects highly varied, and astonishingly rich and beautiful.

"In summer, when the snows are melted, vast plains, situated on the declivity of the mountain, afford excellent pasturage for the flocks. On that part of it opposite to Candia are forests, consisting chiefly of maple and green oak. The ſouthern ſides abound with the ſtrawberry-tree, privets, and rock-roſes The eaſtern brow is beautified with cedars, pines, and cypreſſes, but on the weſt, its perpendicular ſides preſent nothing but piles of rocks, impoſſible to ſcale It is enriched with an infinity of other plants, which would delight the botaniſt, ſuch as the true melilot, the yellow-flowered marjoram, &c Abundant ſtreams flow on every ſide from its ſummits Some ruſh in torrents into the vallies, while others water the plains, which produce luxurious harveſts, or, diſtributed by art, maintain fecundity in the innumerable fruit-trees which grow round the villages The hill-ſides, expoſed to the powerful rays of the ſun, are clothed with vineyards, which produce exquiſite wines, and the olive-trees every where conſtitute the principal riches of the country

"The diverſity of landſcapes, which conſtantly charmed the eye, made us forget the dangers to which we were expoſed For the ſpace of a league we rode along the ſlope of a very high hill On one ſide, the ground was as perpendicular as a wall, and on the other was the channel of a torrent two hundred feet deep, through which the water ruſhed, over the large flint-ſtones, with a violent noiſe The path at laſt grew ſo narrow, that when once fairly entered, it was impoſſible to diſmount, but at the riſk of throwing both ourſelves and our horſes into the abyſs below I can aſſure you, Madam, that in many places, this road was not more than a foot and a half wide, though on the brink of a tremendous precipice, which no one could look down without ſhuddering We were now convinced of the excellence of our horſes, not one of which ſo much as made a falſe ſtep They ſeemed to feel the danger, trod with caution, and examined where to put their feet In a wet place, however, mine made a ſmall ſlip, and tottered for a moment on the brink of the precipice, but I kept my ſeat firmly, and he recovered himſelf We deſcended from theſe heights by ſo ſteep a valley, that the rider's back was againſt the crupper of the horſe. But at length, after ten hours ride, we arrived in perfect ſafety, at the monaſtery of Alomatos"

An Enquiry into the Situation of the Eaſt India Company, from Papers laid before the Houſe of Commons in the years 1787, and 1788 By George Craufurd, Eſq 4to 2s 6d. Debrett

THE author of this Enquiry, with that zeal and ſpirit which has ever animated his character and purſuits, has undertaken the arduous and important taſk of preſenting to the public view a clear and ſucceſsful ſtatement of the real ſituation of the Eaſt-India Company's affairs, and by a ſeries of account, apparently founded on authentic documents, the fallacious arithmetic of which, if in fact it be fallacious, our endeavours have been unable to detect, it appears that "the Company are labouring under a deficiency "of 6,054,440l 6s 0d with the loſs "of 4,000,000l ſtock to the Proprietors, "valued at 6,500,000l ſterling, making "together the ſum of 12 554,440l 6s 0d "ſterling, which is ſtill wanted towards "liquidating their affairs to the ſatisfac-"tion of all concerned"——In framing this balance, Mr Craufurd ſeems to have taken uncommon pains to avoid error, and has proceeded ſtep by ſtep with great caution and regularity He apologizes for the inſidious nature of a publication which tends to create a general diſquietude, on the ground that all parties agree that a true and public ſtate of their important concerns, whether favourable or unfavourable to the Company, ſhould be obtained, is the only means of providing for the ſafety and ſecurity of their creditors, with a due regard to the general intereſt of the public In this ſentiment we entirely concur, but whether thoſe concerns do really wear the aweful aſpect which the reſult of theſe enquiries have given to them, we pretend not abſolutely to determine The labyrinths of arithmetic are ſo "dark and intricate, ſo puzzled in mazes and perplexed in errors," that, in our opinion, thoſe who are familiarly acquainted with their inmoſt receſſes may ſometimes be bewildered, and frequently loſe their way

Obſervations on the National Embarraſſment, and the Proceedings in Parliament relative to the ſame By J L De Lolme, L L D 8vo 1s 6d Debrett

THE high and merited fame which Mr. De Lolme has acquired by his celebrated Treatiſe on the CONSTITUTION OF ENGLAND, creates a degree of veneration and reſpect for every political production that flows from his pen. To this

this predilection the ſubject of theſe OBSERVATIONS, at the time they were written *, added an intereſt the moſt public and important that perhaps ever occurred in the annals of any nation; and the manner in which he has treated the topic will continue a diſtinguiſhing teſtimony of his ſuperior talents and ingenuity but, moſt happily for this country, his Majeſty's recovery † has removed the embarraſſment, converted national proſtration into univerſal joy and public thankſgiving, and rendered a ſolution of thoſe difficulties which his incapacity had created, a matter more of curioſity than uſe Mr De Lolme begins with ſaying, that the King's political ſituation, the legal claims of the Heir Apparent, and the ſituation of the Parliament, have been miſ ſtated and miſunderſtood He denies that the King's incapacity had any analogy to ſuch a ſituation, ariſing either from ſickneſs, infirmity, infancy, or abſence; and contends, that the real political ſituation of the King was ſimilar to that of Don Sebaſtian, while that King was a captive in Africa, "a captive in an unknown land, in unknown hands, and "acceſs to his perſon being deemed in "every reſpect impoſſible, and even not "to be thought of."—Mr De Lolme then proceeds to enquire into "the rights of "the Heir Apparent," and "the powers of the two branches of the Legiſlature then aſſembled." Upon the laſt ſubject he thinks that the act of the King, in having originally called the parliament together, amounts to the delegation and acceptance of a general truſt from the King to govern the nation in his name; and therefore he argues that the royal authority reſided, upon the King's incapacity, in a convention of the Houſe of Lords and Houſe of Commons but the ingenuity of a vivid mind, glowing with ſome degree of political acumen, upon a great and intereſting ſubject, like the vaulting ambition deſcribed by SHAKESPEARE in Macbeth, ſometimes "overleaps itſelf, and falls on the other ſide" ſo Mr De Lolme deſtroys the power he had given to the parliament, by contending afterwards that, according to an act of the Legiſlature paſſed in 1705, all the members, by thus accepting an office under authority of the Crown, had ipſo facto vacated their ſeats This work however contains much real information, and ſolid reaſoning; and will not diminiſh the extenſive reputation of its learned and ingenious author.

ACCOUNT of the TRIAL of WARREN HASTINGS, Eſq (late GOVERNOR-GENERAL of BENGAL), before the HIGH COURT of PARLIAMENT, for HIGH CRIMES and MISDEMEANORS

THE next point to which Mr Burke ſaid he intended to apply preſumptive evidence, related to Munny Begum But he apprized their Lordſhips, that he did not mean to confine himſelf entirely to preſumptive proofs on this head

When Mohammed Reza Khan was removed from his offices, one of which was that of Guardian and Chief Miniſter to the then Nabob of Bengal, who was at that time a minor, Mr Haſtings was ordered by the Court of Directors to ſupply his place with ſome man of known integrity

Did Mr Haſtings pay ready obedience to this order? No On the contrary, he completely diſregarded it, and inſtead of a man, named a woman to fill the important office of Guardian and Miniſter to the young Prince

The circumſtances attending this appointment were of a nature that ſtrongly indicated corruption in the Governor General —To make this appear clearly, Mr Burke gave a ſhort hiſtory of Munny Begum This woman was born a SLAVE, a DANCING GIRL by TRADE, and PROSTITUTE by PROFESSION Thoſe who knew any thing of India, knew that the DANCING GIRLS were the very outcaſts of ſociety Dancing in India was not conſidered as in Europe, it was not that majeſtic and graceful movement which gives eaſe and dignity to the carriage, which poliſhes the manners without corrupting the morals, and which the moſt innocent and virtuous of the fair ſex very properly ſtudy to acquire and improve DANCING in India conſiſted

* This pamphlet was written previouſly to the 23d January 1789.
† The King was declared convaleſcent on the 5th of March 1789.

in

in immodeſt and luſcivious geſtures and in actions which could not be named in an aſſembly ſuch as he had the honour to addreſs. This dancing girl, this Munny Begum was employed, among others, to dance before the preſent Nabob's father, who taking a liking to her, for ſome time carried on a commerce with her. She told him at laſt ſhe was pregnant, and made him believe ſhe was ſo by him. Upon this he took her into the ſeraglio, where ſhe was delivered of a ſon, and where ſhe was treated with the ſame reſpect as the reſt of the ladies of that place. Her influence was ſo great, that ſhe procured her baſtard ſon to ſucceed the Nabob, to the prejudice of his legitimate children, and accordingly he aſcended the throne, after the death or his ſuppoſed father. His mother had all authority under him; but his reign was of a ſhort duration, for he died a minor. The eldeſt legitimate ſon of the old Nabob was then raiſed to the throne, and his mother, a princeſs of illuſtrious birth, was inveſted with the dominion of the ſeraglio, from which Munny Begum had been removed at the death of her ſon. Under this young Nabob, Mohammed Reza Khan governed the country. When Mr Haſtings removed him, the uncle of the Nabob requeſted the Governor General would appoint him to fill the vacancy occaſioned by the removal. The uncle was a Prince whom Mr Haſtings himſelf deſcribed to remain without ambition, and by no means dangerous, and therefore he might have been appointed with ſafety to the Company's intereſt. But this Prince refuſed, he had nothing to ſupport himſelf and family but a penſion from the Company; a perſon ſo ſituated had little chance of ſucceeding with a man of the character of Mr Haſtings.

The perſon moſt near the ſeraglio was the eldeſt brother of the Nabob, but Munny Begum the DANCING GIRL, who knew the world, procured the nomination of Mr Haſtings by means of preſents to the gentlemen, and by him ſhe was appointed ruler of the kingdom, in the name of her ſon, whoſe own mother was removed.

Thus, inſtead of appointing a man to ſucceed Mohammed Reza Khan, according to the Court's inſtructions, he appointed a woman, who, according to the inſtructions of Mr Haſtings could have no will, and to whom no one could ſpeak but on a different ſide of a curtain from her, and a woman ſo ſituated was to preſide over the adminiſtration of all affairs, civil, judicial, religious, and military.

By order of the Company, Mr Haſtings was to appoint to this ſituation a perſon of integrity; the way in which he obeyed his ſuperiors was by truſting the government of the country, and the education of the young Prince to a perſon who, having been a DANCING GIRL, had been obliged to be a PROSTITUTE by PROFESSION.

To account for this ſtrange conduct in the Governor General, Mr Burke ſays, Munny Begum obtained two lacks of rupees, or about 22,000l ſterling for the ſituation. Mr Haſtings accepted the offer, touched the money, and ſhe, to the diſgrace of the Britiſh government, was placed at the head of affairs.

But the diſobedience of orders did not ſtop here. The Court of Directors ordered Mr Haſtings to make reductions in the Nabob's eſtabliſhments, and cauſe the ſavings to be paid into the Company's treaſury. They ordered him at the ſame time to cauſe regular accounts of thoſe ſavings to be kept, and tranſmitted from time to time to England. But though the reductions were made, no account of the ſavings was kept, at leaſt none were ever tranſmitted to England. The ſaving, however, were known to amount to about 900,000l a year, the whole of which, it was extremely probable, Mr Haſtings had converted to his own private uſe, for what was remarkably ſtrange is, all the tranſactions reſpecting Mohammed Reza Khan and Munny Begum, the Governor General acted without the concurrence or ſo much as the knowledge of his Colleagues in the Council.

Thus all the pains which the Company had taken to place the Nabob out the reach of temptation, or at leaſt of controul, were entirely fruſtrated, and they ſettled upon the Governor General an income of near 300,000l ſterling a year, which had been thought ſufficient for that purpoſe, not only by the Court of Directors, but by the Council of Bengal itſelf.

If Mr Haſtings himſelf was ſo be believed, it was ſufficient not only to ſupport him in the dignity of Governor General, but enable him "in a few years (the preſents ſeem to be to lay by enough to make him comfortable and independent all the reſt of his life.' The priſoner had enjoyed that ſituation near fourteen years, and yet it had been trumpeted abroad by his friends, that he was comparatively poor. In his Minutes in Council, he boaſted that fame and the good opinion of his country were his great objects, before which all conſiderations of fortune or wealth died away.

Prudence of fame for ſervices done to one's country, though not virtue, was certainly the beſt counterfeit of it, the beſt ſubſtitute for it, and was truly laudable. The man who felt an ardent paſſion for honeſt fame would be found ſuperior to every grovelling paſſion; all his actions would partake of the ruling paſſion, and bear the impreſſion of nobleneſs. But no hint of this was to be found in Mr Haſtings: he affected to diſregard a brilliant fortune, and to look only for a competent one, and to court only the good opinion of his country. What was now his intention? He had failed in every thing. By his own declaration, he who wanted a competency only, was a bankrupt in fortune, and he who had conſtantly in view the good opinion of his country, which he conſidered as the great reward of all his labours and ſervices, was now a priſoner at their Lordſhips bar, his COUNTRY his ACCUSER.

The accuſations which ſtood againſt him were not for acts of direful deſolation and ſlaughter. Such acts in general were preſumed crimes, the effects of paſſion or raſhneſs, and conſequently were not likely to be often repeated. But the crimes which were laid to the charge of Mr Haſtings were of the grovelling kind, which did not uſually grow upon the paſſions, but were hatched in cold blood. However, when they were carried to the throne, and ſanctioned by the higheſt authority, then they became not the effects of a momentary paſſion, but the conſequences of a ſyſtematic plan, which originating in a fooliſh ſoul, could never give way to a noble and generous impulſe.

The fountain head being corrupt and impure, the whole ſtream muſt partake of the corruption, the chief ruler himſelf being the example of corruption, muſt neceſſarily encourage, inſtead of repreſſing and deſtroying it, and thus a general ſyſtem of bribery and peculation take place through the whole government. This, Mr Burke ſaid, was a true picture of the public ſervice in Bengal, from one end of it to the other.

Having dwelt long upon this point, Mr Burke next adverted to thoſe acts of corruption of which Nuncomar had given information to the Council.

The charges brought by Nuncomar againſt the Governor General depended upon many circumſtances, and he had named ſo many witneſſes who were to ſupport them, that if they were falſe, he afforded the very beſt means that Mr Haſtings could wiſh to refute them.—But without ever declaring that they were falſe, he refuſed to meet them, he viſited the accuſer, and repeatedly diſſolved the Council, that his colleagues might not be able to proceed in their enquiries into theſe charges. They made ſome progreſs, however, and Nuncomar's evidence together with that of his ſon Rajah Gourdaſs was taken, in which they mentioned the ſums which they themſelves had paid him in the name of Munny Begum, the very ſpecies of coin in which they were paid, the bags in which the money was tied up, and the exchange that was paid, and to whom, for giving the current coin of Calcutta in its ſtead. This was corroborated by a letter from Munny Begum herſelf; and to crown all, Nuncomar deſired that Canto Baboo, Mr. Haſtings's own banyan, might be examined to all theſe points. The Governor General, however, who was bound by regard for his own honour, who was bound by the orders of the Company to enquire into acts of peculation and corruption, and by an act of Parliament, under the authority of which Commiſſioners had been ſent to India for that purpoſe, not only diſobeyed the Company and the Legiſlature, but would not ſuffer his own ſervant to obey either. It might be proper, perhaps, for a man bold in conſcious rectitude, to oppoſe his general character to general accuſation, but it was a mark of weakneſs, not to ſay of guilt, to oppoſe general character to ſpecific accuſations, ſuch as were the charges brought againſt him by Nuncomar. He had indeed reviled that Rajah, called him wretch, and the moſt contemptible of his country.

But Nuncomar was in his own country, by his birth equal in dignity to any Peer among their Lordſhips, in ſacred- reſs

neſs of character to any Biſhop, in gravity of deportment to any Judge, and misfortune to moſt Princes

Here Mr Burke ſaid, that if the Counſel ſhould hereafter be ſo injudicious as to attempt to bring forward the conviction of Nuncomar, for the purpoſe of deſtroying the effect of theſe charges, he would open that ſcene of BLOOD to their Lordſhips' view, and ſhew them how Nuncomar was MURDERED under forms of law

The laſt point on which Mr Burke touched, was the lack and a half of rupees given to Mr Haſtings, as a bribe, when he went to Moorſhedabad, the reſidence of the Nabob of Bengal It appeared that the Treaſurer of that Prince, not knowing under what head of accounts to place the expenditure of that ſum, conſulted the Prince, who deſired him to put it under the head of expences for entertaining Mr Haſtings

Now ſuch expences could not have been incurred on this head, for the entertainment muſt have been not only extravagant, but abſolutely beyond the means of the Nabob, as their Lordſhips ſhould ſee

By order of the Company the Nabob's allowance for all his expences, had been reduced from 250,000l a year to 160,000l now the entertainment of Mr Haſtings, at the rate of a lack and a half of rupees for leſs than three months that he ſtaid with the Nabob, muſt coſt 100l per day, and near 70,000l a year, and as Mr Middleton had alſo a large allowance for entertainments, almoſt the whole of the Nabob's income muſt have been ſpent upon theſe two perſons, a degree of hoſpitality this would be, which no Prince in Aſia or Europe could afford to exerciſe

But what rendered it extremely ſhameful in the Governor General, who admitted that he coſt the Nabob the lack and half of rupees, though he would not allow that he had pocketed the money, to ſuffer ſuch an article as this to appear under the head of entertainment, was, that by the reduction of the Nabob's income, he had reduced to abſolute beggary about fourteen hundred of the decayed nobility and gentry of Bengal, who by the introduction of the Engliſh into this country, were driven from all places, both civil and military, which were engroſſed by theſe foreigners, and had nothing in the world to ſubſiſt upon, but ſmall penſions from the Nabob, which were taken from them when that Prince's allowance was reduced

Had the expence to which Mr Haſtings put the Nabob been allowed for the uſe of this body of gentry, it would have fed them all, numerous as it was, but it was as it were fated, that Mr Haſtings could not ſo much as dine without creating a famine

Thus it was that Mr Haſtings preyed not upon the opulent, but the poor, the needy, and the beggars at their expence did he cram his inſatiable maw

He was not like the Eagle, which ſeemed to pride itſelf in contending with a prey that was able to ſtruggle with it, but he was like a Vulture, that faſtened upon carrion, a prey that could make no reſiſtance

There was a mockery of feeling in the account given by Mr Haſtings of the ſituation of theſe decayed gentlemen He ſaid that he reduced without reluctance the Nabob's elephants, menageries and ſtables, but when he was obliged to cut off the penſions, which he knew to be the only ſupport of theſe unfortunate families, he ſaid his heart was bleeding whilſt he was doing it

EXECRABLE HYPOCRISY! cried Mr Burke, INSULTING PITY! I know not in which this man was moſt cruel—in ſtripping theſe people of their only ſupport—or in pretending to feel for their diſtreſſes, when the daily expence to which his table put the Nabob, would have removed them all

It being by this time four o'clock, Mr Burke ſaid, he would not detain their Lordſhips any longer this day, with the opening of the ſeventh charge

Their Lordſhips then adjourned the Court

THIRTY SEVENTH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22.

The Lords met in their robes as uſual, but on account of the ſudden indiſpoſition of Mr Burke, the Trial was adjourned till Saturday, and a meſſage ſent to the Commons to acquaint them therewith

THIRTY EIGHTH DAY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 25

This day Mr Burke proceeded in his opening of the ſeventh article of impeachment

He reminded their Lordſhips, that when he had laſt the honour of addreſ-ſing

fing them, he ſhewed that from various circumſtances attending many acts of the priſoner's adminiſtration, there was ſtrong ground for preſuming him to be guilty of corruption, and that this preſumption of guilt was turned into certainty by poſitive proofs—ſo that their Lordſhips would have in this caſe the moſt ſatisfactory evidence—preſumptive evidence, ariſing from the nature and circumſtances of the meaſures on which the charge, then under conſideration, was founded—and poſitive evidence, conſiſting either in written documents, or the oral teſtimony of witneſſes

The preſumption of guilt, ariſing out of circumſtances which attended the meaſures of the priſoner's government, was confirmed alſo by a variety of circumſtances that followed thoſe meaſures On this ground he begged leave to go a little at large into the conduct of the priſoner, which, he contended, was of itſelf, and without any other proof, ſufficient to fix upon him the guilt of peculation and corruption

When the Council of Bengal was new modelled, and Sir John Clavering, Colonel Monſon, and Mr Francis, were appointed members of it, orders were ſent out by the Court of Directors to that Council, to enquire into the acts of peculation and oppreſſion that might have been committed upon the natives by any of the Company's ſervants in India

In obedience to theſe orders, the three gentlemen whom he had juſt named ſet on foot an enquiry into the truth of charges of bribery and peculation delivered at the Board againſt the Governor General himſelf But that gentleman, inſtead of meeting the charges with that confidence which became a man bold in conſcious innocence, refuſed to make any defence: nay, he refuſed to meet the accuſers—and reſiſted all enquiry to the utmoſt of his power With this view he repeatedly diſſolved the meetings of the Council, and endeavoured, as far as in him lay, to fruſtrate their reſearches, and to withſtand the authority of the Company, by oppoſing the execution of the orders ſent from the Court of Directors to the Governor-General and Council, to ſet ſuch enquiries on foot

Such a line of conduct could not have been adopted by the priſoner but with a view to ſcreen himſelf from the conſequences which he well knew muſt follow enquiry. The [illegible] to which he was driven in [illegible] circumſtances, at the ſame time that [illegible] to eſcape detection and puniſhment, ſerved only to confirm and give additional weight to the charges that had been brought againſt him.

Notwithſtanding his deſire to be thought innocent, he never once attempted to deny the receipt of the money which he was accuſed of having taken as a bribe, but inſtead of attempting to defend himſelf, began an attack upon his colleagues at the Council Board, whom he charged with partiality, and a kind of conſpiracy to deſtroy his character.

Inſtead of ſhewing that the accuſation which had been recorded againſt him was unfounded, he endeavoured to prove, as far as bare aſſertions could prove it, that Sir John Clavering, Colonel Monſon, and Mr Francis were at the bottom of this accuſation, and that it was on their ſuggeſtion that it was brought

But even if that had been true, and theſe gentlemen had really encouraged others to ſtand forward and accuſe the Governor General, could it be ſaid that it followed from ſuch a circumſtance, that the accuſation was falſe, and that his colleagues had ſuborned and countenanced falſe witneſſes?—Might it not be inferred that the encouragement held out on ſuch an occaſion, might be no more than this—that theſe gentlemen would protect all perſons, who, having any diſcovery to make relative to acts of bribery, corruption, or peculation, committed by any of the Company's ſervants, would ſtand forward, and communicate it to the Board?

As it was at leaſt poſſible that the motives of theſe gentlemen might be good, what could the world think of the only ſpecies of defence made by Mr Haſtings, which conſiſted in nothing but the vilifying and traducing of the gentlemen, who, in obedience to the orders of the Court of Directors, their ſuperiors, were endeavouring to diſcover whether any, and what acts of peculation had been committed by the Engliſh in India, and by whom?

Even if theſe gentlemen had been animated in their enquiry by a ſpirit of hoſtility to Mr Haſtings, and had given evident marks of a determined reſolution to repreſent him to the Court of Directors as guilty of peculation, ſtill,

as in purſuing the enquiry, no matter with what motive, they were in point of fact acting in obedience to the orders of their ſuperiors, it was the duty of the accuſed, at leaſt, to declare that the accuſation brought againſt him was unfounded Had Mr Haſtings done this, he might have availed himſelf afterwards of the advantage which this evident hoſtility of his colleagues would have given him, and made it a collateral part of his defence

But from the day on which the charges were firſt brought, down to the preſent moment, Mr Haſtings had never once ventured to ſay that the grounds of the charges were falſe, and that he had never received the ſums of money which he was accuſed of having taken as bribes

But it was a much eaſier taſk to rail at his colleagues, than to diſprove the charges Unfortunately, however, for Mr Haſtings, the characters of thoſe colleagues ſtood far beyond the reach of his calumny The gentleman amongſt them againſt whom the Governor General levelled his moſt bitter invectives, and whoſe he conſidered as moſt hoſtile to him, was the late Sir John Clavering, whom many of their Lordſhips muſt have known

No one who had ever been acquainted with that worthy man, or with his character, but muſt feel that ſuch a perſon was incapable of acting under the impulſe of the pitiful motives to which Mr Haſtings had aſcribed his conduct The world knew that he had paſſed through the different degrees of the military profeſſion with a character, which pointed him out as a model for the whole army to imitate His reputation for unimpeachable honour and inflexible integrity, endeared him to all his acquaintance, and to the whole army. His heart was as free from the meanneſs which prompts ſome men to ſupplant others, or to injure them in their good name, as his reputation was from ſtain or blemiſh In a word, Sir John Clavering was no leſs an ornament to human nature than to his profeſſion, he was as good a man as he was an able officer.

What advantage then could Mr Haſtings expect to derive from an attempt to impute baſe or diſhonourable motives to ſuch a perſon? This was a queſtion to which Mr Burke ſaid he could give no other anſwer than this—that the priſoner muſt have thought it ſafer to do or ſay any thing rather than plead to the charges brought againſt him, or ſuffer the enquiry to proceed, whilſt the poſſibility of cruſhing it was ſtill in his power

In point of fact, Mr Haſtings derived no advantage from this attack upon Sir John Clavering and his colleagues. The Court of Directors, to whom all the minutes that had been entered in the Council-books by both parties, relative to the charges brought againſt Mr Haſtings, had been ſent, in the moſt expreſs and poſitive manner approved of the conduct of the former, and cenſured the latter for having reſiſted the enquiry which they themſelves had ſtrictly enjoined the Council to inſtitute and purſue and they further commanded Mr Haſtings to give them ſatisfaction on thoſe points which formed the heads of the accuſation againſt him.

But the Court of Directors could not make Mr Haſtings pay obedience to their orders. He promiſed, indeed, that he would explain thoſe points, but he found means to evade the performance of his promiſe

Here Mr Burke obſerved, that when a perſon accuſed ſays he will explain the grounds of the charge, he muſt be conſidered as admitting the facts upon which the charge is founded, though he might afterwards deny the inferences drawn from them For none could be ſo abſurd as to explain what had no exiſtence

But this explanation had never yet been made, the excuſe pleaded by the priſoner, whilſt he was in India was, that as the charges might be made the grounds of a proſecution, or a ſuit in a Court of Law, he ought not to diſcloſe his defence in the firſt inſtance, but to reſerve it till he ſhould be called upon to make it before a proper tribunal

Since his return to England, his excuſe was, that as no ſuit or proſecution was commenced againſt him, he conſidered the buſineſs as dropt, and a defence conſequently unneceſſary

Thus this excellent maſter of the ſcience of defence was able to parry off the neceſſity of explaining his conduct by means the moſt ſingular and oppoſite If the accuſation was to end in a trial, he was not to explain before trial, and if the proſecution was ſuffered to ſleep, then there could be no neceſſity for an explanation. ſo that the charges might remain unanſwered for ever

Mr. Burke begged leave to make a remark or two upon the danger which the prisoner accordingly said might attend him, if he was to explain the grounds of the charges, whilst there was a possibility that they might terminate in a trial.

From the good fellowship in which it appeared to their Lordships that Mr Hastings and Sir Elijah Impey lived, they would see that the former could have no great occasion for much anxiety about the event of any suit that might be instituted against him in the Court of the latter. Sir Elijah Impey was not a likely man to strain the law to make it reach Mr Hastings, particularly to favour a false accusation The prisoner, therefore, could not be deterred by any apprehension of danger in India, from an explanation of his conduct

The next thing then to be considered was, whether he had any thing to apprehend in a Court of Law in England from such explanation

He certainly had not, if Mr Hastings himself might be believed for in recommending to the Court of Directors a plan which he himself had proposed in the early part of his administration, which would have left all the Company's servants in India at the mercy of the Governor General, who might dismiss them from the service without giving them a hearing, he said, that the forms of proceeding and rules of evidence laid down and established in the Courts of Law in England, would rather facilitate the escape of an Oriental delinquent from punishment, though the cries of the people should call for vengeance on him, than enable the Company to bring him to punishment.

Upon this principle, then, it might be said, that Mr Hastings had sheltered himself from the necessity of explaining his conduct, under the apprehension of a trial from which he had nothing to fear, not because he was innocent, but because the law could not reach him, on account of the particular circumstances of places, persons, and distance.

The scruples and delicacy of Mr. Hastings might therefore be safely pronounced to be affected, or assumed only for the purpose of evading the promise of an explanation, because he knew he could not explain away the force of the accusation, or establish his innocence

If it had been from an idea that it would be lowering his dignity to defend himself against charges conceived to be unworthy of notice, whom he considered as his inferiors in the Council, surely he would have availed himself of the opportunity which the death of Sir John Clavering and Colonel Monson gave him, and by which he was reinstated in the plenitude of power, to prove that those gentlemen had been actuated by malice against him, and that the charges had not even a shadow of foundation in truth.

But had he since their death attempted to prove any such thing? No; he had ever since observed a silence upon those charges, which nothing could force him to break —Innocence owed it to itself to plead at least not guilty, and declared a false charge to be false. But Mr Hastings had not paid even this faint tribute to innocence Why? Because he was not innocent GUILT had put a SEAL upon his lips, which nothing could break.

Had there been in the breast of Mr. Hastings a spark of that honest indignation, which never fails to fire the breast of an innocent person wrongfully accused, the language and sentiments which Sir John Clavering had held and entertained of him, and which he had recorded in the archives of the East-India Company, would have made it blaze forth.

In a minute entered by Sir John, and which was read by Mr. Burke, that General declared, "that Mr. Hastings had made himself a degraded character in the eyes both of India and of Europe, for his peculation, his corruption, and oppressions"

Such language as this had been sufficient to make Mr Hastings vindicate his innocence and his honour, by entering upon his defence. He did not dare to defend himself, because he knew he could not but disclose his GUILT, if he was to attempt to answer the charges

What, said Mr. Burke, could make this proud and haughty Ruler of India submit to such language, and bear with such opprobrium? Guilt, conscious guilt. The cursed love of money had got possession of his heart; and in the contemplation of his detested WEALTH, he found sufficient consolation for the loss of character and of honour. Under the lash of Sir John Clavering

Clavering, and the execration of all Asia, he seemed to say with the Poet—

—Populus me sibilat, at mihi plaudo—
—et nummos contempl'or in arcâ.

"It was this love of money that had made him deaf to the calls of glory, and callous to the feelings of honour. It was this unbounded and insatiable passion for money, that had seared his conscience and his feelings, and happy in the accumulation of wealth, even by the foulest means, he could hear, unmoved, the most cutting reproaches of Sir John Clavering. "He lay down "in his STYE of INFAMY—WALLOWED in the FILTH of DISGRACE—and FATTENED upon the OFFALS "and EXCREMENTS of DISHONOUR." He suffered his name to be branded not only to cotemporaries, but to posterity, by the charges and observations recorded by Sir John Clavering against him in the archives of the Company. Whilst that gentleman lived, Mr Hastings did not dare to meet those charges, nor had he attempted to give the least answer to them even after his death: they remained to this day unanswered, and unrefuted.

Posterity would not credit the aspersions to which Mr Hastings had had recourse, instead of a defence, and which he dealt so liberally upon Sir John Clavering and his colleagues.

The records of the Company would shew how little these aspersions were founded. The panegyrics pronounced by the Court of Directors upon Sir John Clavering, and recorded in their archives, bore a glorious testimony to the honour, character and merits of that great man. When tired out by the constant opposition given by Mr Hastings to the execution of every plan either recommended or commanded by the Company, Sir John Clavering sent home a resignation of his seat at the Council Board, the Court of Directors refused to accept it, and gave for reason, that his retreat from the Council Board would be an irreparable injury to the Company's service. They at the same time bestowed the most unequivocal and unqualified approbation on the whole of his conduct, whilst he had been in their service; and entreated him, by his love for his country, not to think of resigning a situation in which he had done so much good, and in which so much more remained to be done.

Sir John Clavering died soon after, and literally of a broken heart. Mr Burke read from one of the Company's books part of a letter written on that occasion to the Governor and Council, in which they spoke in terms of the most warm panegyric of the deceased, and expressed a deep concern for the heavy loss which the Company had sustained by his death.

Here Mr Burke asked if such a man, so revered and honoured, were capable of bringing unfounded accusations, or countenancing false accusers. He asked, whether there was a man upon earth, how bold soever he might be in conscious innocence, Mr Hastings excepted, who would have thought lightly of charges countenanced by such a man as General Clavering? He said he was sure that every man who had a character that could be injured by an accusation, would have thought it necessary to defend it, when the name of Sir John Clavering was in any degree connected with the charge, because such a name would give a weight to it, in the opinion of the world, even though the witnesses might not be the most unimpeachable men.

Why then did not Mr Hastings meet the charges under such circumstances? Because, said Mr Burke, he was guilty, and could not but expose his guilt, by attempting to disprove it. This presumption against the prisoner grew naturally out of the circumstances of the case, and in the opinion of all impartial men ought to be considered as tantamount to an admission of the charge.

Mr Burke next observed, that the prisoner had invariably mistaken his own situation, he considered the Company, in the case of the charges alluded to, as plaintiffs and prosecutors, and himself as a defendant, whereas the true relation in which they stood to each other, was that of MASTERS and SERVANT. When the Directors required him to explain the grounds of his conduct in this case, he declined obedience to their requisition, and said he would reserve his defence for a Court of Law.

Mr Burke asked their Lordships, what any one of them would think of such language from his steward. If a steward was suspected or accused of oppressing the tenants, dilapidating the estate, and embezzling the rents, and his Lordship should desire him to explain his conduct, and remove the grounds of ſuſpicion; what would be the aſtoniſhment of that Lord, if he ſhould hear his ſteward reply, "I will "give no explanation now; bring your "action againſt me, I will reſerve my "defence for a Court of Law."

This was the preciſe language that Mr Haſtings held to the Court of Directors, his MASTERS, to whom, as their SERVANT, he owed OBEDIENCE, and to whom he was of courſe bound, when they required it, to explain his conduct.—But it was not very ſurprizing that a man ſhould pertinaciouſly with-hold explanation, however goaded he might be to give it, when explanation could ſerve only to confirm the accuſation.

Mr Haſtings relied, however, for an excuſe upon one circumſtance; and that was, that the Company had ordered a caſe to be made for the opinion of Counſel, whether there were grounds in the charges brought by Nuncomar, upon which a proſecution againſt Mr Haſtings might be maintained by the Company. The priſoner plumed himſelf upon the opinion given by the Counſel, which was againſt a proſecution.

Mr Burke ſaid, that conſidering the manner in which the caſe was ſtated, it was not poſſible for the Counſel to recommend a proſecution. It was not wantonly that he would bring in the names of other people into a buſineſs, in which he meant to criminate Mr Haſtings only; but he muſt ſay this of the caſe in queſtion, which was made out for Counſel, that it was not fairly or truly drawn. He charged it with MISREPRESENTATION, SUPPRESSION, and FALSIFICATION.

The Company's Solicitor, Mr Smith, who drew the caſe, had not been long in his ſituation as Solicitor to the Company, when the caſe was drawn up, and probably many of the hiſtorical parts of it were ſupplied by ſome perſons at the India Houſe, who were friends to Mr Haſtings, and who conſequently wiſhed to make out ſuch a caſe as muſt make Counſel adviſe the Company not to bring a proſecution againſt the Governor General. But though in juſtice to Mr Smith he premiſed this obſervation, he ſaid he muſt add one other obſervation reſpecting that gentleman, and ſay, that it appeared that the very man who made out that caſe for the opinion of Counſel, was at this moment the Solicitor of Mr Haſtings, and conducted his defence.

Having ſtated this, Mr. Burke made ſeveral remarks upon the caſe made by Mr. Smith. Miſrepreſentation, he ſaid, was to be found in the very outſet, where it informed the Counſel, that Mr. Haſtings was accuſed of having improperly received certain ſums of money from the Guardian of the Nabob of Bengal.

Now this was not all the ground of the accuſation. Mr. Haſtings was not charged with having taken money from the Nabob's guardian, but for having removed that Prince's own mother from the guardianſhip of her ſon, and for ſelling it for a ſum of money to the Nabob's ſtep-mother, who had been a dancing girl, and conſequently a proſtitute.

After ſuch a ſtatement at the outſet, their Lordſhips might naturally expect that the whole was calculated to prevent a proſecution——which was preciſely the fact. For to the Caſe was ſubjoined an Appendix, conſiſting of all the minutes entered by Mr Haſtings in the Company's books, with a view to deſtroy the credit of the witneſſes who were to ſupport the charges. But not a ſyllable was added of the minutes entered by Sir John Clavering, Colonel Monſon, and Mr Francis, in reply to the former, and in vindication of the witneſſes, and defence of the charges. Who then could adviſe a proſecution, when the only witneſſes who were to ſupport it, were deſcribed to the Counſel as infamous, and undeſerving of any degree of credit?

Having dwelt long upon this point, Mr Burke reverted to the caſe of Mohammed Reza Khan. This perſon, he ſaid, had been reinſtated in his office of Chief Juſtice, by General Clavering, Colonel Monſon, and Mr Francis; and the DANCING GIRL, Munny Begum, was removed from the adminiſtration of affairs. But no ſooner were General Clavering and Colonel Monſon dead, than Mr Haſtings, who by their death had acquired a majority in Council, diſmiſſed Mohammed Reza Khan again, and reſolved to reſtore the DANCING GIRL to her former power.

To give a colour to his proceedings, and ſo blind the public as that they might not think he had any hand in the latter part of the revolution, he procured a letter to be ſent to him by the Nabob, in which his Highneſs ſtated, that that being then of full age, it was his desire to take into his own hands the appointment of his officers, and to commit to Munny Begum, of whose prudence he had the highest opinion, the management of his affairs.

Three days after, this letter was followed by another, in which the Nabob complained that it had been rumoured that the former letter had been procured from him by the influence of Munny Begum, and without his approbation. This report, he said, was injurious to his honour, and he called upon Mr Hastings to name to him the authors of the rumour, that they might be punished.

The whole of this proceeding was truly farcical, for Mr Hastings himself had always described this Prince as a man of no parts, and incapable of directing or superintending any affair of importance. This description of him was confirmed by letters from Lord Cornwallis. And yet this was the Prince to whom Mr Hastings affected to think he was bound to commit the administration of the Nizamud.

Though it was well known that this Prince was allowed only the shadow of royalty, and was in reality no more than a pensioner of the Company, Mr Hastings said that as he was a sovereign Prince, his rights, and particularly the appointment of his own officers, could not be with-held from him without injustice.

But upon another occasion, Mr Hastings shewed he made light of those sovereign rights, and disregarded them at pleasure. For when a reconciliation took place between him and Mr Francis, the latter stipulated as a condition of it, that the honest Mohammed Reza Khan should be restored to the office of Chief Justice. Mr Hastings accordingly wrote to the Nabob, desiring that he would dismiss the Chief Justice whom he had appointed, and take back Mohammed Reza Khan. The sovereign Prince obeyed the mandate, and Mohammed was restored.

But soon after, when Mr Hastings thought he could do without the support of Mr Francis, who had sacrificed his own opinion on many smaller points to a regard for the public service during the Mahratta war, he once more removed Mohammed, and Munny Begum was restored to the full possession of the government.

Thus in the short space of two or three years, had four revolutions been effected in the native government of Bengal by Mr Hastings, and for corrupt purposes.—In the first instance, he had received two lacks of rupees for putting the government of the country into the hands of a dancing girl: but it was not to be supposed that he received no more, there was reason to believe that he got 100,000l. but the receipt of the two lacks could be proved by something stronger than suspicion.

It could be proved also that he had received 16,000l more, which was charged under the head of entertainments but this was only a name given to conceal a bribe. Mr Hastings had charged the Company 3600l for his expences whilst he was at the place where this supposed entertainment was given. This was a pretty round extra sum for a man's table for three months, who let him be where he would must eat; and by charging for his table, saved those expences which must have been incurred, had he remained in Calcutta.

An entertainment that might cost 600l would not ruin or embarrass the Nabob, and Mr Hastings might have partaken of it without any impropriety; but when the Nabob was charged with a like sum DAILY, for THREE MONTHS, their Lordships would see that the revenues of that Prince must be unequal to such an expence, and the man could not be said to have any regard for him, for the Company, or for his own honour, who would suffer such an expence to be incurred.

It was no excuse for Mr Hastings to say, such entertainments to visitors were customary in India, and that he ought to conform to what he found to be an established custom. But it was a maxim in law—malus usus abolendus. That must be a bad custom which ruined the fortunes of individuals, and Mr Hastings, so far from thinking it was his duty to conform to it, should have made it a point to abolish it, if possible, by discountenancing it.

Lord Coke, speaking of the Brehon law in Ireland, and the coshering, &c. that was countenanced by it, to the ruin of the tenantry, called it a legal custom; and blamed the English settlers in Ireland for having conformed to it, instead of abolishing what they saw was a grievous burden to the people.

That it was usual in India to entertain tain visitors in a ſtile of magnificence, was not a good plea in the mouth of Mr. Haſtings.

He was not at the time alluded to a viſitor, his journey to Moorſhadabad had more of a VISITATION in it than a viſit, and was attended with lamentable effects to thoſe hundreds of nobles who were deprived by Mr Haſtings of their daily bread

There was a ſtriking proof againſt Mr Haſtings, which ſhewed that the money charged under the head of entertainment had not been expended in entertaining him, but had actually found its way into his own pocket —And this proof was, that no one in Moorſhadabad had ſeen or heard of theſe coſtly entertainments Of all the virtues there was only one which derived luſtre from concealment, and that was charity PUBLICITY was part of the SPLENDOR of ALL OTHERS, particularly HOSPITALITY

When an entertainment was given to great perſonages, preparations were made, and numbers of gueſts were invited to do honour to thoſe for whom the feaſt was made but when a prodigious ſum, ſuch as 16,000l was ſaid to have been expended in an entertainment, which had made no noiſe, which had not been heard of in the city where it was ſuppoſed to have been given, it was natural for people to ſuſpect, that there was a myſtery in the buſineſs, calculated to conceal ſome tranſaction which could not bear the day

Mr Burke having got thus far, informed their Lordſhips, that he would not take up any more of their time this day, but would, he hoped, be able to conclude his opening the next day he ſhould have the honour of addreſſing their Lordſhips

He obſerved that there were two grounds of evidence on which he intended to ſupport the ſeventh charge; the one ariſing from concealment; the other from detection, or confeſſion of the perſoner, who finding it impoſſible to conceal any longer from the ſcrutinizing eye of Parliament his many and enormous bribes, at laſt confeſſed that he had received certain ſums of money privately, and made a merit of diſcovering what he ſaid he might have kept for ever from the knowledge of the world.

One of theſe two grounds of evidence, Mr Burke ſaid, he had already opened to their Lordſhips, the other he intended to open as briefly as poſſible at the next ſitting of the Court

Here Mr Burke concluded for the day, and their Lordſhips adjourned the Court a little before four o'clock to April 30

On THURSDAY, APRIL 30, as ſoon as the Lord Chancellor had taken the Woolſack, in the Houſe of Peers, Mr Hobart brought a meſſage from the Commons, intimating a deſire, on account of ſome particular circumſtances attending the trial of Warren Haſtings, that their Lordſhips would defer that trial to a future day *.

This meſſage being read, and taken into conſideration,

Earl Stanhope propoſed that the requeſt of the Commons ſhould be complied with, and moved, that the trial of Warren Haſtings, Eſq be poſtponed till Tueſday next (May 5)

The Earl of Hopetoun then moved, that the order for the reſumption of that trial on this day be diſcharged, and that a new order be made for Tueſday, which was agreed to

Mr Hobart being called in again, was informed of this determination, and deſired to acquaint the Commons with it

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MONDAY, April 20

THEIR Lordſhips met purſuant to their laſt adjournment

Sir William Chambers attended in conſequence of an order of the Houſe, and made his report of what had been done for the accommodation of their Lordſhips in St. Paul's Cathedral on the approaching day of Thankſgiving

Lord Sydney then made ſeveral motions to

* This requeſt proceeded from the Buſineſs agitated in the Houſe of Commons on April 27, 30, May 1, and 4, and for which the reader is referred to the Proceedings of the Commons in the ſubſequent part of this Number.

the

These motions received the assent of the House, and at four o clock an adjournment took place

TUESDAY, April 21

The Bill for repealing the Shop Tax was read a second time

The Duke of Norfolk called upon Ministers to know, whether this country was in so flourishing a state as to bear the loss of this without imposing fresh taxes in lieu thereof, and at the same time to continue paying off part of the national debt? If so, he was very happy to hear it He acknowledged that the shop-tax was a partial and oppressive tax, and ought to be repealed, and for that reason he should not oppose the Bill being committed He had been told the tax fell very short in its produce of what it had been imagined it would have produced Some had set it down at 150,000l per annum, but he had been told the annual receipts had never exceeded 70,000l

No Lord rising to satisfy his Grace, the Bill was committed for Saturd y

WEDNESDAY, April 22

The Lord Chancellor informed their Lordships, that before coming down to the House he had received notice, that the Right Hon Manager, who had on Tuesday begun to open the seventh charge against Mr Hastings, was unable, in consequence of indisposition, to proceed with his opening this day, and moved to adjourn the trial to Saturday Ordered

SATURDAY, April 25

The Bill to repeal the Shop Tax was read a third time and passed without any debate, and a message was sent to the Commons to inform them of the same

Lord Sydney presented a large volume containing the evidence given before the Lords of Trade upon the subject of the Slave Trade, containing the several representations made by the House of Assembly in Jamaica and the other Islands, relative to the state thereof, and moved that a sufficient number of copies be printed for the use of the Lords. Ordered.

MONDAY, April 27.

The Judges made their appearance this day in the House, to give their opinion in a writ of error, Andrew Foley, Esq suing the plaintiff in error, and John Bussell (Sheriff of London) and James Armstrong, defendants The case was, that at the suit of John Grant, the Sheriff had seized and sold under an execution, silver plate of the value of 842l 4s in the year 1779, at the house of Mr Edward Foley, in Portland Place. It was alledged in defence, that this plate was not amenable to Edward Foley s debts, as it was a part of a conveyance made by the late Lord Foley to his heir in tail for ever, and that Edward Foley, without the privity of the plaintiff in error, conveyed this plate to Portland-Place, where it was taken in execution The plaintiff having brought an action against the Sheriff at Worcester assizes, when the Jury gave a special verdict, an injunction had been obtained to prevent the Sheriff from selling, but in 1783, the plate was sold under a new execution In 1786, the cause would have been argued in the King's Bench, but the Court would not hear it, under an idea that the real property of the plate had been determined between the remaining branches of the Foley family in the House of Peers The plaintiff in error had now brought his appeal for the sum of 842l 4s

Earl Bathurst moved that the judgments given in this business should be affirmed; which being agreed to, he moved, that the plaintiff do pay the defendants 50l costs This motion was also agreed to

Then Lordships then adjourned to

THURSDAY, April 30

The Marquis of Stafford informed the House, that he had received information of his attendance being necessary to give evidence before the Committee appointed to examine into the merits of the petitions against the return of the late election for Westminster His Lordship expressed his readiness to attend as a witness on the Committee, if their Lordships would give him leave

Leave was immediately granted to his Lordship

HOUSE

HOUSE of COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 20

THE House aſſembled for the firſt time after the Eaſter receſs.

The Hon Mr Villiers ſaid he was inſtructed by the committee who had been appointed to enquire into the forms adopted by this Houſe in going to St Paul's to return thanks, that the public ſtreets of Weſtminſter and many ſcaffolds and temporary erections had been made for the 23d inſt which from the ſlightneſs of their conſtruction ſeemed to be very inſecure. He did not know of any law to prevent ſuch erections, but thought that ſome ſteps ought to be taken by the Houſe in this buſineſs.

Sir Joſeph Mawbey was of opinion, the Commiſſioners of the Pavement had power to put a ſtop to theſe temporary buildings.

Mr Rolfe replied, that if the Commiſſioners interfered, a contingent ſtoppage would enſue, which could not now take place. The Houſe, however, might interpoſe by ſhort Bill.

Mr Minchin took notice of the great danger attending ſuch weak and haſty ſcaffoldings.

Mr Roſe moved, that Mr Edward Waters, a ſurveyor, be called to the bar.

This gentleman accordingly appeared, and depoſed, in anſwer to a few queſtions from Mr Roſe, Mr Villiers, and Sir George Cornwall, that the ſcaffolds he had ſeen in Weſtminſter were exceedingly inſecure, and that ſeveral more, he was informed, were erecting, which would in all probability ſuffer from them being filled with people.

Mr Villiers moved, that a Committee be immediately appointed to examine the ſcaffolds and other public buildings erected to the Weſt of Temple Bar, in the ſtreets and avenues leading to St Paul's.

This motion was agreed to, and the ſame gentlemen who formed the Committee appointed on the 5th inſt were named Members of this new Committee, with the addition of Lord John Townſhend, Meſſrs Fox, Wilkes, Manwaring, and ſuch Members of the Houſe as were of the long robe.

TUESDAY, April 21

On the breaking up of the Court in Weſtminſter-hall, the Houſe was reſumed, and the Speaker gave notice from the chair, that the Surveyor of the Board of Works had been with him in the morning, and had informed him, that proper accommodations had been provided for the Commons in St Paul's Cathedral for the 23d inſtant.

Mr Villiers preſented the report of the Committee appointed to examine and enquire into the ſtate of ſcaffolds, erections, &c from St James's to Temple Bar. It ſtated, that they had examined Mr Waters, Sir William Chambers, Mr Drake, and other Surveyors, who all agreed, that a number of the erections were extremely inſecure and dangerous, not only to the lives of thoſe they were meant to contain, but alſo to thoſe who ſhould be paſſing under them; that many of them were ſcarcely able to ſuſtain their own weight, under a number of others that could not reſiſt the preſſure that would be againſt them, but muſt fly into the ſtreets, bringing down thoſe that occupied them, that the danger was ſtill greater, in admitting people behind parapet walls, from the bad ſtate of the coping in general, and the looſeneſs of the ſtones, that the Surveyors had admoniſhed the inhabitants to ſtop proceeding in that manner, but, in moſt inſtance, without the ſmalleſt effect. The ſituations moſt adverted to in the report, were in St Martin's lane, Exeter Change, and oppoſite the two churches in the Strand.

Mr Villiers moved, that the report be printed, which was ordered.

Mr Pitt then ſaid, that he hoped the printing of the report would of itſelf go a great way in preventing the dangers expreſſed in it. At all events, the interval was too ſhort for any formal proceeding to be taken. The mode, however, which he thought moſt adviſeable to purſue, would be, that as expence in building could be no object to the public, when employed for the preſervation of the lives of his majeſty's ſubjects, wherever the ſcaffolding were ſuch as could be made perfectly ſecure by any addition or ſupport, that addition ſhould be made at the expence of the public, but where perfect ſecurity was not attainable by ſuch addition, the public ſhould make good to the inhabitants the expence already incurred, together with ſuch other compenſation as might be thought reaſonable. But if henceforth any perſon ſhould preſume to erect inſecure ſcaffoldings, it would be the duty of the Magiſtrates to demoliſh them, in which caſe the Houſe would certainly protect them againſt any actions which might be brought againſt them for ſuch proceeding.

WEDNESDAY, April 22

The Speaker and many of the Members attended in the forenoon, but the ſudden indiſpoſition of Mr Burke prevented them from proceeding to Weſtminſter-Hall. An adjournment therefore immediately took place till the morrow, when they were to aſſemble merely for the purpoſe of going in proceſſion to St Paul's.

SATURDAY, April 25

Immediately after the adjournment of the Court in Weſtminſter Hall, the Speaker took the chair, and proceeded to buſineſs, when ſome Provincial Bills were read a firſt time, and others a ſecond time

The Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared at the Bar, with the report of the proceedings of the Committee of Privy Council, on the ſubject of trade in general, and particularly of the Slave Trade

On account of the magnitude of this report, the Miniſter thought it adviſeable to poſtpone the time of entering on the diſcuſſion of the Slave Trade, which now ſtood for the 27th inſt As this report was ſo copious, Gentlemen, he ſaid, would not have ſufficient time for inſpecting it by the 27th, for which reaſon he would move for the diſcharge of the former order, with a view of fixing the Committee on the Slave Trade for Tueſday ſennight, the 4th of May

The order for the 27th inſt was read by the Clerk, and, on the Miniſter's motion, diſcharged

He then moved, that this Houſe will on Tueſday week enter into a general Committee, to conſider of the various petitions againſt the Slave Trade

Mr Giſcoyne wiſhed that more time might be allowed for the conſideration of ſo ample a report on ſo important a ſubject He therefore hoped that the Right Hon Gentleman would alter his motion to Tueſday fortnight, the 12th of next month

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was of opinion that Tueſday ſennight was late enough, and was therefore unwilling to alter his motion But if Gentlemen, in the courſe of the enſuing week, ſhould think there would not be ſufficient time, by the 5th of May, to make themſelves maſters of the ſubject in queſtion, he would then conſent to lengthen the time

The motion was then put and agreed to.

Adjourned till

MONDAY, April 27

Major Scott ſaid he held a petition in his hand from Warren Haſtings Eſq who was, now upon his trial for high crimes and miſdemeanours this petition, he ſaid, ſtated, that a Right Hon Member of that Houſe (Mr Burke) whom the Houſe had appointed to conduct this trial, had in the courſe of the proſecution introduced a great deal of extraneous matter, and which had not been found by the Houſe The Major obſerved, that although twenty charges had been exhibited at the bar of the Lords againſt Mr Haſtings, yet only ſeven charges had been maturely conſidered, and that no member in the Houſe but himſelf had read the laſt thirteen charges At the ſame time that the Right Hon Manager introduced this foreign and extraneous matter, he was always affirming that every thing that he advanced was upon the authority of that Houſe, and that he had all his inſtructions from it

The Honourable Major next adverted to particulars, to the famous ſtory of the Three Seals, to the affair of Devi Sing, &c. which had been mentioned by Mr Burke a twelvemonth ago But the principal part of the petition related to an aſſertion which Mr. Burke was ſuppoſed to make laſt Tueſday in Weſtminſter Hall The petition ſtated, that he had then accuſed Mr Haſtings of murdering Nundcomar by the hands of Sir Elijah Impey Major Scott contended that theſe charges were all foreign to the proſecution, that they were not to be found among thoſe which had been conſidered by the Commons, and that they implied a higher degree of criminality than a mole of which Mr Haſtings had been accuſed by the Houſe At the ſame time he had no opportunity of anſwering them He therefore prayed in his petition, that he might have an opportunity of anſwering theſe charges, or that the Houſe would give him ſuch other redreſs as they in their wiſdom ſhould ſee proper

Major Scott took notice of the very great delay that had taken place in this trial, and of the vaſt expence Mr Haſtings had been put to upon that account He was going to ſtate ſomething that had happened in the Houſe of Lords relative to this trial, when he was called to order by the Speaker

Mr Fox then roſe and ſaid, he conceived every thing that had been ſaid by the Honourable Gentleman was irregular and unprecedented

Mr Pitt was of a different opinion

Major Scott ſaid, that all thoſe extraneous facts, which had been advanced by the Hon Manager, were falſe and ill founded, and that the Hon Manager had coolly and deliberately miſrepreſented facts, knowingly and wittingly This he pledged himſelf to prove by ſatisfactory evidence, or if he did not, that he ought to be excluded from the ſociety of mankind, and was willing to be turned out at that door, pointing to the door of the Houſe

The Major then read the petition, which contained the ſubſtance of what we have ſtated, and concluded with moving that it might be brought up

When this motion was put from the chair,

Mr Fox declared that this motion was ſo new and unprecedented, that he hoped and truſted it would be negatived He wiſhed to conſider three things, 1ſt, the object of this motion, 2dly, the complainants and by

3dly, those to whom the complaint was made

1st, As to the object of the petition, which complained of certain expressions that had been used by the accuser more than a twelvemonth ago; if Mr Hastings had any complaint to make, he ought to have made it within a reasonable time This he had not done in this case, which was the strongest proof that he had no real complaint If any Member means to observe on words used by any other Member, he must do it immediately after those words have been uttered This rule was founded in excellent sense, for it was obvious that it was only then he could give any tolerable account of the words, when they were clear in his memory

2dly, As to the complainant, was he one of his Hon Friends who had the honour to conduct the prosecution No Was he any Hon Member on that side of the House? No Was the complainant a Member of Parliament? He was not Had he been a Member of the House, Mr Fox said, this circumstance would have had great weight with him, but when he considered that the complainant was the culprit himself, it was impossible but that there must be expressions that would be disagreeable to him The fact was, that every thing, every part of the prosecution was disagreeable to Mr Hastings and his agents, and his Hon Friend might look upon it as a compliment paid to his industry, his oratory and abilities, that such a petition had been presented For his part, he was no way solicitous to conduct the prosecution in a way agreeable to Mr Hastings, but in such a manner as was agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience, to promote the ends of public justice, and, if possible, to bring them to punishment If the culprit himself was allowed to present petitions to that House whenever he was pinched, he could by this means divert the prosecution, by turning his accusers into culprits and criminals This was unexampled in the Journals of that House, or in the history of this country

3dly, With respect to those to whom this complaint was made, it was the Commons He contended that it ought to have been the Lords, who were his judges If any thing improper had been said, their Lordships heard it, and might have stopped the prosecutor The Commons might remove the present Managers, if they thought they had misconducted themselves, and appoint new Managers But Mr Fox was of opinion, that when the House of Commons appointed a Committee to conduct any trial, they must leave that Committee to exercise their best judgment on this business He thought they had been unfairly dealt with They had a most arduous task to perform, they had a most powerful culprit to conflict with, a man who had been Governor-General of India for fourteen years successively, who had it in his power to confer many obligations, and had procured many friends They had to contend with all the power and all the corruption of India; and now the House of Commons, who had appointed him and his friends to prosecute this man, were going to desert them, by withdrawing their support He thought this extremely hard, unfair, and treacherous, and begged of the House never to let it appear on the Journals of that House, that any petition presented by a culprit should be attended to This was totally unknown in other nations, and perfectly subversive of all the principles of justice

Mr Pitt said, he agreed perfectly with what the Right Honourable Gentleman had advanced in the conclusion of his speech, with regard to the support that was proper to be given to the conductors of this prosecution; the character, honour and dignity of that House and of this country were deeply involved in it But the single question before the House was this the House having given limited powers to the Managers to conduct this trial in a particular way, and only to try him for certain misdemeanours, shall the Managers have a discretionary power to exceed their authority, and to accuse Mr Hastings of any crimes and misdemeanours they please? He apprehended not If the Managers transgressed the limits of their authority, they were accountable to that House, from whom their authority was derived, and not to the House of Lords. The Lords could not stop him Suppose a Manager only uttered a few improper words, as that Mr. Hastings killed Nundcomar thro' the agency of Sir Elijah Impey, it was impossible for their Lordships to prevent this, because the words are pronounced before they are aware And although they were not, but that when those words were uttered the Lord Chancellor had said, "You must stop there," that would have been but a poor satisfaction to Mr Hastings He was ready to confess that there was a wide distinction between the words used a year ago, and those respecting the murder of Nundcomar, which were spoken very recently, and the petition had been presented the very next day complaining of these words, which he regarded as the principal part of the petition As to the expressions used last session, Mr Hastings ought undoubtedly to have presented a petition within a reasonable time, if he thought himself aggrieved by them He saw no objection to this petition being brought up; there seemed to be nothing irregular or disorderly orderly in it He thought the honour and justice of the House were bound to do it It was a privilege of the meaneſt ſubject of this country, and for what reaſon ſhould they deny to Mr Haſtings what every man claimed as a privilege, who enjoyed the rights of a citizen of this country? At the ſame time, though he thought the petition ought to be brought up, he did not ſay what would be proper to be done on it If murder was a crime, undoubtedly an injury had been ſuffered by Mr Haſtings, of which it could make no addition to his other crimes But every gentleman remembered that the execution of Nundcomar had undergone a ſolemn diſcuſſion in that Houſe, and that Sir Elijah Impey had been acquitted as principal, and although this did not go perhaps to acquit Mr Haſtings as an abettor of the death of Nundcomar, yet it certainly went a great way towards it, for the jury who acquitted Sir Elijah Impey as principal, would hardly have condemned Mr Haſtings as an abettor

Mr Burke ſaid, he believed he muſt look at ſome diſtance for a character and approbation—to cool and diſpaſſionate poſterity He had hitherto truſted to the goodneſs of the cauſe, and to the approbation of his own mind The Houſe had appointed him the proſecutor of Mr Haſtings, and he had executed that important truſt in ſuch a manner as appeared moſt agreeable to his own beſt judgment, and was moſt conſiſtent with the honour and dignity of the Houſe, and if after he had gone through ſuch a world of labour and fatigue, they thought proper to remove him, he ſhould not be ſorry for it it was what he wanted—he would then enjoy eaſe and quiet, and be happy Mr Burke openly and generouſly confeſſed that he had ſaid Mr Haſtings had put to death Nundcomar through the agency of Sir Elijah Impey, becauſe he thought it eſſential to the proſecution He alſo adverted to the other charges in the petition, and explained his reaſons for mentioning them He adverted to a paper which contained 1441 which Major Scott was ſaid to have received in 1778. for certain writings One item was 50l for an attack on Burke's veracity Mr Burke ſaid he was very ſorry that his veracity had ſold ſo cheap, though he could not help it

Mr Burke, in juſtifying his conduct, went into a vaſt field of argument and obſervation, in which we ſhall not attempt to follow him

Mr Wyndham ſpoke againſt the bringing up the petition, and contended, that if an accuſer were not permitted to mention any other crimes but thoſe particularly ſpecified, it would neceſſarily put an end to all legal proceedings and to all public juſtice for it is natural to ſuppoſe that crimes are cloſely connected together and that one of them may be proved through the medium of the other If this principle was not to be admitted, the offender could ſeldom be brought to juſtice He deſired gentlemen to conſider a little the enormous load of buſineſs that preſſed on the Managers and that if the Houſe of Commons received this petition, inſtead of ſupporting the Managers in their proſecution, which it was certainly their duty to do, they would throw many new impediments in their way, for there might be no end of petitions, and the labour, which was already ſo great in Weſtminſter Hall, would be protracted ad infinitum, and Mr Haſtings would never be convicted He conceived the Lords were the proper judges of this buſineſs, and if the Commons interfered in it, they would throw an inſult on the Lords It would be ſaying, "We were obliged to take notice of that which you ought to have cenſured" He thought this petition was preſented merely for the purpoſe of inſulting his Hon Friend

Mr Fox ſaid, the Hon Major, by the bye, had taken notice of the great delay that had been occaſioned in this proſecution, but they were all well acquainted with the circumſtances of the country a ſhort time ago, which ſufficiently accounted for the delay, and he was certain there was not a man in the Houſe, who thought the trial would have commenced this very ſingle day but for what actually did Haſtings ſhould not be tried but if he were, he ſhould like to have an agent who reſembled a man like Major Scott

Nundcomar accuſed Mr Haſtings of bribery, Mr Haſtings the accuſed him of forgery, and Nundcomar was hanged, becauſe Sir Elijah Impey was Chief Juſtice His Right Hon Friend had accuſed Mr. Haſtings of High Crimes and Miſdemeanors, and had not met with the ſame fate, becauſe Sir Elijah was not Chief Juſtice of this country Mr Fox lamented the time and fatigue that muſt neceſſarily be undergone, if Mr Haſtings was allowed to preſent petitions whenever he pleaſed He conceived the beſt way to ſhorten the buſineſs would be to refer their ſpeeches to Mr Haſtings and a Committee of his friends, before they went to Weſtminſter Hall Mr Fox wiſhed to know how they meant to identify the expreſſions laid in the petition

Colonel Phipps thought it was not the proper time to mention this He was likewiſe of opinion that the Houſe of Commons were the proper judges whether the Managers who had been delegated by them had exceeded

ceeded the limits of their authority, and that Mr Hastings was entitled to the same privileges which were possessed by every British subject

Sir James Johnstone said he was one of those who thought Mr Hastings was guilty, that he deserved punishment, and he was sorry it was not death If any improper expression had fallen from any of the Managers, the Lord Chancellor might have corrected it He would be against the receiving of the petition, if they were to sit till four in the morning

General Burgoyne said a few words against the receiving of the petition

Mr Addington begged leave to say a few words on the subject He thought it would be inconsistent with the honour and justice of the House to crush an individual who was already pressed down, and perhaps by the weight of his crimes, though God Almighty only knew how that was The meanest subject of this country had redress, when he had suffered an injury, and he did not understand on what principle they could deny to Mr Hastings that which every man in this country had a right to claim, and therefore he thought the petition ought to be received

Sir Richard Sutton observed, that some Hon Gentlemen had taken notice of some facts which had been stated in certain Reports, and because they had found them there they took it for granted they were true, tho that by no means followed, for these facts being found in such Reports only showed that it would be proper to inquire into the truth of them, but that they by no means ought to have been taken for granted till they had been proved Sir Richard spoke in favour of the petition

Mr Fox said, he congratulated the Hon Gentleman (Major Scott) at the success his petition would meet with, but he by no means congratulated the House or his country, because he thought such a precedent would be dangerous in the extreme to both Mr Fox here repeated some of his former arguments

Mr Anstruther contended, that the Lords were the proper judges of this business, and the consequence of such petitions would be, to let the culprit into the whole of your plan, by shewing him how such and such facts were relevant to the matter under consideration This trick would be frequently practised, and therefore, for the sake of public justice, this petition ought not to be received

Mr Pulteney thought, for the sake of justice, that the petition ought to be received At the same time he was ready to admit, that petitions of this sort might tend very much to obstruct the channels of justice. He thought, however, that no extraneous matter ought to be introduced

Major Scott still continuing to allege, that Mr Burke had coolly and deliberately misrepresented facts, was called to order by Mr. Fox, who appealed to the Speaker, if such assertion was not a profound affront on his Right Hon friend (Mr Burke)

The Speaker then observed, that he was ready at any time to have given his opinion, what he conceived to be regular and what not. The debate, he said, had been carried on very irregularly by both sides of the House and in the beginning of the debate, he had great difficulty to distinguish what was irregular and disorderly from what was not

The Gallery was then cleared

Strangers were admitted again in about a quarter of an hour When we entered the Gallery the petition had been brought up by Major Scott and it had been ordered to lie on the Table

Mr Burke was contending against this motion, and said, if he deserved censure for his conduct, the House were perpetrators of his guilt, since they had been present, and heard him with approbation

Mr Sumner said, if the House were perpetrators in the guilt of the Right Hon Gentleman, they ought narrowly to watch his conduct, and prevent him as much as possible from committing errors

Mr Marsham spoke a few words on the subject, and was against the petition

Mr Pitt did not suppose that any person in the House conceived that the petition was meant to be attended with any such consequences as that of removing the Right Hon Manager, but he thought it would be prudent this petition should be taken into consideration on some future day, as early as possible, as it would be improper to proceed any farther in the trial till this business was determined, and he should therefore move that it be taken into consideration on Thursday

Mr Marsham thought it would be extremely improper, that the moment the Managers came out of Westminster Hall from prosecuting Mr Hastings, they themselves should become defendants

Mr Pitt proposed that a message should be sent to the Lords, to desire them to put off the trial till Friday

Mr Fox was rather against this business coming forward on a very early day, as he thought Gentlemen ought to consider and weigh its importance, by putting themselves for a moment in the situation of the Managers.

It

It was at length agreed upon to take this buſineſs into conſideration on Thurſday

THURSDAY, April 30

The Chancellor of the Exchequer roſe, and obſerved, that when the Petition of Mr Haſtings was preſented and received, it was underſtood by the whole Houſe, that the ſubject of complaint would have been on that day diſcuſſed It was not however convenient that ſuch diſcuſſion ſhould then take place, as the regularity of the proceedings of the Houſe required certain forms to be obſerved, which would render it neceſſary to poſtpone the conſideration of the Petition until to-morrow He underſtood it to be the invariable rule of that Houſe, in all ſimilar caſes to the preſent, that the ſubject matter of the debate ſhould be entered upon the Journals, and that it ſhould alſo appear thereon, that the Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr Burke) againſt whom the Petition complained, was preſent in his place when regular notice was given of the day on which the complaint was to be conſidered He knew in fact that the Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr Burke) had every notice he wiſhed, the motion he meant to offer was merely for the maintenance of the regularity of the proceedings of the Houſe, he therefore moved, "That a Petition having "been preſented from Warren Haſtings, "Eſq againſt a Manager of the proſecution, "and the name of Edmund Burke, Eſq "being mentioned in the ſaid Petition, no"tice is given to that Gentleman, now being "in his place, that the Houſe will to mor"row take the matter of the ſaid Peti"tion into conſideration"

Mr Burke roſe, and fully concurred with the Right Hon Gentleman in the propriety of his motion, for the purpoſe of preſerving the regularity of the proceedings of the Houſe, by entering on the Journals the ſubject of the complaint, and the notice having been given formally to the perſon complained againſt, it was, however, a ceremony he was willing to diſpenſe with, having no objection to the Houſe taking any part or the whole of his conduct into conſideration in the manner they thought moſt proper, being convinced, on the moſt cool reflection, that he had every reaſon to confide in, and be ſatisfied with, the deciſion of the Houſe, whatever it might be, as he could implicitly rely on their honour To their deciſion he would with deference ſubmit He begged however leave to repeat what he had on a former day ſaid, that if they wiſhed to remove him from the management of the proſecution he was ready and willing to retire He would wait for the determination of the Houſe, and declared that he ſhould not attend the Houſe to-morrow upon the diſcuſſion of the buſineſs, being determined to ſuffer judgment to go by default If any judgment was to be given, he wiſhed the Houſe to have as little trouble as poſſible, and ſhould therefore, for the purpoſe of avoiding any difficulty of proof, and to ſhew how willing he was to meet the charge, admit that he did aſſert the words complained of, "That Mr Haſtings murdered Nund"comar by the hands of Sir Elijah Impey." The Right Hon Gentleman then, at ſome length, entered into the reaſons which had induced him to make the aſſertion; the Houſe, he hoped, would recollect the peculiar circumſtances attending the caſe of the unfortunate Nundcomar; he was poſſeſſed of certain knowledge of the bribery and corruption of Mr Haſtings, and the charge of preſents exhibited againſt that Gentleman was neceſſary to be ſupported by circumſtantial evidence, in which he could not avoid introducing the proceedings againſt, and the fate of Nundcomar, as principal and material features it was therefore natural to allude to that ſubject in the opening of the charge. He obſerved, that it was ſingular that at the moment Mr Haſtings was on the point of being convicted of the foulleſt bribery, he ſhould bring forward a charge againſt his accuſer, he was convinced that it was done with the view to divert the attention of the Houſe and the Public from Mr Haſtings's criminality, to a complaint againſt his accuſer The ſingularity of the preſent Petition was not, however, confined to the obſervations he had made The Houſe might act inconſiderately in going into a diſcuſſion of the Petition it was a notorious fact that Mr Haſtings had at the Bar of the Houſe gravely given in, ſome time ſince, in writing, ſigned by his own hand, a paper purporting to be his defence, which paper was accepted as his defence by the Houſe of Commons, but when the Managers came to ſubſtantiate the charges, and quoted parts of the defence in ſupport of the charges, Mr Haſtings immediately procured the Honourable Gentleman (Major Scott) to ſwear before the Lords, and to aſſert in that Houſe, that the defence was not written by Mr Haſtings, that many parts were written by other gentlemen, and that ſome parts Mr Haſtings never ſaw.

Major Scott ſpoke to order, and charged the Right Hon Gentleman (Mr Burke) with having taken great liberties in his ſpeech which he would not ſuffer to paſs unexplained, and called upon him for an explanation The Hon Major was proceeding, when

The Speaker roſe, and, by the ſupport of the Houſe, put an end to the converſation by deſiring the Major to ſit down.

Mr

Mr Burke again rose, and was proceeding in his speech, by saying, he despised all attempts to interrupt him

Mr Sumner immediately called him to order, not conceiving that any Member had a right to say he despised the interruption, when disorderly, of any Member of that House, whether a friend to Mr Hastings or not

The Speaker again interposed, and Mr Sumner sitting down,

Mr Burke proceeded He said, the House ought to recollect, that if obstacles were suffered to be thrown in the way of the Managers of the Prosecution, it would ultimately tend to the disgrace of the House, if the Managers were crippled by their powers being restricted, the prosecution would be defeated, and villainy triumph over justice He concluded by again repeating, that he trusted implicitly to the honour of the House, being convinced in his own mind, that they would protect their Managers to the utmost, and enable them, for the purposes of justice, to proceed with vigour

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he could not conceive the Right Hon Gentleman serious in his objection to the Petition, in cautioning the House against receiving it, because it was signed by Warren Hastings; for whatever on former occasions had been done by that Gentleman, he could not have forfeited his right of petitioning the House

Mr Adam said, the Right Hon Gentleman did not seem to understand the argument of his Right Hon Friend

Mr Adam restated it with great force and perspicuity He contended, that before this petition had been received by the House, it ought to have been authenticated by calling Mr Hastings to the Bar of the House, and asking him whether it was his petition? For any thing they knew, this might not be Mr Hastings's petition, and when it came to be considered, he should prove that the House had received it by mistake, and that they ought not to have received it Mr Hastings had been continually accusing the Managers of delay, though he could shew that this was so far from being true, that every species of expedition—every sort of diligence—had been used in order to expedite this trial, and to bring it to a conclusion He, as an individual, was but little concerned whether this petition was considered to day or to-morrow; but the Managers of Mr Hastings's prosecution were deeply concerned—the public were likewise deeply concerned, for the Courts of Law would have sat this day in Westminster Hall, had it not been taken for granted that the trial was to have gone on.

Mr Adam contended that the petition did not contain any accusation against any one individual but was general, and was a censure on the whole Committee

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the Hon. Gentleman (Mr Adam) had misunderstood his meaning in his moving to postpone the consideration of the Petition until to-morrow He did not make that motion for the purpose of giving the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr Burke) notice of the Petition being to be considered to morrow, who he knew in fact had sufficient information, but merely for the sake of regularity in the proceedings of the House

The question on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's motion was then put and agreed to.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, "That a message be sent to the Lords acquainting them that circumstances had happened, which rendered it inconvenient for the Commons to proceed that day in the trial of Warren Hastings, Esq and the Commons requested their Lordships to adjourn the further consideration of the Trial to a future day."

This motion being agreed to, Mr. Hobart was ordered to carry it to the Lords

Mr Hobart went immediately to the Lords, and having waited near an hour until their Lordships met, he presented the message, and being returned, reported that their Lordships had agreed therewith, and postponed the further proceedings on the trial until Tuesday next at ten o'clock in the morning

FRIDAY, May 1

Major Scott moved the reading of the order of the day, for the House taking into their consideration the petition of Warren Hastings, Esq

The order of the day being read accordingly and the question put, that the petition be now considered,

Mr Fox Mont gue immediately rose, and stated, that he had just then received a letter from a Right Hon Member of that House, (Mr Burke) which he begged to read as part of his speech, and was as follows:

MY DEAR SIR,

WITH the content, as you know, and the approbation of the Committee, I am resolved to persevere in the resolution I had formed and had declared to the House, that nothing should persuade me upon my occasion, least of all upon the present occasion, to enter into a laboured, litigious, artificial defence of my conduct Such a mode of defence belongs to another sort of conduct, and to causes of a different description.

As a faithful and ingenuous servant, I owe to the House a plain and simple explanation of any part of my behaviour which shall be called

called in queſtion before them I have given this explanation; and, in doing ſo, I have done every thing which my own honour and my duty to the Houſe could poſſibly require at my hands The reſt belongs to the Houſe They, I have no doubt, will act in a manner fit for a wiſe body attentive to its reputation I muſt be ſuppoſed to know ſomething of the duty of a proſecutor for the public, otherwiſe neither ought the Houſe to have conferred that truſt upon me, nor ought I to have accepted it I have not been diſappointed by the firſt abilities in the kingdom, appointed by the ſame authority, not only for my aſſiſtance, but for my direction and controul You, who have honoured me with a partial friendſhip, continued without interruption for twenty four years, would not have failed in giving me that firſt and moſt deciſive proof of friendſhip, to enlighten my ignorance, and to rectify my miſtakes You have not done either, and I muſt act in the inference It is no compliment to men too well known to the world, how well qualified you are for that office, from your deep parliamentary knowledge, and your perfect acquaintance with all the eminent examples of the ancient and the modern world

The Houſe having upon an opinion of my diligence and fidelity, (for they could have no other motive) put a great truſt into my hands, ought to give me an entire credit for the veracity of every fact I affirm or deny. But if they fail with regard to me, it is at leaſt in my power to be true to myſelf. I will not commit myſelf in an unbecoming contention with the agents of a criminal, whom it is my duty to bring to juſtice I am a member of a Committee of Secrecy, and I will not violate my truſt, by turning myſelf into a defendant, and bringing forward, in my own exculpation, the evidence which I have prepared for his conviction I will not let him know on what documents I rely I will not let him know who the witneſſes for the proſecution are, or what they have to depoſe againſt him Though I have no ſort of doubt of the conſtancy and integrity of thoſe witneſſes, yet becauſe they are men, and men to whom, from my ſituation, I owe protection, I ought not to expoſe them either to temptation or to danger I will not hold them out to be importuned, or menaced, or diſcredited, or run down, or poſſibly to be ruined in their fortunes by the power and influence of this delinquent, except where the national ſervice ſuperſedes all other conſiderations If I muſt ſuffer, I will ſuffer alone No man ſhall fall a ſacrifice to a feeble ſenſibility on my part, that at this time of day might make me impatient of thoſe libels, which by deſpiſing through ſo many years, I have at length obtained the honour of being joined in commiſſion with this Committee, and by becoming a humble inſtrument in the hands of public juſtice

The only favour I have to ſupplicate from the Houſe is, that their goodneſs would ſpare to the weakeſt of their members any unneceſſary labour, by letting me as ſpeedily as poſſible, whether they wiſh or diſcharge me from my preſent office If they do not, I ſolemnly promiſe them, that, with God's aſſiſtance, I will as a Member of their Committee purſue their buſineſs to the end. that no momentary diſfavour ſhall ſlacken my diligence in the great cauſe they have undertaken that I will lay open with the force of irreſiſtible proof this dark ſcene of bribery, peculation, and groſs pecuniary corruption, which I have begun to unfold, and in the midſt of which my courſe has been arreſted

This poor Indian ſtratagem of turning the accuſer into a defendant, has been too often and too uniformly practiſed by Deby Sing, Mr Haſtings, and Gunga Govin Sing, and other banyans, black and white, to have any longer the ſlighteſt effect upon me, whom long ſervice in India Committees has made well acquainted with the politics of Calcutta If the Houſe will ſuffer me to go on, the moment is at hand when my defence, and included in it the defence of the Houſe, will be made in the only way in which my truſt permits to make it, by proving judicially on this accuſing criminal, the facts and the guilt which we have charged upon him As to the relevancy of the facts, the Committee of Impeachment muſt be the ſole judge until they are handed over to the Court competent to give a final deciſion on their value In that Court the Agent of Mr Haſtings will ſoon enough be called upon to give his own teſtimony with regard to the conduct of his Principal, the Agent ſhall not eſcape from the neceſſity of delivering it, nor will the Principal eſcape from the teſtimony of his Agent

I hope I have in no moment of this purſuit (now by me continued, in one ſhape or other, for near eight years) ſhewn the ſmalleſt ſymptom of colluſion or prevarication. The laſt point, in which I ſhould wiſh to ſhew it, is in this charge concerning pecuniary corruption,—a corruption ſo great and ſo ſpreading, that the moſt unſpotted character will be juſtified in taking meaſures for guarding themſelves againſt ſuſpicion. Neither hope, nor fear, nor anger, nor wearineſs, nor diſcouragement of any kind, ſhall move me from this truſt,—nothing but an act of the Houſe, formally taking away my commission, or totally cutting off the means of performing it I trust we are all of us animated by the same sentiment.

This perseverance in us may be called obstinacy inspired by malice Not one of us, however, have a cause of malice. What knowledge have we of Sir E Impey, with whom, you know, we began, or of Mr Hastings, whom we afterwards found in our way? Party views cannot be our motive — Is it not notorious, that, if we thought it consistent with our duty, we might at least have an equal share of Indian interest, which now is almost to a man against us?

I am sure I reverence the House as a Member of Parliament and an Englishman ought to do; and shall submit to its decision with due humility. I have given this apology for abandoning a formal defence, in writing to you, though it contains, in effect, not much more than I have delivered in my place. But this mode is less liable to misrepresentation, and a trifle more permanent It will remain with you, either for my future acquittal or condemnation, as I shall behave *.

I am with sincere affection and respect,
My dear Sir,
Your faithful friend
Gerard Street, And humble servant,
May 1, 1789 (Signed) EDMUND BURKE.

* To this letter the following answers have been given in the public prints.

To the PRINTER.

SIR,

MR Burke's motive for publishing the letter which Mr Montague read in the House of Commons, ought to be, to enable those gentlemen who differed with him to enter into a fair discussion of its contents

Some of the assertions of the letter are of so very extraordinary a nature, that I should have been sorry indeed, if so fair an opportunity had not been given to me of meeting them with a most direct and unequivocal contradiction Mr Burke says, that the House having, upon an opinion of his diligence and fidelity, put a great trust into his hands, ought to give him an entire credit for the veracity of every fact that he affirms or denies Never was there, I believe, so monstrous a proposition, and the vote of the House has proved already the fallacy and the absurdity of it If it were true, observe what a dilemma Mr Burke would involve the House in We have had two India Budgets since this Impeachment began. In each year the India Minister has dealt with peculiar force and emphasis, upon the mildness, the justice, and the excellency of the Government of Great Britain in Bengal, has explained the situation of its foreign connections and dependencies, and has last year taken credit of the aggregate of the resources of Bengal, of a surplus, after the payment of all its expences, of two millions sterling The House has heard these statements with great satisfaction, and has voted those resolutions which Mr Dundas moved Could the House have done so, had they believed Mr Burke? No, for, in contradiction to every man's declaration who has any means of information, Mr Burke obstinately persists in putting to the world, in the name of the Commons of Great Britain, the miserable, distressed, depopulated, and ruined state of Bengal, Benares, and Oude I affirm, therefore, that the House has not, cannot, and ought not to give entire credit to Mr Burke, for the veracity of every fact that he affirms or denies

In another paragraph he says, that the Committee must be the sole judges of the relevancy of the facts, till the competent Court finally decides, and he adds, "In that Court the Agent "of Mr Hastings will soon enough be called upon to give his own testimony with regard to "the conduct of his Principal. The Agent shall not escape from the necessity of delivering "it, nor will the Principal escape from the testimony of his Agent"

In this passage I know Mr Burke is not serious, nor will the world believe him, because every man of common sense knows, that there is a common-sense way of doing business, and that if I could give the testimony which Mr Burke insinuates I can give, Mr Fox, the Managers, the five lawyers they employ, would insist upon Mr. Burke's coming to the point at once, they would not permit him to speak four days upon presumptions, and the probabilities of presumptions; but, as Mr Burke has now committed himself, I hope the public will not forget the broad assertion that he has made For the present, I will inform them, that I was examined upon this subject in Westminster Hall above four hours, with all the ability, ingenuity, and industry of Mr. Fox, Mr Burke, and Mr Sheridan, and this is not the only instance they have given of skill in putting questions, as the world well knows I have been examined upon the same subject by a Committee of the House of Commons five years before. When I was called as a witness in Westminster Hall, no information was given to me of the point I was called to depose to, and, in the course of my examination, Mr Sheridan observed, that there was a contradiction between my evidence then given, and that which I gave formerly on the same subject. A Noble Lord afforded me an opportunity of calling for that

The letter being concluded, Mr Montague ſaid he conceived it to be unneceſſary to add another word on the ſubject, he could not, however, refrain declaring, that he reflected with the higheſt ſatisfaction on the honour he had enjoyed for twenty-four years in the ſe-

former evidence It came, it was read; but the ability of Mr Sheridan did not enable him to point out a difference, and, armed with the robe of Magiſtracy, he left his aſſertion to ſhift for itſelf No queſtion can be put to me that I will not anſwer moſt unreſervedly; and as to money tranſactions, I ſhould have no objection if all that I am concerned in, were proclaimed at Charing Croſs I have never lent my name to give currency to a bond, and afterwards refuſed to diſcharge it

Mr Burke ſays, that their perſeverance may be called obſtinacy inſpired by malice, and adds, "Not one of us, however, has a cauſe of malice What knowledge have we of Sir "Elijah Impey, with whom you know we began, and of Mr Haſtings, whom we after-"wards found in our way?—Party views cannot be our motive Is it not notorious, that, "if we thought it conſiſtent with our duty, we might at leaſt have an equal ſhare of the In-"dian intereſt, which now is almoſt to a man againſt us?"

One would really imagine, that Mr Burke was writing to an old woman born in the laſt century, or to an infant in the nurſe's arms That he ſhould gravely put ſuch a queſtion to a gentleman of character and information, and deep political knowledge, is, indeed, moſt wonderful Does not Mr Montague know, that thoſe who have been his boſom friends through life, took up the cauſe of Mr Haſtings moſt warmly and ſucceſsfully in the year 1776, when Lord North wanted to remove him, becauſe he had been accuſed? Does not Mr Montague know, that the Marquis of Rockingham then defended him, becauſe the accuſation was not proved? Does not Mr Montague know, that the accuſations were actually thoſe which, at the diſtance of fourteen years, Mr Burke has revived, though three ſeveral times ſince they were made, Mr Haſtings has, by the unanimous voice of the Legiſlature, been appointed the Governor-General of Bengal? Does not Mr Montague know, that in 1781, when he ſat as a Member of the Judicature Committee, they examined very particularly into the circumſtances of the execution of Nundcomar? Does not Mr Montague know, that preciſely at the ſame period Lord North brought in a Bill, by which Mr Haſtings was a fourth time appointed Governor-General of Bengal, and for ten years? Does not Mr Montague know, that neither Mr Burke, nor any one man of his Committee, intreated Lord North to ſuſpend the appointment becauſe Mr Haſtings was concerned in the death of Nundcomar? He knows that at that time no ſuch ſuſpicions exiſted, nor do they now, though it was found expedient to ſay that which the Commons have diſavowed

But, ſays Mr Burke, we found Mr. Haſtings in our way He never ſpoke more truly in his life

They did ſo, but not in April 1781. They found him in their way when they had turned out Lord North the next year, then, and not till then, did the plot thicken, nor was Mr Haſtings the only man they found in their way They found Mr John Macpherſon in their way; and they made a report which had for its object his removal, and a cenſure of Lord North for appointing him They found Mr Whiter in their way, for they made another report, in which they affirmed, that both he and Sir John were implicated in the criminality of Mr Haſtings The reſiſtance of the Proprietors, and the death of the Marquis of Rockingham, prevented their plans from taking effect They reſigned, and in a few months came in with additional power, by an unexpected junction with an old enemy Then Mr Fox brought in his memorable Bill, and again they found Mr Haſtings in their way, for his friends joined moſt heartily in oppoſition to that meaſure, with a very great majority of the nation I cannot poſſibly look into the heart of a man, and diſcover the motives of his actions, but, I believe, there is not in Great Britain one man of common ſenſe, or who has read beyond the Hiſtory of Tom Thumb, who will ſay with Mr Burke, that party views cannot be the object of their proſecution of Mr Haſtings.

Mr Burke ſays, "Is it not notorious, that if we thought it conſiſtent with our duty, we "might have at leaſt an equal ſhare of the Indian intereſt, which now is almoſt to a man "againſt us?"

There is an inſinuation here, which it is incumbent upon Mr Montague to do away. I deny the truth of it in the moſt ſolemn and unequivocal manner None of us have forgot the late important ſtruggles, nor the active part which Mr Burke took in them During that period, or any other, was the leaſt overture made directly or indirectly on the part of Mr Haſtings by any man living to deprecate the reſentment of Mr Burke, or his party? I affirm [illegible] out, and at the very moment when their poſſeſſion of power appeared (whether [illegible] without cauſe I know not) to be inevitable, I ſpoke of them precisely in the manner that quaintance of the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr Burke), who was admired for his eloquence, and for the depth and extent of his underſtanding: the qualities he however moſt admired in his Right Hon. Friend were the qualities of his heart; his invariable integrity, and his unbounded benevolence.

Major Scott roſe for the purpoſe of ſtating that I had done, when their elevation appeared to be more diſtaſt. If no reply is given, the inſinuation will be treated by the world as it deſerves

I will take upon me to declare, that no overtures were at any time made by Mr Haſtings or his friends to deprecate the violence of his opponents, though an overture was made to them At a very critical period, namely, the night before Mr Fox brought in his Bill, Mr. Sheridan, who made it, would have met me the next day, had I not declined the meeting. How far he was empowered, or by whom empowered to treat, I know not, but after having declined that meeting, which was intended as an opening to an accommodation, I did not expect to hear it gravely aſſerted at any time, as a matter of notoriety, that Mr Burke and his friends "might, if they thought it conſiſtent with their duty, at leaſt have an equal ſhare "of the Indian intereſt" Mr Burke's meaning is too obvious to be miſtaken, but it has no ſort of foundation in fact

I am, Sir, Your humble Servant,

Halles-Street, May 9. JOHN SCOTT.

To the PRINTER

SIR,

I AM obliged to you for inſerting my letter ſo early in your paper, and as I muſt look upon the publication of Mr Burke's letter to be a fair appeal from him to the public, I ſhall ſubmit ſome further remarks to the candour and good ſenſe of the ſame tribunal

In his late ſpeech, he gave us a long account of Munny Begum, whom he called "a Dancing Girl, a common Proſtitute, a wicked Woman,' and beſtowed upon her a variety of opprobrious epithets;' in ſo far that three-tenths of the ladies who heard him, muſt have departed with the moſt unfavourable opinion of this venerable matron If the Houſe were to give Mr Burke entire credit for the veracity of every fact that he either affirms or denies, it would upon this occaſion be in one of the moſt unfortunate dilemmas that any public body was ever involved in, for Mr Burke himſelf, in the Eleventh Report of the Select Committee, gave the Houſe the following very different account of Munny Begum, in the year 1783:

"It will be proper to ſtate to the Houſe the ſituation and circumſtances of the women "principally concerned, who were in the Seraglio of Jaffier Ally Cawn at his death The "firſt of theſe was called Munny Begum, a perſon originally born of poor and obſcure pa"rents, who delivered her over to the conductreſs of a company of dancing girls, in which "profeſſion being called to exhibit at a feſtival where the late Nabob took a liking to her, "after ſome co-habitation, ſhe obtained ſuch influence over him, that he took her for one "of his wives (and ſhe ſeems to have been the favourite), put her at the head of his Haram, "and having a ſon by her, this ſon ſucceeded to our authority and eſtate, Munny Begum, "the mother, being by his will a deviſee of conſiderable ſums of money, and other effects, "in which he left a charge, which has ſince been applied to the ſervice of the Eaſt India"Company"

All the latter part of this account we know to be ſtrictly true, and the firſt may be ſo alſo, although it will be impoſſible for Mr Burke, or any other perſon in England, to prove it Munny Begum, by Mr Burke's own account, was the wife, and the favourite wife of Jaffier, the ſuperior of his Seraglio, and Lord Clive took a legacy of five lacks upon the ſtrength of her teſtimony, which forms a fund for the half-pay of our army If ſhe ever was a dancing girl, it muſt have been nearly fifty years ago, for the laſt twenty-ſeven years ſhe has been treated as the firſt woman in Bengal How ſhe acquired her power and influence originally, long antecedent as it was to our own influence in Bengal, is not a matter of the leaſt conſequence; but I ſhould be glad to know, if the Houſe is to give entire credit to Mr Burke for the veracity of every fact he affirms or denies, how they are to act, when he differs ſo materially from himſelf? In the Eleventh Report, and in the articles preſented to the Lords, this Lady is called the widow of Meer Jaffier In his ſpeech, which we ought moſt religiouſly to believe, ſhe is ſtyled "a wicked woman, and a common proſtitute."

I ſhall proceed in further elucidation of the danger, as well as of the abſurdity, of Mr. Burke's doctrine, the nature of the proofs he meant to adduce in support of the allegations contained in the petition. He entered into a long and minute detail of Eastern transactions, which went to the acquittal of Mr Hastings in the particulars alluded to in the petition.—He at some length entered into the proceedings relative to Nundcomar, the whole of which, he said, were laid before Government, subsequent to which Mr Hastings was repeatedly continued in his high office of Governor-General. After such appointments, what could be the opinion of Mr Hastings, or of the world, but that the charge was looked upon as a base and unfounded calumny? Yet this was the mass of evidence which the Manager had been talking of for two days, and which he was so anxious to produce. The Hon Major proceeding, said, when Mr Hastings returned to England not a question was asked him as to Nundcomar's information; yet his never replying to what was never put to him, was drawn by the Hon. Manager as a strong presumption of his guilt. That House next took up the business of Nundcomar, and passed a decision thereon; yet after that decision, the Manager thought proper to affirm that Mr Hastings murdered Nundcomar by the hands of Sir Elijah Impey. These, he said, were the different points which he wished to substantiate by evidence; after having done that, he would not presume to offer a motion, being confident that the House would consult its own honour, and do Mr Hastings justice in the steps they meant to pursue. He was convinced that he could prove the truth of the allegations, but would not presume to point out what measures ought to be taken.

In the course of the Honourable Major's speech, he was interrupted on the point of order by

He has affirmed, that to let the lands of Bengal in farm, was a most wicked, corrupt, and oppressive system, invented by Mr Hastings, unauthorized by the Directors, and a scandalous violation of the rights of the Nobility and Country Gentlemen of Bengal.

Mr Burke has represented himself as a laborious, pleading, and inquisitive man, who has been intent upon the discovery of Indian grievances for eight years. What reliance ought the House, or the Public, to whom he has appealed, to place upon his accuracy or fidelity, when it is a notorious fact, that the plan for farming the lands was adopted in various instances three years before Mr Hastings adopted it, and is thus mentioned by Governor Verelst and Mr Becher, in a letter to the Select Committee in Bengal dated from Morshedabad, the 30th of July 1769?

"The plan we wished to see generally followed is, that of letting the lands to farm, for a "term of years, as we are persuaded that mode tends most to the welfare of the inhabitants, "the improvement of the country, and of course the benefit of our employers. We are "happy to find the Hon Court of Directors seem to have adopted the same sentiments, and "we flatter ourselves the beginning that is now making in letting out to farm the districts of "Raje Shaby and Nuddea, will in time be followed throughout the Province of Bengal."

Here is another strong instance brought, in order to prove that the House cannot, and ought not, to give entire credit to Mr Burke.

In his last speech, he read a testimonial which Lord Cornwallis and his Council had transmitted to the Court of Directors from the Rajah of Dinagipore, a boy whom he represented to be eleven or twelve years of age. Mr Burke might well say, indeed, that such a testimonial, from such a child, was only to be mentioned with ridicule, or with contempt, and in such a contemptible light he did represent it. This testimonial the House has not seen, but if they were to give entire credit to Mr Burke, they might suppose, that no other signature appeared to the testimonial. The fact, however, is, that it is signed by all the public officers of the Rajah, who manage the business of the Zemindary for him, and the next name to the Rajah's is that of the Naib Zemindar, or Public Minister. I have been asked seriously, of what validity the testimonial of such a child could be, to completely were Mr. Burke's auditors convinced, by his general argument, that no other signature was affixed to it, but that of the infant, as he called him!

I should encroach too much upon your time, and your paper, were I to produce the various instances that have occurred, by which I could prove that Mr Burke's doctrine is a most dangerous one indeed. The good sense and the justice of the House rejected it at once, but it appears to me, that Mr Burke wishes for the decision of the public also upon the same point. If I am right in this conjecture, I am justified in laying before them a few facts, by which they may determine, that neither the House nor the public ought to give him credit for the veracity of the facts he either affirms or denies.

I am, Sir, Your humble servant,

Hatton-Street, May 21, 1789. JOHN SCOTT.

Speech

The Master of the Rolls, who said, he wished that at the moment of complaining of an irregularity in another place, by the use of improper words, the same irregularity might not be taken into there, but that the merits of the petition might be fairly proceeded to be discussed, and the words complained of be examined, whether they were relevant to the prosecution, and whether they were or were not authorised by the House.

Mr Fox desired that the petition might be read, which being accordingly done, he animadverted thereon, observing, that at the moment it complained of the Managers making unwarrantable charges, it did the like, by charging them with several falsehoods under the cover of a protestation

The Master of the Rolls said, that the House ought to go to the investigation of the allegations contained in the petition, and see whether proofs could be advanced to prove the falsehoods it asserted to have been made

The Major, after the above short interruption, proceeded to the conclusion of his speech

Immediately after the Hon Major had concluded,

Mr Bouverie rose, and for the purpose of getting rid of the petition moved, "That this House do now adjourn"

Mr Sumner objected to the motion, and said the House ought to suffer the petitioner to go into a proof of the allegations of the petition

Mr Fox declared himself convinced of the falsehood of every allegation, excepting that relative to Nundcomar, which was misrepresented He wished the House to adjourn

The Marquis of Graham was against the adjournment, and argued the right of the House to suffer the proof being gone into of the words complained relative to the death of Nundcomar

Sir Joseph Mawbey thought the House would do best to adjourn and get rid of the business, he conceived that the House of Lords was the only fit place for notice to have been taken of any improper words, and that such notice ought to have been taken as soon as the words were uttered

Mr Ford contended that the House ought not to adjourn, but proceed to the consideration of the petition If the Lords had objected to, and checked the Managers for any of their proceedings, he doubted not but the Managers would have come to the House, and complained against their Lordships, for presuming to dictate to them the manner in which they should proceed with the prosecution

Mr. Fox said, no such thing would have been done as the Managers complaining against the Lords for any interruption the Counsel for Mr Hastings had a right to interrupt the Managers, and the only time he opposed such interruption, was not for the interruption itself, but on account of its not being decently made He had, he said, as high an opinion of the privileges of the House of Commons as any man, but never had, however, expected to have heard what had just been asserted, that the Lords had no right to interrupt the Managers; they certainly had a right, and they must submit to their Lordships whenever they thought proper to stop their proceedings

Mr Sumner proposed to Mr Bouverie to withdraw his motion of adjournment, as he wished to move that the House to receive evidence to substantiate the allegations of the Petition

Mr Bouverie refused to withdraw his motion

Mr Smith was against the adjournment, and considered it the duty of the House to go into a consideration of the Petition He considered the assertion of Mr Burke, which were complained of, merely as declamation.

Mr Fox again declared, that he fully believed the allegations of the Petition to be false, except that relating to Nundcomar, which was misrepresented.

Mr Mitford contended, that the Petition ought to be considered; for he said, if the allegations it contained were true, it deserved the greatest attention and redress from the House, if, on the other hand, they were false, the Petition, and the person presenting it, would merit the severest censure If Mr Hastings was guilty, he wished him to fall under the weight of his crimes, not under the weight of his prosecutors The prosecution ought to be conducted with honour to that House, with nothing calumniating or inflammatory on the minds of the Judges The Lords had not the power of a Judge in the lower Courts to punish the assertion or a calumny, they could do no more than stop his proceeding in such calumny. where then with propriety could the Petitioner appeal for redress but to that House? To them the application was made, and to their candour and justice He had heard the explanation which the Right Hon Gentleman offered to the House, it was, however, an explanation that by no means satisfied him he was convinced, in his own mind, that it was the duty of the House to examine whether the allegations were or were not founded; and and on that fact being afcertained, it would afterwards behove them to afcertain what ought to be done if the allegations were proved true, to redrefs the party injured, or fhould they be proved falfe, what cenfure it would be neceffary to pafs on the petition, and the perfon offering it

Mr Fox agreed with the Hon Gentleman, that it was improper in cafes of life and death to influence the paffions, it was not fo in mifdemeanours In trials on life or death, the verdict could not be different, the defendant muft be found guilty or acquitted, it was not fo in an impeachment for a mifdemeanour, where aggravation was fair on one fide, and extenuation on the other ——The Lords might find a perfon impeached before them guilty of a mifdemeanour, it refted with them, as they conceived the guilt, to order the punifhment, it was therefore the duty of the profecutors to ftate in the ftrongeft colours and moft forcible language the great enormity of the offence He faid, he was ready to allow, that he fhould abufe his truft, were he to affert a fact he did not mean to prove, or that in his confcience he did not believe to be true what had been charged againft Mr Haftings he believed to be perfectly fo. He infifted, that it was the duty of the Houfe to give the utmoft confidence to their Managers, in truffing to them what they conceived to be relevant, for, if they did not, the profecution could not poffibly be carried on with effect The Houfe, he faid, whatever mode they might adopt, or in what way they might think proper to bring forward the prefent bufinefs, muft in the end come to the fhort queftion,—Whether the Managers were or were not fit to carry on the profecution?—It was not probable, he faid that at the moment they were about to gather the laurels of their labours by a fuccefsful conclufion to the profecution, they would ftigmatize their caufe, the honour of their Country, the honour of the Houfe, and their own honours, by unfounded calumnies He obferved upon the manner in which the complaint came before the Houfe, not from one of their own body, but from the accufed perfon The whole proceedings on the petition, he faid, were not more contrary to precedent than they were to common fenfe, and ruinous to all public juftice for ever He wifhed to afk, if the opinion of the fate of Nundcomar was new? Was it not aflerted by his Hon Friend (Mr Sheridan) before the Lords, with an effect never to be forgotten, at the moment that the decifion in favour of Sir Elijah Impey was new, that Nundcomar was bafely murdered? He would not allow that the Houfe of Commons refufing to impeach Sir Elijah Impey was an acquittal of him; the Houfe was at liberty at that moment, if they thought fit to impeach him for that murder It was his opinion, and ever had been fo that it was a grofs murder, and that the unfortunate man had been put to death for the bafeft purpofes He argued, that if the affertions made againft Mr Haftings could not be proved true, they would ultimately tend to his advantage, it being a well known rule, that the failure of an argument againft an accufed perfon made for him He cared not, he faid, on his own account, how the motion was difpofed of, it was of little moment to him he wifhed, however, to inform the Houfe, that his Right Hon Friend (Mr Burke) did not ftand fingle; that every one of the Managers would have ufed the fame ftrong expreffions, had it fallen to their fhare to open that charge —There was no difference of opinion on the fubject between thofe who had confidered it, the difference only exifted between them and thofe who knew lefs; and between them and Mr Haftings It was therefore fair to prefume that the Managers were right; and as the prefumption was in their favour, the Houfe ought to be careful to obtain folid proof againft their Managers, previous to their proceeding to cenfure them He entered into obfervations on the difficulties under which the Managers commenced the profecution, without the affiftance of any of the Crown Lawyers, and without the favour of the Houfe on general political topics —He intreated the Houfe, if they refufed the Managers their affiftance, not to impede them, but to allow them fair play if they had not time to fit them, he hoped they would not find time to oppofe them, and to endeavour to ftop their proceedings Oppofition, he faid, were always charged with a wifh of getting the places of thofe they oppofed; he wifhed he could fay the fame of the prefent Oppofition to the Managers of the Profecution; the cafe was however the reverfe, and were the Oppofition to defert the Managers, they would not be willing to proceed with the profecution themfelves If the adjournment, fhould be negatived, he hoped the Houfe would go into a proof of the allegations, and he had no doubt the falfity of them would appear he would vote for the adjournment, but whether it was agreed to or not a time he hoped would come when the whole of the prefent proceedings would be reprobated and expunged —The conduct of his Right Hon Friend (Mr Burke) was honourable to himfelf, to that Houfe, and to his country the Houfe in trying him would try all the Managers, they all admired his general conduct, and admired his conduct of that day in abfenting himfelf, feeling the indignity of being called upon as a defendant by the culprit he was profecuting He concluded by conjuring the Houſe to take care of their own honour, not to ſuffer their inquiſitorial powers to be infringed or deſtroyed, and not to ſuffer it to appear to the world that they were either prevaricators in the proſecution, or acting as counſel for the man they pretended to proſecute

Mr Jekyll argued the duty of the Managers conducting themſelves with the ſame caution as advocates for a criminal proſecution He contended, that it was incumbent on the Houſe, in preſervation of their duty to individuals, and of their honour and dignity, to receive the Petition, and if the allegations were true, to give that redreſs which they were bound in juſtice to grant to the injured party He concluded by reprobating the conduct of a Manager who would preſume to make a charge againſt any man, in the teeth of a ſolemn deciſion of the Houſe

Mr Bouverie's motion was then put, "That this Houſe do now adjourn," on which the Houſe immediately divided,

Ayes	—	97
Noes	—	158
	Majority	61

Major Scott then moved, "That Mr Gurney, ſhort hand writer, be called in and examined"

A ſhort converſation took place on this motion, which was objected to by Mr Fox, Mr Adam, Sir Grey Cooper, and Sir James Johnſtone, as an improper mode of proving the words of a Member of Parliament

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Marquis of Graham, Col Phipps, the Attorney General, Mr Rolle, Mr Smith, Alderman Le Meſurier, and Sir William Young, were of opinion, that the evidence of the ſhort-hand writer could with propriety be admitted

Mr Adam wiſhing a Committee to be appointed to examine precedents, moved the 'Previous Queſtion'

A ſhort converſation enſued on this motion, which being agreed to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and others on that ſide of the Houſe, it was carried

Mr Adam then moved the appointment of a Committee, which Sir William Young oppoſed, and inſiſted upon dividing the Houſe.

The Houſe immediately divided,

And at half an hour after four o'clock the Houſe adjourned.

MONDAY, May 4.

Writs were ordered to be iſſued for Members to ſerve in Parliament for the county and town of Cambridge, the former vacated by the death of Sir Henry Peyton, the latter by General Adeane, who has forfeited his ſeat by the acceptance of the office of one of the Grooms of the Bedchamber.

The Marquis of Graham reported from the Committee appointed to ſearch for precedents applicable to the ſteps neceſſary to be taken on the petition of Mr Haſtings, that they had found no precedent immediately to the point, but referred the Houſe to the caſe of Sir Dudley Digges and Elliot, and which caſe was inſerted in the Journals, where they conceived that the Houſe "in reſpect to words, would find ſomething analogous and worthy their obſervation

The report was ordered to be laid on the table

Mr Sumner moved, that the order of the day on the further conſideration of the petition of Warren Haſtings, ſhould be read.

The order of the day being read,

Mr Sumner next moved, that Mr. Gurney, ſhort-hand writer, ſhould be examined for the purpoſe of proving the allegations contained in the petition of Mr. Haſtings

Mr Francis aſked whether the ſhort-hand writer was to be examined to the entire of the allegations, or to ſome particular point. He thought that he ſhould be examined as to the whole of the ſpeech, and that it ſhould be tranſlated, to ſee whether the tenor of the ſpeech was conſiſtent with the ſtreſs laid on the particular words ſnipped out as to have been ſpoken by Mr. Burke

Mr Addington thought it was unneceſſary to take a retroſpect of the entire buſineſs the charge was made againſt that part of the ſpeech which related to the murder of Nundcomar, he did not ſee that the Houſe was to take cognizance of any other part of the ſpeech He would therefore move an amendment, that after the word "examine" ſhould be inſerted, "for the purpoſe of aſcertaining ſo much of the allegation in the petition as reſpected the affair of Nundcomar"

Mr Sheridan thought the amendment extremely partial; it went to proſcribe Mr. Burke from the benefits which might accrue from conſulting the general features of his ſpeech, and it wiſhed to confine to a point, the principle of which could not be known without the ſpeech or the whole ſhould be conſulted He did not think it fair or honourable to pin his Hon Friend down to a ſpecific charge, "he did not think it juſt to garble the petition in favour of the culprit againſt againſt one of the Managers; and whether the Houſe acted through tenderneſs or juſtice, ſtill it ſhould keep up appearances, and for his part, he would, conſiſtent with his idea, give his negative to the amendment

Major Scott declared he had no communication whatſoever with the ſhort hand writers Mr Burke had made many charges for which there was no foundation He would not for the preſent enter into what he had ſaid of Devi Sing and the three reports, but as to his charge of Nundcomar it dwelt on the mind of Mr Haſtings and to that particular it was neceſſary to direct the attention of the Houſe

Mr Fox did not diſcuſs the grounds on which the Hon Member had acted improbable The priſoner had ſtated a matter exceedingly injurious to his Hon Friend Where, he aſked, could he obtain ſatisfaction? Not before a Court of Juſtice Not before the High Court of Parliament Not from the deciſion of the Houſe of Lords The Commons of Great Britain, of whom he was a repreſentative, he applied to He only aſked them to go into a complete inveſtigation of his conduct, and that ought not to be denied.

Mr Pitt differed from the Right Hon Gentleman; it could not, he ſaid, have any effect on the Hon Gentleman, (Mr Burke) to have the petition proceeded on conſiſtent with the amendment Thoſe Gentlemen who had boaſted that they were cloathed in the Robes of Magiſtracy, could not be injured by any allegation made by the perſon whom they were proſecuting, particularly if theſe allegations were not deemed worthy the conſideration of the Houſe He thought the priſoner ſhould have complained before, that is, to ſeverally of the allegations He charged the Managers with acting contrary to their former declaration, for that in requeſting that the whole of the allegations might be diſcuſſed, they evaded the only which they had taken ſo much pains to impute to the conduct of the other ſide of the Houſe

Mr. Fox briefly replied he ſaid, that delay could not be imputed to the Managers, they had ſaid originally that the petition ought not to have been received He then entered into an able reply to the arguments uſed by Mr Pitt, and with his uſual ability controverted the aſſertions and arguments of his adverſary.

Mr. Wyndham took a retroſpect of the buſineſs He entered into the queſtion at large, and declared that it was evident from what had dropped from others of the Managers, of which not the leaſt notice had been taken, that his Hon Friend Mr Burke was ſingled out by the priſoner as being the moſt formidable of his accuſer, and having a knowledge of his guilt, which muſt bring him to juſtice.

Mr Pitt denied that Mr Burke had been ſingled out, for the charge alluded to was not made by Mr Burke, it originated with another of the Managers (Mr Sheridan), and therefore this aſſertion could not have weight with the Houſe

The Houſe divided

For the amendment,		115

	Majority	46

After ſome diſcuſſion converſation, the ſhort hand writer was examined

It is impoſſible for us to enter into an exact detail of the arguments made uſe of on each ſide, during the examination of Mr Gurney After being many times ordered to withdraw, he was ſuffered at laſt to give his teſtimony, with the aſſiſtance of his ſhort-hand notes, reſpecting the words ſpoken, which proved that Mr Burke had ſaid, "that HE (meaning Mr Haſtings) MURDERED HIM (meaning Nundcomar) "THROUGH THE HANDS OF SIR ELIJAH "IMPEY

After Mr Gurney had withdrawn,

The Marquis of Graham roſe He wiſhed not to dwell long on the ſubject; he would only ſpeak to the authority veſted in the hands of the Managers by the Houſe; it certainly did not amount to charging Mr Haſtings with the murder of Nundcomar He would therefore move, "That no direction or authority was given by this Houſe to bring as a charge againſt Mr Haſtings, or to impute to him the condemnation and execution of Nundcomar"

Mr Sheridan requeſted to know if this reſolution was to be followed by any other?

The Marquis of Graham replied, by none, that he knew of

Mr Fox had not much objection to the motion, and therefore would not protract the debate by taking the ſenſe of the Houſe upon it He did not conceive the reſolution implied any cenſure on the conduct of his Hon Friend

The Chancellor of the Exchequer expreſſed much ſatisfaction at the ready acquieſcence of the Right Hon Gentleman who ſpoke laſt, It was a full conviction that the motion carried evident propriety with it, it was a neceſſary atonement the Houſe owed for the injury done to Mr. Haſtings, by charging him with murder, at the ſame time he begged to be underſtood as not meaning to throw any cenſure on the Right Hon Managers.

Mr Fox wiſhed to inform the Right Hon. Gentleman that he acquieſced becauſe the motion conveyed no cenſure upon his friend.

He

He acquitted farther, becauſe it did not reſtrain him from mentioning the tranſaction in future. He begged the Houſe to obſerve, that Mr. Burke brought no ſuch charge againſt Mr Haſtings as murder; that not even an Honourable Baronet laſt year, when he impeached Sir Elijah Impey, accuſed him of murder, in the technical ſenſe of the word — it was only in a moral ſenſe. It could not be brought againſt either of them as a heavy crime, but as a miſdemeanor Nunducomar was taken off in a foul manner — they were the cauſe, not the effect That the Hon Gentleman oppoſite to him (Mr Pitt) was ſatisfied with his acquieſcence, he was pleaſed, he was more pleaſed, becauſe the motion conveyed no cenſure At the ſame time, he thought it would be diſgraceful to the character of a learned Gentleman, who had ſaid, that all Europe looked with eager eyes on this trial, if he neglected to move for the removal of the preſent Managers.

He might, or might not ſay, what was agreeable to the Hon. Gentleman who ſpoke laſt, but he conceived himſelf at liberty to mention again the ſame words Mr Burke had made uſe of. He wiſhed the Houſe, if they were diſſatisfied with their conduct, to remove them The Managers did not wiſh to continue in their office without the confidence of the Houſe Perhaps the Hon Gentleman might find perſons on his ſide the Houſe fit for ſuch offices The Managers were men of different characters He had relied much on the generoſity and honour of the Houſe, he had thought that political profeſſions and prejudices would have been waived on this ſubject he had been deceived, he had found a deſire to find fault with their proceedings, to liſten to complaints againſt them The Houſe muſt be ſenſible that they muſt act according to their judgments, that it was not, he had been informed, illegal to inſtance a larger crime towards proving a ſmaller, for in the trial of a man for defrauding an inſurance-office, the proſecutors had alledged and proved the commiſſion of murder againſt the priſoner.

Mr Sheridan could not, even at this late hour, help troubling the Houſe with a few obſervations. He wiſhed the Houſe to look over the charges; nay, to proceed a ſhorter way he dared the Hon. Gentleman oppoſite (Mr Pitt) to riſe and ſay, that if Nunducomar had not brought the charges for bribery and corruption againſt Mr. Haſtings, he would have died in the manner in which he did — When he had ſaid, laſt year, words to the ſame effect as Mr Burke's, no notice was taken of them, nay, in the anſwer delivered in by Mr. Haſtings, he had conſidered that allegation as a charge; for he ſays, "With reſpect to the malicious charge of murder, I ſolemnly declare I had no hand whatſoever in the condemnation and execution of Nunducomar". He concluded by ſaying, that ſhould it fall to his lot in a ſubſequent part of the trial to mention that tranſaction, he ſhould uſe words to the ſame effect as Mr Burke had done

Mr Wyndham ſaid a few words in ſupport of the Managers.

Mr Pitt diſregarded inſinuations thrown out againſt him, he and his friends ſhould be watchful over the conduct of the Managers, and take care they tranſgreſſed not the directions of the Commons

Mr Fox with much warmth contended, that no tyrant ever behaved in a more barbarous manner over thoſe whom he governed, nor with more duplicity and treachery He would maintain that the privileges of the Commons were never more invaded, nor endangered within this century, nay he would ſay within the laſt, than they had been within theſe few days

The Marquis of Graham was led to ſay more than he wiſhed, he had hoped the motion would have met with no oppoſition. The caſe he thought was now materially altered he therefore ſhould move that the ſubſequent words do follow the original motion That the words ſpoken by Mr Burke, "he (meaning Mr Haſtings) murdered him (meaning Nunducomar) by the hands of Sir Elijah Impey," ought not to have been ſpoken

Colonel Phipps ſeconded it. He thought the conduct of the Managers unjuſt and abſurd

The amendment and the original motion were now read.

Mr Fox wiſhed to know if the Honourable Gentleman who ſpoke laſt meant to give the ſenſe of the Houſe — if he did, and the Houſe thought the conduct of the Managers unjuſt and abſurd, why not remove them? It was a reflection on the Houſe, to continue in thoſe offices men who were diſqualified by injuſtice and abſurdity He moved that the following do follow the former amendment "Notwithſtanding on a former year, no notice was taken of the words ſpoken by another Manager to the ſame effect; and that Mr. Haſtings, in his defence, had conſidered them as a charge, anſwering in the following manner: — 'With 'reſpect to the murder of Nunducomar, I 'ſolemnly deny having any concern in it 'whatever'"

Mr. Fox reprobated the conduct of the Gentleman who had ſet their faces againſt the Managers. He ſaid, that the Houſe had voted for the impeachment; they had appointed the Managers to conduct it; but, from the motion of the noble Marquis, it seemed that they had appointed them merely for the purpose of abusing them The noble Lord had wished to censure the Managers, but as he had done so in a courtly style, he thought the censure was admissible for his part, he saw plainly that it was the intention of the Marquis, as well as his friends, to slur the prosecution—in plain words, they had acted meanly in wishing to convey sentiments which they were afraid or ashamed to avow

Colonel Phipps rose to order, he said the Right Hon. Gentleman had uttered words which were not only indecent, but such as were unfit for such an assembly, and would not be tolerated in any other place

Mr M A Taylor replied, that the Hon Gentleman who had spoke last, was guilty of a breach of order in the first instance, in calling his Hon Friend to order, when nothing occurred to excuse his conduct, and that the words with which he concluded his speech were much more disorderly than those to which he had very improperly objected

Mr Francis, looking stedfastly at the Speaker, told him, that a very unwarrantable menace had been offered to a Right Hon. Member, and that he (the Speaker) had heard it

Mr Fox having made a very pointed and severe observation on the conduct of Col Phipp, the strangers were ordered to withdraw,—in about an hour after, the gallery was opened for the admission of strangers

Mr Pitt at our entrance was on his legs, recapitulating many of those arguments which had been used before, and was very fully answered by Mr Fox The House having grown clamorous in calling for the question, the amendment of Mr Fox was negatived without a division

The question was then put on the original motion

Ayes	135
Noes	66
Majority	69

The whole motion, as amended by Lord Graham, was then carried without a division

Mr Bouverie next moved a vote of thanks to the Managers, for their services in the public cause

This motion was resisted as premature, a direct negative was not put upon it, but it was disposed of by the previous question — And then the House adjourned.

THEATRICAL JOURNAL.

APRIL 28.

A Gentleman, whose name is said to be Meredith, appeared the first time on any stage in the character of Alexander the Great, at Covent Garden, for the benefit of Mr Aikin His figure is a good one for the stage, tall and not ill formed, but awkward in his manner His voice powerful, and capable of expressing the various passions with propriety and effect, except at times, from a slight defect in enunciation, which, probably, care and application would correct The difficulties attending a first exhibition are too many to enable us to say with certainty that this candidate for public favour was intitled to much applause. He has many imperfections to overcome, and much to unlearn Time and assiduity, with the requisites he possesses, may do much Before the Play the following Prologue, written by Mr Vardill, was spoken by Mr Middleton

WHEN the plum'd eaglet first his pinions tries,
Lingering he quits the nest, and trembling flies,
His hardy sire to new attempts excites,
Bends his efforts, loves to ploudier heights,
'Till bold with practis'd wing, and conscious force, [course
Fearless he eyes the sun, and skims his airy
Such mingled hopes and fears his mind engage,
When first the youthful genius treads the stage,
But safely past th' ordeal of your laws,
His pow'rs awoke and nerv'd by just applause,
He shews young Ammon's fire, his port, his mind,
Breathes all the hero, and assumes the god
'Tis yours the fears of merit to dispel,
And aid the generous purpose to excel,
To fix the doubtful claims of modest worth,
And call, by praise, its latent talents forth;
For oft, too oft unripen'd to withstand
Envy's chill breath, and Hate's ungentle hand,
True genius pines beneath inclement skies,
Shrinks up its tender leaves, and in oblivion dies.
By passion for dramatic pleasures mov'd,
Which friends perhaps too partially approv'd,
With ardent wish to please, but check'd by fews,
A young adventurer at your bar appears;
To you he makes his first, his last appeal,
His fate your censures or your plaudits seal
Should

Should his firſt voyage be crown'd with fauſtive gales,
Theſe ſeas he'll court, and ſpread his flowing ſails,
But ſhould dread ſtorms aſſail him on our main,
He ne'er will quit the peaceful ſhore again
In arts theatrical unſkill'd and rude,
You'll judge it raſhneſs that I dare intrude
For others, like a vet'ran tried, to plead,
And aſk th' indulgence which myſelf I need
Yet, as the tar juſt ſcap'd from ſeas and wind,
Feels moſt the dangers of the crew behind,
O let me lend my feeble plank to ſave
A moſt mate panting ſtill upon the wave!
Then let fair Candour hold the critic ſcales,
And, if his merit o'er his faults prevails,
Grant him the olive, if denied the laye,
He ſues for pardon, where you cannot praiſe

30 A Deſcription of Britiſh Loyalty, or, a Squeeze for St Paul's, ſaid to be written by Mr Colman jun was performed at Drury Lane, for the benefit of Mr Bannister jun

The ſame evening a Dramatic Piece of One Act, called St George's Day, or, Britons rejoice, was acted the firſt time at Covent Garden, for the benefit of Mrs Mattocks This is a ſlight performance, calculated only for one night, and entitled to no further notice

MAY 1 The Farm-Houſe, a Comedy taken from The Cuſtom of the Manor of Charles Johnſon, by Mr Kemble, was acted at Drury Lane. The characters are as follow

Modely, - -	Mr Wroughton
Heartwell, - -	Mr Whitfield
Freehold, - -	Mr Aikin
Shacklefigure, -	Mr Suett
Flora, - -	Mrs Kemble
Aura, - -	Mrs Jordan

As the original play from whence this piece is taken cannot be repreſented now with any effect, we are not ſorry to ſee this abridgement of it brought on the ſtage, as it affords us an opportunity of ſeeing Mrs Jordan, and (it is but juſtice to add) the other performers in a very favourable light.

7 Mr Macklin attempted once more to perform the part of Shylock, for his own benefit, but finding his memory entirely gone, he was obliged to requeſt that Mr Ryder might ſupply his place The change was accepted by the audience, and the public have now probably ſeen the laſt of this veteran of the theatre

8. A School for Widows, a Comedy, by Mr. Cumberland, was acted, for the firſt time, at Covent Garden. The characters are as follow.

Lord Mirable, -	Mr. Farren.
Squire Wilful, -	Mr Quick.
Frederick, - -	Mr Lewis.
Marmozet, - -	Mr Lewis.
Gayleſs, - - -	Mr. Davies.
Sterling, - - -	Mr Ferron.
Lady Richmore, -	Mrs. Abington.
Mrs Worldly, - -	Mrs Mattocks.
Arabella, - - -	Miſs Tweedall.
Mrs Gayleſs, -	Miſs Wewitzer.

This play is an alteration of The Country Attorney acted at the Hay-Market in 1783, and of which we gave an account in our Magazine for July that year (See Vol XII p 63.) The alterations are not many, though ſomething for the better They have not been ſufficient however to preſerve the play from neglect After three performances it is laid aſide; we ſuppoſe for ever The Prologue was ſpoken by Mr Pope; the Epilogue by Mrs Abington

11 Mrs Siddons concluded her engagement for this ſeaſon with the performance of Juliet for her own benefit; after which ſhe recited the Ode printed in our laſt Magazine (See p. 336) Of Juliet it may be ſaid, that ſhe performed the character with her uſual excellence; and if the recitation of the Ode had leſs effect, we are inclined to aſcribe it to the performance rather than the performer

15. The Dramatiſt, or, Stop Him Who Can, a Comedy, by Mr. Reynolds, was acted for the firſt time at Covent Garden, for the benefit of Mrs Wells. The characters are as follow:

Vapid, -	Mr Lewis.
Lord Scratch, -	Mr Quick.
Ennui, -	Mr Edwin.
Neville, - -	Mr Middleton.
Florival, - -	Mr. Blanchard.
Willoughby, -	Mr. Macready.
Lady Wiſhfort -	Mrs. Webb.
Mariana - -	Mrs. Wells.
Sophia -	Miſs Brangin.
Louiſa, - -	Miſs Brunton

The ſtory of this play is but ſhort Lady Wiſhfort, in love with a brother of Florival, writes a letter, which being given to Vapid the Dramatiſt, occaſions the miſtakes of the play Lord Scratch, who is in love with Lady Wiſhfort for her ſentiments, and hates play, is continually croſſed by the poet. A deſign to entrap Louiſa is prevented by the good fencing of Florival, a coxcomb of the Italian ſchool. The marriages of Vapid and Mariana, and Louiſa with Neville, and the disappointment of all the schemes of Lady Wishfort, form the denouement of the piece.

The character of Vapid the Dramatist is well imagined, and strongly drawn A passion for the drama and dramatick writing affords a fine subject for the stage; and the author has done himself no discredit by his execution of it Some parts of the play are feeble, but the whole of it, taken together, possesses merit enough to deserve an attentive and careful revision. When this is done, it will meet with the success it deserves

18. The Haymarket Theatre opened with The English Merchant, and a musical entertainment called Ut Pictura Poesis, or, The Enraged Musician, said to be by Mr. Colman. The characters are as follow

Castruccio, -	Mr Chambers.
Young Quaver, -	Mr. Iliff.
Knife-Grinder, -	Mr Reeve.
Cryers, Mob, &c	Mr Matthews, Mr. Johnson, Mr Chapman, &c.
Castruccina, -	Mrs Bannister.
Picolina, - -	Mrs. Plomer
Milk Girl, - -	Miss George.
Cryers, Ballad Singer, &c.	Mrs Edwin, Mrs Powell, Mrs Lefevre, &c

This piece is taken from Hogarth's print, and the story as told by the painter is adhered to The prologue was spoken by Mr Edwin jun the musick composed and compiled by Dr Arnold The performers did justice to their parts, and the Drama has much merit as a composition

THE SHAKESPEARE GALLERY.

THIS Exhibition, which may be truly styled the triumph of the English School of Painting, is so honourable to the undertakers of the vast design of which it forms a part, so connected with polite letters; so fraught with national advantage, whether considered with respect to Commerce, to the Arts, to Literature, to the amusement of the day, or the more permanent entertainment of succeeding generations; that we consider it as an object particularly deserving the notice of a Literary Journal. We therefore, in common with the best of the public, hail this dawn of the English Historical School, which presages a splendid day in its progressive course, equally to the honour of the nation, as to the advantage of the spirited projectors of the scheme.

The present collection consists of thirty-four scenes from the different plays of our great dramatic bard, painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds, Barry, Boydell, Downman, Durno, Fuseli, Hamilton, Hodges, Kirk, Miller, Northcote, Opie, Peters, Rigaud, Smirk, Watt, Wheatley, and Wright, and it may be observed, that each artist appears to have exerted the full force of his genius In such a variety of performances, the merit of some must predominate over others With a few exceptions, however, which it would be invidious to point out, the whole collection is entitled to the honourable situation in which it is placed, and when completed will form an epoch in the History of the Arts

"But the nature, progress, and extent of this important undertaking may be better learnt from the following extracts taken from Mr Boydell's sensible preface to his Catalogue.

"I cannot permit this Catalogue to appear before the public, without returning my grateful thanks to the numerous Subscribers to this undertaking, who with a liberality and a confidence unparalleled on any former occasion, have laid me under the most flattering obligations I hope upon inspection of what has been done, and is now doing, the Subscribers will be satisfied with the exertions that have been made, and will think that their confidence has not been misplaced, especially when they consider the difficulty that a great undertaking like the present has to encounter, in a country where Historical Painting is still but in its infancy —To advance that Art towards maturity, and establish an English School of Historical Painting, was the great object of the present design

"In the course of many years endeavours, I flatter myself, I have somewhat contributed to the establishment of an English School of Engraving. These exertions have not been unnoticed at home—But in foreign countries they have been estimated, perhaps above their value—When I began the business of publishing and selling prints, all the fine Engravings sold in England were imported from foreign countries, particularly from France—Happily, the reverse is now the case; for few are imported, and many are exported, to a great annual amount. I mention this circumstance, because there are of those, who not putting much value on the advancement of national taste, still feel the advantage of promoting the Arts, in a commercial point of view.

"I flatter myself that the present undertaking is that, and many other points of view, will eventually serve this country. The more objects of attraction and amusement held out to foreigners, that may induce them to visit this metropolis, the more are our manufactures promoted, for every one of them carries with him some specimen of them ſhem, and I believe it will be readily granted, that the manufactures of this country need only be ſeen and compared, to be preferred to thoſe of any other—To the great number of foreigners who have of late viſited this country, may in ſome degree be attributed the very flouriſhing ſtate of our commerce, and that great demand for Engliſh manufactures, which at preſent ſo univerſally prevails all over the Continent—At leaſt I can with certainty ſay, I feel the effect of this circumſtance, in my own branch of buſineſs.

"That the love of the Fine Arts is more prevalent abroad than in this country, cannot be denied, but I ſtill hope to ſee them attain (advanced in years as I am) ſuch a ſtate of perfection in England, that no man in Europe will be entitled to the name of a Connoiſſeur, who has not perſonally witneſſed their rapid progreſs—And that their progreſs has been wonderfully rapid in this country, within theſe twenty years, the whole world will readily allow—This progreſs we principally owe to his preſent Majeſty, who, ſenſible of their importance in every point of view, has cultivated the Fine Arts with a ſucceſs that the annals of no other country, in the ſame ſpace of time, can produce. The enterpriſe and liberality of ſeveral individuals alſo have not been wanting to contribute to ſo great an end—For my own part, I can with truth ſay, that the Arts have always had my beſt endeavours for their ſucceſs, and my countrymen will I hope give me credit, when I aſſure them, that where I failed, I failed more from want of power, than from want of zeal.

"In this progreſs of the Fine Arts, though foreigners have allowed our lately acquired ſuperiority of Engraving, and readily admitted the great talents of the principal Painters, yet they have ſaid with ſome ſeverity, and I am ſorry to ſay with ſome truth, that the abilities of our beſt Artiſts are chiefly employed in painting Portraits of thoſe, who, in leſs than half a century, will be loſt in oblivion——whilſt the nobleſt part of the art——Hiſtorical Painting—is much neglected. To obviate this national reflection was, as I have already hinted, the principal cauſe of the preſent undertaking, an undertaking, that originated in a private company, where painting was the ſubject of converſation—But as ſome ſhort account of the riſe and progreſs of the whole work may at a future time be given to the Subſcribers, it is not now neceſſary to ſay, who firſt promulgated the plan—who has promoted it—or who has endeavoured to impede its ſucceſs—ſuffice it to ſay at preſent, that the artiſts, in general, have with an ardour that does them credit, contributed their beſt endeavours to carry into execution an undertaking, where the national honour, the advancement of the arts, and their own advantage are equally concerned.

"Though I believe it will be readily admitted, that no ſubjects ſeem ſo proper to form an Engliſh School of Hiſtorical Painting, as the Scenes of the immortal Shakeſpeare, yet it muſt be always remembered, that he poſſeſſed powers which no pencil can reach; for ſuch was the force of his creative imagination, that though he frequently goes beyond nature, he ſtill continues to be natural, and ſeems only to do that, which Nature would have done, had ſhe o'erſtepped her uſual limits—It muſt not then be expected, that the art of the Painter will ever equal the ſublimity of our Poet. The ſtrength of Michael Angelo, united to the grace of Raphael, would here have laboured in vain.—For what pencil can give to his airy beings "a local habitation and a name?"

"It is therefore hoped, that the ſpectator will view theſe pictures with this regard, and not allow his imagination, warmed by the magic powers of the Poet, to expect from painting, what painting cannot perform.

"It is not however meant to deprecate criticiſm—Candid criticiſm is the ſoul of improvement——and thoſe artiſts, who ſhut their ears againſt it, muſt never expect to improve—At the ſame time, every artiſt ought to deſpiſe and contemn the cavils of Pſeudo critics, who, rather than not attempt to ſhew their wit, would crush all merit in its bud—The diſcerning part of the public, however, place all theſe attempts to the true account—malignity—But, as the world was never entirely free from ſuch critics, the preſent undertaking muſt expect to have its ſhare.

"Of the merits of the Artiſts employed in this work, I can with truth ſay, that I have ſought for talents wherever they were to be found, and withſtood all recommendations but thoſe that ſtrongly brought. By this means I have offended ſome; but a moment's reflection will, I think, ſhew the propriety of this line of conduct. Upon the merits of the pictures themſelves, it is not for me to ſpeak; I believe theſe never was a perfect picture, in all the three great requiſites of compoſition, colouring, and deſign it muſt not therefore be expected, that ſuch a phenomenon will be found here—Thus much, however, I will venture to ſay, that in every picture in the Gallery there is ſomething to be praiſed, and I hope ſufficient marks of merit to juſtify the lovers of their country, in holding out the foſtering hand of encouragement to native genius. I therefore flatter myſelf, that the eſtabliſhed maſters will ſupport and increaſe their former reputation, and that the younger Artiſts will daily improve, under the benign influence of the public patronage—They all know, that their future fame depends on their preſent exertions: for here the

the Painter's labours will be perpetually under the public eye, and compared with thoſe of his cotemporaries—while his other works either locked up in the cabinets of the curious, or diſperſed over the country in the houſes of the different poſſeſſors, can comparatively contribute but little to his preſent fortune or future fame.

ODE,

I cannot but remember SUCH THINGS WERE and were moſt precious to me

SHAKESPEARE

I.

SCENES of my YOUTH! ye once were dear
Though ſadly I your charms ſurvey,
I once was wont to linger here,
From early dawn to cloſing day
SCENES OF MY YOUTH! pale Sorrow flings
A ſhade o'er all your beauties now,
And robs the moments of their wings,
That ſcatter pleaſure as they flow,
While ſtill to heighten every care,
Reflection tells me, SUCH THINGS WERE

II.

'Twas here a tender mother ſtrove
To keep my happineſs in view,
I ſmil'd beneath a parent's love,
That ſoft compaſſion ever knew,
In whom the virtues all combin'd,
On whom I could with faith rely,
To whom my heart and ſoul were join'd
By mild Affection's primal tie!
Who ſmiles in Heav'n, exempt from care,
Whilſt I remember, SUCH THINGS WERE!

III.

'Twas here, (where calm and tranquil reſt O'erpays the peaſant for his toil)
That, firſt in bleſſing, I was bleſt
With glowing Friendſhip's open ſmile
My Friend, far diſtant doom'd to roam,
Now braves the fury of the ſeas,
He fled his peaceful, happy home,
His little fortune to encreaſe
Whilſt bleeds afreſh the wound of Care,
When I remember, SUCH THINGS WERE!

IV.

'Twas here—ev'n in this blooming grove,
I fondly gaz'd on Laura's charms,
Who, bluſhing, own'd a mutual love,
And melted in my youthful arms
Tho' hard the ſoul conflicting ſtrife,
Yet Fate, the cruel tyrant, bore
Far from my ſight the charm of life—
The lovely maid whom I adore.
'Twould eaſe my ſoul of all its care,
Could I forget that SUCH THINGS WERE.

Here firſt I ſaw the morn appear
Of guileleſs Pleaſure's ſtirring day;
I met the dazzling brightneſs here,
Here mark'd the ſoft declining ray—

Beheld the ſkies, whoſe ſtreaming light
Gave ſplendour to the parting ſun,
Now loſt in Sorrow's ſable night,
And all their mingled glories gone!
Till Death, in pity, end my care,
I muſt remember, SUCH THINGS WERE

THE MORNING DREAM

By W. COWPER, Eſq

'TWAS in the glad ſeaſon of ſpring,
Aſleep, at the dawn of the day,
I dream'd what I cannot but ſing,
So pleaſant it ſeem'd as I lay

I dream'd that on ocean afloat,
Far weſt from fair Albion I ſail'd,
While the billows high lifted the boat,
And the freſh-flowing breeze never fail'd.

In the ſteerage a woman I ſaw,
Such at leaſt was the form which ſhe wore,
Whoſe beauty impreſs'd me with awe
Nor leſs taught me by woman before.

She ſat, and a ſhield at her ſide
Shed light like the ſun on the waves,
And ſmiling did wirely ſhe cried,
"I go to make free-men of ſlaves."

Then raiſing her voice to a ſtrain
The ſweeteſt that ear ever heard,
She ſung of the Slave's broken chain,
Wherever her glory appear'd

Some clouds that had over us hung,
Fled, chas'd by her melody clear,
And methought while ſhe Liberty ſung,
It was Liberty only to hear

Thus ſwiftly dividing the flood,
To a Slave cultured Iſland we came,
Where a Dæmon her enemy ſtood,
Oppreſſion his terrible name

In his hand, as the ſign of his ſway,
A ſcourge hung with laſhes he bore,
And ſtood looking out for his prey,
From Africa's ſorrowful ſhore

But ſoon as approaching the land,
This goddeſs-like woman he view'd,
The ſcourge he let fall from his hand,
With the blood of his ſubjects embrued

I ſaw him both ſicken and die,
And the moment the monſter expir'd,
Heard ſhouts which aſcended the ſky
From thouſands with rapture inſpired.

Awaking, how could I but muſe
On what ſuch a Dream might betide,
When ſoon my ear caught the glad news,
Which ſerv'd my weak thoughts as a guide,

SPRING

WINTER's unjoyous ſeaſon paſt,
The ſnow freaught cloud, the nipping blaſt,
No longer threat the plain;
With thee, ſweet Spring, the op'ning flow'r,
The gentle breeze, and tepid ſhow'r,
Returne their wonted reign

See, all around the teeming ſpray
Is burſting forth, in beauty gay,
To deck the new-born year,
While o'er the diſtant grove is ſeen
The firſt faint tinge of cheerful green
By ſlow degrees appear

The feather'd choir now ſwell their throats,
And wooe with wild enamoured notes
The pairings of their care,
Mark how they frame the curious neſt—
Ah! may no cruel and moleſt
One little harmleſs pair

The boiſterous torrent now ſubſides,
And with a ſoothing murmur glides
Along its pebbly bed
Again the ſunny bank delights,
Again each ſylvan path invites,
Which I was us'd to tread

How bright the proſpect all around!
How gay the flow'rs that ſtrew the ground!
What muſick fills the air!
This lovely ſeaſon ſure was ſent
To make the happy more content,
And charm the pangs of care.

While Nature thus delights each ſenſe,
I glow with feelings more intenſe,
Which gratitude inſpire,
For in his works that Pow'r I trace
Who gave the ſcene ſuch matchleſs grace,
And form'd me to admire

SHAKESPEARE

To Mrs ABINGTON

FROM ever verdant bowers I write,
Celeſtial ſeats of calm delight,
Where all thoſe hards divine are plac'd,
Whoſe ſkilful pens the Drama grac'd,
Who now with extacy look down
On you that make their talents known.
Fletcher and Steele behold with pride,
Their favorite dames ſo dignified;
The latter with enrapture'd eyes,
Viewing romantic Biddy cries,
"Was ever ſuch a perfect creature!
"So finely form'd! the pride of nature!
"Her voice harmonious, graceful air,
"Quite captivate the eye and ear
"Ladies ſhould read the old romances,
"Nor longer think them idle fancies,
"Like her ſuch heroine's manners trace,
"And copy fortitude, eaſe, and grace."
Fletcher his ſkill of whim ſurveys,
And warm in Elifrana's praiſe,
Exclaims, delighted with the view,
"She ever juſt, yet ever new,
"With equal ſkill the ruder ſcenes diſplays,
"Gives force to humour in its various ways,
"And the full ſenſe of every thought con veys;"
Then of his Scornful Lady tells,
And on your peerleſs merit dwells.
Cibber, Farquhar, and many more,
Of modern days and days of yore,
Their grateful admiration join,
And laſt not leaſt accept of mine.

Yes, Abington, I muſt impart
The ardent wiſhes of my heart.
Still true to Nature, true to me,
O! may I oft exulting ſee
The Beatrice my fancy drew
Find ſubſtance and a ſoul in you:
Looks which add brilliancy to wit,
More poignant than the words I write,
When, feeling for a friend oppreſs'd,
Diſdain, rage, pity are expreſs'd,
And agitate your gen'rous mind,
A real Beatrice I find:
Pigmalion like, I gaze! admire!
The image glows with living fire;
My work with wonder I explore,
And that unknown'd could adore:
Still in theſe trifling witleſs days,
When Farces are prefer'd to Plays,
Do you ſupport my comic name,
Nor let oblivion cloud my fame.

SHORTNESS OF LIFE.

Or what are joys that ſide the grave?
The greateſt of our comfort's health:
How ſhort, indeed, the time we have!

Death, fatal foe to ſocial joy,
Thou with thy dagger pierceſt deep;
Thou filial comforts doſt unapy,
And mak'ſt the tender mother weep.

But why weep, woman, for thy ſon?
He's gone from hence to endleſs bliſs;
Haſte then, ye youths, that heedleſs run,
Oh! may your time be ſpent like his!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

[FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE.]

Conſtantinople, April 7

YESTERDAY evening, between nine and ten o'clock, the Grand Seignior was taken ill with a fainting fit, which proved to be a ſtroke of apoplexy, and baffled all the efforts of the phyſicians, the Sultan expired at half an hour after ſix this morning. Information of this event having been tranſmitted to the Porte, the Mufty, the Captain Paſhaw, and the other Grandees, aſſembled in the Seraglio about eight o'clock and paid homage to the new reigning Sultan, Selim the Third (born in 1761), whoſe acceſſion to the Ottoman Throne, attended with the uſual ceremonies, was announced by the cannon of the Seraglio. The remains of the deceaſed Sultan were depoſited, at twelve o'clock, in the magnificent tomb prepared by his order, ſeveral years ſince, for himſelf and his children.

Vienna, April 18. On Wedneſday night laſt the Emperor's indiſpoſition returned with ſuch alarming ſymptoms, that he expreſſed a deſire to receive the ſacrament, which was accordingly adminiſtered to him the following day, in the preſence of the Royal Family, the Great Officers of State, and ſeveral of the Nobility and Gentry of both ſexes. The diſorder has ſince abated. His Imperial Majeſty paſſed laſt night quietly, has had ſome refreſhing ſleep, and appears in a favourable ſtate to-day.

Vienna, April 22. Letters are received from Prince de Hohenlohe, dated Hermannſtadt the 14th of this month, mentioning that Colonel Mayerſheim having received intelligence on the 8th, that 7000 Turks were on their march to attack the advanced poſt Valle Muleri, defended by only 200 fuſiliers and chaſſeurs, had reſolved to abandon it, and that the enemy having attempted to harraſs this ſmall corps in their retreat, were ſo warmly received by the chaſſeurs and a party of huſſars detached to their aſſiſtance, as to be obliged to deſiſt with the loſs of 253 men killed, whilſt the Auſtrians loſt only one killed, and had nine wounded.

Stockholm, April 28. Yeſterday the Bewilliung, or extraordinary Free Gift, was voted in the Plenum of the Nobility, after which the termination of the Diet was announced by ſound of trumpet, with the ſame parade and ceremonies as were obſerved at the opening of it, and this day the King cloſed the Seſſion with a very gracious ſpeech from the Throne.

Vienna, April 29. His Imperial Majeſty's health is ſo much improved as to give hopes of his complete recovery.

Venice, May 1. On Wedneſday evening a courier arrived here with diſpatches from the Bailo at Conſtantinople to the Senate, acquainting them with the ſudden death of Abdul Hamid, the Ottoman Emperor, which happened on the 7th of April, without any viſible previous illneſs. He was born the 20th of March 1725, and aſcended the Ottoman throne on the 21ſt of January 1774, by the name of Achmet the Fourth. It is believed that he will be succeeded by his brother Selim.

Vienna, May 2. In all parts has been received from Croatia, that, on the 18th of last month a body of Turkish cavalry, amounting to five thousand men, attempted to attack an advanced post at Vidin. The Turks, attacked by surprise, were repulsed with the loss of nine of their number, forty of which they carried off, and left on the field of battle. The Imperialists had to lament fourteen killed, and thirty two wounded.

Paris, May 7. On Tuesday last, about twelve o'clock at noon, his Majesty opened the Assembly of the States-General by a speech from the throne, which was received with loud acclamations.* The Queen was placed on his left hand, Monsieur, and the Comte d'Artois, at a small distance on the right, Madame, and Madame Elizabeth, (his Majesty's sisters) together with Madame Victoire and Adelaide (his Majesty's aunts) on the left hand behind the Queen. The other Princes of the Blood, Princesses and Peers, were all on the right, the Marshals of France, with others

* This speech has been given as follows in the public papers:

"GENTLEMEN,

"I find myself surrounded with many persons whom I have long wished to see, and I find myself animated by the hope of a better futurity.

"The general convocation of the States-General, but although the Assemblies have not for a long time been held, I have not been swayed by the steps of my predecessors to re-establish a custom, from which the nation may certainly hope to acquire new vigour, and which may be the means of bringing to an additional force of happiness.

"The public credit is already immensely connected to the throne, and has increased under my reign, an event which could not be but very flattering, and an augmentation of which the consequences, I am unquestionably sure, must be more sensibly felt.

"A very beneficial agreement, a spirit of freedom and love have taken hold of the people's minds, and will certainly influence, in a favourable manner, their decisions to fix them by wise and moderate counsels.

"It is with this confidence, Gentlemen, that I now assemble you, and I rejoice to see that at this hour, marked by the fatal plan of [illegible] first order of the State have the means to remove the [illegible] by the [illegible] which I have cherished, to see all the orders united and clear with each other to the public good, while their rights, not being destroyed.

"I have only ordered the preliminaments of expence, you will receive from me with your sentiments on the [illegible], which I shall receive with delight, but in the present circumstances, I fear, gentlemen, it will not be possible for me to subject to your deliberations the extent of the resources which I could wish. I will endeavour to be laid before you the exact state of the finances, when you have examined them, I am assured you will propose to me the means to establish them on a permanent and firm foundation.

"The public spirit of the [illegible] Assembly of the Representatives of the nation will certainly hearken to no other counsels but those founded on wisdom and prudence. You yourselves, gentlemen, have been enabled to judge on many recent occasions, that the people have but one idea, but the spirit which will rule over your deliberations will answer for the unanimity of a generous nation, whose distinguished character has ever been the love of their king, I shall banish from me every other sentiment.

"I know the authority and power of a just King, grounded by a faithful people, at all times attached to the principles of monarchy, these have caused the glory and splendour of France. I ought, and I ever shall be the support of them.

"But what we may be expected from the most tender solicitude to the public good—whatever can be asked from a Sovereign, the sincerest friend of his people, you may, you ought to hope from me.

"May an happy union reign in this Assembly, and may this epocha become ever memorable for the happiness and prosperity of the country. It is the wish of my heart, it is the most ardent desire of my prayers, it is, in short, the price which I expect from the fidelity of my intentions, and my love for my people.

"The Keeper of the Seals will explain my intentions more fully, and I have ordered the Director General of the Finances to lay before you the state of the kingdom."

of the same rank, were on the left The Garde des Sceaux was also on the left, and the other great Officers of State were on the right of the Throne The Duc d Orleans, who is the only Prince of the Blood chose Deputy to the States General, took his seat as such amongst the Nobility The Ministers were seated close under the platform on which the Throne was placed As soon as his Majesty had finished his speech, the Garde des Sceaux and Monsieur Necker addressed his Majesty and the Assembly, and at about four o clock in the afternoon the King rose from his seat, and adjourned the meeting to the following day

MONTHLY CHRONICLE.

APRIL

A VERY important decision to owners of landed property lately took place in the Court of King s Bench —The question arose out of an appeal tried at the last Michaelmas sessions for the county of Devon, and was sent up to the Court of King s Bench to be determined The point was, whether parish apprentices can be bound in a compulsory manner, under the 43d of Elizabeth, upon owners of estates, who are not inhabitants, as whether inhabitants alone of parishes are liable Lord Kenyon delivered it as his opinion, that occupiers of property were liable, even though not inhabitants, and the binding was confirmed

Another cause was tried before Lord Kenyon, at Guildhall, wherein J Inwood was plaintiff, and Nath Block defendant This was an action by an indorsee against the second indorser of a bill of exchange

The plaintiff not having been able to prove the hand-writing of the first indorser, Mr Erskine, for the defendant, objected that the plaintiff had not proved his declaration, but his Lordship overruled the objection, saying the law was perfectly clear, that every indorsement creates a new bill, and therefore it was unnecessary to prove the signature of the first indorser, but were it against the acceptor it might be otherwise A verdict was found accordingly for the plaintiff, for the principal and interest

23 Eighty of the Sunday school children at Windsor were clothed by her Majesty, and attended divine service, following the Mayor and Corporation in procession all of them wore in their hats a garter blue ribband, with "Long live the King" in letters of gold, to every child was given a medal, which was hung round their necks by an orange ribband On one side is the head of the King, and round it, "God save the King" On the reverse, "When we forget him may God forget us —Thurlow Restored to health March 1788."

Lord Heathfield s cannon were fired at his seat at Lumbam Green, his Lordship also roasted an ox, which was distributed, with a large quantity of beer, on the occasion

The Governors of Bethlem have received a liberal and well timed benefaction from a person unknown, accompanied with the following note, viz "The Governors of Bethlem Hospital are desired to apply the inclosed two Bank notes (or 50l each) to the use of that charity, being the humble expression of the donor s gratitude to Almighty God, for that signal act of his mercy to these kingdoms, which is to be publicly commemorated on the 23d of April 1789

29 This afternoon, at three o clock, arrived at Spithead, the Andromeda frigate, Prince William Henry, commander, in 22 days from Halifax

Same day the sessions ended at the Old-Bailey, when nine convicts received judgment of death, and 56 were ordered to be transported

Twenty-three female convicts, whose execution had been respited, were set to the bar, and acquainted that his Majesty would be pleased to grant them a pardon, or condition of being transported to the Eastern coast of New South Wales, which gracious offer was accepted by seventeen of them, but the other six obstinately refused it, declaring they had rather die than leave this kingdom.

MAY 2 His Royal Highness Prince William Henry arrived at Windsor from Portsmouth, when he was immediately introduced to their Majesties

We hear from Barnstaple, that on Monday night, about three in the morning, the inhabitants of that town were alarmed by a shock of an earthquake, attended with considerable noise, which shook the household furniture, but did not overturn any thing The shock was also felt at Ilfracombe

4 This afternoon Count Saint Alman, a native of France, and Count Scella, an Italian nobleman, with their seconds, (two French gentlemen) took hackney coaches at Lambeth, and drove to Kennington Common near the brick kiln, and fought a duel, in which Count St Alman received a ball in his side, of which he died the next night

§ The following gentlemen were nominated by the Lord Mayor to be offered to the Livery at Midsummer Day for their choice of Sheriff to serve for the ensuing year, viz — Richard Wright, esq citizen and grocer Edward Nairne, esq citizen and spectacle-maker William Hill, esq citizen and grocer Joseph Rose, esq citizen and goldsmith David Pugh, esq citizen and grocer Cornelius Denne, esq citizen and grocer Thomas Baker, esq citizen and blacksmith Simeon Pope, esq citizen and painter stainer James Richardson, esq citizen and goldsmith.

Messrs. Wright, Hill, Pugh, and Denne, esqrs have since paid their fine, to be excused serving the office.

As William Ward the famous pugilist of Bristol, and several of his friends, were on their way to Stilton, they stopped at the Black Horse, at Enfield, where a smith, of the neighbourhood, was drinking, who being a noted bruiser, and understanding Ward was of the fraternity, he challenged him to fight for one, or for twenty guineas, which Ward refused to do on any terms the smith then made use of some foul language, and dared Ward to follow him, which he did into the road, where they had some rounds, in the course of the battle Ward got a black eye, but the other gave in Shortly after, Ward went into a publick house, in which his antagonist was sitting, and hearing him utter some disrespectful expressions of him, challenged the other in his turn, after several rounds, Ward gave his opponent a violent blow, which beat in the lower ribs, so as to bruise the kidnies, and occasion instant death He is committed to New Prison, for Manslaughter, the coroner's Inquest brought in their verdict Manslaughter

§ The long impending match between Humphries and Mendoza took place this day at Stilton, and terminated in favour of the latter The battle began at one o'clock, and they fought thirty five minutes, when Humphries fell to avoid a blow of Mendoza This, it is conceived, was contrary to express stipulation, and that the battle was thereby lost However, after a most laborious exertion, it was agreed they should again set to, and it became two to one in favour of Mendoza After a further quarter of an hour's contention, Humphries finding himself much worsted, made a second fall, which was considered as a palpable foul, and Mendoza's victory was declared to be decisive Humphries seemed, during the whole, warm and confident, Mendoza, calm and collected Captain Brown was Mendoza's second — Johnson, Humphries's.

Humphries has since published a long letter, explanatory of, and justifying his conduct at Stilton, which he attributes to a violent attack of the rheumatism that came on after a profuse sweat, whilst waiting an hour and a quarter for the fight disputed till being decided, which unnerved his powers, and made him sink down without the power of recovering himself — He concludes with a challenge to Mendoza, who has offered to fight him again in the first week of June next, or in May 1790 However, Humphries, on account of his ill health declines to engage till Sept Oct Nov or any time before May 1790

An insurrection took place last week in Paris, in consequence of some inconsiderate expressions used by the proprietor of a large manufactory in that city, respecting the price of labour, of certain taxes were abolished. The manufacturers disapproved the words spoken, a scuffle ensued between them and the military, in which more than 172 persons were killed, and 157 wounded on the spot. Some of the rioters have been prosecuted to the utmost rigour of the law. Two were hanged on the 2d inst. in the morning, and with circumstances extremely particular. Never was an execution of the common order of people conducted with such pomp. All the streets and bridges were lined with cavalry from the Châtelet to the gate of St. Anthony. At this place the French and Swiss regiments of guards, and some others, were stationed, with cannon at all the avenues of this extensive quarter of the town. The criminals were followed by another party of the guards to the place of execution. These precautions were the more necessary, for fear of a further disturbance, though there did not appear the smallest inclination towards it. The dreadful scene was in the Faubourg de St. Antoine.

An express from Ireland brings advice, that Mr. Grattan has brought forward the question of the Poyning's law in the House of Commons, on the report from a committee, which stood thus:

For the question	78
Against it	132
Majority, for Government	54

The Attorney General then moved, "that the report of the Committee be rejected from partial and garbled evidence should be rejected," which was done without a division.

8. The question which has so much agitated the minds of people in trade all over the Kingdom for the last twelve months, "Whether the bills which were filed by Lewis and Potter, Livesey, Hanburies and Co. and others, to fictitious persons, and indorsed in their names, could be legally covered, or proceeded on the effects of the acceptors," was finally determined this day in the King's Bench, by Lord Kenyon in favour of the holders of the bills. That is, that every person who is fairly in possession of these bills, having paid the value thereof can prove a demand against the drawers, acceptors, and all who have indorsed them—notwithstanding they cannot prove the identity of the first indorsement, which the law heretofore required, but which was absolutely impossible in many of the bill transactions of last year in London and Manchester, as they amounted to an immense amount, which, by a collusive agreement between the drawers and acceptors, were made payable to persons of no property at all, and many to names which did not exist. These bills were discounted among the bankers and monied people on the credit of the names which were known thereon; and as a premium was paid for them, it would have been the greatest injustice, and of most dangerous consequence to trade, if a fictitious indorsement which was unknown to the discounter should have precluded him from all recourse on the parties who had contrived the scheme, and obtained the value of the bills which they issued.

The Court of King's Bench have determined, that the sheriff in execution has a right to retain the body, while the hammer is suspended, as the bidding is merely an offer not accepted till the hammer is actually down.

The decision of a cause before the Judges of the Common Pleas, and a special jury of Norfolk, respecting the freemen of London being exempt from export fees generally throughout England, and particularly at Lynn, was in favour of the freemen.

16. The journeymen smiths, who were convicted of a conspiracy for the purpose of raising their wages, have received judgment from the Court of King's Bench to be imprisoned in Newgate eighteen month.

A gatekeeper at Colnbrooke received judgment to pay a fine of 40s. and to be imprisoned three months, for demanding more than the turnpike, viz. to pay a fine of 50l. and to be imprisoned three months.

Macdonald and Morgan also received sentence for publishing obscene libels to be imprisoned in Newgate for the space of one year, and find sureties in 200l. for three years.

19. Being her Majesty's birth day, the installation of the Knights took place at Windsor, where the King, Queen, and Princesses received the compliments of all the foreign Ministers, and a number of nobility and gentry at the Queen's Lodge, and the whole of the Royal Family now in England dined together.

In the evening there was a grand concert at the Castle, and a supper in St. George's Hall, in the same style of preparation as those lately given, but on a more enlarged scale. All the great officers of State, officers of the Household, Lords and Ladies of the Bed-Chamber, &c. were present.

21. The anniversary meeting of the sons of the clergy was held this day, at which the Lord-Mayor, Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Lord Chancellor, several of the the Bishops, and others of the Nobility and Gentry were present The collection at St Paul's this day, amounted to 275l 5s 0d which, with the collection of Tuesday 208l 18s 6d and at Merchant Taylor's Hall 624l 11s 1d amounted to 1108l 14s 7d

22 The Court of Common Council unanimously voted 100l towards the erection of the Protestant chapel in Ostend, upon the motion of Mr Powell

A gentleman on the subject of canary birds, observes, "that this elegant little songster might very easily be completely naturalized to our climate, and become a denizen of the British woods and groves not only turning out pairs, (which never yet succeeded but by depositing the eggs of canary birds in the nests of the green linnet, grey linnet, chaffinch, gold finch, or yellow-hammer) but canary birds thus hatched and reared, would in time lose the same modes and habits of their foster-parents, so that every succeeding autumn and winter season the produce would be the most favourable, we would recommend those who have the inclination for such amusements, to make the trial

20 The field-officers of the Coldstream regiment of guards on the 15th inst. was marked by a peculiar circumstance. The Hon Col Lenox addressed a letter to the Duke of York, in Council, requesting to know what his Highness had "that he, Mr Lenox, put up with language never for any gentleman to bear," the duke, without any explanation, ordered him to his post. The moment the field-day was over, his Highness ordered the attendance of all the officers in the orderly room, where he called upon Col Lenox to state his complaint. This being done, the Duke acknowledged he had heard that improper language had been put use with by Col Lenox but as to the precise words he declined repeating them. The Colonel demanded to know who the author was? the Duke replied, that Mr Lenox might consider him as an officer of the regiment, and call upon him whenever he pleased

The following circular letter was afterwards sent by Colonel Lenox to every member of Daubigny's club

Richmond House, May 18, 1789.

SIR,

A Report having been spread, that the Duke of York had said—"Some words had been made use of to me, in a political conversation, that no Gentleman ought to submit to," I, on the first opportunity, spoke to his Royal Highness before the officers of the Coldstream regiment, to which I have the honour to belong; his answer was, "That he had heard them said to me at Daubigny's;" but he positively refused to tell me the expression, or the person who had used it. In this situation, being perfectly ignorant what his Royal Highness can allude to, and not being aware that any such expression ever passed, I cannot find any better mode of clearing up this matter, than by writing a letter to every member of Daubigny's club, desiring me each of them to let me know if he can recollect any expression to have been used in his presence which could bear the construction put upon it by his Royal Highness, and, in such case, by whom the expression was used. If any such expression should occur to your memory, (as you must be conscious of the disagreeable situation in which I am placed) I trust and hope you will take the earliest opportunity of stating it to me. If no such expression recurs to your memory, I would request a positive answer, which I should also hope to receive before the day is past.

I am much more to be,

SIR,

Your most obedient humble servant,

(signed) C LENOX.

Col Lenox not having received any satisfactory answer to his requisition to the Members of his club and having waited the time he limited, found no alternative to have recourse to the Duke of York, on the subject of the expressions he chose to make use of.

On Monday evening the 25th, therefore, he sent to desire the necessity of a proper explanation, which his Highness not choosing to give, a meeting took place this day on Wimbledon Common. Lord Rawdon was second to his Royal Highness Earl Winchelsea to Colonel Lenox and who have given the following Account of the Rencontre.

In consequence of a dispute already known to the public, his Royal Highness the Duke of York, attended by Lord Rawdon, and Lieutenant Colonel Lenox, accompanied by the Earl of Winchelsea, met at Wimbledon Common. The ground was measured at twelve paces, and both parties were to fire at a signal agreed upon ——— the signal being given, Lieutenant Colonel Lenox fired, and the ball grazed his Royal Highness's curls the Duke of York did not fire. Lord Rawdon then interfered, and said, he thought enough had been done. Lieutenant Colonel Lenox observed, that his Royal Highness had not fired. Lord Rawdon said, it was not the Duke's intention to fire. His Royal Highness had come out, upon Lieutenant Colonel Lenox's desire, to give him satisfaction, and had no animosity against him. Lieutenant-Colonel Lenox replied that the Duke of York should fire, which was declined, upon a repe-

a repetition of the reason. Lord Winchelsea then went up to the Duke of York, and expressed his hope that His Royal Highness could have no objections to say, he considered Lieutenant Colonel Lenox a man of honour and courage. His Royal Highness replied, that he should say nothing. I had come out to give Lieutenant Colonel Lenox satisfaction, and did not mean to fire at him if Lieutenant Colonel Lenox was not satisfied, he might fire again. Lieutenant Colonel Lenox said, he could not possibly fire again at the Duke, as his Royal Highness did not mean to fire at him. On this, both parties left the ground. The seconds think it proper to add, that both parties behaved with the most perfect coolness and intrepidity.

Tuesday Evening, RAWDON

An ACCOUNT of the LIFE and WRITINGS of Mrs. H. COWLEY.

[With a PORTRAIT of HER.]

AMONGST the ladies of the preſent times who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their literary purſuits, and demonſtrated the equality of talents in each ſex, the authoreſs whoſe portrait we now preſent to our readers ſtands in a point of view equally conſpicuous and eminent. From few authors now living has more theatrical entertainment been derived, from ſcarce any one, when we reflect on the fertility of her genius, is more to be expected.

Mrs COWLEY is the daughter of Mr. Parkhouſe, of Tiverton, in Devonſhire. He is ſaid to have been every way a man of reſpectable endowments. To the advantages of education he joined a natural flow of humour, which, together with the information he poſſeſſed, rendered him a uſeful friend and a pleaſing companion. He has lately paid the debt to nature, leaving his widow, Mrs Cowley's mother, who ſtill reſides at Tiverton, enjoying the affection of her daughter, and ſuch attentions as are due from filial piety to virtuous age. To the poem called "The Maid of Arragon," Mrs Cowley has prefixed a dedication to her father, which may ſerve as a teſtimony of her regard for her parents. It is as follows:

Accept, dear parent! from a filial pen,
The humble offſpring of my penſive muſe.
She painted on my mind a daughter's woes,
Nor could my heart the tender theme refuſe.
The rightful patron of th' eventful tale,
To you I dedicate the ſcenes I drew,
My ſoul ſhe ſearch'd to find Oſmida's thoughts,
And colour'd her from what I feel for you.
Yours then the meed—if meed kind fame will grant,
The tale to you—to you the bays belong,
You gave my youthful fancy wings to ſoar,
From your indulgence flows my wild-note ſong.
Its muſic in your ear will ſweetly ſound,
Its page with fond delight you'll traverſe o'er:
With half your pleaſure may the world peruſe!
My muſe, my vanity can aſk no more.
Dear other parent! guiltleſs hold my heart,
Though unadorn'd my numbers with your name,
Your worth, your goodneſs, in its centre lives,
And then ſhall periſh only with my frame.

About the year 1772 ſhe married Mr. Cowley, who is now in the ſervice of the Eaſt-India Company at Bengal (and brother to Mr Cowley of Cateaton-ſtreet) by whom ſhe has three children, a ſon and two daughters.

It was not until the year 1776 that Mrs Cowley appeared as a dramatic writer. At the concluſion of Mr. Garrick's management, The Runaway was performed, and was the laſt drama received before his relinquiſhing the ſtage both as a performer and manager. To this comedy, which was acted with great ſucceſs, he contributed an epilogue, and the reception the piece met with encouraged our authoreſs to continue her exertions for the ſtage. It is worthy to be remarked, that ſhe has been highly ſucceſsful in the different walks of Tragedy, Comedy and Farce, and that ſhe is not diſtinguiſhed merely by literary endowments, for her engaging perſon and manners render her conſpicuous in thoſe lines where ladies generally like to be conſpicuous.

The poetical correſpondence of DELIA CRUSCA and ANNA MATILDA has engroſſed much of the public attention. The utmoſt ingenuity has been exerted to remove the veil of myſtery from thoſe two charming writers, who have actually formed in this late age a new SCHOOL for POETRY, which muſt reign, and will have its diſciples, as long as the language endures. It is at length confidently whiſpered, that the ANNA MATILDA is Mrs Cowley, and the DELIA CRUSCA, Mr Merry: if ſo, the country is indebted to THALIA for ſpecimens of the moſt beautiful poetry that any period has produced; and what is very extraordinary, it appears that they are perſonally total ſtrangers to each other, though mutually ſtruck with admiration

In the life of one devoted to literature there is ſeldom to be recorded either incident or adventure In that of Mrs Cowley, the even tenor of domeſtic life has been little varied, conſequently no circumſtance has ariſen worthy of particular notice We ſhall therefore conclude with a liſt of her works, after obſerving that ſhe went laſt ſummer to Paris for the purpoſe of ſuperintending the education of her daughters and nieces, where ſhe is viſited by people of rank and talents The place of her reſidence is the Hotel de l'endome, at preſent remarkable for the abode of ſeveral perſons of diſtinguiſhed abilities, a Marquis on the ground floor, who has compoſed a petite piece, a Count, the author of two operas, and a Biſhop, celebrated for the beauties of his ſtyle in compoſition Her apartments command a view of the gardens of the Auguſtines

Beſides the Maid of Arragon already mentioned, Mrs Cowley is the authoreſs of The Scottiſh Village, a poem, and the following dramas

1 The Runaway, a Comedy, acted at Drury Lane 1776

2 Who's the Dupe, a Farce, acted at Drury Lane 1779

3 Albina, a Tragedy, acted at the Hay-market 1779

4 The Belle's Stratagem, a Comedy, acted at Covent Garden 1780 This had a run of upwards of twenty nights

5 The School for Eloquence, an Interlude, acted at Drury Lane for Mr Bierton's benefit 1780 Not printed.

6 The World as it Goes or a Trip to Montpelier, a Comedy, acted at Covent Garden 1781 This piece was unfavourably received, which occaſioned its being altered, and again brought forward under the title of

7 Second Thoughts are Beſt, a Comedy, acted at Covent Garden 1781, and again unfavourably received Neither of theſe pieces are publiſhed

8 Which Is The Man? a Comedy, acted at Covent Garden 1782

9 A Bold Stroke for a Huſband, a Comedy, acted at Covent Garden 1783

10 More Ways than One, a Comedy, acted at Covent Garden 1783

11 A School for Grey Beards, a Comedy, acted at Drury Lane 1786

12 The Fate of Sparta, a Tragedy, acted at Drury Lane, 1788.

THE HETEROCLITE.

No VI

Fond to be Fools of Fame WHITEHEAD

I PROMISED laſt month what I cannot, I find, perform this month, viz "Obſervations on the Conteſt between Humphries and Mendoza" they are unavoidably poſtponed for want of time and recollection. Quant ſuff —The world, I think, ſeems deſirous of making bad worſe Sic probo —In Heteroclite, No III. parag. 1, for tour, read hour Parag 2, for pigmy in literature, read a pigmy in, &c Parag 7, for abſtruſe ſilence, read abſolute ſilence —In Heteroclite, No IV. Fragment, line 12, for due, read day. Line 17, for hyds, read hyds —In Heteroclite, No V parag. 3. read the words univerſally admired with a mark of interrogation, and after the word 'antiquity' a comma Parag. 2, for hey, I know not, read nay, I know not In the Ode for Chapmens Meander read charm &c Zounds, man! my compoſition, I fear, difficult enough, even in their very beſt ſtate With theſe ſupernumerary advantages they will be totally inexplicable

This immortal method of preſerving to poſterity theſe ſeveral errata will, I hope, Mr Editor, be productive of no miſunderſtanding between us, but of more caution on the part of the Printer, who may (tis only a conjecture) be too frequently———", &c &c —Proof impreſſions ought to be corrected with care.

And now for a ſubject for my ſixth Heteroclite —Mrs Montague, in her elegant and ſpirited "Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Shakeſpeare," obſerves, that "there are delicacies of decorum in one age unknown to another age, but whatever is immoral is equally blameable in all" Now, though this, coming from the pen of a lady, may be juſt ſuch an obſervation as we might naturally expect, female delicacy being

* No—do not think ſo—in this caſe, as in many others of the like nature, perhaps even a lie, in fact, may be meant than meets the ear.'

moſt ſenſibly affected by a neglect of this ſort, yet, be it remembered, as an obſervation, which not having been made for us, good ſenſe and good manners would have taught us to make ourſelves, and if not even the genius and talents of a poet like Shakeſpeare, nor the almoſt total want of refinement in the age he lived, can excuſe his, in ſome meaſure, neceſſary ſacrifices at the ſhrine of indecency, much leſs can we overlook thoſe ſame faults in writers of no talents and genius whatever (except ſuch indeed as furniſh them with wit ſufficient for obſcenity), and in an age too which claims to itſelf the very ne plus ultra of refinement. The ſtage, under its preſent regulations, is certainly inimicable to our morals—it might be, what I am perſuaded it was intended to be, an improver of them, but whilſt the power of rejecting frivolous and impertinent nonſenſe ceaſes to be exerciſed †, theatrical exhibition ceaſes to be edifying, and of courſe to be encourageable. But theatrical exhibition is encouraged: be it ſo, this proves nothing but the degeneracy of mankind, and the bad taſte of the times. I could mention, were it not forbidden by my own and my editor's feelings to be too perſonal, ſeveral pieces which have been even acted with applauſe, whereas had propriety and mere common ſenſe been conſulted, they ought to have been condemned immediately. I am not certain that ſuch trumpery ‡ may not continue to be admired, but of this I am certain, that an Athenian audience (and juſtice forbid a refuſal of that title to the audiences of Old Drury and Covent Garden) would have regarded ſuch repreſentations as the vileſt burleſque upon their underſtandings. To behold a refined people, with all that ſenſibility of nature, all thoſe powers of nice diſcrimination, which refinement is ſuppoſed capable of beſtowing, patiently attending to, nay, even highly delighted with, the ridiculous nonſenſe of ridiculous authors, who, to the ſhame of authorſhip be it ſpoken, previouſly adapt their performances to the capacity of ridiculous players, and who, without ſuch a meaſure prudential ſubmiſſion, dare never probably expect that their pieces ſhould be received at all §—to behold ſuch an audience exulting ſuch a —— I have no expreſſion for the idea that ſets at defiance Tragedy, Comedy, Pantomime and Farce—Spectatum admiſſi, riſum teneatis?—Si foret in terris, rideret Democritus. If an Author will write for the ſtage, let him imagine his ſpectators men of ſenſe, not a ſet of Momuſes;—let him ſuppoſe his actors endowed with rationality, or, if he muſt blunder in his ſentiments, rather let him miſtake them for all Garricks, than Ewins all. We are tired, we are diſguſted with the heap of unmeaning ribaldry forced upon our attention, and were it not for the uncommon exertions of a Siddons, who, I will be bold enough to affirm, is almoſt the ſole ſupport of theatrical honour, our play-houſes would ſink into perfect contempt. Here, though it be "no eaſy matter to make advice a free gift," I would yet willingly, as a caution, perſuade this celebrated actreſs to diſdain, as utterly beneath her capacity as well as notice, all inferior parts. She is at preſent the delight and glory of her age—ſhe may, by a prudential conduct, continue to be ſo. But, Mrs Siddons, condeſcend to bear with one ſimple queſtion—Lady Macbeth, Deſdemona, Imogen, Cordelia,—theſe are characters you have amply done juſtice to.—Have you done equal juſtice to the Princeſs in the Law of Lombardy), Mary (Queen of Scots), or even to the Grecian Daughter? ‖—You have not, Mrs Siddons, you could not,

† Not ſo much, I apprehend, through tenderneſs for miſtaken abilities, or an unwillingneſs to mortify the pride of an author, as from a moſt outrageous partiality for the modern ſtile, be the ancient rules connected with it or not.

‡ I grant the word is an awkward one, but it perfectly anſwers to the concomitant idea.

§ "One would expect it of our writers (ſays my Lord Shaftſbury) that, if they had real "ability they ſhould draw the world to them, and not meanly ſuit themſelves to the world in "its weak ſtate." He afterwards goes on to aſſert, "They—viz. authors—regulate themſelves by the irregular fancy of the world, and frankly own they are prepoſterous and abſurd, "in order to accommodate themſelves to the genius of the age." (Quere, Are ſuch ſongs as Horum Corum Sunt Divorum, Fal de Ral Tit, Galloping Dreary Dun, &c &c &c accommodated to the genius of the age or the actor? Such nonſenſe may poſſibly attract Mr Edwin's attention, but it hardly follows from thence, that it ſhould deſerve the attention of reaſonable creatures.) "In our days (continues he) the audience makes the poet, and the bookſeller the "author." How exactly is one age the counterpart of the other!

‖ In ſinging out theſe pieces be it known that I have no particular motive, my motive is general, to evince that ſecondary productions are by no means calculated for the diſplay of firſt-rate abilities.

Some

for as no one's feelings but your own can expreſs the ſentiments of a Shakeſpeare, ſo no one's ſentiments but Shakeſpeare's can expreſs your feelings! In ſaying this, I am no flatterer—I profeſs but an approbation in common with others. With others, however, I have not yet learnt the art of concealing that approbation beneath an affected faſtidiouſneſs. Real merits, in my eyes, has not leſs charms becauſe of its popularity. I can look upon the ſun without envy—diſpenſing his rays every where, they muſt light upon me too.

ACCOUNT of JOSEPH Cᵗ WALKER, Eſq (See Page 209)

JOSEPH C WALKER, Eſq was born in Dublin He received his ſchool education under the Rev Dr Ball,* and completed his ſtudies under the care of private tutors. Beſides a knowledge of the dead he is acquainted with the living languages, and unites all the faſhionable accompliſhments of the age His perſon is about the middle ſize, neat and regularly formed, his features handſome, and his eyes dark and animated, his manner is eaſy and polite, and his converſation lively and ſenſible

We are well aſſured, that though this young gentleman has produced works that would do honour to an hoary antiquary, his age does not exceed twenty-five or ſix years, and that ſtill, unmatriculated, he enters into all the gay amuſements of the age

In the year 1787 Mr Walker was admitted a member of the Royal Iriſh Academy, and ſoon after choſen Secretary to the Committee of Antiquities, an office which he held for two years. He has ſince been admitted an Honorary Member of a Scotch and Italian Academy

Our Author's firſt publication was, "Hiſtorical Memoirs of the Bards and Muſic of Ireland," a work equally curious and entertaining In the year 1788 he gave the public another work, not leſs curious, and equally amuſing, entitled, "An Hiſtorical Eſſay on the Dreſs, Arms, and Weapons of the Iriſh" And in the Tranſactions of the Royal Iriſh Academy for the laſt year we find an elegant little eſſay, from our author's pen, on the Iriſh Stage In all theſe works Mr Walker diſplays deep reſearch, and an extenſive knowledge in polite literature, and he treats his ſubject, however abſtruſe, with an eaſe, livelineſs, and elegance that charms his readers.

Our author, we are informed, holds an employment under the Government of Ireland Some of his publications are dated from the Treaſury Chamber

ANECDOTE by Mr THICKNESSE

HAVING landed at Southampton, about the year 1768, from the Iſland of Jerſey, and lodging in that city, oppoſite the market-houſe, I was daily accoſted by a remarkable well looking woman, who had a ſtand there for the ſale of aſparagus, greens, fruit, &c with "Nothing in our way to-day, Sir?" In ſhort, this woman's captivating manners were ſuch, that I had no idea of dealing with any one in any other way but herſelf Upon my aſking her one morning the price of her aſparagus, ſhe made ſo high a demand, that thinking myſelf at Jerſey inſtead of Southampton market, I replied, in French, "C'eſt trop" "Indeed Sir," replied my elegant fruitereſs, "I have not drank a "drop to-day" I inſtantly recollected my miſtake, explained it, and aſked what ſhe ſuppoſed I had ſaid? She replied, (ſtill preſerving her temper and the ut-

* That we can in our own minds conceive how particular paſſages ought to be expreſſed I deny not The wonder is, that any one ſhould be found capable of expreſſing them with the perfect accuracy of our inward conceptions When Macbeth, for inſtance, thus congratulates his wife, "Deareſt love! Duncan comes here to night," and for anſwer ſhe retorts upon him, "And when goes hence?" we immediately find the ſearching dark ſuſpicious manner in which, by the laſt, theſe words were intended to be uttered; we immediately conclude that the murder is determined on already Yet hardly, I am of opinion, ſhould we be ſanguine enough to expect that the bare delivery of ſuch a ſentence would gladdiſh us in this concluſion. moſt addreſs and good manners) "I "thought, Sir, you ſaid I were drunk." I begged her pardon, and expreſſed my ſurprize that ſhe could have ſuppoſed I could have ſaid ſo rude a thing to ſo handſome and ſo well behaved a woman, and we parted both perfectly ſatisfied A Southampton friend, who dined with me that day, commending her aſparagus very much, I thought a little commendation due alſo to the accompliſhed vender of them, related what had paſſed between us, and deſired he would obſerve her appearance from the window, as ſhe was ſtill at herſt and in the market "Do you know "who ſhe is?" ſaid my friend "That "woman, Sir," ſaid he, "is the ſiſter of "the preſent Ducheſs of Chandos!" I determined the next morning to give her handſel, and the following dialogue paſſed between us "Pray, Madam," ſaid I, "are you ſiſter to the Ducheſs of "Chandos?" "Yes, Sir, I am" "And "does your ſiſter take no kind notice of "you" "Yes, Sir, ſhe takes a proper "notice of us all, we are many ſiſters" "What ſort of notice does ſhe take?" "Why ſhe ſent for us all up to London, "cloathed us ſuitable to our ſtations in "life, ſent a ſervant to ſhew us ſuch "things in London as were moſt likely "to amuſe ſuch ſtrangers, put ſome mo-"ney in our pockets, (obſerving that the "Duke is not rich) and then paid our "journey back again adding, "What "elſe could ſhe do? for we were not fit "to be ſet down at the Duke's table" What an inſtance was here of good ſenſe and refined judgment It were a pity, thought I, that there had not been another good-tempered Duke to have bought this woman alſo of her huſband, for ſhe too was certainly worthy of gracing any man's table

Her Grace, when a girl of 14 years of age, ſerved as pot-girl to an old woman who kept an ale-houſe near the entrance gate of the city of Wincheſter, and when the old harridan was told of the ſudden and exalted ſituation of her quondam maid "Aye, aye," ſaid ſhe, "I always "told her, Nan, you'll come to good— "you'll come to good, Nan"

REMARKABLE TENURE not inſerted in BLOUNT'S COLLECTION

AT Broughton, near Brig, in Lincolnſhire, ſome lands are held by the following tenure Every year, on Palm Sunday, a perſon from Broughton comes into the church porch, at Caiſter, having a green ſilk purſe, containing two ſhillings and a ſilver penny, tied to the end of a cart-whip, which he cracks three times on the porch, and continues there till the ſecond leſſon begins, when he goes into the church and cracks it three times over the clergyman's head, and kneeling before him during the reading of the leſſon, he preſents the miniſter with the purſe, and then goes into the choir, and continues there during the reſt of the ſervice.

EPITAPH inſcribed on the TOMB of Dr. ROSE, in CHISWICK CHURCH-YARD.

Written by the AUTHOR of the GRECIAN DAUGHTER

WHOE'ER thou art, with ſilent footſteps tread [his head,
The hallow'd mould where Roſe reclines
Ah! let not folly one kind tear deny,
But penſive pauſe, where truth and honour lie,

His the gay wit that fond attention drew,
Oft heard, and oft admir'd, yet ever new;
The heart that melted at another's grief,
The hand in ſecret that beſtow'd relief;
Science unſtinctur'd with the pride of ſchools,
And native goodneſs free from formal rules.
With zeal, through life, he toil'd in Learning's cauſe,
But more, fair Virtue, to promote thy laws.
His every action ſought the nobleſt end;
The tender huſband, father, brother, friend!
Perhaps, even now, from yonder realms of day
To his lov'd relatives he ſends a ray,
Pleas'd to behold affections alike his own
With filial duty raiſe this votive ſtone!

DUCHESS OF DEVONSHIRI

PETITION to TIME in her GRACE'S FAVOUR

By PETER PINDAR, Eſq

TOO long, O TIME, in Beauſeance's ſchool
Have I been bred, to call thee an old fool,
Yet take I liberty to let thee know,
That I have always thought thee ſo;
Full old art thou to have more ſenſe—
Then with an idle cuſtom, Time, diſpenſe.

Thou really acteſt now like other miſſes,
Who, when a pretty doll they make,
Their curious fingers itch to take
The pretty image all to pieces
Thus, after thou haſt form'd a charming fair,
Thou canſt not quit her for thy ſoul,
Till, meddling, thou haſt ſpoil'd her bloom and air,
And dimm'd her eye—with radiance taught to roll

But now forbear ſuch doings I deſire,
Hurt not the FORM that all admire;
O never with white hairs that temple ſprinkle!
Oh! ſacred be her cheek, her life, her bloom,
And do not, in a lovely dimple's room
Place a hard mortifying pimple.

Know, ſhouldſt thou bid the beauteous Ducheſs fade,
Thou, therefore, muſt thy own delights invade;
And know, 'twill be a long, long while
Before thou giv'ſt her equal to our ſmile,
Then do not with this ſweet chef-d'œuvre part,
Keep her—to ſhew the triumph of thy art.

JUNE.

THIS is the ſeaſon, Celia, when the roſe
The ſweeteſt offspring of the garden blows.
Yet in a few ſhort weeks this lovely flow'r
Will ceaſe to bluſh within your ſacred bow'r;—
This is the ſeaſon when your cheeks outvie
The lily's whiteneſs, and the roſe's dye;
But ah, 'tis beauty's fate, that like the flower
It cannot live beyond the Summer hour.

Mr. NELSON to Dr. MAPLETOFT.

REV SIR,

YOU had received an anſwer ſooner to your very obliging lines of the 13th from Aſpeden, but that I am at preſent in my very agreeable retirement at this place, where I find in my Lady the kindneſs of a mother, and in her houſe the ſame freedom as if I were in my own, theſe circumſtances, with the native pleaſures of the ſeat, and its being frequented by little or no company, give it a particular reliſh to me, and not the leſs for being envied by few or none. The Rector here is a very good ſcholar, and a man of admirable parts, whoſe converſation is my great diverſion: he labours very hard at preſent in a very beautiful tranſlation of the ancient Apologies for Chriſtianity, which I have put him upon; and adorns them with admirable notes, uſeful and profitable for all readers, which he throws at the bottom of each page. He will have an admirable preface about the right uſe of the Fathers, as a neceſſary introduction to his undertaking; wherein, if I miſtake not, he entirely confutes Daille, and expoſes his whipt cream with ſome ſalt; and plainly proves that his arguments militate with equal force againſt the Scriptures as againſt the Fathers, and conſequently proye nothing by proving too much: but enough of this to wet your appetite for the future entertainment. As to Mr. Oſterval's treatiſe againſt uncleanneſs, I entirely agree with you in your character of it. I read it about three months ago, and eſteem it much the beſt that ever I met with upon the ſubject. Then and your commands would have had a great influence upon me, if a friend of ours had not made that attempt needleſs; for it is about three months that the book has appeared in Engliſh, being tranſlated when there were very few copies of the original in town. The worthy clergyman that has taken pains to ſuch good purpoſe, is Mr. Spincke; and though I cannot ſay I have compared it with the original, yet I know it is well tranſlated by its reading ſo well, as [illegible] to be an original in Engliſh, either or no Galliciſms ſhewing themſelves.—He has introduced it with a very handſome and ſolid preface, relating to the ſame ſubject; but his name is not affixed, for reaſons that the engaging bookſellers gave him.—I hope you may live to publiſh it in Latin for the benefit of the chriſtian world, it being a ſubject wherein I am afraid too many fail in, from want of right notions in that matter.—I have with a great deal of pleaſure read your ſermons, which are certainly very proper for our deſign, though they cannot be ready ſo ſoon as we intend to give the world a taſte of this charity; for we ſhall out of hand ſet up fifty-two parochial libraries, which, at 16l. a library, will amount to 832l. We have ſome thouſands of volumes in our repoſitory, and I depend upon your uſual goodneſs for ſome conſiderable encouragement.—I am glad to find my attempt of doing good has had any ſucceſs. I heartily bleſs God that he has been pleaſed to make me an inſtrument of reviving decayed piety amongſt us, and to his name be the glory. It is a ſort of ſatisfaction which agrees with me better than the laurels of mighty conquerors, whom I often pity rather than admire. The fifth edition is juſt finiſhed, ſo that in four years and a half there has been ten thouſand printed. It is juſt now going to the preſs in Welſh, tranſlated by Mr. Williams of Denbigh, formerly the late Earl of Berkley's Chaplain, and Mr. Mapletoft's neighbour ſometimes at Bugden; and I wonder the bookſeller will venture upon printing ſoon; but he is well known in Wales, and has lately printed the Common Prayer Book in that language.

I hope you will not defer finiſhing the legacy you deſign for your pariſh. Thoſe particular addreſſes have an admirable effect; the people think themſelves under greater obligations to reach, and are more inclined to comply with thoſe advices which they think [illegible] for themſelves; [illegible] will remain [illegible] motive of your care [illegible] and to which you may appeal at the day of judgment.

I [illegible] the pleaſure of converſing with an old friend [illegible] a great way; though I hope [illegible] the letter too long. [illegible] ſo to put us in priſon. Pray God [illegible] you ſafe to your own home. [illegible] forbear wiſhing that you may ſometimes be mindful of one who has always had a great value for you, and continues to be with great ſincerity,

Rev Sir,

Your moſt faithful friend and humble ſervant,

ROBERT NELSON.

Dr. BARROW to Dr. MAPLETOFT.

HON. AND DEARE SIR,

MR EUSDEN intends, God willing, for London in the coach next Wednesday; will preſent himſelfe to you, and obey your directions. He ſhall have recommendations from our Maſter to the Biſhop of London for receiving orders immediately. He is ſatisfied with the conditions you propound, and will performe what ſhall be required of him. I am very confident you ſhall find him ſo in all reſpects to anſwer you deſires, that you ſhall not have cauſe to repent of the obligation you have putt upon him and me. Pleaſe to forward the encloſed, and to preſent my hearty love and ſervice to Mr. Pomeroy; it was my unhappineſſe not to ſee him at London. Thanking you (more than I can expreſſe) for all your kindneſſe, I am

Moſt affectionately and obligedly your's,

Gentis Dardaniæ.

YOU have driven me to my ſhipps, being de proprio inſolvent of fit expreſſion. In ſooth I never find any regrett for my being a poore meane fellow, but when upon ſuch occaſions I conſider myſelfe to be hopeleſſe of getting opportunity to ſhew my willingneſſe to be thankfull for ſuch courteſyes I could now even wiſh myſelfe an Arch-Biſhop, yea, almoſt a Pope, that I might have preferments for you to diſpoſe of to your friends, beſide that I might be able to keepe a company of crazy knaves, and allow good fees for them. My comfort is yet, although you can receive none from me, yet that you will have ſome requitall in the ſatisfaction of having obliged your friends, this good college, that worthy wag whom I doubt not but you will find in reſpects correſpondent to your beſt expectations, and to the character thought due to his deſerts from

Your ever moſt affectionate friend and thankful ſervant,

I ſhall offer (though I know nothing) upon a kind of intimation in your's to wiſh you much joy, for ſurely you could not leave ſuch a Lord but for a very good Lady.

NUMBER IX.

Crimina quæ cernunt alterum, nec ſua cernunt:
Illi ſapiunt alii, deſipiuntque ſibi. MART.

THERE is a claſs of writers who take an unſpeakable delight in poaching at the works of expired genius, in order to diſcover faults which they would not have taken notice of in his life-time. But when they are incapable of ſpeaking like humſelf, theſe ill-natured crows of literature analyſe his works with the utmoſt ſcrutiny of critical ſeverity. They will diſcover meanings in them which he never thought of, deduce conſequences from them which he would have abhorred, and invent a tendency the very reverſe of that to which he aimed.

There is ſomething ſo very ungenerous and mean in this ſpecies of detraction, as muſt, or at leaſt ought to, expoſe every one who delights in it to the contempt of all who have any portion of juſtice tempered with the milk of human kindneſs in their breaſts. And yet, to the diſgrace of our age, publications manufactured nufactured in this ſpirit are among thoſe which meet with the moſt favourable reception from the public. And this is even greater if ſome invidious anecdotes or obſervations can be brought to bear hard upon the private character of the poor author thus cruelly and baſely mangled; as if to err was not a weakneſs incident to human genius, nor to fall ſhort of perfection in virtue the property of human nature. I was led to theſe reflections by a peruſal of remarks which a living writer of ſome celebrity* has thought proper to beſtow upon the works of the late original genius, the tender and facetious STERNE.

After ſeveral years have elapſed ſince his death, he is thrown forth to the public eye, and gibbeted with all the rigour of critical ſeverity, in order to render him an object as univerſally deteſtable, as he has been hitherto univerſally admired.

The writings of this once favourite Engliſh author are charged by his harſh cenſurer with "obſcurity, obſcenity, quaintneſs, impudence, oddity, wantonneſs, wildneſs, and extravagance;" convenient names, which are very eaſily heaped together by dullneſs to aſſail an envied character; but if they are thrown without judgment and reaſon, they will unavoidably recoil upon the aſſailant, and only expoſe himſelf to contempt, inſtead of the object at which he aimed.

But as I have, here, profeſſedly taken up the defence of an eminent literary character, whom the voice of applauſe or of reproach cannot now reach, it may be expected that I ſhould go over and clear all thoſe charges brought againſt him, in a regular and copious manner. This favour his antagoniſt would have been intitled to, had he been juſt enough to make theſe charges in ſome meaſure good by the proper proofs. But mere poſitive aſſertions which are evidently the offspring of jaundice eyed prejudice, deſerve to be treated with ſilent contempt, or with ſimple negatives, rather than with a laboured confutation.

And to gueſs at particular paſſages in Sterne's writings, which it may be ſuppoſed our critic had in his eye when he applied to them the above curious ſtring of appellatives, would be giving him cauſe to triumph in the thought, that even the admirers of that genius were conſcious of the truth of the charges brought againſt him.

But though the miſcellaneous part of Sterne's productions appears to very little advantage in the eyes of the ſevere moraliſt, yet one ſhould have expected that his ſermons at leaſt would have paſſed without cenſure; or rather that they would have meliorated the ſpirit of criticiſm into the more pleaſing ſtrain of approbation. In this however we are miſtaken; for the ſame rigid ſpirit purſues even theſe alſo, and, what muſt mortify their admirers ſtrongly, threatens them with nothing leſs than annihilation.

"Gentle Spirit of ſincerity, deſcend to aſſiſt us to ſave theſe, at leaſt, from total deſtruction, and tranſmit them, like to poſterity, as evidences that once virtue and morality were aſſociated with them!—

Our critic profoundly ſays, that "the "appearance of ſincerity is one of the "beſt beauties of a ſermon;"—and I would beg leave to aſk him, in which of the ſermons Sterne publiſhed this beauty is not to be found?

Affectation has been generally conſidered as the very oppoſite to [illegible]. But the lively touches of [illegible] obſervations on life and manners, and the exquiſite pathetic ſcenes, as well as the moral improvements of them, contained in thoſe truly beautiful compoſitions are all perfectly natural, without the leaſt appearance of harſh conſtraint, or of foreign embelliſhment.

If there is, occaſionally, a little levity in the opening of his ſubjects, and in the expoſing of ſome common vice or folly, it is evidently with an intent to ſhame his auditors into virtue; and very ſoon does he engage them in the moſt ſerious attention, by the excellence of his moral precepts.

Thus [illegible] an equal degree of merit muſt readily be allowed; but there is no ſingleneſs of them that will not fully refute this critic's charge of the want of ſincerity.

But whatſoever leaves the ſermons in order to make a moſt violent attack upon the other works of the once favourite Yorick. We are told, that "the ex-"ceſſive ſympathy at firſt ſight, that ſen-"timental affection which is but juſt in "the boſom, and which is ſo ſtrongly re-"preſented by the Sentimental Journey, and "by Triſtram Shandy, have been the "ruin of thouſands of our countrywomen "and country-women who ſtudied them "while they were [illegible] the laſt"

* Vide K——'s "Eſſays Moral and Literary."

"God and man, they were actuated by "the fine feelings of ſentimental affec- "tion.—How much are divorces multi- "plied ſince Sterne appeared!"—Hea- vens! Yorick, into what a profound abyſs of miſery muſt thou, by this time, be ſunk, by the weight of ſuch an immenſe load of crimes upon thy head;—crimes not thy own, but of thoſe who have read thy works!—The idea is enough to make the warmeſt of thy admirers to tremble, and to ſhrink from thy books as from poiſon!—

Let us, however, analyſe this curious paſſage, and for once endeavour to turn the tables, and criticiſe the critic.—Is "ſympathy at firſt ſight"—that, as I underſtand it, affection kindled between two perſons from a congeniality of ſoul, to be dignified with no better a name than that of "luſt in diſguiſe!"—Is mildneſs of heart or tenderneſs of ſoul inferior than to the oppoſite qualities?—And becauſe ſome have proſtituted love to luſt, and friendſhip, to the purpoſes of villainy, are we therefore to harden our hearts, and endeavour to render them inſenſible to the perſonal and mental charms around us?—Away with that morality which would make us enwrap our hearts in the ſeven-folded and impenetrable garb of ſuſpicion and deceit! Rather let them be open temples, warmed with benevolence from the altar of ſincerity, and free for the entrance of all that is worthy and beautiful!—

It is ſurely a very unkind thing to charge conſequences upon an author's works, which he never intended;—but it is the height of injuſtice to make his works the ſource of evils which, in the eye of every ſenſible diſtinguiſhing obſerver of mankind, lay evidently the ſeeds of very different circumſtances. Can any perſon, in his ſober ſenſes, really believe, with our ſagacious critic, that are divorce has been cauſed, or even aſſiſted by any of Sterne's publications?

If this were indeed, the caſe, certainly there muſt be as many ſcenes, or ſentiments, in his works apologizing for adultery, as there are proofs in the Theſpeſiæ in favour of Polygamy.—But this is ſo far from being the caſe, that on the contrary no writer has ſpoken more feelingly of the ſweetneſs of a matrimonial union, when cemented by ſentimental affection, than he has done in every one of his works. Could he, therefore, inſinuate any thing favourable of a crime, the ſole tendency of which is to deſtroy this affection, and to render the ſoul a cage of uncleanneſs, inſtead of, what he ever wiſhed to ſee it, the habitation of beauty and innocence?

In fact, the perſon who could charge the writings of Sterne with conſequences favourable to the ſin of adultery, might with equal reaſon have charged them with that of murder; and ſo have traced the faſhionable rage for duelling, as well as for divorces, to a cauſe which no one elſe ever dreamt of.

But, however ardent I may appear in the defence of this celebrated writer, I will not in the warmth of admiration vindicate every line which he thought proper to publiſh.—Perfection is not in man,—and there are paſſages in his works over which I would throw the mantle of oblivion, and endeavour to forget the faults of a favourite writer.—But even in theſe I will not allow him to be the pandar of vice, or, in the words of his critic, "the "grand promoter of adultery, and every "ſpecies of illicit commerce."—They are ſo very few and ſo very ſhort, that I am firmly perſuaded the generality of his readers paſs them over without a thought of that meaning which the harſh cenſurer puts upon them.—But let him delight in poring over thoſe excreſcencies which we would wiſh to lop off and bury in oblivion;—yet we will, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of memorable criticiſm, which condemns the whole to annihilation for a few trifling ſpecks—we will continue to derive inſtruction and entertainment from them; and ſtill venerate the memory of STERNE, as one whoſe merits infinitely ſurpaſſed his failings.

LETTER from M. DE LA LANDE, on the NAME of the PLANET HERSCHEL, to the Editors of the JOURNAL des SCAVANS.

M. HERSCHEL having diſcovered a Mercredi, the 7th of March 1781, and having ſince ſome time convinced himſelf that it was a planet, he gave it the name of the King of England, Georgium Sidus. That prince, indeed, well deſerves the eſteem of all aſtronomers, by the large ſums he has expended for the promotion of the ſcience of aſtronomy. This year, when, being in England, I thanked him for the ardour he has ſhewn in ſo laudable a purſuit, he made me this inſtructive, this memorable anſwer: Is it not far better than ſpending money for the purpoſe of ſetting men to murder each other?

But the zeal of aſtronomers has not always been able to perpetuate the monuments of their gratitude to princes. When Galileo diſcovered the ſatellites of Jupiter, in 1610, he thought fit to name them the Stars de Medicis. Caſſini called the ſatellites of Saturn, the Stars of Lewis. Yet neither of theſe appellations has been adopted. National prejudices every where reſiſt national preferences, and prevent their ſucceſs. Whilſt M. Herſchel conſulted only his gratitude, others conſulted analogy, in naming this new ſtar. All the other planets have names ſacred in mythology; the names of the gods of the ancients. Jupiter and Saturn being the fathers of the gods, M Pontſinet thought the name of Cybele, the mother of the gods, moſt proper for the planet which is placed neareſt to them. M Proſperin, a celebrated Swediſh aſtronomer, conſidering that Neptune was one of the ſons of Saturn, and that Jupiter, the brother of Neptune, was on one ſide of Saturn, he thought Neptune might be placed on the other: on this account he choſe the name of the latter deity for the new planet. M. Bode, a celebrated aſtronomer of Berlin, prefers the calling it Uranus, in the excellent Ephemerides which he publiſhes annually: this appellation has been adopted by many in Germany. I have remonſtrated to him on the ſubject, but in vain.

The giving the name of Uranus, however, to the planet of M Herſchel, in which M Bode ſtill perſiſts, is an act of ingratitude to the author of that noble diſcovery, and an affront to that auguſt and munificent patron of aſtronomy, the King of Great Britain; whoſe name ought to be preferred to every other, if that of the author had not a ſtill more forcible claim on our acknowledgements. Beſides, the name of Uranus is an impropriety, even according to the mythological ſyſtem. Sanchoniathon and Diodorus, it is true, ſay, that Saturn was the ſon of Uranus; but this is now allowed to be purely allegorical. The gods were the children of Heaven and Earth, that is, of the Univerſe they were its firſt productions, and Uranus never was a real perſonage, as they muſt have the ſimplicity to ſuppoſe, who give that name to the new planet. This has been proved by M. Dupuis, in a diſcourſe read at the meeting of the Royal College, on the 10th of November, 1788. When the Egyptian prieſts framed a theogony by turning nature into an allegory, the Earth, with the fluid ſhell which ſurrounded it, was conſidered as that part of the univerſe which included the ſeeds of all vegetal bodies, and the cauſe of the perpetually active Heaven which extends above the Earth and includes it in its ſpacious orb, was to it that principle of motion and life, which circulates in the air and in the heaven; whether in ſummer, in thoſe gentle ſhowers which nouriſh the plants, and give the trees their ſap and juices of vegetation, or by imparting to it that warmth which fecundates and expands all ſeeds, and ripens every fruit. Without it, Earth, condemned to eternal darkneſs and ſterility, had been dead to nature, nor ever received the name of mother of gods and men. All thoſe emanations betwixt Heaven and Earth, which render the union of both neceſſary to the activity of the univerſal cauſe, were expreſſed in the allegorical ſtyle by the word Marriage, and the two firſt principles of nature were conſidered as two perſons, united to give birth to all other beings. One of theſe was male, and the other female: one the firſt of gods, the other the firſt of goddeſſes, whoſe marriage peopled Earth and Heaven. M. Dupuis ſhews, in his memoir, that theſe ſame ideas are found in all the ſyſtems of philoſophy, amongſt the Chaldeans, the Egyptians, the Perſians, the Indians, the Greeks. They were the common foundation of all the theories of nature. Heaven, ſays Plutarch, appeared to the firſt obſervers to perform the functions of a father; and the Earth, thoſe of a mother. Heaven poured the fecundating ſeed, in gentle ſhowers, into the boſom of the Earth, who, thus fecundated, brought forth various offſpring. Anaximenes, and Xenophanes, diſciples of Thales, a celebrated philoſopher, ſaid the ſame remark, and a great while before them. Ocellus of Lucania, a diſciple of Pythagoras, had taught the ſame doctrine; which, indeed, was the ancient philoſophy of the Eaſt. The univerſe, ſays he, is an indeſtructible product: it always has exiſted, and will for ever exiſt: it has had no beginning, it will have no end: including in itſelf generation, and the cauſe of generation: generation is where there is a change and diſſolving of parts, and the cauſe which makes this mobility in nature. Hence it is evident, that motion and action are properties of the generating cauſe, and that which receives it muſt be acted on and moved. The diviſions of the heaven ſeparate the unchangeable part of the world from that which is inceſſantly changing. The line of ſeparation betwixt mortal and immortal, is the circle deſcribed by the moon. All that is above is the habitation of the gods; all beneath her, the abode of nature and diſcord. As the world is incapable of being generated or deſtroyed, it is neceſſary, that the principle which effects generation in another, and that which effects it in itſelf, muſt always have co-exiſted. The principle which effects it in another is all that is above the moon; that which engenders in itſelf is the ſublunary world. The one is always moving; the other always moved: the one always governing; the other always governed. In a word, the compoſition of the world includes both the active and the paſſive cauſe.

Such are the firſt diviſions which the philoſophy of the ancients had eſtabliſhed in nature, and which it had placed at the head of almoſt all cauſes. Mythology exhibits the ſame pictures, and preſents them to us at the head of the genealogy of their gods, and of their heroes, the children of the gods, becauſe mythology is nothing but the philoſophy of the ancients, written in the ſacred language, and in its poetical allegories expreſſes nothing but the action of phyſical cauſes, and the filiation of natural agents perſonified. Now this perfect reſemblance between the dogmas of philoſophy and the fictions of mythology, and the correſpondence of each with the apparent order of the world, are found in all the theogonies, or marvellous hiſtories, with which the annals of every people commence. Uranus and Ge, Heaven and Earth, are the firſt gods ſung by the poets, as if they had been the firſt kings of the univerſe. Heſiod alſo, whoſe theogony conſiſts entirely of nature and its parts perſonified, makes Ge the wife of Uranus, and places theſe two ſpouſes at the head of all other gods their deſcendants, as they are at the head of all the viſible cauſes of the univerſe. Apollodorus thus enters upon his hiſtory of the gods. At the beginning Uranus, or Heaven, was the lord of all the world. He had many children by his wife Ge, or the Earth. Proclus begins the line to do with the marriage of Heaven and Earth. Beroſus, the author known by that name, calls Heaven the lord of the world, the father both of the greater and inferior gods; he gives him to wife Arets or Arecha, the ſame, ſays he, as the Earth, which is fecundated by Heaven. Virgil has expreſſed the ſame idea of the fertilization of the Earth on the ſpring

Tum pater omnipotens fœcundis imbribus æther
Conjugis in gremium lætæ deſcendit, & omnes
Magnus alit, magno commixtus corpore, fœtus.
Geoſg II 325

Earth ſwells with moiſture all her teeming lands,
A genial fructifying ſeed demands
Almighty Jove deſcends, more full of life,
On the warm boſom of his kindling wife.
WARTON.

Amongſt the Celts the worſhip of Heaven was not ſeparated from that of the Earth. They ſaid, that the one would have been barren without the other; and that their marriage produced the univerſe. The Scandinavians acknowledged Heaven as the firſt king, and gave him the Earth to wife. Rudbek adds, that their anceſtors were perſuaded, that the Heaven marrying the Earth, and uniting his powers with thoſe of his ſpouſe, produced the plants and animals, and make him the firſt king of the Scandinavians. In the books of the Perſians paſſages are found which ſtyle Heaven male, and Earth female. This theological idea is expreſſed in the religion of the Indians, by the ſymbolic emblem of the active and paſſive parts of generative nature. The famous ſymbolic ſtatue of the world, conſecrated by the Bramins, was half male, half female. We ſee, then, that it has been every where agreed to conſider Heaven and Earth, or the active and paſſive parts of nature, as the firſt two beings from which all others proceed; and thus they are celebrated in the theogonies as gods. If in the moſt ancient hiſtories they have been repreſented as kings and princes, it was becauſe the remembrance of the firſt notions was loſt, and their allegorical origin forgotten. But in the preſent day, when this idea is recovered, we can no longer attribute to Uranus a real exiſtence diſtinct from that of Heaven; nor can we give the name of Heaven to one of the leaſt planets which it includes.

I cannot but think therefore, gentlemen, that all aſtronomers ought to unite in proſcribing a denomination built on ſuch miſtaken foundations, and ſo unjuſt with reſpect to the celebrated Herſchel, to whom we are indebted for the diſcovery of a planet. To you, gentlemen, I addreſs my complaint, as a literary body moſt capable of ſupporting it, if you will do me the honour to make it public.

ON DRAMATIC DISCOVERY

To the EDITOR of the EUROPEAN MAGAZINE.

SIR,

THE following are ſelected from ſome obſervations which I made about ſix years ago on reading Dacier's tranſlation of Ariſtotle's Poeticks. If you honour them with publication in your next Magazine, I ſhall occaſionally ſend you more of them.

"Après celles-là les meilleures ſont celles que ſe font, &c." P. 290.

FROM all authority there is an appeal to reaſon; and to that I appeal from the authority of Ariſtotle for preſumption to ſhew that in this chapter he has neither divided the ſpecies according to their natures, or aſſigned to each one the relative worth which from its nature it deſerves.

That which is placed third in the catalogue, and diſtinguiſhed as diſcovery by memory, is not ſpecifically ſuch; ſince the memory is alſo neceſſary. Inſtruments in diſcovery are by natural marks, ſcars, and trinkets. Ariſtotle, then, to ſpeak with logical preciſion, has miſtaken a property for the difference nay, he may be ſaid to have miſtaken an accident for it; as an attentive examination of the nature of the ſpecies alluded to, will ſhew that memory is not eſſential to it.

The Trojan wars being unexpectedly ſung in the hearing of Ulyſſes, the ſong, by the irreſiſtible aſſociation of ideas, ſuddenly excited in him an emotion, which, before his reaſon or his art could interfere, operated upon his countenance and demeanour to the obſervation of the ſpectators. The uſe of an individual example is to diſplay the character of the ſpecies; and to that uſe if this be applied, it will appear that this ſpecies of diſcovery is made involuntarily, inſtantaneouſly, and by the obvious and irreſiſtible impulſe of Nature. That it is involuntary is perhaps its higheſt praiſe; for what is more delightful than to behold the triumph of nature over artifice and diſguiſe! That it is inſtantaneous is alſo of ſignal worth; for the more ſudden and immediate is the tranſition from ignorance to knowledge, the more is it agreeable and ſurpriſing. That it is obviouſly effected by the ſtrong impulſes of nature only, is the laſt, but no inconſiderable topic of its praiſe; ſince thus by deſtroying all appearance of art, it contributes to realize the ſcene. Each of theſe three qualities is of ſignal excellence; the combination of them renders their ſubject tranſcendent. Before I proceed to a definition, I will illuſtrate the ſubject by a few more examples. The diſcovery, then, that the madneſs of Ulyſſes was feigned, by laying his infant ſon before the plough, was of this kind; for it was involuntary, inſtantaneous, and by the immediate operation of nature. Such was Ulyſſes' diſcovery of Achilles, when diſguiſed among women, by his ſnatching the helmet from a baſket of female ornaments. And ſuch was Solomon's diſcovery of the real mother, by ordering the infant to be divided between them, ſuch was Hamlet's diſcovery of his uncle's guilt by means of a tragedy; and ſuch is the diſcovery of Foigard in the Stratagem.

It is related in one of the fables of Æſop, that a man who had a favorite cat, prayed to Venus to change it into a woman. The goddeſs conſented; but in the middle of the night, a mouſe creeping the room, ſhe leaped from the arms to purſue it, and diſcovered that though her form was changed, her nature was the ſame.

But as the Drama is a picture of human life, perhaps its properties could not be better exemplified than by an inſtance or two from the Tempeſt.

During the laſt wild conſpiracy was formed of Caliban, Trinculo, and Stephano, for the voyage to Milan; the purpoſe whereof was, wholly to diſpoſſeſs Proſpero of the iſland, to which end the officers were bound, ſurſe the ſhip, and carry her into an enemy's port. It was concerted with judgment, and kept with ſuch ſecrecy that the officers could not have the leaſt ſuſpicion of it. It happened that the day before that appointed for the execution of the plot, it occurred to the Captain to try whether one of the quarter-deck guns might not be brought to bear upon a ſhip-chaſe with efficacy on a flying enemy, when occaſion might occur: for this purpoſe a gun was hawled out of its port, and pointed forward. He who was at the time ſteering the ſhip, and who was of the conſpirator's immediately [illegible] that the officers had discovered the concerted mutiny, and were now turning the guns of the quarter-deck upon the crew for their own preservation. He therefore suddenly called out with great emotion: "Gentlemen, if you will spare my life, I "will give you a list of them all." And the whole was discovered.

With another example more comic in its nature and effects I will conclude the subject.

The boatswain of a man of war that had just been paid off in the River, passing through Monmouth-street with full pockets and a prodigal heart, was so captivated with the richness and finery of a velvet suit which was displayed at the door, that he immediately went in and bargained for it. Having tried it on, he was so pleased with his appearance, that he was easily prevailed upon by the merchant to complete his dress with the necessary appendages, a bag-wig, a sword, and chapeau au bras. Thus equipped, his next care was, where to exhibit himself. The theatre readily occurred, whither he went, and placing himself in the front row of one of the side-boxes, soon became attentive to the play. Notwithstanding his disguise, he was presently recognized by one of his ship-mates in the upper gallery, who pointing him out to his comrade, asked if that was not their boatswain; a question which the other answered in the negative, assuring him that it was a "lord, or some great gentleman." "We'll soon settle it," said the first, "for we'll hail him. Ohoa, the "boatswain of the Romney, Ohoy!" who forgetting his situation started from his seat, answered "Hollos!" and was discovered.

Having thus exemplified the nature of the subject, and illustrated it with sufficient examples, I define it, that species of discovery which is made necessarily and suddenly, by the operation of an external action, upon the unexpectedness of the person thereby discovered. And thus do think, for the reasons before alledged, to be the most perfect, because the most beautiful and surprising kind.

The next to it is confessedly that, naturally resulting from the previous action, to which the philosopher ascribes the pre-eminence; and which may be sub divided into many kinds; as discovery by will, by confession, by accusation and testimony, &c. Fourthly, I would rank by inferring a false consequence from true principles, as in the false Ulysses; which, because its effect is produced by surprize, I would prefer to the fifth, which is the conclusion of a veritable syllogism, exemplified in the Canephoræ of Æschylus. The sixth is that placed second in the text, (where the catalogue begins at the other end) and is certainly culpable, since it is arbitrary, and the artifice discernible. The seventh, by scars or trinkets, is altogether ridiculous; though great poets have sometimes fallen into it; as Voltaire in his Zaira makes a notable discovery by means of a necklace.

Besides recognissance, there is another genus of incidents by which peripetia or revolution is produced, which is properly called encounter, and means the sudden and unexpected appearance of a person in the scene causing surprize and change of affairs. In the use of this instrument poets often fail, from the difficulty of concealing the artifice. A visible example of this failure is in Cato, where the two women weeping over the dead body of Syphax, whom they suppose to be Juba, this Prince enters listening from behind, and shews himself, to their great astonishment and joy. And such is the sneaking entrance of Altamont in the Fair Penitent, when he comes to interrupt the tete-a-tete between Lothario and his wife, and pops his head between them at the mention of her name, as if to illustrate the vulgar saying, Speak of the Devil, &c. Of the same vicious character are those encounters which are made by mechanical assistance; by the removal of chairs and tables, the opening of closet-doors, and the throwing down of screens; so has been practised in some fashionable modern comedies, to the delight of the million*.

MR. BARETTI, it is said, received his first encouragement to come to England from Lord Charlemont, to whom he became known in Italy, and to whom he afterwards dedicated his account of the manners and customs of his native country. "Upon your arrival in Italy "several years ago," he says, addressing

During his stay in London, he met with much kindness from the English people. To those of the first persons both for rank or literature he procured himself to be introduced, with many he lived on terms of friendship, and with some he was permitted to make a part of their family during their seasons of retirement. At length he resolved on his return to Italy, and accordingly left London on the 25th of August, 1760. In his first letter to his brothers, he thus speaks of the kingdom he was about to leave. " Now there- " fore, England, farewell! I quit thee with " less regret, because I am returning to my " native country, after a very long absence, " considering the shortness of life. Yet " I cannot leave thee without tears. May " Heaven guard and prosper thee, thou " illustrious mother of polite men and vir- " tuous women! Thou great mart of li- " terature! Thou nursery of invincible " soldiers, of both management and inge- " nious artists, farewell, farewell! I have " now forgotten all the crosses and anxie- " ties I have undergone in thy regions for " the space of ten years; but never will I " forget those many amongst thy sons who " have assisted me in my wants, encouraged " me in my difficulties, comforted me in " my adversities, and imparted to me the " light of their knowledge in the dark " and intricate mazes of life! Farewell, " imperial England, farewell, farewell!"

His journey home was taken through Portugal and Spain. Previous to his setting out, he was recommended by Dr. Johnson to write a daily account of the events that might happen: and with all possible punctuality, and by him were printed with the notes which would make [illegible] delight in a future publication. To those who have read the narrative which he afterwards gave the world, it will be unnecessary to explain Dr. Johnson's suggestion. It must be admitted to be one of the most entertaining journals which the public had ever received, containing a description of places then little known, and placing the character of the writer (so far as any dependence can be had on an author's delineation, as drawn from his writings) in a very desirable point of view. During the progress of the short good sense and good humour, a

After his return to England, [illegible] he returned to England, and [illegible] immediately dipped his pen [illegible] with Mr. Sharp, who had [illegible] lished "Letters from Italy, [illegible] the Customs and Manners [illegible] try in the Years 1765 and 1766." Mr. Sharp's representation was certainly extravagant, and perhaps taken on too slight grounds. It excited Mr. Baretti's resentment, and it is well known that he seldom expressed himself in gentle terms when he felt himself entitled to show his anger. "When after an absence of six "years I came to this kingdom," he says in his reply to Mr. Sharp's answer, "a "young lady of my acquaintance com- "plimented me for having quitted my bad "country; Why madam, said I, do you "still hold a country [illegible] "countryman a very good one, [illegible] "thank God for [illegible] "where [illegible] "said she, [illegible] "glad [illegible] "Mr. [illegible] "who [illegible] "Italians, [illegible] "Italians [illegible] "[illegible] "[illegible] I was reading the book, I blushed, [illegible] I was not born an Italian [illegible]

Mammuth, or, Human Nature diſplayed on a grand Scale; In a Tour with the Tinkers into the inland Parts of Africa By the Man in the Moon. 2 vols 12mo. 6s Murray.

WHEN the King of Pruſſia was engaged in what he calls the War of ſeven Years, and was on the point of being overwhelmed by the combined arms of the great continental powers, he received an embaſſy with an offer of aid from the Khan of the Tartars. The Ambaſſador, the King obſerves in his Hiſtory with much pleaſantry, was no other than his barber. This circumſtance ought not, to a philoſophical a writer, to have appeared a matter of ſurpriſe To a ſpectator who views human nature on a grand ſcale, and from a point that elevates him above the clouds of prejudice, it does not appear more ſurpriſing that the Khan of the Tartars ſhould commit an embaſſy to his barber, than that the King of Bohemia ſhould be cup-bearer to the Emperor of Germany, that the Elector of Bavaria ſhould be his Grand Sewer, or that the Elector of Brandenburg (the King of Pruſſia) ſhould be his Great Chamberlain. Yet ſuch is the inveterate power of prejudice, that men are continually wondering at the peculiarities and abſurdities of their neighbours, while their own [illegible] appear to be the diſtortions of truth and nature. To illuſtrate this general truth ſtrikingly the natural tendency of [illegible] paſſions, and the conſequences to which they would undoubtedly lead in certain given ſituations; in a word, to ſurvey human nature through the microſcope of ridicule is the [illegible] object of the [illegible] before us, which at the ſame time endeavours to exhibit the attention of the reader in a [illegible] and very curious [illegible] as [illegible] ſpeculation, by [illegible] the [illegible] of wit and humour. It is, in the whole, conceived in a ſimilar ſtrain to that of Tom Hickathrift's great Nameſake; a tale which our author [illegible] ſeveral times, in a very [illegible] manner, in the [illegible] that Jacques and valets aſſume among themſelves the titles of their maſters."

THE MAN IN THE MOON, then, in imitation of hiſtorians and epic poets, who endeavour to intereſt their readers in their narrations and deſcriptions by exhibiting at once to their view the bold outlines of the facts to be related and the ſcenes to be deſcribed, breaks out into the following ejaculations, and an account of the objects by which they were excited.

" By the LIVING PYTHAGORAS, Philoponus is right! Though wrong-headed in moſt things, in this he is right! We are in many inſtances governed by prejudices of education, and, in many, aſſume to ourſelves too high a rank in the ſcale of nations. The preſent race of mortals are as much inferior to their remote anceſtors, as a lady's lapdog is to an Ourang Outang Men have exiſted, and a few nations, venerable remains of antiquity, ſtill exiſt, far ſtronger and better than we, large and long lived, ſagely ſevere in their manners, black, grim, and to the apprehenſions of the poor pygmies of our part of the world, objects of terror. Such were the philoſophers of ancient Egypt, the native land of ſcience and art, and all that improves and embelliſhes the nature of man. As light ſpringe from darkneſs, and the grey dawn ſhines forth to the perfect day; ſo inſtruction, thro' the medium of the tawny Phœnicians, and the brown Greeks and Italians, has been derived by a regular progreſſion from the ebon ſons of Africa to the fair inhabitants of the moſt northerly nations of Europe. I tremble while I relate that impreſſion of ſenſe which firſt conveyed theſe, with many other truths, to my gnoſtic powers!

" In the central parts of Africa, untrod by the foot of Abyſſinian Bruce, and which I never entered into the heart of,

of the lying Munchausen * to conceive; as I doubled one of the projections of an abrupt and rugged mountain, I was met, full in the face, at the small distance of about two or three hundred yards, by a gigantic, black, and woolly-haired hierophant, riding stark-naked on a monstrous Mammouth. He waved before his visual orbs somewhat that in appearance, as well as in size, resembled the foresail of a ship, and hummed, as he moved slowly on, certain articulate sounds, which I had for some time conceived to be the howling of the wind amidst the clefts and incurvations of the mountain. Though struck with horror, and a strong desire to make my escape, I felt myself powerfully attracted by some physical impulse towards the jaws of the Mammouth, into which if I had once fallen, I would never have returned, either dead or alive, to the green surface of the foodful earth, at least by the same way that I entered. If the sympathetic reader, alarmed for my safety, wishes to know for what end I threw myself into a situation so full of danger, and by what means I escaped it, I will immediately proceed, by a detail of events, to gratify a curiosity which I consider as a very great compliment."

The writer proceeds to deduce his history from the point where he was first initiated in the mysteries of the gypsies, as related in his former publication; "from the spacious "barn near Musselburgh, in which he re-"clined with his lovely partner on the "fragrant hay, and forgetting all his sor-"rows, gave way to the pleasing intoxi-"cation of the most successful love." He relates the circumstances which induced him to recollect his promise to publish his Tour with the Tinkers; and on this subject we are entertained with not a little pointed and just satire on certain living characters, both literary and political. Having detailed the leading maxims of the gypsies, in their conduct in life, and particularly in the grand business of fortune-telling; which maxims are founded in great shrewdness, and a profound insight into the [illegible] of the human mind; he relates a great [illegible] of very [illegible] and facetious [illegible] which were performed in the North of England by himself and his company in the character of [illegible]. [illegible]

"In a great chief's house, while the master was from home, on the grand [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] the vigilance of [illegible] [illegible] found means to entertain us for a [illegible] fortnight. We were [illegible] in the [illegible] in coal-cellar, [illegible] it began to be dark we were [illegible] through a private door into the [illegible] house, where we generally [illegible] nine or ten o'clock to one or two in the morning, when we crept into our holes again, well loaded with all kinds of necessary refreshments. After this [illegible] course had been carried on for some days, the coachman, who had no doubt discovered the distinguished rank of my partner and myself, invited us to pass a night in one of the empty stalls in the stable, [illegible] he had taken care to provide [illegible] fresh hay, with horse-clothes instead of blankets. [illegible] himself [illegible] early [illegible] o'clock shewed us our [illegible] and having carefully looked over the whole stable, according to custom, carried off the light for fear of accidents, and locking the door, put the key in his pocket, and walked home. No [illegible] our [illegible] retire, than up jumps a large [monkey?] called the Man of the Woods, with a whip in his hand, on the back of one of the saddle-horses, and lashing him most unmercifully, rode the animal for hours together, and then placing the whip where he found it, retired in the morning to his cave. My gentleman, who had a taste for variety, did not confine himself, as I afterwards found, to one horse, but roamed, as the whim struck him, from one horse or mare to another, over the whole stable; so that not one of the creatures was all in a [illegible] and bore marks of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the stable [illegible] they were [illegible] was too [illegible] far from his hiding-place.

[illegible] it is a maxim of the gypsies never to [illegible] any thing they hear or see, [illegible] [illegible] because the [illegible] [illegible] things [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

hold his tongue. In this he was not a whit behind hand with the gypſies, though I very much doubt whether, with all his knowledge of books, and acquaintance with men of letters, he received ſo good a political education as that in which the gypſies are bred from their very cradles: for there is a great difference between that attention which is paid to maxims taught at ſchools, and that which is ſhown to maxims on whoſe immediate and unremitted application men depend for immediate ſubſiſtence. We ſtudied to give no offence, but to gain the good-will, not only of every human creature, but of the very domeſtic animals in great families Had we revealed the pranks of the monkey, even that creature might have contrived to do us a miſchief. But, even without any dread of the monkey, it was a law with us to be ſilent on all occaſions, however frivolous, leſt by indulging an habit of talkativeneſs, we ſhould ſtumble on ſomething that, by being injurious to others, might prove detrimental to ourſelves, and by too much ſpeaking loſe our reputation for knowledge. No, no It was not our buſineſs to bring an impeachment againſt the Man of the Woods, though we laughed heartily at his tricks among ourſelves. We played a deeper game. After we had loitered four or five days about this palace, we led on the converſation to the beauty and to the variety of the Chevalier's ſtud, and were of courſe informed, that ſcarcely one night paſſed in which ſome one or other of thoſe generous creatures was not almoſt ridden to death by ſome evil ſpirit, or incubus Holly-buſh, mountain aſh, and red thread, with a thouſand other exorciſms, had been tried in vain; inſomuch that the Chevalier entertained thoughts of pulling down his princely ſtables, and building new ones cloſe by the ſide of an old decayed chapel, and, for the greater ſafety, even to encroach a little on the conſecrated ground.

"I boldly undertook to exorciſe the devil. I was aſſured, that a proteſtion, and even encouragement to ſtroll throughout the whole county of Cumberland ſhould reward ſo great and good an action. It was now reported by the ſervants to the land ſteward himſelf, that the gypſey doctor, whom they confeſſed they had privately entertained, had undertaken to exorciſe the evil ſpirit that haunted the ſtables. The land ſteward chid them for their audacity, but gave me leave to make a trial of my ſkill and power. He winked at the reſidence of the gypſies ſo near the hall (ſo the noble ſeat was called,) who now crept out of their holes, and reſorted even to the environs of the kitchen

"There is a fungous ſubſtance formed by the foam of the ſea, and the influence of the ſun and air, the moſt ſubtile of all chemical menſtrua, well known to the vulgar on the coaſts of Scotland under the name of ſea-fyke This ſubſtance, dried and pulverized, forms a pungent powder, which poſſeſſes a ſtrong power of pricking and bliſtering, thence denominated ſea-fyke, becauſe ſhipped, by miſchievous boys, into the ſmall-clothes of their comrades, it makes them fidge, or in the Scotch dialect, fyke I quickly provided myſelf with abundance of this ſubſtance, and ſcattered it for ſeveral nights on the backs of the horſes The monkey by the agitation of his poſteriors, when he went to take his ride, gave full efficacy to the medicine, which bliſtered and afflicted him very ſeverely He ſoon gave over his tricks, and became afraid even to come near an horſe, or to look him in the face Several nights had now elapſed, and no harm had happened to the horſes I declared that the devil was now exorciſed, and that he would no more appear in the ſtables, adding, that I would return within eight days to ſee whether there were any new complaints. I received five guineas from the land ſteward, with aſſurances that if I would do ſo, and that the miracle ſhould hold, I ſhould receive other five. I ſprinkled the horſes backs again with the powder, and retired with the reſt of our company to the environs of Whitehaven, while our reputation waxed greater and greater every day At the end of eight days I returned to the hall, where I found all well I received five guineas more, according to promiſe, with farther aſſurances of being more liberally rewarded by the Chevalier, when he ſhould return from Yorkſhire I ſlept in the ſtable, at my own deſire, as uſual, although I had an offer of a good bed in the houſe. And, leſt caſe ſhould recant vows made in pain, I adminiſtered in a ſweet cake, which I gave to the monkey, a poiſon, that ſecured my miracle, by putting an end to the courſe of a few days to his exiſtence."

They performed a great variety of other miracles, equally aſtoniſhing and amuſing, on principles that would not diſhonour the greateſt adepts in the ſcience of moral philoſophy. In the courſe of their peregrinations, they fell in with the Duke of R—m—d, whoſe character, as well as that of Lord S—y, in another place, is treated with the utmoſt ſeverity of ridicule. And here we cannot but obſerve, that authors thors very little conſult their own reputation, or laſting fame, when they are led by their prejudices to write invidiouſly of living characters, that are too inſignificant to intereſt futurity. This conduct is like that of a carpenter, who, in building a houſe, ſhould intermix green wood, that muſt quickly decay, with wood that had been properly ſeaſoned

The ſupercilious treatment which the Man in the Moon, in the character of Doctor of the Gypſies, met with from the "peer of peerleſs pertinacity," is contraſted with that which he, with his partner the Queen of the Gypſies, received, for ſeveral days, in the ſmoaky cell of a philoſophical miner, in Cornwall, who united mechanical labour with that of the ſpade, the plough, and the ſtirring hook; who maintained his family, by induſtry, in independence; who was hoſpitable, learned, wiſe, and good; and was more reſpectable for his talents and virtues, than pleaſant on account of the moſt whimſical oddities and ſingularities which, nevertheleſs, to a philoſophical obſerver, ſuperior to all local prejudices, might ſeem to be founded in reaſon and nature.

An Explanation of the miſtaken Principle on which the Commutation Act is founded; and the Nature of the Miſchiefs that muſt follow from a Perſeverance in it In a ſecond Addreſs to the Public from Thomas Bates Rous, Eſq. 4to. 1s 6d Debrett.

THE author of this ſhort tract has proved himſelf to be a deep and ſcientific politician upon the ſubject of which it treats His general propoſition is, "that no tax on fixed property can be "made to yield ſufficient to be a ſubſtitute for revenues drawn from articles "of general conſumption, without being "ruinouſly oppreſſive;" and he exemplifies it with great clearneſs and preciſion, by a ſtatement of the effect which a commutation of the duties on foreign brandies muſt neceſſarily have, in reducing the vaſt revenue ariſing from the conſumption of MALT, that great pillar of all revenue. It ſeems that Mr Rous's obſervations upon this ſubject were laid before the Miniſter about two years ago, when a general commutation on all thoſe foreign articles which were objects of ſmuggling was in contemplation, and from that hour the idea was abandoned, and no farther mention has been made of carrying this viſionary ſcheme into execution. It appears alſo, that Mr. Rous's arguments upon this ſubject in all probability extirpated from the Commutation Tea Act many of the evils with which it was originally pregnant; and that though yet unrepealed, little of its principle remains, except the injurious and unproductive window tax.

Mr Rous ſtates, that the commercial object aimed at by altering the duties on tea, was to enlarge the Eaſt-India Company's trade, and to reduce the balance paid to the Chineſe by this nation; and that the evil to be remedied, as injurious to the revenue, though perhaps beneficial to the manufacturing and commercial intereſts, was ſmuggling. But he proceeds to ſhew, by ſtrong arguments and plain calculations, that the meaſure adopted muſt not only fail in both theſe purpoſes, but that it will eventually produce miſchiefs of a magnitude that muſt render the evils, againſt which this Commutation Act was directed, of ſmall conſideration Theſe calculations, however, are founded on facts exiſting in public documents, to which we have not the opportunity of adverting, and we muſt therefore rely upon the great pains which it is evident the author has taken to inveſtigate the ſubject, for the truth and propriety of the ſtatements he has made. Admitting his premiſes to be right, his reaſonings ſeem fair, and his concluſions juſt; and the ſubject is undoubtedly of ſuch national importance as to make the reviſion of the Act a proper object of parliamentary inveſtigation.

The Traveller's Companion, or, New Itineraty of England and Wales, with Part of Scotland, arranged in the Manner of Copper-plates; being an accurate and comprehenſive View of the principal Roads in Great-Britain, taken from actual Surveys, wherein every Object worthy of Notice is pointed out; to which are annexed, the Circuits of the Judges, the Ports from whence the Government Packets ſail, and a copious Index, where are particularized the Market-Days of each Town. By Thomas Pride and Philip Luckombe. 8vo. 5s. 6d. half-bound.

THIS Traveller's Companion appears to be well adapted to its title, which is not the caſe with all books of this kind It not only points out every place on the road, but furniſhes copious information of each object within a conſiderable diſtance on either ſide; a circumſtance in which other books on the ſubject are extremely deficient. The attention paid to this work, and the accuracy of its materials, will in all probability meet with the encouragement of the public.

WE are now to take a general ſurvey of the moſt uſeful part of our author's entertaining work; the ſecond volume being calcul ted not only to inform, but to inſtruct young officers actually engaged in the military ſervice of their country; and to give a clear and competent delineation of the ſcience of arms, by which gentlemen in private life may be enabled to qualify themſelves for the field, if on any unexpected emergency they ſhould be called upon to ſtand forth as the natural guardians and defenders of their own property, and of the lives and fortunes of their fellow citizens. It is not only a vulgar but a dangerous error to hold the militia of the kingdom in any degree of contempt; and it is the more inexcuſable ſince we have had a melancholy proof of the neceſſity of relying upon that uſeful corps in a ſituation of univerſal alarm, terror, and confuſion, and at a time when we had a large ſtanding army of regular troops within the realm, which may not always be the caſe.

The timely arrival and proper ſtationing of the provincial militia during the riots in 1780, moſt probably ſaved the lives of thouſands of the inhabitants of the metropolis, and protected their houſes and effects from rapine and deveſtation. Thoſe who had an opportunity of obſerving the different encampments of this reſpectable corps, ſeemed to agree in one general remark, that many of the country gentlemen who commanded them, maintained as good diſcipline, exerciſed their men as exactly, and went through all the duties of the field with as much addreſs, alertneſs, and attention, as the moſt experienced officers in the regulars; while, on the other hand, by far too great a number appeared to be much better qualified to run down a timid hare, or to purſue with ſavage fury the wily fox, and lay ſiege to his covert, than to face an enemy, or defend a town.

To remedy this defect, and to reſtore the militia, the natural and conſtitutional force of the kingdom, to that ſtate of reſpectability and credit which it ought to exiſt, and will then have a right to claim, no better method can be adopted than that which has already taken place in many conſiderable academies in the vicinity of London—the training up young gentlemen to the exerciſe of arms, as an honourable and rational amuſement, as well as a ſalutary relaxation from their ſtudies. This laudable practice ſhould be extended to every capital ſchool throughout the kingdom, and the maſters ſhould keep in their libraries our author's Hiſtory of the Engliſh Army for the uſe of adults, that they may acquire in due time accurate ideas of the dignity, antiquity, and vaſt importance of the military ſcience, conſidered in the reſpectable light of national defence, and not as letting looſe the dogs of war on foreign countries, to gratify the ambition or the avarice of thoſe pernicious tyrants who are falſely ſtiled glorious and immortal heroes.

Captain Groſe opens the ſecond diviſion of his elaborate performance with an account of the clothing of the Engliſh Army; and obſerves, that the ſoldiers who compoſed our ancient armies were not always clothed by Government, and therefore moſt probably had not any regular uniform, on which account the records of early date furniſh but little information on this head, he is therefore obliged to have recourſe to the annals of modern times, and it is curious to obſerve the difference between the charges for clothing the army in the reigns of William III and George II.

"By an original contract in 1693, between the Right Hon the Lord Caſtleton and Mr Francis Molineaux, a clothier, preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum among the manuſcripts of the Harleian collection, No. 6844, we find the prices of the different articles of clothing for a regiment of foot at that time, both as charged by the clothier, and as eſtimated by an after-valuation made by the officers of the regiment, the original contract being deemed an overcharge

If we add to the first contract one shilling for waistcoats, which are omitted, the clothing of a private foot soldier in King William's time amounts to two pounds and sixpence; so that we find a saving made under George II of no less than three shillings and eight-pence per man; a very considerable object to the nation in the expenditure of those immense sums which Parliament has been obliged to raise for the support of the land forces in times of war, and we may notice with pleasure the improved state of our woollen manufactures, for the principal difference in the two statements consists in the prices of the hats and stockings, and upon enquiry it will be found, that these articles are better in quality at present than they were in the year 1693. To a benevolent mind it is likewise highly satisfactory to know, that these comfortable parts of clothing for the poor in general are so considerably diminished. And here the statesman ought to observe the good effects of not laying impolitic and oppressive taxes on the necessaries of life consumed by the lowest classes of the people. If soap and candles were as free from excise as common hats and stockings, we should not be burthened with such enormous poor-rates.

But to return to our subject from this short digression, which we hope our readers will pardon.——The administration of military justice falls next under the consideration of our indefatigable historian. Before the institution of Courts Martial, inferior officers and soldiers were tried and punished under the direction of the High Constable and the Marshal, assisted by the civilians and veteran officers, whose statute books were the laws and ordinances of war then in force; but general officers, and capital delinquents of high rank, were tried and adjudged by Parliament. After the abolition of the office of High Constable, the Marshal, who was second in command, continued to enjoy the prerogative of sitting as chief judge in all military causes, and to hold his court two days in every week; but upon the approach of time the commissions granted by our Kings to command in chief authorized them to enact ordinances for the government of the armies under their command, and to sit in judgment themselves, or to appoint deputies; and this encroachment on the power of the Marshal's court ended in the total suppression of the office itself, and instead of the Marshal, an officer was appointed who was styled president of the High Court of War, and on certain occasions, he claimed the privilege of a double vote. It is easy to conceive what hardships the poor soldiers must have suffered, as well as the inferior officers, from the partial mode of trying and punishing them which subsisted during the early periods of our history, and even down to the time of James II. One instance of a tyrannical commission issued by Charles I in 1626, given in a note to page 56, is sufficient to shew that English soldiers were little better than slaves to their officers before the Revolution.

Soon after that happy epoch, Courts Martial as they are now constituted, were established and regulated by Act of Parliament, together with the military laws now called articles of war; and that a door might be left open for such amendments and improvements as the dictates of humanity, sound policy, and the genius of British freedom might from time to time suggest, this military Act of Parliament, if we may be allowed the expression, is renewed every year, under the title of "the Mutiny Act."

Following up the advantages which this extension of the protection of the whole legislature has given to the poor soldier, who daily hazards his life in the service of his country, (for in a moment he may be called forth to quell a riot more dangerous than an open enemy) we have the satisfaction to find that all barbarous, torturing punishments, partaking of the infernal horrors of the Inquisition, were abolished by degrees, as a milder system of military government took place.

The bare mention of some of the punishments formerly inflicted upon both officers and soldiers, and the description given of some of the instruments of cruelty in the plates contained in this volume, cannot but excite pity and indignation, seeing the tongues with a red-hot iron, for expressions which a bigotted priest or an enthusiastic commander in chief might falsely the blasphemy was a punishment confined to officers, and was not abolished till the reign of Queen Anne.

An engraving of the wooden horse sufficiently demonstrates the barbarity of that punishment; by which many soldiers were rendered totally incapable of duty, and others lost their lives: the according of the picket, often inflicted on the cavalry and artillery by the commanding officer, without the sentence of a court-martial, must raise sentiments of gratitude to heaven in the breast of every thinking man, for the mild and equitable government under which he lives, more especially if he has any near and dear relations honourably engaged in the military service of his country.

From the painful subject of punishments we advert with pleasure to the foundation of hospitals for the sick and wounded. Formerly wounded and maimed soldiers alone members were provided for by a parish rate, and the parishes wherein they were first landed after actual service were obliged to afford them instant succour and relief. At length, a more regular mode of providing for invalids took place; and, to use our author's own words, "foremost among the military rewards of modern times stands Chelsea College, or Hospital, and the out-pensions from that establishment; institutions that do honour to the founder and to the nation, and by holding out to our soldiery the prospect of a comfortable retirement in their old age, encourages them to encounter death, wounds, hardships, fatigues, and the ravages of unwholesome climates for the service of their King and country." An elegant engraving of Chelsea College, as it was originally erected by James I. for a college of divinity in controversial divinity to defend the Protestant doctrines against Popery, forms an agreeable introduction to the history of that seminary, and of its happy conversion to its present noble purpose by Charles II. who must be considered as the real founder; though the completion of the building, and of the benevolent plan now subsisting, was reserved to adorn the annals of William III. and his glorious Queen, Mary.

There is a defect in this important work which we hope to see remedied in a subsequent edition; the capital heads of the history are not divided, as is customary, into distinct books or chapters. From a long account of martial laws, punishments, &c. he passes on—with only the common separation of one paragraph from another—to a detail concerning the ancient mode of encampment—and from thence to a progressive description of ancient and modern tents, which is highly entertaining, particularly the account of the magnificence of the royal tent of King Henry VIII. Under the head of encampments is likewise comprised various plans of the forms of camps ancient and modern, with the regulations observed in them. The military instruments of musick follow next in order, and the discussion of this subject serves as a kind of introduction to the manual exercises, at various periods, of the infantry and cavalry, noting the changes that have taken place. The different standards, banners, pendants, &c. and the badges of honour or distinction worn by the British army at present, are so accurately described that any gentleman may know each regiment he sees on the ground at a general review, and by close attention may even distinguish to what corps any private sentinel belongs.

The remainder of the volume, though equally curious, is more adapted for the perusal of military men than for general readers. It contains an account, and an illustration by plates, first, of the ancient projectile machines and artillery—then of the modern, used at sieges, and in the field. The watery element likewise furnishes a singular representation of a naval engine of destruction called an infernal, used by the Dutch and the English at St Maloes, under King William. A description of ancient fortifications; some observations on the custom of ransoming prisoners in former times, and a copious Appendix; consisting of several documents necessary to authenticate and elucidate many facts recorded in the course of his History of the Army, terminate our author's extensive plan.

With respect to the plates, which are executed in a masterly manner, we apprehend it will give our readers a satisfactory idea of the whole, to annex a concise description of them, and as the work is published in numbers, as well as volumes, they will thereby be enabled to select such specimens as they shall judge most suited to their own taste, and best calculated to encourage them to complete their sets.

In Vol. I. are the following engravings—A man at arms in plate armour mounted on a barbed horse, and an archer——Norman soldiers——A horseman's arms, armour, and accoutrements—ancient dragoon——horse-guard light dragoon—an officer of pikemen—

A ſoldier of the time of King James I armed with a culver; the croſs bow; armour and arms of infantry; a muſquetier with his match lock, bandileers, and reſt, an officer and ſerjeant of a Highland regiment; Highland Soldiers, a piper of a Highland regiment, a yeoman of the guard attending Queen Elizabeth on a progreſs.

Vol. II. contains two plates of military rewards and puniſhments; thirteen plates of caſtrametation; three of regal tents; three of modern tents; three of encampment in the preſent form; one of inſtruments of muſic; twenty-three of the different kinds of military exerciſe; eight of machines for projecting ſtones and darts, one of battering machines; one of machines uſed in ancient ſieges; nine of artillery uſed with gunpowder, five of fortifications; and four of the ancient attack and defence of fortified places.

A Narrative of the Expedition to Botany Bay. With an Account of New South Wales, its Productions, Inhabitants, &c. &c. By Capt Watkin Tench, of the Marines. 8vo 3s Debrett.

THE flattering accounts which were given by Capt Cooke and his companions of the richneſs and fertility of that part of New Wales now called BOTANY BAY, preſented it to the mind of his Majeſty as a ſpot worthy of colonization. At that period the emancipation of America had rendered it no longer practicable for this country to tranſport the yearly convicts to that quarter of the globe, and neceſſity impelled the Legiſlature, in the year 1779, to doom them to a ſtate of temporary ſervitude and labour in raiſing gravel for ballaſt from the bottom of the Thames on board HULKS, which were eſtabliſhed at Woolwich for that purpoſe. The ſucceſſive diſcharges and frequent eſcapes which almoſt daily happened from theſe ill managed gallies, filled the goals of the kingdom with ſuch crowds of priſoners and convicts, that Adminiſtration became alarmed, from their increaſing numbers, for the ſafety of the kingdom itſelf. To relieve the State from its apprehenſion, and theſe unhappy ſufferers from their cloſe confinement, were the firſt motives for adopting a new ſyſtem of tranſportation, and BOTANY BAY immediately preſented itſelf as the propereſt place for this purpoſe. At the meeting of the Parliament in the year 1787, his Majeſty accordingly declared in his ſpeech from the Throne, "That a plan had been formed by his direction, for tranſporting a number of convicts, in order to remove the danger and inconvenience which aroſe from the crowded ſtate of the priſons in the different parts of the kingdom." The Legiſlature ſeconded their Sovereign's ſcheme, and by the Statute of 27 Geo III ch 2 a code of laws was framed to ſentence convicts to be tranſported to "the Eaſtern Coaſt of New South Wales, or ſome one or other of the Iſlands adjacent;" and authoriſing his Majeſty to grant charters of colonization accordingly. In conſequence of theſe powers, an arrangement was made; and at day-light on the morning of the 13th of May 1787, his Majeſty's ſhips Sirius, Hyena, and Supply, three victuallers with two years ſtores and proviſions on board for the projected ſettlement, and ſix tranſports, with 565 male convicts, 192 female convicts, 18 children, 4 captains, 12 ſubalterns, 24 ſerjeants and corporals, 8 drummers, and 160 private marines, ſailed from Portſmouth, under the command of Governor Phillip, for the purpoſe of eſtabliſhing a new Colony on Botany Bay. The novelty and importance of this expedition to the preſent and future intereſts of this country very naturally excited the public curioſity, and after the long interval of two years, that curioſity is at length gratified by the Narrative at preſent under our review. Mr Watkin Tench, the author, was a Captain of marines on board the fleet, and ſeems to have made a buſy uſe of thoſe opportunities which his ſtation afforded to him, to obſerve the temper and diſpoſition of the convicts during their tedious voyage, and of the probability of their being able to eſtabliſh the intended ſettlement. He dates his narrative from Port Jackſon, July 29, 1788, and the manner in which it is written, in many inſtances diſcovers that he poſſeſſes the ability of a ſcholar, the penetration of a philoſopher, and humanity as a man. He profeſſes, that the deſign of his work was not only to gratify preſent curioſity, but to point out to future adventurers the favourable as well as adverſe circumſtances which will attend their ſettling in ſo diſtant a region. We ſhall therefore endeavour to aſſiſt this laudable intention, by extracting the ſubſtantial part of this pamphlet for the entertainment or information of our reſpective readers.

Before ſix o clock on the morning of the 13th of May 1787, the whole fleet was under sail; and, the weather being fine and wind easterly, proceeded through the Needles with a fresh leading breeze. The Hyena frigate accompanied them to a certain distance westward, and returned to England on the 20th of May. On the morning of the 30th they made the rocks named the Deserters, off the south-west end of Madeira. On the 3d of June, they made the Island of Teneriffe, and in the evening anchored in the road of Santa Cruz. In this Island they remained a week, and having completed their stock of water, wine, &c they weighed anchor on the 10th of June, and stood out to sea with a light easterly breeze. On the 18th of June they saw the most northerly of the Cape de Verd Islands, at which time the Commodore gave the fleet to understand, by signal, that his intention was to touch at some of them. The following day they made St Jago, and stood in to gain an anchorage in Port Praya Bay; but the baffling winds and lee currents rendering it doubtful whether the ships would be able to fetch, the signal was hauled down, and the fleet bore up before the wind. In passing along them they were enabled to ascertain the south end of the Isle of Sal to be in 16 deg 40 min north latitude, 23 deg 5 min west longitude; the south end of Bonavista 15 deg. 57 min. north, 23 deg 8 min. west; the south end of the Isle of May 15 deg 11 min north, 23 deg 26 min. west, and the longitude of the fort in Port Praya, to be 23 deg 36½ min. west of Greenwich. On the 14th of July they passed the Equator. On the 2d of August, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the Supply, which had been previously sent a-head on purpose, made the signal for seeing the land, which was visible to the whole fleet before sunset, and proved to be Cape Tiio, latitude 23 deg. 5 min. south, longitude 42 deg. 40½ min. west. On the 7th they anchored in the harbour of Rio de Janeiro. On the 4th of September they left this harbour, amply furnished with the good things which its happy soil and clime so abundantly produce; and on the 13th of October they cast anchor in Table Bay, at the Cape of Good Hope, without any remarkable occurrence, except the loss of a convict, who unfortunately fell into the sea, and perished, in spite of all endeavours to save him by cutting adrift a life buoy and hoisting out a boat. On the 12th of November they left the Cape, and every scene of civilization and humanized manners, to explore a remote and barbarous land, and plant in it tho'e happy arts, which alone constitute the pre-eminence and dignity of other countries.

"We had hardly cleared the land, says Mr. Tench, when a south-east wind set in, and, except at short intervals, continued to blow until the 19th of the month, when we were in the latitude of 37 deg 40 min. south, and by the time-keeper, in longitude 11 deg. 30 min east, so that our distance from Botany Bay had increased nearly an hundred leagues, since leaving the Cape. As no appearance of a change in our favour seemed likely to take place, Governor Phillip at this time signified his intention of shifting his pennant from the Sirius to the Supply, and proceeding on his voyage without waiting for the rest of the fleet, which was formed in two divisions. The first consisting of three transports, known to be the best sailers, was put under the command of a Lieutenant of the navy; and the remaining three, with the victuallers, left in charge of Capt. Hunter, of his Majesty's ship Sirius. In the last division was the vessel in which the author of this Narrative served. Various causes prevented the separation from taking place until the 25th, when several sawyers, carpenters, blacksmiths, and other mechanics, were shifted from different ships into the Supply, in order to facilitate his Excellency's intention of forwarding the necessary buildings to be erected at Botany Bay, by the time the rest of the fleet might be expected to arrive. Lieutenant Governor Ross, and the Staff of the marine battalion, also removed from the Sirius into the Scarborough transport, one of the ships of the first division, in order to afford every assistance which the public service might receive, by their being early on the spot on which our future operations were to be conducted.

"From this time a succession of fair winds and pleasant weather corresponded to our eager desires, and on the 7th of January 1788, the long-wished-for shore of Van Diemen gratified our sight. We made the land at two o'clock in the afternoon, the very hour we expected to see it from the lunar observations of Capt. Hunter, whose accuracy as an astronomer, and conduct as an officer, had inspired us with equal gratitude and admiration.

"After so long a confinement, on a service so peculiarly disgusting and troublesome, it cannot be matter of surprise that we were overjoyed at the near prospect of a change of scene. By sunset we had passed between the rocks which Capt. Furneaux

Forneaux named the Mewſtone and Swilly. The former bears a very cloſe reſemblance to the little iſland near Plymouth, whence it took its name; its latitude is 43 deg. 48 min ſouth, longitude 146 deg. 25 min. eaſt of Greenwich

"In running along ſhore, we caſt many an anxious eye towards the land, on which ſo much of our future deſtiny depended. Our diſtance, joined to the hazineſs of the atmoſphere, prevented us, however, from being able to diſcover much. With our beſt glaſſes we could ſee nothing but hills of a moderate height, cloathed with trees, to which ſome little patches of white ſandſtone gave the appearance of being covered with ſnow. Many fires were obſerved on the hills in the evening.

"As no perſon in the ſhip I was on board had been on this coaſt before, we conſulted a little chart, publiſhed by Steele of the Minories, London, and found it in general very correct, it would be more ſo, were not the Mewſtone laid down at too great a diſtance from the land, and one object made of the Eddyſtone and Swilly, when, in fact, they are diſtinct Between the two laſt is an entire bed of impaſſable rocks, many of them above water The latitude of the Eddyſtone is 43 deg 53½ min. longitude 147 deg. 9 min, that of Swilly 43 deg 54 min ſouth, longitude 147 deg 3 min eaſt of Greenwich.

"In the night the weſterly wind, which had ſo long befriended us, died away, and was ſucceeded by one from the north-eaſt. When day appeared we had loſt ſight of the land, and did not again return till the 19th, at early the diſtance of 18 leagues from our deſired port. The wind was now fair, the ſky ſerene, though a little hazy, and the temperature of the air delightfully pleaſant: joy ſparkled in every countenance, and congratulations iſſued from every mouth: Ithaca itſelf was ſcarcely more longed for by Ulyſſes, than Botany Bay by the adventurers who had traverſed ſo many thouſand miles to take poſſeſſion of it.

"Heavily in clouds came on the day" which uſhered in our arrival. To us it was "a great, an important day," though I hope the foundation, not the fall, of an empire will be dated from it.

"On the morning of the 20th, by ten o'clock, the whole of the fleet had caſt anchor in Botany Bay, where, to our mutual ſatisfaction, we found the Governor, and the firſt diviſion of tranſports. On enquiry, we heard, that the Supply had arrived on the 18th, and the tranſports only the preceding day.

"Thus, after a paſſage of exactly thirty-ſix weeks from Portſmouth, we happily effected our arduous undertaking, with ſuch a train of unexampled bleſſings, as hardly ever attended a fleet in a like predicament Of two hundred and twelve marines we loſt only one, and of ſeven hundred and ſeventy-five convicts, put on board in England, but twenty-four periſhed in our route."

The Life of Frederick the Second, King of Pruſſia, to which are added, Obſervations, authentic Documents, and a Variety of Anecdotes. Tranſlated from the French 2 Vol. Octavo. 10s 6d. Debrett.

THE conduct of Frederick the Second during every part of his life, from the cradle to the grave, was marked by circumſtances ſo extraordinary and illuſtrious, that he awakened univerſal curioſity, and rivetted the attention of the ſurrounding nations to the great and eventful tranſactions of his reign. Whether engaged in promoting the delights of friendſhip, or enlivening the charms of converſation; in diſſeminating ſcience, or planning ſchemes of policy; in cultivating the ſofter arts of peace, or increaſing the fatalities of war, in ſeizing the advantages of victory, or repairing the diſaſters of defeat, a mighty genius predominated, and enabled him to ſhine with equal luſtre as a wit, a philoſopher, a ſtateſman, and a ſoldier He raiſed the Electoral Houſe of Brandenbourg, from its poor and inconſiderable ſtate, into a great and powerful empire; and, both before and ſince his death, the ableſt pens of Germany, France, Italy, and England, have been hardly employed in recording the actions of the Hero, and in appreciating the ſingular character of the Man. The number of writers upon this fertile ſubject are ſaid to exceed four hundred, and, as far at leaſt as our reading has enabled us to decide, the author of the work at preſent before us is by no means the meaneſt in the throng. His unwearied induſtry to obtain materials for his work appears to have been rewarded with conſiderable ſucceſs; but from a fear of wounding vulnerable pride, or offending captious vanity, he diſclaims all intention of writing a hiſtory of the reign of this extraordinary Monarch, and proteſts to have only applied his purſuits to a multitude of intereſting anecdotes, to a diverſified aſſemblage of curious particulars, and to ſuch a collection of pleaſing details as enter always with propriety into the MEMOIRS of illuſtrious men, though they do not ſtrictly conſtitute what might be regarded as materials for the graver page of HISTORY. It falls, however, upon the preſent occaſion within the province of the BIOGRAPHER to enumerate the brilliant ſcenes of war in which this gallant Prince was ſo conſpicuouſly engaged, and he has interwoven with this relation a great variety of new, curious, and important circumſtances, without clogging the progreſs of his narration, or loſing ſight of his main deſign.

He has divided his ſubject with great judgment and perſpicuity into Eight Periods, from which we ſhall proceed reſpectively to extract the moſt intereſting particulars, and then offer ſome general obſervations on the merit of the work.

The FIRST PERIOD, from the year 1712 to 1740, includes a deſcription of the Electorate, its becoming a Kingdom under the grandfather of Frederick, in 1657, his birth at Berlin, on the 24th of January 1712, his deſcent, as the third ſon of the Hereditary Prince Frederick-William, by Maria Dorothea, a Princeſs of the Houſe of Brunſwick, his education, his marriage with the Princeſs Elizabeth-Chriſtina of Brunſwick, niece to the Empreſs, and his acceſſion to the throne on the 31ſt of May 1740, on the death of the King his father, who had ſucceeded Frederick the Firſt in the year 1713.

The SECOND PERIOD extends from his acceſſion to the throne to the peace of Breſlau in 1742.

The character of the King is diſcloſed by the following deſcription —"Hitherto this Prince had been viewed only as the friend of philoſophy and the muſes, as the friend of peace, ſtudy, and retirement. The world looked for a very different reign from that of his father. The public imagination had long anticipated a brilliant court, Attic elegance, all the charms of wit, all the advantages of the arts and ſciences, in a word, a Prince who would limit his pleaſures to the delights of ſtudy, and his ambition to the title of a King philoſopher. The world was deceived. Frederick did not ceaſe to love and cultivate letters, but he united with the love of ſtudy all the qualities of all the labours of a great King. It was imagined that the army would be neglected, and he augmented it with ſome regiments without touching its conſtitution, he only diſbanded the regiment of guards, more ſingular than uſeful *, except one battalion, which he retained as a monument. The clergy of the different communions thought themſelves loſt, and he reſtored to the Lutherans the liberty of performing divine ſervice with all the ceremonies prohibited them by Frederick-William, in order to draw them nearer to the reformed, with whom he wiſhed them to be united. The people feared they ſhould be forgotten for the choice ſpirits † and public ſhews, and the ſecond day of his reign he threw open all the royal magazines, diſtributed corn at a low price, to put an end to the ſcarcity; and reſolved to be purchaſed in Poland, to form new magazines in the provinces, abolished all diſpenſations of marriage, and permitted every body to marry according to their fancy in all caſes where marriage was not clearly prohibited by the Bible. The Choice Spirits at Rheinſberg already figured to themſelves a delicious life flowing with abundance, they beheld nothing in future but days interwoven with gold and flowers, ſome of them already wept with joy, and Kayſerling had nearly loſt his ſenſes. The King indeed provided for them, but they were obliged to work, and render themſelves uſeful.—By the third day the greateſt part of theſe changes were effected; and on the ſame day the philoſopher Wolfe was recalled

* "The chief pride of the old King was to be maſter of the talleſt regiment in Europe; and he had ſuch a collection of GIANTS as perhaps was never ſeen in the world before. To review this towering regiment was his daily pleaſure, and to perpetuate it was ſo much his care, that when he met a tall woman he immediately commanded one of his TITANIAN retinue to marry her, that they might propagate proceres, and produce heirs to the father's habiliments."—Dr Johnſon's Life of the King of Pruſſia.

† "The old King purchaſed a country ſeat at Rheinſberg, and preſented it to his ſon, which he cultivated with great taſte, and placed the following inſcription over the great gate of the Caſtle—Friderico Trangvillitatem Colenti. In this beloved retreat he remained till his father's death, in the ſociety of a ſelect company of amiable and well informed men. ed * " He wished to reign over an enlightened people, but he dreaded left knowledge and abundance ſhould corrupt the military ſpirit, and deſtroy activity, ſobriety, and ſubordination He had formed two plans from which he rarely deviated during his whole reign, which were, to govern his ſubjects as a father, and his ſoldiers as a deſpot —The two firſt months of the reign of Frederick were taken up in new arrangements, journies, and other public affairs; and he formed the ORDER OF MERIT, deſtined more particularly as a military recompence He went into Pruſſia and Weſtphalia to receive the homage of the inhabitants In taking this laſt journey, the idea ſtruck him of proceeding incognito as far as Paris He aſſumed the name of Dufour, called himſelf a Bohemian Count, and thus arrived at Straſbourg. Prince William, his brother, who accompanied him, took the name of Count de Schafgotſch, and lodged in a different hotel from the King On their arrival they dreſſed themſelves à la Francaiſe Towards the evening the King went to a coffee-houſe, got acquainted with ſome officers, and invited them to ſupper. Parbleu! ſays one of them pretty loud, let us ſee what ſort of perſonage this Bohemian Count is They repaired to his invitation, and were not a little ſurprized to find the pretended Bohemian an amiable companion, full of wit, and who ſpoke their language as well as themſelves They retired in high glee, and the next day invited themſelves to breakfaſt At the hour of the parade the King was there, but no ſooner did he appear than he was diſcovered by a ſoldier who had ſerved in the Pruſſian army The Marſhal de Brogho, then Governor of Straſbourg, was immediately informed that the King of Pruſſia was in town Frederick walking on him under his falſe name, he received him with diſtinction, and two or three times during the converſation let the words "your Majeſty" eſcape him The whole city ſoon learnt that the King of Pruſſia was at Straſbourg, the ſtreets were illuminated, vivat was ſhouted under his windows, but Frederick, vexed at being diſcovered, changed his project, no longer thought of his expedition to Paris, and quitted Straſbourg at day break † " *

But the peaceful excurſions of Frederick were ſoon interrupted by the obſtinacy of the Biſhop of Liege, and by the death of the Emperor Charles the Sixth. The Houſe of Brandenbourg claimed the Seigniory of Herſtal, in the poſſeſſion of the Biſhop, as part of the ſucceſſion of the Prince of Orange The inhabitants of Herſtal, at the inſtigation of the Biſhop, refuſed to do homage to their new King Frederick ſent his Chancellor Ramborret with orders to the Biſhop to renounce his claims The Biſhop refuſed, and continued to aſſiſt and encourage the revolters The King immediately marched twelve companies of infantry and a ſquadron of dragoons into the Seigniory, and lived there at the expence of the Biſhop, who at length conſented to purchaſe peace by the payment of 150 000 crowns to Frederick as his ſuperior Lord principal of them were Chaſot, a French officer, who had as much wit and information as amenity in his character,—Kayſerling, a gentleman of Courland, full of talents and vivacity, poſſeſſing at once ſolid qualities and whimſical ſingularities, the Prince generally called him Cæſarion,—Jordan, a French refugee, a pleaſant companion, whoſe converſation amuſed the Prince, and who merited his confidence by the qualities of his heart,—Knobelſdorf, leſs gay than the others, but who directed the buildings and gardens, and could converſe on all the arts of deſigning with as much taſte as judgment.—This was the ſociety of Cloe Spirit."

Extra Official State Papers. Addressed to the Right Hon. Lord Rawdon, and the other Members of the Two Houses of Parliament, associated for the Preservation of the Constitution, and Promoting the Prosperity of the British Empire. By a late Under Secretary of State. Vol. I. and II. 8vo 3s. each. Debrett.

THE two volumes of "Extra Official State Papers" at present under our review, are introduced to the public eye under the covert and convenient seeming of three patriotic addresses to the Association which is sometimes distinguished by the title of THE ARMED NEUTRALITY. This plan of publication, however, appears to be in a great measure offensive, or at least to wear a double aspect; for the sagacious author, WILLIAM KNOX, ESQ. who was, for twelve years, the under secretary of state for the American department to Lord Hillsborough, Lord Dartmouth, and Lord George Germain, and deeply engaged in the arcana of politicks which signalized the administration of Lord North, but whose spreading fortunes have been sadly wrecked in the revolution of affairs, has ingeniously contrived to mix a story of his private woes for the benefit of himself, with his public recommendations and advice for the benefit of the nation!

In his first Letter he states the charges which the two great Factions, by which the Nation is at present divided, respectively make against each other, with an exception "in favour of that ATLAS OF THE CONSTITUTION and ornament of the woolsack, whose brilliant wit, vast comprehension, sound judgment, and inflexible integrity, give equal dignity and strength to the Crown, and security to the liberties and properties of the people," but cunningly avoids an examination, whether THE OLD WHIGS have been uniform in the pursuit of their plan of lowering the King's authority by depriving the Crown of its influence, or whether it is MR PITT's purpose to prevent the Crown from extending its power by any other than himself alone, by filling all the departments of the government with men not only attached to, and dependant upon, himself, but with such as are so incapable of discharging the duties of their offices, that they are sure no other minister would continue them, and therefore can have no hope of remaining but from supporting him. He concludes however, after having used some fine-spun arguments to prove it, that the measures which have for their avowed object the diminishing the influence of the Crown, will in their consequence render THE CONVENTIONS a more dignified and than they have ever been upon it; and therefore he trusts that THE ILLUSTRIOUS BODY to whom he addresses his observations, will dare to save the constitution by bravely combating popular prejudices, and by restoring the Board of Trade, the Board of Green-Cloth, and Board of Police, with a capacity to their members to sit in the House of Commons.

The second object of Mr Knox's recommendation is the more perfect establishment of a PAPER OFFICE, for the reception and preservation of such papers as might be spared from the several public offices, making, by an act of the legislature, all original papers of a public nature the property of the Crown, and the subtraction of them from their respective offices without his Majesty's command a high crime and misdemeanour!

The third object is a reformation in the mode of giving directions for warlike preparations, in order to preserve, unviolate the necessary secrecy which such occasions require, and thereby to prevent the enemy from obtaining a knowledge of the designs of Government. During the last war, Mr. Knox proposed a method of carrying on business where secrecy was required; which method was adopted by Lord George Germain and the whole Cabinet, and approved by his Majesty, and not one of the secret expeditions was afterwards discovered or defeated. "It was owing to this plan," says Mr Knox, "that although the preparations for the succour and maintenance of Gibraltar were the greatest ever known, the secret was so well kept, that the great restorer of the character and discipline of the British navy, the gallant but persecuted RODNEY* was able to surprize the Spanish admiral, and that St Lucia and St Eustatius were likewise surprized. I sincerely hope, that before this Country is engaged in another war, all those whom I had the honour to serve with, and myself, may be beyond the reach of its alarms, but whenever that misfortune happens, THE PLAN will be found where it was my duty to deposit it." This important deposit we presume was made when the united endeavours of Mr Rigby and Mr Dundas were successful in overthrowing the power of Lord North, and, by the consequent ſequent diſcontinuation of the American war, rendering the department in which Mr. Knox acted, uſeleſs and unneceſſary, "for I ſoon perceived," ſays Mr. Knox, "that a new diſtribution of the Secretaries' offices was in contemplation, and that Mr. DUNDAS meant to content himſelf with the otter of the Eaſt India roſe, without endangering the pricking his finger with the American thorn; though he had no objection to its repreſentative the thiſtle of his own country; the well known properties of that plant, to offend thoſe who touch it gently, but to do no injury to thoſe who ſqueeze it hard, being very much to his mind."

The fourth object which Mr. Knox recommends to the attention of the Aſſociation is, "the proviſion of timber for the conſtruction of ſhips of the line," and he predicts, as a proprietor and feller of woods, that unleſs the royal foreſts are incloſed and planted with acorns, there will not be a ſingle tree to be purchaſed in another century fit for the conſtruction of a ninety gun ſhip, being convinced that every inland gentleman of taſte will do as the Marquis of Buckingham has done, give up the price of the timber, and ſuffer the trees to die of old age, rather than diſpoſe of them upon the terms of having a fine park, a beautiful lawn, or a well grown fence deſtroyed by the removal of them intire

The fifth object of Mr Knox's anxiety is the unequal price of fleſh-meat and corn, an attention to which in times of peace would, in Mr Knox's opinion, as well become the ſtation of a ſtateſman, and be infinitely more beneficial to the public, than his riding in the whirlwind and directing the ſtorm of the moſt ſucceſsful war To thoſe politicians who imagine that the abolition of tythes would tend to promote rural happineſs and induſtry, and convert the arable land into meadows for breeding cattle, Mr. Knox aſſigns lodgings in one of the ſides of Moorfields, for it is impoſſible "that any people could be happy without virtue, that virtue ſhould thrive without religion, that religion ſhould flouriſh without a prieſthood, or that a prieſthood ſhould ſubſiſt without an eſtabliſhment." Mr. Knox however does not admit the claim of the clergy to be jure divino, and ſays, that he ſhould not be more influenced by the example of Melchiſedack and Abraham than by that of Doctor Price and Alderman Sawbridge

The ſixth object of Mr Knox's recommendation is the inſtitution of ſermons in College Chapels. "There are, I believe, in both univerſities forty-three chapels, in which prayers are read about twenty-four Sundays in every year;" and Mr. Knox propoſes, "that the ſmall ſum of two guineas a Sunday be given to each for a Sunday lecture, or elementary diſcourſe upon the principles of our religion, after the morning prayers: the whole expence would be no more than two thouſand and ſixty-four guineas per annum, not half the charge of the government of Cape Breton: and ſurely," continues Mr. Knox, "we ought to lay out as much for cultivating the minds of all our youth of the ſuperior claſſes with the true principles of our religion, as we do to improve the barren rocks of an iſland on the other ſide the Atlantic." And with this recommendation Mr. Knox cloſes his firſt Letter, reſerving an account of the King's health, and the general ſtagnation of all government which it occaſioned, the hiſtory of what has paſſed reſpecting the Britiſh Colonies in America, and the United States, until better times.

THE SECOND ADDRESS relates entirely to the ſervices which Mr Knox has rendered to Ireland, of which kingdom he is a native, as the propoſal of its octennial parliament; its ſhare in the Newfoundland Fiſhery; its participation in the trade of the Britiſh Colonies, the removal of the embargo on butter and beef, the propoſal of a national bank; and the removal of a reſtriction which had been clandeſtinely inſerted in the Fiſhery Acts "Receiving the firſt rudiments of my political education," ſays Mr Knox, "from one of the ableſt and beſt informed ſtateſmen that iſland ever produced, the late Sir Richard Cox, I was early well acquainted with the ſtate of that great but unknown and neglected member of the Britiſh Empire, and ſo thorough a knowledge had I obtained of its wants and grievances, that ſoon after I returned from America, in the year 1761, I was able to take up their conſideration, and lay ſome propoſals for their redreſs before a reſpectable body of Iriſh noblemen and gentlemen who called themſelves The Donnegall Society, whoſe avowed purpoſe was to promote the intereſts of their country, but which ended, as Iriſh meetings generally do, in toaſting its friends in the Britiſh Parliament, and drinking full bumpers, with three cheers, to the proſperity of Ireland."

THE THIRD ADDRESS ſeems calculated to reconcile the loſs of America to the the true interests of Great Britain "It contains," says Mr Knox, "propositions and reasonings respecting objects of the highest importance to Great Britain, and although they, as well as what I before published, are extra official, yet, inasmuch as they are the propositions and reasonings of one who was a principal actor in the executive government, at the time these very important matters were transacted, they have the advantage of experience over the more scientific plans and systems of the mere political speculatist, and it is in the hope that they may serve to check that ardour for reforms and thirst for innovation, which seems to be the characteristic of the present speculators upon the constitution, and to indispose Parliament to adopt their Utopian chimeras, that I now lay them before the public"

Thus far Mr Knox appears to be influenced by a warm regard and patriotic concern alone for the advantage and prosperity of the British empire, but when he laments that he has been not only deprived of his estate, which remitted him from 1700l to 2000l per annum, but of all his offices, which yielded him 2500l, more, from the jealousy of his official knowledge, and the resentment which his services under Lord North's administration had excited, that he was the only person passed over by Lord Shelburne without compensation for the suppressed offices; that the Lords Commissioners were of opinion that he had no claim whatever upon Government, that he intends to throw himself upon the justice and candour of Parliament, and that every part of these volumes is calculated to impress the public with an opinion of the extraordinary services he has rendered to his country, without any other return than a pension which pays only 440l a year, the real motive of Mr Knox's endeavours to recommend himself to the notice and protection of Lord Rawdon, and the other noble men and gentlemen who compose THE ARMED NEUTRALITY, becomes more apparent These volumes, however, contain many curious particulars, and among others, a description of the treatment which Mr Knox received from the Earl of Shelburne upon his coming into office; for which, however, we refer our readers to the work itself

An Institute of the Law relative to Trials at Nisi Prius By Arthur Onslow, Esq. Barrister at Law 8vo. 6s Whieldon.

THIS celebrated work was originally published in octavo, in the year 1760, without the Author's name, but it was then conjectured, and has now been long known, to be the production of the present Earl Bathurst, as an initiatory recommendation to practice at the bar The merit of it could not long remain unknown to so sagacious and discerning a profession as the Law, and it was soon afterwards published with additions, in quarto But great abilities and deep learning, assisted by the more powerful interest of family connections, soon placing the noble Author's fame and fortune beyond the necessity of literary speculation for support, the copy-right was handed over to his relation, the present Mr JUSTICE BULLER It was accordingly republished in the year 1770, in one volume quarto, under the title of "An Introduction to the Law relative to Trials at Nisi Prius," with large additions, by FRANCIS BULLER, Esq of the Middle Temple Under such auspices as Mr Buller's, the reputation of the work could not but increase; and from this period to the present time, it has continued, ad eredi, though a course of four editions, to be esteemed a book equally instructive to the student, and useful to the professor The number of new cases, however, which have occurred upon the learning of this work since its last revision, has long rendered a new edition of it not only desirable, but important to the profession The higher employments, however, in which its last learned Editor has now long been engaged with so much honour to himself, and advantage to the public, precluded all hope that he would be again able to devote the time and attention which so laborious a performance necessarily requires, and as all pretension to copy-right has expired, the task has at length been undertaken and very ably executed by Mr ONSLOW in the present publication The arrangement of the subject, and all the matter published by Mr Bathurst, continues in its original form, and from this state the work has been improved by a progressive insertion of all the subsequent determinations to the present time The accuracy and judgment with which these additions have been made, do great credit to Mr Onslow's abilities as a Lawyer, and we have no doubt, but that the merit of his labours will contribute greatly to promote his fame and interest, and to obtain him the grateful acknowledgements of his professional brethren, for the service they must derive from the utility of this work, especially on their several circuits.

OUR voyagers having concluded their commerce at Queen Charlotte's Islands, made the best of their way to King George's Sound, in order to join Captain Portlock. On the 8th of August 1787, they saw two vessels, which they took to be the King George and her long-boat; but on speaking with them, they proved to be the Prince of Wales, Capt Colinet, and the Princess Royal, Capt. Duncan, both fitted out by the owners of the King George and Queen Charlotte, and had settled a factory at Staten's Island to collect seal skins and oil. By these vessels our voyagers had the satisfaction of hearing from their friends in England. They parted company with their new brothers in trade the next day, leaving the American coast for good, without meeting with the King George, and proceeded for the Sandwich Islands, where they arrived the 5th of September. An anecdote of one of the inhabitants of Atooi, to whom they gave the name of Long-shanks, is worth extracting, as a pleasing proof that the people whom we dignify with the title of Savages are not destitute of the finer feelings of human nature.

"Long-shanks had been often on board when we were last at Atooi, and by that means was personally acquainted with all our people. Being naturally curious and inquisitive, he now took an opportunity of going amongst them to ask a number of questions about the voyage. On going down between decks he met with the carpenter, who had been troubled with a lingering disorder for a considerable time, and at present was very weak and poorly. His pale countenance and emaciated figure affected poor Long-shanks very sensibly, a tear of pity stole unheeded down his cheek, and he began to enquire about his complaint in a tone of tenderness and compassion: seeing him very weak and infirm, he gently chafed and pressed the sinews and muscles of his legs and thighs, and gave him all the consolation in his power. Presently afterwards he came upon deck, called his canoe, and went on shore in a hurry, without taking leave of any person on the quarter-deck, which was contrary to his usual custom; but he returned very shortly, bringing a fine fowl along with him, which he immediately carried down to the carpenter, told him to have it dressed directly, and he hoped it would make him better in a day or two."

They sailed from these islands the 13th of September, being bound for China to dispose of their stock of furs, and came to anchor at Macao the 5th of November; the next day they were joined by the Imperial Eagle, of 600 tons, Capt Berkley, who had been on the same trade with themselves. This ship had met with a melancholy accident, which our [illegible] writer thus relates:

"Capt. Berkley frequently sent the long-boat with his second mate and [illegible] or twelve of his people to trade with the Indians in places on the coast where the ship had not been. In one of these excursions Mr. Miller, second mate, Mr. Beale, gunner, and two of the people, left the boat, and went in an Indian canoe to trade with the inhabitants on shore, taking with them a sheet of copper for that purpose, but were never seen afterwards. Some of the Imperial Eagle's people landed at the place next day, and found some pieces of their cloaths and linen mangled and bloody, but no part of their bodies, so that they doubtless had been murdered, and their bodies either eat or burnt."

On the 25th they had the welcome sight of their old consort the King George, with all her people in health.

The success of this ship had been nothing equal to that of the Queen Charlotte, and she had made no very striking discoveries.

Their cargo being discharged, on the 20th of January they began to take in their cargo of tea, which was fully completed in a few days. They met with great trouble, however, in the disposal of their furs, owing to the market's being overstocked. The total amount of what they sold them for was 54,857 dollars, which was vastly below their expectations. On the 9th of February they left China, and arrived at St. Helena the 18th of June, without having met with any thing particular except the loss of their surgeon. They sailed from St. Helena the 24th of June, and arrived at Dover the 27th of September, the King George having gained the start of them by a fortnight.

We have already given our opinion of the literary part of this work; and [illegible]

extinct, by expressing our regret that the whole narrative had not been written by the author of the Introduction

At the end, however, he favours us with an ingenious and interesting Appendix, giving an account of several new, descript species of birds, shells, &c with plates very elegantly engraved

Upon the whole, it appears that the fur trade is very precarious on the American coast, so far as it hath been yet discovered, and with the latter writer's concluding remark upon it, we shall here make our conclusion "From this short sketch of the fur trade, thou may'st fully perceive that very great advantages would be derived from it, if placed on a permanent footing, to effect which, I should conceive the most eligible plan would be to establish a factory on the coast, and the North end of Queen Charlotte's Islands seems peculiarly well adapted for that purpose; the situation is nearly central between Cook's River and King George's Sound; and we are well assured that the furs to the Southward are of a very inferior quality. Two small vessels would not only collect all the furs in what harbours are hitherto known, but likewise explore such parts of the coast as are yet undiscovered: besides, there are other valuable articles to be procured here, such as ginseng, copper, oil, spars, &c. and vast quantities of salmon might be cured, which could not fail being a valuable commodity" W

The Young Widow; or, the History of Cornelia Sedley. 4 vols. crown 8vo 12s. Robinsons.

THIS novel may be classed among the superior productions of its kind The story is uncommonly interesting, and discovers in the author great powers both of judgment and invention The incidents are new and singular; the characters natural, and the style is easy, animated, and graceful The catastrophe, which is well concealed and happily disclosed, casts a mournful sensation over the feelings of the reader, and deeply inculcates the noble principle, that a pure and holy religion administers comfort to a wounded spirit more effectually than all the boasted consolations of philosophy, and places happiness and virtue upon their safest and most permanent basis. The pictures of the fond, sensible and gentle Giuliana visiting the remains of her beloved Peverell in the tomb of his ancestors, and the subsequent interview of reconciliation with her offended father at Geneva, are among the first subjects of poetry and painting, and well worthy of their sublimest efforts. All the personages of this work are disciples of the School of Virtue; but the author has varied their several tempers, dispositions, and habits, with so much skill and discrimination, that they appear well contrasted to each other. From the nature of the epistolary correspondence through which the story is conveyed, the narration is sometimes clogged with a repetition of the same circumstances, but the sensible observations and different sentiments which are made to accompany the repetition, lessen the defect

Louisa and Nina; or, an Excursion to Verdun 2 vols 12mo 6s.

THE author of these volumes possesses talents capable of affording public amusement, but he has unfortunately, in the present instance at least, mistaken the application of them. In the imitation of Mr Sterne's style and manner there is something to blame, especially in a writer who occasionally emits sparks of originality. In the endeavour to promote mirth, and awaken all the finer sensibilities of human nature, by well imagined scenes, and elegant compositions, there is something to admire; and if the author had confined to his own genius, he would in many instances have been entitled to share the crown with more confidence and greater success than he has at present. The studied obscurity in which the story of the work is involved prevents us from giving any account of it; but it seems to be a short journey by a man of sense and singularity, for the name of the traveller is never once disclosed, from one side of the Alps to the other, during which he meets with the several incidents that compose the subject matter of the work. The bigotry of the Catholic Priests, and the little regard they pay to truth in arguments reflecting their religion, is in one instance happily ridiculed. "I happened," says the traveller, who appears to have been a Calvinist, "to dine one day with a curate who made a visit to the curates of the neighbouring villages. The dinner being ended, they joined company with me, and engaged me in a controversy I proposed five questions to them which rather heated them. Suddenly one of them, with the air of a man who was about to nonplus his antagonist, pronounced nounced this vigorous apostrophe—"Your Calvin indeed! what name will you give him when you shall be informed that he still owes fifteen-pence to the descendants of an innkeeper at Annecy, who wrote it down in his note-book, wherein it has never been effaced?" This declaration of fact, it seems, ended the controversy; for all the curates with an air of triumph applauded the superior skill of their brother, and declared they were fully convinced that the fifteen-pence of Calvin [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in favour of the Curate of Paris, and [illegible] the Reformation.

This publication takes its [illegible] an affecting and original love-story, which is introduced at almost the [illegible] of the second volume.

Family Sketches. 'A Novel.' By a Lady. 2 vols. 12mo. 6s.

THE story upon which this novel is founded does infinite credit to the invention of the authoress; and discovers a faculty which time and attention may greatly improve. The machinery, for in that view we consider all the personages of Mr Dudley's family, is extravagant with equal genius; and the conclusion in some parts rather lame and impotent. It is not often that we have to complain of a novel being too short, or its incidents too numerous, but, in the present instance, we think that the narration, in many parts of it, might have been happily [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] conclusion the [illegible] are made to happen in such quick [illegible] that their effect is always [illegible] and sometimes destroyed. Upon the whole, however, it possesses [illegible] merit. The style is easy and [illegible] the sentiments well suited to the [illegible] ters, the observations natural and [illegible] the moral framed to convince the [illegible] that although the storms of [illegible] may, for a time buffet the good man, [illegible] the path of virtue is the only road to happiness."

ACCOUNT of the TRIAL of WARREN HASTINGS, Esq. (late GOVERNOR-GENERAL of BENGAL), before the HIGH COURT of PARLIAMENT, for HIGH CRIMES and MISDEMEANORS.

THIRTY-NINTH DAY.
TUESDAY, MAY 5

THE prisoner having been brought to the Bar, and the Serjeant at Arms having, by the usual proclamation, called upon the Commons to make good their charges against Warren Hastings,

Mr Burke rose, and said, that in obedience to their Lordships proclamation, he would proceed to make good the charges brought against the prisoner at the bar by the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled. But before he should enter into the proofs of those charges, he begged leave to inform their Lordships, that since he had last had the honour of addressing them, an event had taken place, upon which it was extremely difficult for him to speak, but which at the same time it was impossible for him to pass over unnoticed: for the last sitting of the Court he had acquainted their Lordships, in the course of his speech, that the prisoner had murdered Nundcomar by the hands of Sir Elijah Impey. But this position he was no longer at liberty to support, for in what he had said upon it, he was disappointed and disowned by his principals—the House of Commons. Their Lordships were not therefore to expect that he would attempt to support, by evidence or assertion, which, however it might appear to himself to be well founded, was discountenanced by those who had ordered the prosecution, and had commissioned him to conduct it. It was the province of the House to command those who acted under its authority, and it was his duty to obey.

But at the same time that he professed his readiness to obey the commands of his principals, their Lordships, he hoped, would suffer him to say a word or two by way of apology for that part of his conduct which brought upon him the censure of those whose approbation it would be his ambition to obtain, and his study to deserve. When he said that Nundcomar had been murdered by Mr Hastings, he never could have meant to accuse the prisoner of the specific crime which the law called murder. He was a little too well acquainted with the laws of his country to entertain an idea, that murder was a crime which was to be tried by impeachment. What he meant, therefore, by the word murder was ſenſe in which he had uſed it, was not the crime which the law diſtinguiſhes by that name, but a crime which in reaſon and common ſenſe muſt be conſidered of at leaſt as great atrocity.

From all that he had learned by nine years enquiry into the adminiſtration of juſtice in Bengal, he had been ſo clearly convinced in his own mind that Nundcomar had been taken off ſolely for the purpoſe of throwing a diſcredit upon the charges brought by that unfortunate perſon againſt Mr Haſtings, that as long as he ſhould ſpeak his own private opinion, he would not heſitate to ſay, that Nundcomar had been murdered by Mr Haſtings. So deeply was this conviction rooted in his heart, after nine years enquiry and deliberation upon that ſubject, that it would be torn from him only with his life And therefore, though he was willing to admit that the word murder applied to the caſe of Nundcomar, did not convey the idea that he had conceived of that fatal event, ſtill he maintained, that as the poverty of our language did not afford any other word, more particularly deſcriptive of the crime which he thought might fairly be brought home to the priſoner, he had been reduced to the neceſſity of calling it a murder If he could diſcover any other word that would more forcibly convey his idea of the atrocity of the priſoner's guilt, he never would have uſed the word murder—he had been driven to it only by his not having been able to find a worſe

His private opinion, however, was not to ſtand in competition with the opinion of the Houſe of Commons, but to give way to it It was not for him to conſider how the Commons could have learnt in ſome few days that the reſult of nine years labour beſtowed by him upon this ſubject, did not furniſh a ground for charging Mr. Haſtings with having conſpired againſt the life of Nundcomar, as the only way to deſtroy the accuſation brought by that unfortunate man againſt Mr Haſtings.—It ſufficed that the Houſe of Commons had declared its opinion on that ſubject; whatever opinion ſhould be a law to him. And therefore he would not in the courſe of the trial ſay one word about the conviction and execution of Nundcomar, let them be urged ſo forcibly by the Priſoner againſt the credit of that perſon, unleſs the Commons ſhould give him freſh inſtructions on that head

Indeed it never was his intention to offer any proof to their Lordſhips reſpecting the circumſtances of the condemnation and execution of Nundcomar, except with a view to rebut the diſcredit which Mr Haſtings might be adviſed to endeavour to throw upon the accuſation brought againſt him by Nundcomar, by ſhewing that this man had afterwards been condemned and executed for forgery

That Mr Haſtings entertained an idea of diſcrediting the accuſation of Nundcomar by ſuch means, appeared from his own defence at the bar of the Houſe of Commons, where he actually declared it It was very natural therefore for him who was to manage the impeachment, to ſupport the credit of Nundcomar, whoſe teſtimony was one of the chief ſupports of the preſent article of charge relating to preſents

However, as the Commons had been pleaſed to cenſure him for having mentioned the death of Nundcomar as a charge againſt Mr. Haſtings, he would not attempt in the courſe of the trial to ſhew that Mr. Haſtings had any hand in that death He would leave it to be ſuppoſed that an execution, which at leaſt for that time put an end to a charge then pending againſt Mr Haſtings, and which was conſequently a moſt uſeful event to him, had been effected by a fortuitous coincidence of circumſtances, in which Mr. Haſtings had no concern, but from which, happening ſo very opportunely, he derived the greateſt advantage

He would ſuppoſe even that it was one of thoſe ſtrokes of Providence, which, as Mr Haſtings himſelf ſaid in his defence, the people of India ſuperſtitiouſly imagined always watched over his perſon, and conducted all his meaſures to their deſtined end he was willing to ſuppoſe that this Providence had cut off Nundcomar juſt at the moment when his death could be moſt ſerviceable to Mr. Haſtings.

Having made theſe preliminary obſervations, Mr Burke read the reſolution which was paſſed the preceding night by the Houſe of Commons.* From this reſolution, he ſaid, it appeared that he was reſtrained only from defending the credit of Nundcomar by proving that he was taken off by Mr Haſtings —But he was not reſtrained from defending the cre-

credit of Nundcomar by any other way Thus, though he was not left at liberty to prove that a Prime Minister of this great kingdom, who had under his ſole management a revenue of 1,500,000l a year, and who had been tried for a paltry forgery, ſuppoſed to have been committed eleven years before his trial, and under the authority of an Engliſh Act of Parliament paſſed after the pretended commiſſion of the crime, was proſecuted, not with a view to ſatisfy public juſtice, but to ſtop the courſe of it, ſtill he was at liberty to repel the attacks made by Mr Haſtings on the character of Nundcomar, by charging him with other forgeries, which had no connexion with the pretended crime for which he ſuffered death.

It was a maxim received in ſome of the revolutions of philoſophy, that when a limb was cut off from the human body, the ſtrength of the others were proportionably increaſed And therefore, ſaid Mr Burke, this one limb of your charge being cut off, the others will be proportionably ſtrengthened; and we ſhall proceed, even in our maimed ſtate, with more vigour and energy than we diſplayed before

He then begged their Lordſhips would not impute to the Houſe of Commons, or to their cauſe, any part of that weakneſs which belonged ſolely to him, their agent. Whatever was energetic, right, and regular, ſhould be imputed to the Commons, what was feeble, wrong, or irregular, ſhould be laid excluſively at his door The Commons, in cenſuring him, did not mean to throw the leaſt damp upon the impeachment, for though they had cenſured and diſavowed him, they had again ſent him to proſecute the ſame impeachment with the ſame colleagues againſt the ſame defendant, and at the ſame bar at which he had originally opened it. They had raiſed a theatre to Juſtice, on which the eyes of all the world were fixed, and in which the honour of the Commons and of the Britiſh name were deeply concerned. It was for the Commons who had brought the proſecution, becauſe they were convinced of the Priſoner's guilt, to ſpeak with confidence of it but it was the province of their Lordſhips to believe nothing advanced by them, that ſhould not be made out in proof

Having ſtated this, he obſerved that Mr. Haſtings [illegible] the bar of the Houſe of Commons, charged Nundcomar with having written two letters, one from Moonny Begum, the other from the Nabob Mubarek Dowlah. But at the [illegible] things defeated their [illegible] moment he brought them.—For he ſhewed that the proved forgery of a letter from Munny Begum was ſupported only by his own teſtimony—"I "have ſince been informed, ſays he, "that ſhe (Munny Begum) was totally "unacquainted with the uſe that had "been made of her name, till I informed her of it."—This aſſertion Mr Burke ſaid, reſted ſolely upon the authority of Mr. Haſtings himſelf, and ſupported by any one witneſs.—It was true, indeed, he referred to a witneſs for he ſaid in his defence—"Mr. Middleton, whom ſhe conſulted on the "occaſion, can atteſt the truth of this "ſtory"—But Mr. Haſtings ran no riſk in referring to Mr. Middleton, who could not contradict him—and for the very beſt reaſon, becauſe that Mr Middleton is dead.

The other charge reſpecting the forgery of a letter in the name of the Nabob YETRAM UL DOWLAH, was ſtill more extraordinary, for though Mr. Haſtings did not heſitate to call it a forgery, he admitted that he knew nothing of the matter, as appeared from his defence, where he ſays—"I "have not yet had the curioſity to en"quire of the Nabob Yetram ul "Dowlah, whether his letter was of "the ſame ſtamp; but I cannot doubt "it."

Mr. Burke adverted next to the preſents and bribes taken by Mr Haſtings. To prove that to take preſents in any ſhape, or on any account, was made penal in every ſervant of the Eaſt-India Company, he read the Act of Parliament, by which the penalty was impoſed, and he quoted a minute, written by Mr Haſtings himſelf, in which, ſpeaking of the bounty offered by Sujah ul Dowlah to the Company's troops who had aſſiſted him in the extermination of the Rohillas, he declared that the unlucky diſcovery of this Act of Parliament convinced him, that the troops could not accept of this bounty; he ſaid he would be glad to lay aſide the Act, but it was irreſiſtible.

Mr. Burke remarked, that if troops could not accept of a bounty from a Prince,

Prince, who by their bravery and blood had acquired millions, à fortiori, the Company's civil-ſervants were precluded from taking preſents.

But Mr Haſtings, it ſeemed, had made preſents and bribes a ſource of revenue, and had received them for the benefit of the Company But this, excluſive of the ſhameful idea of making up an exchequer of bribes, was a weak pretence, for it was a maxim in law, that when a man pays a ſum of money, and gets no conſideration for it, he can recover it by action Thus Mr Haſtings could be ſued by any individual for a ſum ſo paid to him; and if it had found its way into the Company's Treaſury, Mr Haſtings, after having been compelled to refund to the original donor, could recover of the Company all the monies that had been ſo lodged in their Treaſury Of this the Court of Directors were aware; for they ſent out orders to the priſoner to receive no private ſum on their account, and they bound themſelves to repay any that had been ſo received

Mr Burke took infinite pains to purſue through all their mazes what he called the arts of the priſoner to conceal the ſums he had privately received, and to diſguiſe them under falſe accounts. We cannot pretend to follow him through all his ſtatements, interſperſed with various references to letters written by the priſoner on the ſame accounts, and all contradictory He inſtanced the accounts of three lacks of rupees, which were deſcribed in one account as the joint property of the Company and the priſoner, two belonging to the former, and one to the latter In another account the three lacks were deſcribed as the ſole property of the Company;—and in a third account as the excluſive property of Mr Haſtings Now it was pretty remarkable, that though at firſt the Company was repreſented as the owner of two thirds of this ſum, Mr Haſtings took the Company's bonds for the whole—And though in the third account he ſtated the money to be his own, he ſaid he afterwards indorſed the bonds to the Company, meaning thereby to declare that they did not belong to him Theſe different prevaricating accounts proved, he ſaid, that the views of Mr Haſtings in taking the money originally were corrupt

Mr Burke touched next upon the bribe of three lacks received by Mr Haſtings from RAJAH NOBEKISSEN. The priſoner's own account of the tranſaction was as follows—"In the "year 1783, when I was actually in "want of a ſum of money for my pri"vate expences, owing to the Com"pany not having at that time ſuffi"cient caſh in their Treaſury to pay "my ſalary, I borrowed three lacks "of rupees of RAJAH NOBEKISSEN, an "inhabitant of Calcutta, whom I de"ſired to call upon me with a bond "properly filled up he did ſo; but "at the time I was going to execute it, "he entreated I would rather accept "the money than execute the bond. "I neither accepted the offer nor re"fuſed it, and my determination upon "it remained ſuſpended between the "alternative of keeping the money as "a loan to be repaid, and of taking it "and applying it, as I had done other "ſums, to the Company's uſe. And "there the matter reſted till I under"took my journey to Lucknow, when "I determined to accept the money to "the Company's uſe," &c

Mr Burke ſaid, that the obſervation which was applied to the fair ſex, "That the woman who deliberates is "undone,"—might be applied to a perſon to whom a bribe is offered, for whoever deliberates about taking is ſure to take it in the end, as was the caſe with Mr. Haſtings The generoſity of the noble-minded Rajah Nobekiſſen overcame him This Nobekiſſen was a Banyan; and if there was any thing more flinty, more griping, more thrifty, or more careful to improve the value of money than a Jew, it was a Gentoo Baryan, or Money Broker. And yet ſuch a man refuſed a bond for his money, and entreated it might be taken as a preſent Their Lordſhips would of courſe expect, after ſuch a tranſaction, to hear of this Nobekiſſen again, and ſo they would, for he had been appointed to the collection of the revenue of a large diſtrict, and was behind-hand in his payments to the Company, in at leaſt as large a ſum as was that which, no doubt for corrupt purpoſes, he had given to the priſoner

Mr Burke next adverted to the preſent of 100,000l. received by the Priſoner from the Nabob of Oude, which he diſcovered, becauſe, as he had ſaid himſelf, it was of a magnitude not to be concealed, and which he defined the

Compan

Company would give to him as a reward for his ſervices, or, as he ſhould have ſaid, for his falſe, fraudulent, covenous, and prevaricating accounts

The laſt thing on which Mr. Burke touched was the letter written by Mr. Haſtings from Cheltenham to the Court of Directors, in which he endeavoured to avoid giving the account which they preſſed him to give, of all the ſums privately received by him for their uſe, together with the names of the perſons from whom he received them. This letter Mr Burke deſcribed as ſui generis, as unique in its kind, and not to be paralleled in the annals of mankind

At 20 minutes paſt four o'clock, Mr Burke ſaid he would not detain their Lordſhips any longer that day: There remained, he ſaid, very little more for him to ſay in the opening of this charge; and he aſſured them he ſhould be able to ſay it in a very ſhort ſpace of time the next day of meeting; and then he ſaid he would proceed to give in evidence, irrefragable proofs of all that he had alledged at his opening.

Mr Burke then ſat down, and their Lordſhips adjourned from the Hall to the Upper Houſe of Parliament.

FORTIETH DAY

THURSDAY, May 7

Mr Burke reſumed the ſubject of the bribes taken by Mr Haſtings. Some of theſe, he ſaid, were, according to the Priſoner's own words, "of a magnitude that could not be concealed;" and therefore as he knew that ſome account of them would reach the ears of the Directors, he thought he would have ſome merit to plead to the Court, by making the diſcovery himſelf But he reſolved at the ſame time to make it in ſuch a way as would, in his opinion, baffle all enquiry, and ultimately conceal what it appeared to be the object of the diſcovery to reveal

Accordingly, the account he gave of the preſents was ſo obſcure, that the Court of Directors could not ſee their way through it—if Mr Haſtings ever gave any explanation, it was to puzzle the firſt account, and to add obſcurity to that which had but too much before.

His memory being weak, he was reduced to the neceſſity of gueſſing what might have been his motives for concealing at firſt the receipt of the ſums in queſtion, and for making the Company debtor to him for its own money—and after having diſtinguiſhed gueſſes in the room of accounts, he confeſſed, in his famous letter from Cheltenham, that he was not ſure that the motives which he gueſſed had influenced him were thoſe by which he had actually been influenced.

Mr. Burke ſaid that when a myſtery was thrown over accounts, to conceal from thoſe who ought to inſpect them, he ſuſpected that it was uſed for the ſole purpoſe of covering a fraud.—He admitted that there might be occaſions when the accounts of a nation might with propriety be kept from the eyes even of perſons filling conſiderable offices under Government; but there could not occur any one caſe in which it would be proper to keep accounts from the knowledge of thoſe who were at the head of the executive government. And therefore he preſumed that Mr. Haſtings was conſcious of guilt, when he with-held from the Court of Directors the account of the receipt and expenditure of money which belonged to the Company, and which it was their department to direct and controul. Mr Haſtings might be ſaid to with-hold the accounts in queſtion from the knowledge of the Directors, when he gave them only ſuch accounts as they could not underſtand, and when he explained them only in ſuch a manner as to render them, if poſſible, ſtill more obſcure.

Concealment ſeemed to be the wiſh of his heart: when he was called upon in India by the Court of Directors to give thoſe accounts, his anſwer was, that he would give them ſatisfactorily on his return to England But when he did return, and the Directors again preſſed for the accounts, he referred them to India, where, he ſaid, were the only accounts of the preſents that were in exiſtence: to his own memory he could not truſt one moment; but he believed Mr Larkins, the Company's Accountant-General, was poſſeſſed of all the particulars relating to thoſe preſents Thus did Mr Haſtings always ſet one half of the Globe between the queſtions put to him and his anſwers For when he was in India, he always ſaid that it was in England he could ſatisfy the wiſhes of the Directors; but when in England, he ſaid it was only in India they could procure the accounts they were ſo anxious to obtain.

The

The Directors having been thus referred to Mr Larkins, sent him orders to transmit to them particular accounts of all the sums of money privately received by Mr Haſtings for the uſe of the Company, and paid into the hands of Mr. Larkins.

The anſwer of Mr Larkins was to have diſpelled the myſtery which hung upon this buſineſs, but unfortunately it left it involved in its original obſcurity, for it was nothing leſs than ſatisfactory —The account contained in this anſwer might be called Geographical and Chronological, but by no means ſatisfactory. It ſtated the places where the money was paid, and the times when it was received, but ſaid not a ſyllable about the perſons by whom it was given, or the purpoſe for which it was advanced

Some things, however, were to be found in this anſwer, which would lead their Lordſhips to preſume, that the account given by Mr Larkins, though it could not be thought to contain all that Mr Larkins knew of the matter, was very far from being a full account of all the bribes and preſents received by Mr, Haſtings. Some part of the account tranſmitted by Mr Larkins, was ſtated by that gentleman to have been read to him out of a Perſian paper, by a Perſian Agent of Mr. Haſtings; but it did not ſtate that the ſum mentioned in the part of the paper to read, was the only one of which that paper contained an account

It was evident alſo, from the account ſent over by Mr Larkins, that Mr Haſtings had not a Superintendant General of bribes, to whom all the inferior agents, employed in this buſineſs, gave particular accounts of the ſums raiſed by them for the uſe of Mr Haſtings, or, to adopt his own idea, for the Company Mr Haſtings was too careful to truſt too much to one man; he had agents of every country, complexion, and religion, but no two of them were acquainted with the buſineſs which their principal was carrying on: each thought himſelf the only one truſted in money matters, though the number actually truſted was very conſiderable.

It appeared alſo, from the account made up by Mr Larkins, that if it had not been for him, who had reminded Mr Haſtings, that he had promiſed to ſend home ſome accounts to the Court of Directors, even ſome of the memorandums out of which Mr Larkins formed a part of his anſwer, would never have been collected from ſome of the Priſoner's Black agents

Their Lordſhips might well be ſurpriſed that Mr Larkins, into whoſe hands, as the Company's Accountant-General, Mr Haſtings boaſted he had paid many of the ſums received by him for the Company's uſe, ſhould have made no obſervation upon the very irregular conduct of the Priſoner, who paying into the Company's Treaſury the Company's own money as he called it, took bonds for that very money payable to himſelf, thus making the Company his debtor for their own money

There was one circumſtance more to be found in Mr. Larkins' account, which muſt convince their Lordſhips, that the ſyſtem of bribery was carried on in a manner which ſhewed that it would be an Herculean taſk to deſtroy it —Mr Larkins ſaid, that if he himſelf had been ſuſpected of perjury, he would not have made out the account, and even in that caſe he would not have done it, if he had not had the permiſſion of Mr Haſtings to reveal what he knew of the buſineſs.

Such was the bond of union by which all thoſe were engaged to each other, who had any ſhare in the buſineſs of bribes and peculation, that the ſenſe even of public duty could not ſhake it, and even the Company's Accountant-General would not tranſmit to his maſters their own accounts, if he had not firſt obtained the leave of Mr Haſtings to obey the lawful orders of his ſuperior. Thus did theſe gentlemen couple a nice ſenſe of honour with infamous peculation, private fidelity with public treachery, and patriotiſm with meaſures which tended to deſtroy the character and honour of their country

Mr Burke entered into a minute detail of the peculations in Dinachpore, from whoſe Rajah 30,000*l.* had been extorted He touched upon the bribes received by Gunga Govin Sing, and by Mr. Haſtings's black agent Canto Baboo. The former was by contract to have raiſed a large ſum in another diſtrict, but did not pay above one-half of it: ſo that between two different agents, who were to have raiſed 90,000*l.* only 50,000*l.* were acknowledged to be paid into the Company's Treaſury The remaining 40,000*l.* either found its way into the pocket of Mr Haſtings, or into thoſe of his agents.

He

He next remarked upon the conduct of Mr Haſtings, who had complained to the Houſe of Commons that the enormities committed by Devy Sing, had been aſcribed to him But notwithſtanding the complaints of the Priſoner, the guilt imputed to him in theſe tranſactions ſhould be brought home to him. And this led him to ſpeak of the written teſtimonies to his character procured lately from India by the Priſoner. One of them was from the Rajah of Dinachpore, who beſtowed the higheſt encomiums on Mr's Haſtings, and bore teſtimony to his honourable, juſt, and equitable conduct towards the ſaid Rajah, during his adminiſtration in India

Mr Burke begged their Lordſhips would give him leave to ſtate briefly the hiſtory of that Rajah —This noble perſon was the ſon of the late Rajah of Dinachpore, who having no legitimate male iſſue, and being on bad terms with his brother, adopted his natural ſon, to exclude the brother from the ſucceſſion This ſon, at the death of his father, was ſcarcely ſix years old. It was not clear, that by the Gentoo laws the deceaſed Rajah could have adopted this child, whilſt he himſelf had living a legitimate brother. However, the adoption was confirmed by the Engliſh government, and Gunga Govin Sing was appointed to adminiſter the Zemindary during the noble youth's minority Under this Miniſter, all the friends and relations of the young Rajah were removed from about his perſon, and the infamous monſter Devy Sing was thought a proper inſtrument to be appointed by Gunga Govin Sing, the friend or creature of Mr Haſtings, Governor to the young Lord, and to be entruſted with his education It was then, and in the country of his pupil, that Devy Sing did thoſe acts of barbarity, which ſhould be given in evidence to their Lordſhips The Rajah himſelf was plundered of upwards of 30,000l and yet it was from a perſon ſo treated that Mr Haſtings had lately procured an honourable teſtimony of his character*.

But ſo far were the Managers from being alarmed by this teſtimony, that they would themſelves produce it in evidence. The Rajah, as Mr Burke had ſaid before, was ſcarcely ſix years old when he ſucceeded to the Zemindary, and he was little more than Seven when Mr Haſtings left Bengal. Thus it was from a boy that this teſtimony was procured, which related to the meaſures of government that took place whilſt he was a child

The other honourable teſtimony in favour of Mr Haſtings, was from a perſon who, it ſhould be made appear to their Lordſhips, had been robbed of one lack and a half of rupees

But though theſe teſtimonials had been obtained from perſons who could not be proved to have been plundered; ſtill little dependence could be had upon teſtimonies procured from natives of India who did not dare to think differently from their tyrannic rulers.

This was vouched by Sir Elijah himſelf, who, in one of his letters, which ſhould be laid before their Lordſhips, ſaid that no attention ought to be paid to the letters or petitions or addreſſes of the natives of India in favour of their rulers —" Addreſſes," ſaid the letter, " are procured in England through " influence—in India through force"

Having finiſhed all his remarks upon the different heads of the charge, Mr. Burke concluded with a handſome addreſs to the Court

" My Lords, ſaid he, this proſecution is not brought merely for the " purpoſe of bringing down puniſhment upon Warren Haſtings, and " preventing future peculations in " India it ought to be conſidered as " a great cenſorial proſecution, inſtituted for the purpoſe of guarding " Great Britain from the vices of Aſia. " The people of this country have often been repreſented as unſocial, " cold, phlegmatic, and diſtant but " their greateſt enemies have always " admitted that they were open, honeſt, " candid and ingenuous But ſhould " the ſubjects of Great Britain who " ſerve in India be ſuffered to purſue " any longer the maxims of Aſia, they " will bring home her vices as well as

* Here Mr Burke dilated exceedingly—his intention was only to " open a package of " guilt againſt the culprit, in order that it might get air, be ventilated, and perform quarantine "

" Mr Haſtings would call upon the mountains to cover him A Court of Juſtice was " an element in which he could not live, and his only ſanctuary was to appeaſe the perſe- " verance of his proſecutors "

" her wealth, and both will over-run " the land Thoſe vices, if they are " ſuffered to ſpread, will deſtroy the " genius and character of the people, " who will become like the Aſiatics, " reſerved, diſſembling, plotting, trea- " cherous and perfidious "

" But, my Lords, it is not for our " manners only or our morals that we " have to fear, but alſo for our liberty " If the vices of the Eaſt would cor- " rupt the former, its wealth would " utterly deſtroy the latter An intel- " ligent Poet hath ſaid—

—Obnum metuenda poteſtas

" From the wealth of Aſia our liberty " may apprehend its ruin—a deluge " of Aſiatic ſpoilers and delinquents " may pour into the Senate, and cor- " rupt the ſources of our Conſtitution " To day the Commons are proſecu- " ting Aſiatic delinquents—to-mor " row thoſe delinquents may be the " Commons Do you, my Lords, " ſtand forward the defenders of our " Conſtitution, and let the LIBERTY " of the COMMONS be preſerved by " the JUSTICE of the LORDS "

Here Mr Burke concluded

The Managers then withdrew to conſult about the mode of proceeding —They returned in a few minutes, and Mr Adam ſaid that the Managers had to propoſe two things to their Lordſhips' conſideration, with the adoption of either of which the Commons would be ſatisfied The Right Hon Manager who had juſt concluded, had open- ed the charge generally, and it was in- tended that another Hon Manager ſhould enter more minutely into ſome parts reſpecting the concealed bribes, upon which the Right Hon Manager had touched but ſlightly Now what he had to propoſe was, either that the Manager to whom he alluded ſhould begin then, or elſe that the Managers ſhould produce their evidence as far as it related to the ſums received by Mr Haſtings from Munny Begum, and from the others mentioned in the charge brought by Nundcomar, and that the Hon. Manager ſhould afterwards pro- ceed to open the detail of the other bribes.

The Lord Chancellor ſaid it was a mere point of order, which he would leave entirely to the diſcretion of the Managers

They agreed after ſome converſation, to produce their evidence

Mr Grey then ſaid, that the Com- mons would ſhew that there did exiſt ſuch abuſes in India, with reſpect to the taking of preſents, that the Court of Directors were obliged to ſend out inſtructions on that head, ſtrictly for- bidding all their ſervants to take pre- ſents under any pretext Theſe in- ſtructions were produced and read

A letter of minute was alſo read, which was written by Lord Clive, in which he propoſed, that a certain al- lowance ſhould be allotted in future to every Preſident or Governor of Bengal, in lieu of the emoluments that he might expect to make by trade, from which he was to be precluded, and in lieu of preſents, which he was not, under any pretence, to receive An OATH was alſo framed by Lord Clive, by which the Governor was to bind himſelf not to take a preſent of any kind, or ſuf- fer it to be taken for him And to ſet all future Governors an example, Lord Clive, who framed the oath, voluntari- ly took it himſelf at the Council Board It appeared alſo, that Governor Vereliſt and Governor Cartier took the ſame oath, or, as it is called in the minutes, " the oath of office "—But it was proved by Mr Hudſon, one of the Clerks from the India Houſe, that he could not diſ- cover, from the Company's records, that Mr Haſtings had taken this oath

The Managers next produced bonds ſigned by Mr Haſtings, in which he cove- nanted not to accept of any preſent whatever

They produced afterwards a letter from the Court of Directors to the Pre- ſident and Council of Bengal, in which they complained that the more pains they had taken to prevent the receipt of preſents, the more they found that pre- ſents were received They then com- municated their intention to apply to Parliament for their aid to ſuppreſs this evil

And laſtly, the Managers referred to the regulating Act of 1774, which contains a poſitive and peremptory pro- viſion on the article of preſents, which were forbid under penalties

Mr Grey was going to produce a minute written by Mr Haſtings, to ſhew in how ſtrict a ſenſe that gentleman himſelf underſtood that proviſion of the Act, but was ſtopped by the Lord Chan- cellor, who finding that it was five o'clock, thought it was time for the Houſe to adjourn A motion of ad- journment was accordingly made, and their Lordſhips immediately adjourned to their own Houſe

JOURNAL of the PROCEEDINGS of the SIXTH SESSION of the SIXTEENTH PARLIAMENT of GREAT BRITAIN.

HOUSE of LORDS.

MONDAY, MAY 18

THE order for ſummoning the Lords being read,

Earl Stanhope roſe, and obſerved, that their Lordſhips muſt recollect he had, on a former day, during the progreſs of the Regency Bill, expreſſed his diſapprobation of ſome penal ſtatutes reſpecting religious opinions, and an occaſional neglect of divine worſhip To this ſubject he would now again call the attention of the Houſe, as it was a matter of conſiderable moment Many of the Acts on the Statute book were very oppreſſive and intolerant, and indeed reflected diſgrace on the times in which they were enacted, and on the legiſlature who had given them their ſanction Some of them were ſo abſurd, as to excite ſentiments of ridicule rather than of indignation It was his intention to ſtate the ſubſtance of the moſt abſurd Acts on this head, and he truſted, that on the ſmalleſt degree of conſideration, every one of their Lordſhips would give their vote in favour of the bill which he meant to ſubmit to them, for relieving the public from ſuch ſtatutes There was an Act made in the firſt year of Queen Elizabeth, which purported that all who abſent themſelves from church ſhall be fined one ſhilling for every time of ſuch abſence This, he ſaid, was a ſpecies of robbery, which he hoped would no longer be ſanctioned But the next ſtatute he would mention, was far more ſevere; which ordained, that every one who miſſes church for a month, ſhall either be impriſoned, or (if the Court ſhall think proper) ſhall forfeit two thirds of his lands, tenements, and hereditaments This Act was a convincing proof of the ſuperſtitious and oppreſſive ſpirit of the age that produced it — It was enacted by another ſtatute, that thoſe perſons who go to Court before they have taken the oaths, may be treated as popiſh recuſants Many of their Lordſhips, and perhaps the whole Bench of Biſhops, had, he believed, been guilty of this offence, and he therefore had no doubt of the concurrence of that pious and reſpectable Bench in the object of his bill, for, as the Act now ſtood, he could bring down the vengeance of the law upon their heads, and ſweep them at once from the Houſe as popiſh recuſants — It was alſo enacted, that ſuch as entertain in their houſe ſervants who have not been to church for a month, or viſitors (and even the ſervants of ſuch viſitors) who have been ſo abſent from public worſhip, are as liable to the penalties of non-attendance as if they themſelves had been abſent for that period. The Act of the 23th of Elizabeth ordered, that thoſe who were abſent from church for a certain time, ſhould be committed to priſon till they did go He quoted St Matthew in ſupport of an opinion he had always maintained, that devotion did not conſiſt in outward ſhow, but in inward feeling, and, on this ground, to compel by law a attendance on public worſhip was repugnant to the true principles of chriſtianity The 25th of Elizabeth alſo enacted, that a ſon ſhould be deprived of an eſtate that he had previouſly received from his father, and of which he was in full poſſeſſion, if the father ſhould happen to commit any offence which might ſubject him to eccleſiaſtical penalties or diſabilities This went beyond even the moſt rigorous of civil laws, for, even in caſes of high treaſon, a ſon loſes only thoſe eſtates which he would otherwiſe have inherited from his father, not thoſe of which he is already in poſſeſſion — The Act of the 27th of James I left it open for a perſon to lay information for non attendance in different counties at the ſame time; an abſurdity that was flagrant in the extreme The 5th of Elizabeth gave a licenſe to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to preſcribe the time, as well as proportion, in which fleſh was to be eaten It might be ſaid, that ſome of theſe laws had expired, which, indeed, was the caſe, but the ſpirit of them remained in the eccleſiaſtical laws now in force in the Spiritual Courts, by which a perſon, for the offences above-mentioned, may be excommunicated, and deprived of the common rights of a citizen.

His Lordſhip then proceeded to other ſtatutes, one of which impoſed ſeveral penalties for practiſing the arts of magic and incantation Another ſtatute iſſued the thunder of the law againſt thoſe who gave animal or vegetable food to evil ſpirits, or who held any converſation with thoſe beings. By another Act, marrying a widow was deemed bigamy as much as marrying two wives, which induced a wag of the Temple to obſerve, that as this Act was ſuch a diſcouragement to the expectations of widows, it might be called an Act for keeping widows at ſhort commons His Lordſhip then levelled his ſatire againſt the Canons of the church; but they are not binding on the laity, nor indeed, as he contended, on the clergy at preſent abſurdity and intolerance, ought to be repealed It was unneceſſary to dwell much on the effects of general toleration, the defence of which was happineſs to ſociety Here his Lordſhip was led to give the opinion of Lord Mansfield upon the right of individuals to unbounded toleration: that great man had ſaid, "That the conſcience of man is not controllible by human law, and that all reſtraints upon religious opinions have, from the earlieſt periods, been calculated to make nothing but hypocrites and martyrs, nor was there to be found from the common law of the land, which is founded on the good ſenſe and uniform cuſtom of mankind, any thing like countenance to the ſlighteſt reſtraint upon the religious opinions of mankind" From this it was evident, that all the eccleſiaſtical reſtraints which have been from time to time impoſed, have owed their origin to ſtatute law, and are only to be done away by repealing thoſe ſtatutes which gave them birth This was the view with which he ſhould introduce his bill the contents of which were, that no perſon ſhall hereafter be liable to any pains, penalties, diſabilities, or forfeitures, on account of his not attending divine worſhip that no perſon ſhall be liable to any pains, penalties, &c for eating any food, &c The ſame exception or liberty he gave to other points, of which he had taken notice This bill was founded on this general maxim, viz that the right of private judgment is an unalienable right in man This was a maxim, which he believed would be as uncontested, as it is in itſelf incontestible! He had drawn a line of diſcrimination between Papiſts and Roman Catholic Diſſenters, for though the former blend political with religious opinions, the latter conſider and avow theſe two points, viz religion and politics, to be diſtinct and ſeparate To the Papiſts, therefore, his bill did not extend, to the Catholic Diſſenters it did extend The bill did not extend to the 13th of William III becauſe that affects the Crown The Teſt and Corporation Acts his bill did not touch, becauſe theſe, in a great degree, regarded civil and not religious rights Theſe points he ſhould leave for diſcuſſion upon any other occaſion, and if it ſhould ever take place, he ſhould recommend to their Lordſhips, and all others who may feel themſelves intereſted in the ſubject, to peruſe a pamphlet, entitled, "The Rights of the Proteſtant Diſſenters to a complete toleration vindicated"

From what he had ſtated, it could not remain a doubt that laws pregnant with ſuch

It had been ſaid, when he mentioned this ſubject three months ago, that as theſe laws were wholly diſuſed, it was unneceſſary to repeal them But he would contend, that the prelate who had made this remark (the Biſhop of Saliſbury) was wrong in principle, in law and in fact If they were abſurd, they ought to be expunged from the ſtatute-book, whether they were enforced or not, but the fact was, that ſome of them had been put in force within theſe few years

His Lordſhip concluded with moving that his bill be received, read a firſt time, and printed, which motions were aſſented to

FRIDAY, May 22

The Duke of Leeds laid, by his Majeſty's command, upon their Lordſhips table, a copy of the Treaty of Defenſive Alliance concluded between his Majeſty and the King of Pruſſia

Lord Stormont called upon his Grace to declare, whether there did not exiſt other articles of offenſive alliance between this country and Pruſſia, which were not communicated along with thoſe on the table

The Duke of Leeds declared he conſidered his Lordſhip as ſtanding too high in the Corps Diplomatic to ſuppoſe he ſeriouſly expected an anſwer to ſuch a queſtion, and declared he would make no other reply

Lord Stormont then declared himſelf grounded in giving credit to thoſe rumours, which were too generally ſpread abroad His Lordſhip next commented on the nature of the Treaty now laid before them, which his Lordſhip contended bore a very different aſpect when coupled with another of a quite contrary tendency, which might involve us in the war now raging in Europe —His Lordſhip alſo reprobated the policy of this Treaty itſelf, as forwarding the intereſts of a French ally, the Swedes, and deſerting our natural connexion, the Ruſſians

The Lord Chancellor replied to Lord Stormont —He juſtified the Duke of Leeds giving no other anſwer, and as to turning our backs upon Ruſſia, he obſerved that when circumſtances tended in ſome meaſure to vary the face of politics, and alter the balance of power in Europe, it became incumbent on this country to take ſuch ſteps as might be deemed moſt applicable to that variation of political equilibrium He threw out an inſinuation that ſome people ſeemed to act as the agent of ſome foreign Miniſter, and wiſhed to feel the pulſe of Government by throwing out ſuſpicions and ſurmiſes

Lord Stormont ſaid he was perſuaded the noble Lord could not allude to him, reſpecting the feeling the pulſe of Government, it was true he poſſeſſed and valued the friendſhip of ſeveral foreign Miniſters, but he derived none of his information from ſuch quarters —Adjourned

[No public buſineſs was agitated during the remainder of this month; and on the 28th the Houſe adjourned to Monday the 8th of June]

HOUSE

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6

THE order of the day was read for a Committee of the whole House to consider of the Bill for repealing Mr Bearcroft's County Election Act

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he did not mean to oppose the Bill of Repeal, but he still hoped that the principle of keeping a register of the names of freeholders would not be abandoned

Mr Crew hoped that the expence which had attended Mr Bearcroft's Bill might be defrayed out of the public money, not by a County Rate

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in reply to Mr Crew, whose proposition, he said, deserved some consideration He hoped that Gentlemen would postpone any motion on that subject, till the report of the Bill of Repeal should be brought up

THURSDAY, MAY 7

The Hon. Mr Villiers presented a petition in behalf of the Catholic Dissenters of this country, praying such relief as the House should in their wisdom think proper to grant them

The petition was received, and ordered to lie on the table *

FRIDAY

* The petition was as follows

The humble petition of the persons whose names are hereunto subscribed, on behalf of themselves and others, Catholic Dissenters of England,

Sheweth,

That sentiments unfavourable to your petitioners, as citizens and subjects, have been entertained by English Protestants, and that your petitioners are subject to various penal laws, on account of principles which are asserted to be maintained by your petitioners, and other persons of their religion, and which principles are dangerous to society, and totally repugnant to political and civil liberty

That your petitioners think it a duty, which they owe to their country as well as to themselves, to protest in a formal and solemn manner against doctrines that they condemn, and that constitute no part whatever of their principles, religion, or belief

That your petitioners are the more anxious to free themselves from such imputations, because divers Protestants, who profess themselves to be real friends to liberty of conscience, have nevertheless avowed themselves hostile to your petitioners, on account of the opinions which your petitioners are so supposed to hold, and your petitioners do not blame those Protestants for their hostility, if it proceeds (as your petitioners hope it does) not from an intolerant spirit in matters of religion, but from their being misinformed as to matters of fact.

That your petitioners acknowledge that they should merit the reproach of being dangerous enemies to the state, if it were true, that they had adopted the maxims that are erroneously imputed to them, but your petitioners detest those unchristianlike and execrable maxims; and your petitioners severally claim (in common with men of all other religions) as a matter of natural justice, that your petitioners ought not to suffer for, or on account of any wicked or erroneous doctrines that may have been holden, or that may be held by any foreign Roman Catholics, which doctrines your petitioners publicly disclaim, any more than any of the British Protestants ought to be rendered responsible for any dangerous doctrines that may be held by any foreign Protestants, which doctrines they, the said British Protestants, disavow.

I That your petitioners have been accused of holding as a principle of their religion, That Princes excommunicated by the Pope and Council, or by authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or other persons —But so far is the above mentioned unchristianlike and abominable position from being a principle that your petitioners hold, that they reject, abhor, and detest it, and every part thereof, as execrable and impious, and your petitioners do solemnly declare, That neither the Pope either with or without a General Council, nor any prelate, nor any priest, nor any assembly of prelates or priests, nor any ecclesiastical power whatever, can absolve the subjects of this realm, or any of them, from their allegiance to his Majesty King George the Third, who is, by authority of the legislature, the lawful King of this realm, and of all the dominions thereunto belonging

II That your petitioners have also been accused of holding as a principle of their religion, That implicit obedience is due from them to the orders and decrees of Popes and General Councils, and that therefore, if the Pope or any General Council should, for the good of the church, command your petitioners to take up arms against government, or by any means to subvert the laws and liberties of this country, or to exterminate persons of a different religion from your petitioners, the accusers of your petitioners assert, that your petitioners

Mr Beaufoy rose to make his promised motion in favour of the Protestant Dissenters He should not, he said, have again trespassed on the indulgence of the House upon this subject, if he did not con-

petitioners hold themselves bound to obey such orders or decrees on pain of eternal fire — Whereas your petitioners positively deny, That they owe any such obedience to the Pope and General Council, or to either of them: And your petitioners believe that no act that is in itself immoral or dishonest can ever be justified by or under colour that it is done either for the good of the church, or in obedience to any ecclesiastical power whatever Your petitioners acknowledge no infallibility in the Pope, and they neither apprehend nor believe, that their disobedience to any such orders or decrees (should any such be given or made) could subject your petitioners to any punishment whatsoever —That your petitioners do solemnly declare, That no church, nor any prelate, nor any priest, nor any assembly of prelates or priests, nor any ecclesiastical power whatever, hath, have, or ought to have any jurisdiction or authority whatsoever within this realm, that can, directly or indirectly, affect, or interfere with the independence, sovereignty, laws, constitution, or government thereof, or the rights, liberties, persons or properties, of the people of the said realm, or of any of them, save only and except by the authority of Parliament; and that any such assumption of power would be an usurpation

III That your petitioners have likewise been accused of holding, as principles of their religion, That the Pope, by virtue of his spiritual power, can dispense with the obligations of any compact or oath, taken or entered into by any person of the religion of your petitioners, that therefore, no oath of allegiance, or other oath, can bind your petitioners, and consequently, that your petitioners can give no security for their allegiance to any government — That your petitioners admit that this conclusion would be just, if the original proposition upon which it is founded were true But your petitioners positively deny, that they hold any such principle, and they do solemnly declare, that neither the Pope, nor any prelate, nor any priest, nor any assembly of prelates or priests, nor any ecclesiastical power whatever, can absolve your petitioners, or any of them, from, or can previously or subsequently dispense with, the obligation of any compact or oath whatsoever

IV That your petitioners have also been accused of holding, as a principle of their religion, That not only the Pope, but even a priest, has power, at his will and pleasure, to pardon the sins of persons of the religion of your petitioners, and therefore, that no person of the religion of your petitioners, can possibly give any security for his allegiance to any government, inasmuch as the Pope or a priest can pardon perjury, rebellion, and high treason —That your petitioners acknowledge also the justness of the conclusion, if the proposition on which it is founded were not totally false —But your petitioners do solemnly declare, That on the contrary, they believe that no sin whatever can be forgiven at the will of any Pope, or of any priest, or of any person whomsoever —But that a sincere sorrow for past sins, a firm resolution to avoid future guilt, and every possible atonement to God, and the injured neighbour, are the previous and indispensible requisites to establish a well founded expectation of forgiveness

V That your petitioners have also been accused of holding as a principle of their religion, That "faith is not to be kept with heretics;" so that no government which does not profess the same religion as your petitioners, can have any security from your petitioners for their allegiance and peaceable behaviour —But your petitioners reject, reprobate and abhor the doctrine, That "faith is not to be kept with heretics," as being contrary to religion, morality, and common honesty And your petitioners do hold and solemnly declare, that no breach of faith with, or injury to, or hostility against, any person whomsoever, can ever be justified by reason of or under pretence that such person is an heretic or an infidel

That your petitioners further solemnly declare, That they do make this declaration and protestation, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of the same, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever —And that your petitioners humbly conceive, that your petitioners, who thus solemnly disclaim, and from their hearts abhor, the above-mentioned abominable and unchristianlike principles, ought not to be put on a level with any other men who may hold and profess those principles

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray, that the Honourable House will be pleased to grant such relief to your petitioners, as this Honourable House in its wisdom shall deem to be just

A protestation or declaration to the same effect as the above petition, has been signed by a considerable number of Catholic Dissenters No repeal of the Popery laws is intended to be prayed for, but only an exemption to a certain extent, from their effects, in favour of the protesting Catholic Dissenters

ceive that the ſtrongeſt reaſons exiſted for another application to Parliament, for a repeal of part of the Teſt and Corporation Acts The body of men in whoſe cauſe he was now an humble advocate, were as much diſtinguiſhed by their integrity, loyalty, and peaceable deportment, as the adherents to the eſtabliſhed church Their numbers were alſo great, and their conſequence, both as individuals and as a body, undoubted It was not, however, on their numbers or general reſpectability that they relied for ſucceſs in the preſent application, but on the juſtice of their cauſe They conſidered themſelves as aggrieved by the two Acts above-mentioned they complained of thoſe penal diſqualifications, which prevented them from accepting any employment under the executive Government, or any concern in the management of Commercial Corporations, without receiving the Sacrament, and alſo from entering into the army or navy, without taking the Sacramental Oath They juſtly deemed it a great hardſhip that they ſhould be debarred of the common right of Citizens, and ſubjected to undeſerved diſabilities, and unmerited diſhonour But he truſted that this ſtigma would not long remain The two Acts in queſtion were originally intended againſt the Roman Catholics, as being, from their principles, the moſt obnoxious to the eſtabliſhed religion But as Catholics were ſufficiently excluded from offices by the oath of abjuration, theſe Acts were not neceſſary as a check to them, and on what principle of rational policy they were ſuffered to operate to the excluſion of the whole body of Proteſtant Diſſenters (except the Quakers, who are otherwiſe diſqualified, as they take no oaths) he was at a loſs to conceive He referred to hiſtory, to prove that the Diſſenters had in general acted with loyalty and ſubmiſſion to Government, and that they were even liberal in their pecuniary encouragement to the miniſters of the eſtabliſhed worſhip He further obſerved, that it was a profanation of religion to make a religious act a qualification for a civil employment, and that it was an encouragement to Diſſenters, rather than loſe an office, to take the Sacrament, which, under ſuch motives and circumſtances, muſt be unworthily received By theſe, and a variety of other remarks, Mr Beaufoy ſupported his motion for a repeal of the parts of the Corporation and Teſt Act which require the ſacramental oath to be taken by all thoſe who enter into his Majeſty's ſervice, and the Sacrament upon accepting an office.

Sir Henry Houghton ſeconded the motion. He conjured the Houſe not to withhold from Diſſenters that participation of the rights of citizens, to which they had a juſt claim.

Lord North roſe, and ſignified his decided diſapprobation of the motion. He had always conſidered the Teſt and Corporation Acts as the grand bulwarks of the Church of England They were not intended, as ſome ſuppoſed, by way of puniſhment on Diſſenters, but as a meaſure of ſelf-defence. After a long life ſpent in an increaſing veneration of thoſe laws, which he admired from the beginning, it was his decided opinion, they ought in every inſtance to be defended, as the great ſupport of the conſtitution Every argument he had uſed when this queſtion was debated before, ſtill exiſted in his mind with unabated force It was a maxim of ſound policy, that no perſon without bearing ſome teſtimony that he was not ill affected to the religious eſtabliſhment of the country in which he lived, ſhould be truſted with places of power Every ſtate was juſtified in requiring ſuch a teſt, and the two ſtatutes complained of by the Diſſenters, were neceſſary for the defence and ſupport of that Church, without which it might be endangered by perſons diſaffected to it being admitted into office The Acts certainly were principally aimed againſt the Catholics, but they were intended to include Diſſenters of every denomination, for it was always found, that the connection between the Church and State was ſuch, that the one never flouriſhed without the other His Lordſhip declared he was no enemy to the Diſſenters as a body, to many of them individually he was warmly attached, but on ſo important a ſubject he had ſpoke the honeſt dictates of his heart, with it being biaſſed by any perſonal or intereſted views in oppoſing the motion

Mr Fox diſſented from the Noble Lord he obſerved, that there was not, in his opinion, a connection between the religious and civil government, except inſomuch as religion influenced the morals of the people He further remarked, that it was unfair and unjuſtifiable to ſubject any perſons to diſqualifications for their religious ſentiments The legiſlature ought to have no concern with the opinions of individuals, who ought to be tried by actions alone He had an averſion to all Teſts, and hoped that the Houſe would remove the Teſt now complained of, of which it might be ſaid, that if it had but little bad effect, it had alſo but little good effect

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not mean to compare Diſſenters with the Papiſts of former times; but the reſtrictions impoſed upon them he conceived to be fairly juſtifiable on this ground If, being admitted into places of truſt and power, they obtained influence, they might endanger the eſtabliſhed church, and in order to ſecure it, was it not juſt to prevent them from ſharing in political eſtabliſhments which made no part of their natural rights, unleſs they gave ſome pledge of their being well affected to the church? This was no ſtigma on them, no penalty, no perſecution It was ſaid to be hard that they ſhould be precluded from receiving favours from the Crown any more than their fellow ſubjects: offices were not to be conferred merely as matter of favour, but by diſcretion for the public welfare, and if the legiſlature thought proper in any inſtance to limit that diſcretion, it ſurely did no more than it was juſtifiable in doing

Mr W Smith, Mr Martin, Mr Hawkins Browne, and Mr Wyndham warmly ſupported the motion, which being put, was loſt by a majority of only 20 (viz) For Mr Beaufoy's motion, 102—Againſt it, 122

Mr Burgeſs moved the order of the day for the ſecond reading of the Debtor and Creditor Bill

The Bill being read a ſecond time, Mr Burgeſs moved that the Bill be committed

Mr Orde oppoſed this motion the Bill, he ſaid, went to the alteration of the whole ſyſtem of the laws relative to Debtor and Creditor; he could not agree to it, as he thought ſufficient notice had not been given, and as no Crown Lawyer was in the Houſe to give his opinion thereon, he conceived it very improper for the Houſe to agree with it.

Mr Burgeſs ſaid, the Bill went by no means to a total alteration of the laws; it went but to a modification of them: the Bill was in fact the ſame as the one he had offered laſt year, and had undergone the reviſion of a conſiderable number of eminent men, and of ſome lawyers of the higheſt rank in the country

Mr Orde ſtill objecting to the Bill, the Houſe divided, Ayes 22, Noes 8. And it appearing that 40 Members were not preſent, the Houſe neceſſarily ſeparated without deciding the queſtion—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 12

Mr Wilberforce roſe, and prefaced a moſt able and animated ſpeech with a declaration to the Committee, of the magnitude of the ſubject he had undertaken having created in him the greateſt apprehenſions, which were occaſioned by the motion he intended to make involving in it not only many intereſts in this country and its dependencies, but being of conſiderable importance to the whole world. He ſaid, that as in the progreſs of the enquiries he had been under the neceſſity of making, he had every where been received with that candour that convinced him of his motives being conſidered in the moſt favourable view, he had diſmiſſed his apprehenſions, and was determined to march forward with a firm ſtep in the cauſe of juſtice, of humanity, and freedom He hoped the Houſe would conſider the ſubject coolly diſcard all party motives, and ſuffer the clear voice of reaſon to be heard He came forward not to accuſe the Weſt India planters; he came not forward to accuſe the Liverpool merchants, he came forward to accuſe no one; he came forward for the purpoſe of ſhewing to that Houſe, that guilt ſomewhere exiſted, which ought to be removed, and though he was weak, he would not flinch from the taſk of ſhewing the guilt, and the neceſſity to purge it away

He conceived it to be unneceſſary to detain them long on the trade on the coaſt of Africa, it was well known, that conſiderable numbers of Africans were continually conveyed away from their country by owners of Britiſh veſſels, the queſtion then was,—Which way came they by them? In anſwer to that queſtion, he declared, that the Report of the Privy Council, which was then on the table, was the moſt ſatisfactory and concluſive; it confirmed every opinion he had entertained from information of the beſt authority, and from every hiſtory he had read but it was unneceſſary to quote either the Report or hiſtory, for common ſenſe alone declared how the poor Africans were obtained Africa was a country divided under many kings, under many governments, under many laws In many parts they were ſubject to tyrannical rule, men were conſidered merely as goods and property, and, as ſuch, ſubject to plunder, in the ſame manner as property in other deſpotic countries The kings and princes of that unfortunate country had been made fond of our commodities; and to procure them by the captivity and ſale of their countrymen, they waged war on each other, and ravaged their own country. In their courts of law many poor wretches who were ignorant were condemned; and to obtain a ſufficient number of ſlaves, thouſands were kidnapped, and torn from their families and their country, and ſent into miſery. The gentleman he ſaid, who defended this trade, we are warped warped and blinded by their interest, and would not be convinced of the miseries they were daily heaping on their fellow creatures. By their conduct they had placed the inhabitants of Africa in a worse state than that of the most barbarous and savage nation, they had destroyed what ought to be the bond of union and safety, they had rendered the whole country one general scene of discord and anarchy, they had set kings against their subjects, had set subjects against their governors, had rendered every private family miserable, and created one general scene of desolation.

Their plan had been described by several witnesses as a comfortable conveyance, they had painted the accommodation of a slave ship in the most flowing terms, they had represented it in a manner that would have baffled his attempts in praise of the most luxurious scenes. The song and the dance, they said, were promoted, the women were employed in weaving fanciful ornaments for the hair, games of chance were encouraged, their food was alternately of their own country and European, and they were indulged in all their little humours, and their spirit constantly kept up. He wished not to say that such descriptions were wilful misrepresentation, if they were not, it proved that prejudice was capable of spreading a film over the eyes sufficient to occasion total blindness. On the contrary, however, and from many of the greatest merit, it did appear, that instead of apartments for those poor wretches, instead of those comfortable conveniences, they were placed in niches, and one heels, in such a manner that it was impossible for any one to pass among them, however small he might be, without treading upon them, and Sir George Yonge had, that in a slave ship in which he went on board, and which had not completed her cargo by 250, the stench was intolerable, the allowance of water was so deficient, that the slaves were frequently found gasping for life, and the pulse which they were favoured with, a luxury of their own country, was bitter, English horse-beans. With respect to the song and dance, which were said to be promoted, he could not suffer it to pass without acquainting the House with the meaning of the word promoted, as there used. The way the song and dance were promoted, was by severe whipping, when from excessive melancholy the poor wretches did not voluntarily take such exercise, as might be considered necessary for their existence, their dances and their songs afforded them so much merriment, that the moment they were ceased to be promoted, tears, sighs, and melancholy succeeded.

He next noticed the deaths, and the loss thereby on the whole cargo; he entered into a minute statement of the losses by death, which, he said, amounted to no less than between 50 or 60 in every 100 taken from Africa, he said, the average loss on the middle passage was rather more than an eighth of the whole, or 12 and a half per cent. four and a half loss from entering the ports of their destination, to the discharge of their cargoes and upwards of 33 in the 100 lost in seasoning. The first thing it became necessary to enquire about was, the mortality of the Blacks in the West Indies; and why in a climate so good as their own, and of persons so prolific as the Blacks, such a decrease should have existed as to render continual importation necessary. The first great cause he stated to be, the disproportion of males to females, there being upon an average five males to three females. The next cause he stated to be, the sad condition in which they were brought on shore, made up for the most part by astringents, washes, mercurial ointment, and repelling drugs. There were, he said, many other causes—excessive labour, their not being properly and sufficiently fed, an universal dissoluteness of morals. He proved, that the decrease of slaves in Jamaica had lessened in so great a degree, that, from the year 1774 to the present year, the decrease was not quite one in a hundred; and that in fact they were at present in a state of increase. He stated the island of Barbadoes, of Nevis, of Antigua, and the Bermudas, to be like Jamaica, lessening their decrease, and holding forth an evident and reasonable expectation of a speedy state of increase. If Gentlemen, he said, should agree with him that the account were authentic, he was confident they would agree with him, that by good usage the slaves would increase and that there was no further need of importation, and a constant waste of the human species. He was warranted, he said, by the Liverpool gentlemen themselves to declare the trade to be a losing one; and he was convinced, if they would open their eyes, that they would be unanimous for the abolition of the trade.

The Hon. Gentleman then went into arguments to prove that great advantages might be attained by a fair and honourable course with Africa, after which he concluded by begging pardon of the House for having taken up their attention so long; he said, he could have expressed his conviction upon the business in a few words, he needed only for that purpose to have quoted a commandment from Holy Writ, "Thou shalt do no murder," but he rose to make out his propositions to the House, he had done it in the best beſt manner he was able, and thanked them for the indulgent hearing they had granted him He did not mean to aſk for a deciſion, but would merely move to have his Propoſitions lie on the table, for the future diſcuſſion of the Houſe

Mr Wilberforce then preſented ſeveral Propoſitions * at the table, which contained the ſubſtance of his ſpeech, and which were immediately read by the Clerk

Mr Pitt ſaid, though no queſtion had been put that night, he could not help expreſſing

* The PROPOSITIONS were as follow

I That the number of ſlaves annually carried from the coaſt of Africa in Britiſh veſſels, is ſuppoſed to amount to about 38,000

That the number annually carried to the Britiſh Weſt India Iſlands has amounted to about 22,500 on an average of four years, to the year 1787 inclusive

That the number annually retained in the ſaid iſlands, as far as appears by the Cuſtom-houſe accounts, has amounted on the ſame average to about 17,500

II That much the greater number of the negroes carried away by the European veſſels are brought from the interior parts of the continent of Africa, and many of them from a very great diſtance

That no preciſe information appears to have been obtained of the manner in which theſe perſons have been made ſlaves

But that from the account, as far as any have been procured on this ſubject, with reſpect to the ſlaves brought from the interior parts of Africa, and from the information which has been received reſpecting the countries nearer to the coaſt, the ſlaves may in general be claſſed under ſome of the following deſcriptions

1ſt, Priſoners taken in war

2d, Free perſons ſold for debt, or on account of real or imputed crimes, particularly adultery and witchcraft, in which caſe they are frequently ſold with their whole family, and ſometimes for the profit of thoſe by whom they are condemned

3d, Domeſtic ſlaves ſold for the profit of their maſter, in ſome places at the will of their maſters, and in ſome places on being condemned by them, for real or imputed crime

4th, Perſons made ſlaves by various acts of oppreſſion, violence, or fraud, committed either by the princes and chiefs of thoſe countries on their ſubjects, or by private individuals on each other, or, laſtly, by Europeans engaged in the traffic

III That the trade carried on by European nations on the coaſt of Africa for the purchaſe of ſlaves has neceſſarily a tendency to occaſion frequent and cruel wars among the natives, to produce unjuſt convictions and puniſhments for pretended or aggravated crimes, to encourage acts of oppreſſion, violence, and fraud, and to obſtruct the natural courſe of civilization and improvement in theſe countries

IV That the continent of Africa, in its preſent ſtate, furniſhes ſeveral valuable articles of commerce, highly important to the trade and manufactures of this kingdom, and which are in a great meaſure peculiar to that quarter of the globe, and that the ſoil and climate have been found by experience well adapted to the production of other articles, with which we are now either wholly or in great part ſupplied by foreign nations

That an extenſive commerce with Africa in theſe commodities might probably be ſubſtituted in the place of that which is now carried on in ſlaves, ſo as at leaſt to afford a return for the ſame quantity of goods as has annually been carried thither in Britiſh veſſels And laſtly, that ſuch a commerce might reaſonably be expected to increaſe in proportion to the progreſs of civilization and improvement on that continent

V That the ſlave trade has been found by experience to be peculiarly injurious and deſtructive to the Britiſh ſeamen who have been employed therein, and that the mortality among them has been much greater than in his Majeſty's ſhips ſtationed on the coaſt of Africa, or than has been uſual in Britiſh veſſels employed in any other trade

VI That the mode of tranſporting the ſlaves from Africa to the Weſt Indies, neceſſarily expoſes them to many and grievous ſufferings, for which no regulations can provide an adequate remedy, and that in conſequence thereof, a large proportion of them has annually periſhed during the voyage

VII That a large proportion of the ſlaves ſo tranſported has alſo periſhed in the harbours in the Weſt Indies previous to their being ſold that this loſs is ſtated by the Aſſembly of the iſland of Jamaica at about four and a half per cent of the number imported, and by medical perſons of experience in that iſland aſcribed in a great meaſure to diſeaſes contracted during the voyage, and to the mode of treatment on board the ſhips, by which thoſe

preſſing his approbation of the Right Hon Gentleman's ſentiments Mr Pitt ſaid, that no argument reconcileable to any idea of juſtice, could be given for continuing or carrying on the trade in queſtion, and he was perfectly clear that his opinion, at leaſt the principles on which it was founded in his own mind, were totally untenable, yet he was ready to hear with the utmoſt candour and impartiality all the arguments that could be offered by thoſe who, either from conviction or from any other motive, entertained different thoſe diſeaſes have been ſuppreſſed for a time, in order to render the ſlaves fit for immediate ſale.

VIII That the loſs of newly imported negroes within the firſt three years after their importation bears a large proportion to the whole number imported

IX That the natural increaſe of population among the ſlaves in the iſlands appears to have been impeded principally by the following cauſes

1ſt, The inequality of the ſexes in the importation from Africa

2d, The general diſſolute neſs of manners among the ſlaves, and the want of proper regulations for the encouragement of marriages, and of rearing children

3d, The particular diſeaſes which are prevalent among them, and which are in ſome inſtances attributed to too ſevere labour, or rigorous treatment, and in others to inſufficient or improper food

4th, Thoſe diſeaſes which affect a large proportion of negro children in their infancy, and thoſe to which the negroes newly imported from Africa have been found to be particularly liable.

X That the whole number of the ſlaves in the iſland of Jamaica in 1768, was about - - - - - - - - - - - - 167,000

That the number in 1774 was, as ſtated by Governor Keith, about - 193,000

And that the number in December 1787, as ſtated by Lieut Governor Clark, was about - - - - - - - - 256,000

That by comparing theſe numbers with the numbers imported into and returned from the iſland in the ſeveral years from 1768 to 1774 inclusive, as appearing from the accounts delivered to the Committee of Trade by Mr Fuller, and in the ſeveral years from 1775 inclusive to 1787 inclusive, as appearing by the accounts delivered in by the Inſpector General, and allowing for a loſs of about 1 22d part by deaths on ſhip board after entry, as ſtated in the Report of the Aſſembly of the ſaid iſland of Jamaica, it appears, that the annual excels of deaths above births in the iſland, in the whole period of 13 years, has been in the proportion of about 7 8ths per cent computing on the medium number of ſlaves in the iſland during that period That in the firſt ſeven years of the ſaid 13, the excels of deaths was in the proportion of rather more than one on every hundred on the medium number That in the laſt 13 years of the ſaid 13, the excel of deaths was in the proportion of about three-quarters on every hundred on the medium number, and that a number of ſlaves, amounting to 15,000, ſtated by the Report of the iſland of Jamaica to have periſhed during the latter period in conſequence of repeated hurricane, and of the want of foreign ſupplies of proviſions

XI That the whole number of ſlaves in the iſland of Barbadoes was in the year 1764, according to the account given in to the Committee of Trade by Mr Braithwaite - - - - - - - - 70,706

That in 1774, the number was, by the ſame account - - 71,774

In 1780, by ditto - - - - - - 68,70

In 1781, after the hurricane, according to the ſame account - - 63,048

In 1786 by ditto - - - - - - 62,115

That by comparing theſe numbers with the numbers imported into this iſland, according to the ſame account (not allowing for any re-exportation), that the annual excel of deaths above births in ten years from 1764 to 1774, was in the proportion of about five on every hundred, computing on the medium number of ſlaves in the iſland during that period.

That in the ſeven years from 1774 to 1781, both inclusive, the excel of deaths was in the proportion of about one and one third on every hundred on the medium number

That between the year 1780 and 1781, there appears to have been a decreaſe in the number of ſlaves of about 5000

That in the ſix years from 1781 to 1786 both inclusive, the excel of deaths was in the proportion of rather leſs than ſeven eighths in every hundred on the medium number

And that in the four years from 1783 to 1786 both inclusive, the excels of deaths was in the proportion of rather leſs than one-third in every hundred on the medium number different ſentiments He truſted that it would not be found the means of inviting foreign powers to ſupply our iſlands with ſlaves by a clandeſtine trade, becauſe, after a debt founded on the immutable principles of juſtice was found to be due, it was impoſſible but that the country had means to have it paid, and when once they had come to a reſolution to aboliſh the ſlave trade, they were not to be prevented by any fears of other nations being tempted by the profit reſulting from a commerce (which upon grounds of humanity and national honour they had abandoned) to carry it on in an illicit manner Should that be the caſe, the language muſt be, that Great Britain had reſources to enable her to protect her iſlands, and prevent that traffick being clandeſtinely carried on with them, which ſhe had thought it for her own honour and character to abandon It was their duty, and it ſhould be their ambition, to take the lead in a buſineſs of ſo much national importance, and ſo much national credit, and he declared, he could not but have great confidence, that foreign nations would be inclined to ſhare the honour Mr Pitt added ſeveral other arguments, all tending to prove his firm opinion, that the unqualified abolition of the ſlave trade was the only ſtep that ought to be taken

Lord Penrhyn and Mr Gascoyne both declared, that in many parts the Hon Gentleman had very much miſrepreſented fact, relative both to Liverpool, to the Weſt Indies, to the mode of obtaining the ſlaves, and their tranſportation They declined entering into any reply until a future opportunity, and hoped that ſufficient time might be allowed previous to the next diſcuſſion of the buſineſs, to come prepared to anſwer every part

Mr Fox expreſſed the high ſatisfaction he felt at the refuſal of the duke of Portland Gentleman (Mr Wilberforce) in the miniſtrance he was leſs ſolicitous about the form of his propoſitions, though he confeſſed that in point of form, they were highly to his credit It had been his opinion, and he believed Gentlemen would do him the honour to recollect he had always ſaid, that it would be infinitely better to aboliſh the ſlave trade altogether, than to palliate or modify it It was not only diſgraceful to our national character, but he was convinced it was politically miſchievous to this country He ſaid, he had ſometimes been thought to uſe too harſh expreſſions of France, in treating her as the rival of this country Politically ſpeaking, France certainly was our rival, but he well knew the diſtinction between political enmity and illiberal prejudice. If there was any great and enlightened nation now exiſting in Europe, it was France, which was as likely as any nation on the face of the globe to act on the preſent occaſion with warmth and with enthuſiaſm, to catch a ſpark from the light of our fire, and to run a race with us in promoting the ends of humanity —France has been often improperly ſtimulated by her ambition, he had no doubt, ſhe would in the preſent inſtance readily follow its honeſt dictates He concluded with obſerving, that the buſineſs began auſpiciouſly, and promiſed ſucceſs

Mr Grenville (the Speaker) warmly complimented Mr Wilberforce on the ability and the eloquence which he had that day diſplayed in a ſpeech, which, he ſaid, would reflect immortal honour on his talents, as well as on his humanity He approved of the mode of bringing the diſcuſſion forward in diſtinct Propoſitions I was the only way by which the buſineſs could be fairly argued

Mr Martin declared himſelf a warm advocate for the abolition of the ſlave trade, which, he ſaid, ought not to be continued, if even it ſhould be the means of paying off the national debt

The further conſideration of the buſineſs was deferred till Monday next, after which the Houſe adjourned

WEDNESDAY, May 13

The order of the day for a Committee of Supply was read, and diſcharged till Friday next, as was alſo the order for a Committee of Ways and Means

At two o'clock the Houſe adjourned.

And that during the whole period, there is no doubt that ſome were exported from the iſland but conſiderably more in the firſt part of this period than in the laſt

XII That the accounts from the Leeward Iſlands, and from Dominica, Grenada, and St. Vincents, do not furniſh ſufficient grounds for comparing the ſtate of population in the ſaid iſlands at different periods, with the numbers of ſlaves which have been from time to time imported into the ſaid iſlands reſpectively therefrom But that from the evidence which has been received reſpecting the preſent ſtate of theſe iſlands as well as of Jamaica and Barbadoes, and from a conſideration of the ſeveral obſtructions which have hitherto operated to impede the natural increaſe of the ſlaves and of leſſening the demand for manual labour will not diminiſhing the profits of the Planter, it does appear that no conſiderable or permanent inconvenience would reſult from diſcontinuing the further importation of African ſlaves

THURSDAY

THURSDAY, May 14.

Mr Giſcoyne moved, that the order of the Houſe, for conſidering further of the ſlave trade on Monday next, be read

This being complied with, he obſerved, that on account of the momentous nature of the ſubject, and the variety of intereſts that were involved in the diſcuſſion of it, a delay of a few days would be expedient He therefore hoped that no oppoſition would be made to the motion he would now ſubmit to the Houſe, which was, that the above-mentioned order be diſcharged, and that on Thurſday next a Committee of the whole Houſe do conſider further of the ſlave trade —The motion was put, and agreed to

Mr Hungerford moved the order of the day, for the ſecond reading of the Bill for cutting a canal between Loughborough and Leiceſter

The queſtion being put that this Bill be now read a ſecond time,

Sir James Erſkine roſe and ſtated his objections to the Bill, and concluded with moving, as an amendment to the original queſtion, that, for the word "now," there be ſubſtituted the words "this day four "months"

On a diviſion the numbers were as follow: For the amendment 73—againſt it 35—Majority 38

The Bill was therefore loſt for this ſeſſion

At ſix o'clock the Houſe adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 15

Sir William Young moved the ſecond reading of his Bill for preventing vexatious removals of the Poor, and for ſupplying the defects in the Poor laws now exiſting To a ſubject ſo important he requeſted the patient hearing of the Houſe The abuſe of removals was owing to the words "perſons "liable to become chargeable," in the 13th and 14th Acts of Charles the Second By the conſtruction which overſeers put upon theſe words, ingenious artificers and laborious peaſants were often removed from pariſhes in which they might be earning a livelihood, and were thereby conſidered in the ſame light with thoſe, whom on account of vicegrancy it was thought proper to remove Feeling therefore that humanity and good policy were united in the adoption of the meaſure he had the honour to propoſe, he thought it his duty, both as a member of ſociety and as a chriſtian, to uſe his utmoſt endeavour to ſupport it He was, however, conſcious that there were various opinions on the ſubject, and that the quarter ſeſſions of the county of York were inimical to the meaſure The grand point of his Bill was to prevent the overſeers from removing any perſons but ſuch as are actually chargeable. This was a principle which he truſted would not be repugnant to the feelings of the Houſe, as it would prevent the overſeers from exerciſing their authority, in the removal of thoſe induſtrious perſons who only ſeek to earn a maintenance in a different pariſh from their own, without being mere vagrants. Another point in his Bill was to order a temporary relief to thoſe perſons who were diſabled from labour This, he thought, would be better than ſending them to the Work-houſe of every occaſion, for Work-houſes did not in general anſwer to their name, but were houſes of idleneſs rather than of induſtry They were receptacles of miſery with out guilt

Mr Jolliffe roſe to ſignify his diſſent to the Bill He did not approve of the alterations in it with regard to Work houſes, and was of opinion that they would be leſs beneficial to the community than the regulations now in force

Sir Richard Hill highly approved of the Bill, as, he ſaid, it would ſtrike at the root of the defects in the poor laws Mr J H. Browne and other Members likewiſe took this ſide of the queſtion; but Mr Jekyll, Mr. Baſtard, and Mr Brett, conſidered the Bill as an improper one, likely to occaſion great expence, litigations, and innovations, and after a few words from Mr Gilbert, in which he mentioned the great labour and expence he had beſtowed upon the poor laws, and his conviction that it would be well worth while for Parliament to vote ſome thouſands to well informed perſons, to enable them, by enquiry and attention, to regulate the preſent imperfect ſyſtem of theſe laws, the Houſe divided for the motion 22— againſt it 34. The Bill was therefore loſt, and the Houſe adjourned

MONDAY, May 18

The order of the day was read for a Committee of Supply, and Mr Gilbert took his ſeat as chairman

Mr R Hopkins moved, that a ſum not exceeding 713,000l. be voted for the ordinary of the navy

This being agreed to, he moved that 575,000l be granted for the building and repairing of veſſels in his Majeſty's dock yards, to which the Committee alſo agreed

After the reſumption of the Houſe, a queſtion was put to the Miniſter by Mr. Powys, with regard to the time of his bringing forward ſome plan for the improvement of the Quebec laws, to which the Right Hon Gentleman anſwered, that he had not ſufficiently made up his mind on the ſubject to be able to mention the particular time; but he would take care to give ample notice whenever he was ready

A Com-

A Committee was then formed on the Bill relative to hawkers and pedlars, Mr T. Stanley in the chair.

Mr Rose proposed several clauses to be added to the Bill, one of which, namely, that which prohibits hawkers and pedlars from disposing of their merchandise within two miles of a market town, produced the following conversation.

Mr Dempster warmly opposed this clause, as unconstitutional. He did not see any reason for depriving so large a body of men who had not been found guilty of any crime, of the means of getting their bread. The House ought not to encourage monopoly, by making a law between the hawkers and shopkeepers, but should consider the connection between them to be that of the buyer and the seller of trade. He therefore hoped that a clause would be added to the Bill which would tend to check the monopoly complained of by the petitioners.

Mr Robinson spoke in vindication of the clause. It could not be expected, that the hawkers should enjoy all the privileges of a shop keeper, for this reason, that the shop keepers, in consequence of a fixed residence, paid many taxes that the former were exempted from.

Mr Burges spoke against the clause as an unjust restriction, as did also Sir James Johnstone, Mr Hawkins Brown, Mr. Windham, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, Mr Dalrymple, and Mr Gilbert.

The Committee divided on this clause, when there appeared for it 36—against it 29. Majority 7.

The clause was therefore annexed to the Bill.

The next clause that produced a debate was that which empowered a Justice of Peace to banish hawkers and pedlars from any particular town which he thinks proper.

Mr Dempster recommended this clause, as authorising the most severe kind of oppression that had been exercised since the revocation of the edict of Nantz. He compared the Committee now to again enforce that clause.

Sir James Johnstone opposed the clause, not only as seeming to the oppression of a very respectable body of men, but as giving too great a power to the Magistrates. He said that any Justice who could lay his hand to his heart, and say that he ought to have this power of banishment, deserved to be struck out of the commission, unworthy of the honour of magistracy.

Mr Burton supported the clause, as justifiable on the ground of preventing too great an encroachment on the shop keepers.

Mr Hawkins Browne opposed the clause, as did also Mr Pulteney, and the Lord Advocate.

Mr John Baring spoke in favour of the clause.

On a division, the numbers were, for it 26—against it 27—Majority 1.

It was therefore rejected.

Mr Alderman Sawbridge proposed a clause to be added to the Bill, tending to prevent the merchants of Rag fair from infesting the City in such bodies.

The clause was supported by Sir Benjamin Hammet and Sir Watkin Lewes, but was opposed by Mr Rose as irrelevant to the Bill.

It was rejected without a division.

The bill being gone through, the House was resumed, and adjourned till the morrow.

TUESDAY, May 19.

After the Speaker had returned from having the Commission read for putting the Poor repealing Stop Fire Act,—the Bill for regulating the Coal-selection Act, together with sundry other public and private Bills, the first mentioned of the day were discharged, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 20.

Mr Alderman Newnham presented a petition from those concerned in the ship-owners or London who are concerned in the slave trade, praying that the House would not adopt any measure from motives of humanity as the abolition of that trade would prove.

It was ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Penrhyn brought up a petition from many of the planters and merchants trading to and from the islands protesting against the abolition of the slave trade.

He also presented a string of petitions from the coopers, joiners, ship-wrights, blockmakers, rope makers, and other manufacturers of Liverpool, representing the ruinous consequences that will flow from the abolition of the trade above-mentioned.

Mr Gascoyne presented a petition of a similar purport from the mayor and corporation of Liverpool.

Mr Alderman Watson brought up a petition from the merchants of the West-India Islands, praying to be heard by counsel against the abolition of the slave trade.

Mr Mainwaring moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend an Act of the 6th year of his present Majesty, for punishing depredations on gardens and nurseries. This Act, he said, extended only to those who robbed and destroyed gardens in the night, for if a person should do the greatest possible damage to a garden, orchard, or nursery, at any time when it was not completely dark, he might escape with impunity, as the law now stood. This he thought was a defect that ought to be remedied, for it was encouragement to evil minded persons to pillage gardens in the day-time, or during the twilight both of the morning and evening. The Bill which he proposed to introduce, would make this practice felony either by day or by night. Sir Joseph Mawbey seconded the motion.

Mr. Sheridan was unfriendly to the motion

Mr Huffey refifted the motion, as an improper extention of the penal laws, and faid he would divide the Houfe againft it

Mr Rofe fpoke in favour of the motion

A divifion now took place on Mr Manwarings motion, when the numbers were,

For it	—	30

That gentleman was therefore ordered to prepare and bring in a bill to the purport he had mentioned

THURSDAY, May 21.

Capt Berkeley, in purfuance of the report of the private Committee appointed to conſider of the beſt mode of regiſtering freeholders, moved for leave to bring in a Bill to regulate County Elections

This motion, after a few words from Sir Joſeph Mawbey and Mr Vanſittart, was agreed to

Mr Wilberforce moved the order of the day, for a Committee of the whole Houſe to conſider further of the Slave Trade

The Speaker then put the queſtion for the Houſe reſuming the Chair, when

Mr Alderman Sawbridge roſe, and willed to know whether the Hon Gentleman intended to call any evidence to the bar in ſupport of the allegations contained in his ſpeech of laſt week

Mr Wilberforce replied, that he had no intention of calling evidence to the bar, becauſe, in his opinion, the facts ſtated by him had been ſufficiently made out by the documents to which he referred But if any gentleman was deſirous of further teſtimony, he had no objection to the adduction of it

Mr Sawbridge roſe again, and ſaid he ſhould oppoſe the Speaker's leaving the Chair, till the Houſe ſhould agree to hear evidence at the bar The Report of the Privy Council was not a regular ground for the Houſe to proceed upon, and to found any reſolution on that Report, would be to depart from their inquiſitorial privileges

Mr Powys was inclined to think that a regulation of the trade would be preferable to an abolition of it but upon this point he did not fully made up his mind

Mr Courtenay was inclined to an abolition of a trade repugnant to humanity He was perfectly ſatisfied with the Report of the Privy Council, a Report founded on the beſt evidence that could be procured He did not at all regard the aſſertion of the merchants, that the abolition of the trade would tend to the ruin of their mercantile intereſts Ill-founded aſſertions were too frequently raiſed by intereſted perſons

Mr Hamilton roſe for the purpoſe of controverting a aſſertion of the Hon Gentleman reſpecting the Iſle of Man, and a letter which had been ſent to him from the late Duke of Athol, and which was ſtrongly in the poſſeſſion of the preſent Duke of Athol the latter was then in Weſtmoreland, and had no connection with the Iſle of Man in conſequence of a Will which he had ſeen in the Iſle of Man's poſſeſſion The Hon Gentleman

* The following is a literal tranſlation of the above Letter, from the original Copy, kindly furniſhed to the Printer by Mr Hamilton

From, Great and Powerful Prince of the Weſt, to the Great Prince of the Eaſt.

Jamaica, 1786.

GREAT PRINCE,

BEING informed and ſenſible of your mighty wars, grandeur and power over other white kings and kingdoms, make no doubt your lofty Excellency will call us black Creatures whom we call Yewo or White-man, not having, or ever having, in our kingdoms Law, though my brother and father before me made conſiderable offers to the Governor of Ardah, Whidah and Jacquin, to permit and encourage one to come to us, that we might ſee what we had ſo much heard of, and look upon, as it were a new diſcovered thing, though many of my common ſubjects never thought of ſuch people being in the world, till I made a captive of the ſaid white man, at my conqueſt over the great kingdom of Ardah, my country being from the great waters or ſea but ſo much, which has been one of our ſubjects was ever permitted to come to ſee (unleſs as ſlaves) for it is impoſſible to come anywhere without paſſing through the country of the great king of Ardah, alſo the Whidah's or Jacquin's country, which they will not permit

I hope this may be a means of making me known to Your Majeſty and trade may only be to theſe parts, and as a token of my deſired friendſhip and alliance ſend by him to Your Majeſty, a preſent of fourty ſlaves, and if you deſire a fourty times fourty more for your ſervice, the other fourty which I have given him, he is to make uſe of as he thinks fit, to enable made several remarks on this letter he deplored the barbarity of this African monster, but observed that his barbarity, and the wars he had occasioned, could never be justly enable him to return to me again, and bring back with him his Imguister Adome Oronoco Ale Captain Tain, for whom I have a great vallew Your African Company, of wich I understand you are the chief, I am informed dose not trade so much as usal, by reason they want your friendship and encouragement, as formerly they had from your predecessors, but now hope and begg you ll promeate trade to these parts, and they shall find much better usage and treatement then they did in the reign of the arbitrary king or emperor of Ardah and Jaquin, &c

I am mightily surprised ate one thing this white man tells me amongst others, which is that hereafter there will be a restitution of all things, no more wars, no more trade, nor no more people, die we must, that we see daily, but the other startles me, for after death wee certainly believe wee shall be something in the other world as well as this, and who shall be afraid to die, wich is a thing so common

I much admire the white man's way of corresponding by way of writing, the knowledge of wich and other things your God has given you beyond us, by which means you know his ways wee think and believe him to be the greatest of gods, and that he has appointed our gods or sete-allies to rule, govern, direct, kill or destroy us is wee act

But wee think it very strange that your god, laws and customs confine so great a king to one wife, and that the women have and are allowed so much power as wee here, they are even to reign over men—but no more of that, customs of countries differ

This white man I have detained neer this three years, to informe me as much as he could of your manners, customs, and laws, and withall till I had subdued other petty kingdoms, and made myself sole monarck down to the sea, and then in-land I have worke enough for many yeers, so that there will nor shall be my want of slaves

I have yet that proud king and people of Whidah to subdew, who vainly think themselves above my power, but I ll let them see there is no withstanding the Dawhomeyns, unlass there owne gods fight against them

By this white mans means or persuasions, I have desisted for this year past, and have likewise forbone going on Jacquin, (who since have submitted themselves, and become tributary to me) he telling me that it would be a discouragement to trade, and I should frighten away the white men, for whom I have great vallew, but now I find I have no way to bring the Whidahs under but by force, it must be done, and when I send my General and Captain of war on an arrent, they must not come back without success

My grandfather was no warryer, and only enlarged his dominions by conquering one kingdom, my father nine, but my brother fought seventy-nine battles, in which he subdued several petty kingdoms, but myself have fought two hundred and nine battles, in wich I have subdewed many great kings and kingdoms, some of which are continually revolting, and keeps me employed

By computation I can send near 500,000 armed and well skilled men to battle, that being what all my subjects are bred to (but the women stay at home to plant and manure the earth) I also keep a sufficient number of armed forces about me, lest I should be attacked or surprized from the northward, eastward, or westward, and my army goes to the southward

Both I and my predecessors were, and are, great admirers of fire armes, and have allmost intirely left of the use of bows and arrows, though much nearer the sea use them, and other old fashioned weapons as for speers, and short sort of batt or stick, with a large nobb at the end, which they so dexterously throw's that whatever it hitts, it prodigiously bruises and wounds; but we think none better than the gunn, and a ncree sorts of muskeet, or cutlas, which wee make ourselves, and will cleave as a broad axe —Could wee but come into the secret of making powder, or be better supplyed, I should spend vast quantities in my diversion, haveing, at the conquest of Ardah, taken several pieces of canon, which was thought a great thing to be brought up so far as there, but my people brought them up to me, with several others I have since purchased, which has been very difficult and troublesome to bring by land, so far in land, but my people stick or stop at nothing to serve me, for I reward them well, and punish them well according to there deserts, a rule with me in government

As I acknowledge you the greatest of Kings, under your Union Flag which I have taken upon me to hoist I drink your Majesty's health, and shou'd oftner only I am obliged always to keep a sufficient magazine of powder, for fear of being attacked by some great countries, which are beyond, and wide of me, but as they are at a vast distance, and must bea con

charged to the instigation of Europeans, who [illegible] ries, and but one of whom was ever seen never came within 300 miles of his territo- within his dominions He concluded by cautioning

a considerable time a coming, I gave him time to prepare to receive them, as wee did in my brother's reigne, the Great Mallowzee Creotow Halleeca to the Tropa King of Wimey, who with his army of seven hundred thousand, were destroyed (myself being then head general) The King's head we have preserved to this day, with skin and hare on, the head of this generall wee distinguished by giving them place on each side of the doors of our seteash houses, and his under captains of wars skins have served before the doores, and the head of the common soldiers were fixed round the walls of the palace of our ancestors, as cloths as they can be one by another; and since that I have been so fortunate in warr, that I have not only completed that, (which is circumference about three miles) but three fourths of my owne house before I was King which is about a mile and a half round, and hope in time to compleat the out walls of [illegible] my great houses in the same manner, which are in [illegible] but seven, and as many my wifes, which are in number at least as many thousand household slaves, but rooms left within bewide of any of them after sun-sett but my

My houses are [illegible] entirely governed by my chiefe wife, with all these imaginable, [illegible] doore-keepers and their assistants, who are always the luck sort of women slaves I have no disturbance or controversies whatever, either amongst my wifes or other subjects, every one knowing their duty, place, and station, for if any transgress against my laws or customs, or attempt it them of my forefathers, they must suffer by death, and sometimes not in my power to save them, without violating the laws of my gods, kingdom, and predecessors, and bring the curse on me and my country however, I never give sentence without sufficient proof, or that I condemn them by their confessing the fetish, and after that I sometimes endeavour to make it up by the contrivance, and some offering to the god and my deceased relations, who, wee firmly believe, have power of revenging any wrongs done to them by violating the laws and customs of their country and ancestors, and that it is in their power also to prosper us, or frustrate our designs, nay, even to take away our lives

I hope you, or att least your trading subjects, will send me back this white man as governor or chief over other white men and women, to live in my country, and by that I shall have as many of my subjects as they desire, to assist them in building a castle, fort, house, or houses, as they shall think fitt and convenient for trade

When I send my forces against Widah, as I fully propose to do, I shall give orders to my generals to take care not to hurte any of the white mans goods, or persons, if they keep in their fort and factory, but if they come in a warrlike manner to assist the kings and people, and happened to be killed and wounded, must not blame me or people

The white man will informe your merchants traders to my country what I desire and is fitt for me, for there is nothing so costly, rich and fine, but what I'le purchase even to a thousand slaves for any single thing (that may be worth it), he knows what I'le like, besides the common commodities, as guns, powder, cowries, our monye, &c

For as I here you are the greatest of white kings, so I think myselfe the greatest of black ones, or emperor, having now so many kings under me who durste not come into my presence without falling flatt on the ground, and rubbing their mouths nine times in the dust before they opens it to speak to me; and when I confer any dignities or favours on them, wipe the soles of my feet with the hair of their heads, throwing dust over themselves, and makeing the very skies ring with their and their peoples acclamations, but this only as to my owne people and subjects, as to the white man, he always satt in a chaire in my presence as I did, and always shew'd him the same compliments as he showed me, and shall continue to all white man the same, according to their stations

My customs differ very much from them of the kings of Ardah, for they, after being made kings, never went out of doores, or abroad to be seene by the common people, but always indulged and diverted themselves in the small compass of their palace amongst their wifes, who was under the care att other times of their evenucks, and at the conquest of that country I took several of them along with his wifes, the woman I thought good to add to my owne, as we esteem ourselves, and are looked upon by all neighbouring nations the greater and richer the more we have, but as to the evenucks, (a useless sort of fellows) I gave them back to his son, with some thousands of his old people and relations On my restoring him to his kingdom, which is now tributary to me, with the rest of his dependant kingdoms, nine of whose princes came in one month to be reinstated by me, which I did with the same ceremony as formerly done by the kings of Ardah, which is as follows viz. Being assembled, cautioning the House not to proceed precipitately, and throw into the hands of our rivals an important trade

Lord Maitland was against the House going into a Committee, before it was decided whether evidence should be adduced or not He objected

semblied, they signify to some of them, that they are come to submit themselves and countrys to me, and that for ever after they will owne no one to be the great king or emperor, but me and my successors, deny any allegiance to the king of Ardah (which was killed in the conquest), and now as it ware in the bushes pretends a write of being the great king or emperor, though I have got it by force of arms, and the son of the late king has been made by me in the same manner as the rest but if he has not a great care, he and his adherents may chance to shate the same fate as his brother did, for I le have his head if possible But as to the ceremony, it being signified to me as before, I order a silk gound, hatt, chair, and sword to be brought out by seperate persons, and carried before me to the prince who is to receve them, upon which two of my old wives or judges veste him with the gound and hatt, then I seat him in the chaire, and deliver to him the sword, with he is to be assistant to me with, and defend his country against any of our enemes: this being done, he rises from the chaire, falls on the ground, and kisses it nine times, and between every three, clapping his hands in a very regular manner, the same is done by all his cabosheirs and people about him, which I answer by a clapping of my hands standing after this he remains on his knees, or sitting or lying on the ground for he's not to sit on my thing above it in my presence, after that time, the chaire being for his own house amongst his owne subjects after this I dismiss him with giving him and people severall presents of clauth, corall, brandy, pipes and tobacco, and a sume of money to bear their expences home, they being pleased with the reception they mett with, and I with having added a kingdom to my dominions

We have a custom, which is quite contrary to Archbriens—I am obliged to go out at different times in the year, and strow great quantities of goods and money amongst the common people, and make sacrifices to our gods and fore fathers, sometimes of slaves (which custom I have much broke), sometimes of horses, other times of oxen, and other creatures

I very often beside love to go abroad about eight or ten miles an end, in what is call'd by the Portuguese a sup rentine, not but that I have many fine chaires, but do not like to trust to my people's carrying them, not being so much used to them as the other When I am out I fix myself under some great shadey tree, whare I view what number of armed people I have ready in two or three hours by this time up comes two or three hundred of my inferior wifes, the chief favourites being about my person in sundry stations, some to fan and cool me, others to keep the flies away with whisks, others holding my armes, as gun, pistols, and sabre, &c others again holding kedysalls or humbrellows, which stand on the ground and make a canopey over my chaire, and another to fill and light my pipe, which being done, I order the aforesaid bands of women to be unloaded, who have each a case of brandy though clothed in crimson, green, blue, and black velvett, and fine silks, and arrayed with great quantities of large coral (for my slaves buy me things of all nations) Besides, I have many fine things which comes over land, by a people which are called Mallays, and are in coming five months; thare religion are Mahometans (and tells me that near the sea on the other side, are a sort of white men), I have many of these people in my country, and follow thare several occupations as well as trading, in which I give them great encouragement (as I do to all stranger) I have appointed a governor or petty king of their owne over them, these ware the people who some of them used to go down to Widah and Jacquin, and come back and give us an account of the stranger manner of ships and white men coming to trade thare, which we long found to be true by thare gunns, powder, and all sorts of goods being brought from market to market

But to return —When I have smoked my pipe, and my people have pretty well exercised themselves in activity of body, by running, leaping and firing thare armes, as if engaged I order my brandy to be distributed, which is soone made away with, and then the sun being pretty well down, I return home with the acclamations of my people, with my drums beating, and hornes of different sortes sounding, with other sortes of my country musick, in which I have great numbers day and night continually imployed about my house

I shall not trouble you much more on these things, but hope to hear from Your Majesty per the aforesaid white men, who has promised me to return, and bring back with him before and after, Captain Tom, who is one of the king of Jacquin's family, who I took likewise at Ardah with him, and being desirous to go and see England, I send him, that on his return, unless death prevents, he may give me a large account of Your Majesty countries objected to the evidence of the Privy-Council, as inadmiſſible Ought the Houſe, he ſaid, to truſt to evidence manufactured by the Miniſter? He condemned the report as a motley maſs of contradictory, and therefore imperfect evidence, and contended, that the fulleſt and moſt perfect body of evidence was neceſſary on a ſubject, which he conceived to be one of the moſt important that ever came before Parliament

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was aſtoniſhed at finding any oppoſition to the Speaker's quitting the chair, for it muſt naturally, he thought, be the wiſh of both ſides of the Houſe to deliberate upon a ſubject of ſuch magnitude No gentleman, he thought, who wiſhed to diſcuſs the buſineſs maturely, would oppoſe the going into a Committee The noble Lord had remarked, that the report was contradictory, and therefore imperfect In his opinion, however, its being contradictory was a better argument in its favour, than if it had been entirely on one ſide, as it tended to ſhew that it was not merely an ex parte evidence ——By receiving this report, the Houſe did not by any means bind itſelf to a refuſal of any other evidence — The report only ſerved to aſſiſt their deliberations, and a conſiderable part of it was what could not be given in viva voce evidence at the bar —With regard to further evidence, it was the privilege of any Member of the Houſe to call for ſuch witneſſes as he might think proper.

Mr Fox was convinced, that nothing but a deſire of putting an entire ſtop to the diſcuſſion of this ſubject could have induced any gentleman to reſiſt the forming a Committee upon it With regard to what had been ſaid of the inadmiſſibility of the report of the Council as evidence, that was an erroneous remark It was certainly admiſſible in the way of aſſiſtance; but whether it was ſufficient evidence, was another conſideration —Another Friend near him (Mr Powys) had talked of a regulation of the ſlave trade; but he thought it ſtrange to propoſe a regulation of robbery Abolition was better adapted to meet his feelings than any regulation whatever in a trade of this kind He did not wiſh, however, that the Houſe ſhould adopt ſuch a meaſure, without a full conviction of the juſtice as well as policy of it

Mr Gascoyne repreſented the merchants and planters as impatient for an ample enquiry into the buſineſs becauſe they were confident that ſuch an enquiry would produce a refutation of thoſe aſperſions which had been thrown out againſt them, for their conduct towards the ſlaves He alſo contended, that it was incumbent on Mr Wilberforce to prove his aſſertions by evidence at the bar

Mr Wilberforce denied that he had aſperſed the character of the merchants or planters —He likewiſe obſerved, that his propoſitions were ſufficiently confirmed by the report of the Privy Council countries and dominions, and that he may the better qualify himſelfe for the great poſt of Yewo Gah Ali, Captain Blanco, or the white man's caboſheere, which I deſigne to give him on his return, and hope that he'll be more fitt and capable to anſwer the white man's endes than any one hereto ore, knowing their ways and cuſtoms

So once more hopeing Your Majeſty the company or other trading ſubjects will not fail to ſend me back this white man, who is now to me as much as my ſon, whom I deſign ſhall ſucceed me, and whoever comes with him ſhall not want encouragement nor neither ſhall any ſhip that comes by his means, and to him, pay my tribute or cuſtoms to me, as they did to the king of Ardah, for ſix years after his arrival at Jacquin or Dawhomay

He can informe you more at large of my wars, conqueſts, greatneſs, and grandure, though a black, ſo ſhall take leave, and hope your God will always proſper your wars and undertakeings, and committ the ſaid white man to his and your care, for I ſhall not faile (as I have already done) to offer ſacrifices to mine continually for his preſervation and ſafe return, with aſſurances to them that on it I ſhall give for that purpoſe oxen, hoggs, ſheep, and goats, and ſhall be more rejoiced at it, than at the greateſt battle or conqueſt I ever won, ſo I remain, with the moſt profound reſpect, as the Gods have made us blacks to ſerve you,

Great Prince,

Your Majeſty's moſt faithful and obedient friend humble ſervant,

Trudo Audato Poveſaw Diujerenjon Suveveto Bon-Mottee Addee Pow, a Polow Cow Hallow Nec tely, Emperor of Dawhomay.

P S Could I write my own hand, or explain myſelf as I would, I ſhould ſay a great deal, but believe this white man has done it as much as poſſible.

Lord Penrhyn affirmed, that part of the report was founded on hear-fay evidence, and much of it was totally falfe

The Chancellor of the Exchequer propofed that the queſtion for the Speaker's leaving the chair ſhould be withdrawn, in order that motions might be made for the hearing of Counſel and evidence

Mr Molyneux, Mr Baring, Mr Macnamara, Mr Martin, Sir Charles Middleton, Sir William Dolben, Sir John Sinclair, Colonel Phipps, and Mr R Smith, afterwards ſpoke

At length Mr Wilberforce withdrew his motion for the Houſe going into a Committee, and after a ſhort converſation between the Miniſter, Lord Maitland, and Mr Giſborne, it was agreed, that it ſhould be an inſtruction to the Committee upon this buſineſs, to hear Counſel and witneſſes at the bar, before the Propoſitions above-mentioned ſhould be formally moved

Mr Giſborne then moved, that on Monday next, a Committee of the whole Houſe be formed to conſider of the Slave Trade

FRIDAY, May 22

Alderman Newnham moved for diſcharging the order for going into a Committee of the whole Houſe on the Slave Trade on Monday next and fixing the time for Tueſday, which was agreed to

Mr Huſſey moved, that a clauſe might be added, compelling the Weſtminſter Aſſurance Company to make good their promiſed inveſtment of a ſecond hundred thouſand pounds in the funds, by making their private property liable to the debt of the Company, until ſuch inveſtment ſhould be completed

Lord Newhaven objected to theſe regulations

Mr Dempſter propoſed that if theſe regulations ſhould be adopted with reſpect to the Company in queſtion, they ſhould be extended to all others of the ſame deſcription

The Speaker by no means wiſhed to diſcuſs in his mind on the propriety of the reſtrictions propoſed, but thought them of ſuch conſequence, as to deſerve the further conſideration of the Houſe He therefore propoſed the Committee ſhould report progreſs, and the leave to ſit again, that Gentlemen might have time to turn it in their minds

Capt Berkeley ſaid that as he underſtood it was the intention of ſome Gentlemen to oppoſe the Bill agreed to by the Committee for explaining and amending the laws relative to County Elections, that time might be allowed for conſideration, he ſhould move to put off the ſecond reading till the firſt Monday after the holidays The motion was agreed to

Mr Popham ſaid, he meant early next Seſſion of Parliament to propoſe ſome alteration of the Poor Laws He revered the old ſyſtem too much to propoſe repealing, and wiſhed only to make it more clear by ſome neceſſary explanation and amendments

Mr S Smith moved for various accounts of ſhips cleared out from the ports of Briſtol, Liverpool, &c to the Coaſt of Africa, which, in reply to a queſtion from Lord Maitland, he ſaid could be laid on the table in ſeven days The reaſon of moving for theſe accounts again was, that Mr Wilberforce had not put his motion into a technical form.

The order of the day having been read for going into a Committee on the further conſideration of the Slave Trade, previous to the Speaker's putting the queſtion for his leaving the chair,

Mr Alderman Newnham roſe, and obſerved, that the magnitude of the ſubject which now engaged the attention of the Houſe, required the fulleſt inveſtigation, he ſhould therefore propoſe a Call of the Houſe on this day ſe'nnight It was his intention, as occaſion ſhould require, to extend this order from time to time, ſo as to inſure the attainment of the object he had in view

Mr Wilberforce expreſſed his perfect coincidence in the motion

Several other Gentlemen ſpoke on the motion, when the gallery was cleared, and upon a diviſion the motion for the Call of the Houſe on this day ſe'nnight was carried,

The Houſe reſolved itſelf into a Committee of Supply, Mr Gilbert in the chair

Mr Steele moved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that 359,709l be granted for the extraordinaries of the army for the current year, which was then put and agreed to —He afterwards moved, that 28,771l be voted for the eſtabliſhment in New South Wales This motion being aſſented to, was followed by a variety of others relative to various branches of the Supply, all of which met with the acquieſcence of the Committee

The order of the day being for the Houſe reſolving itſelf into a Committee upon the Slave Trade,

Sir William Dolben in the chair, Counſel were called to the bar

Mr. Barnes, late Governor of Bengal, was examined examined for a conſiderable time, by Mr Beaufoy, Mr Huſſey, Lord Maitland, and other Members, after which the Houſe adjourned

THURSDAY, May 28

Mr Mainwaring's Bill for protecting gardens and nurſeries from depredations, by making it felony to plunder them by day or by night, was read a ſecond time, and the queſtion being put that it be committed,

Mr Wyndham roſe, and objected to the further progreſs of the Bill, as an unneceſſary extenſion of the penal laws

The Attorney General juſtified the Bill

Mr Mainwaring ſaid, that as tranſportation would be too ſevere a puniſhment for a trifling theft from a garden, his Bill would leave it to the diſcretion of the Magiſtrates to vary the puniſhment according to the greater or leſs degree of the offence. He would alſo inform the Houſe, that the Bill did not extend to the ſtealing of trees, plants, &c under the value of five ſhillings

Mr Burke was ready to continue the ſame practice which he had uniformly purſued ever ſince he had been honoured with a ſeat in Parliament—that is, to oppoſe the multiplication of the criminal laws

Mr Drake approved the Bill as a very proper meaſure

A diviſion now enſued, which terminated in favour of the Bill, the numbers being

For the commitment of it		41
Againſt it	—	11
Majority		—30

The Bill was therefore ordered to be committed

The Chancellor of the Exchequer deferred the opening of the Budget from Friday the 5th of June to Monday the 8th

The Houſe reſolved itſelf into a Committee on the Slave Trade, Sir William Dolben in the chair

Richard Miles was examined at the Bar for a conſiderable time, on the mode of procuring ſlaves in Africa, on the manners of the natives, &c. He depoſed, that vaſt numbers of the ſlaves purchaſed by us on the African coaſt, are wretches that would otherwiſe be ſacrificed, that no violence is uſed by our traders in procuring ſlaves, &c

When the Committee broke up, the Chairman was ordered to report progreſs, and aſk leave to ſit again

At one o'clock the Houſe adjourned till the 5th of June

To UT PICTURA POESIS! or, The ENRAGED MUSICIAN

Written by G COLMAN

Spoken by Mr EDWIN, jun

BEHOLD a firſt fiddle! no cord nary hand
And, believe me, not one of this excellent band!
But before, gentle Sirs, (to the Orcheſtra) you the Overture play,
Suffer me to the audience a few words to ſay
Since muſicians are meant for the laugh of the night,
Let all ſons of the gamut their forces unite!
Well tun'd and well roſin'd, and arm'd with a kit,
I come with ſmall arms to attack a ſmall wit (Pulls out a kit)
But where are my notes? tho' I'm ſure to be right,
I need no preparation; for I play at ſight
(Pulls out the play book)
(Looks at the title page)
Ut Pictura Poeſis—A modeſt inſcription!
Of the Drama, alas! a moſt faithleſs deſcription
At the head of a halfpenny ballad they put
An ugly, ridiculous, vile wooden cut,
And ſtrict the reſemblance, we very well know,
'Twixt the picture at top and the verſes below
Had drawings like theſe been compar'd to this ſtuff, (ſhewing the book)
'Twould have ſeem'd no ſuch very extravagant puff,
But here the whole caſe is the very reverſe,
The print is moſt brilliant, moſt wretched the verſe,
And the humour which Hogarth's droll genius created,
To the ſtage without genius or humour tranſlated
Nor is this, I aſſure you, our Bard's firſt offence,
Nor this his firſt treſpaſs on Hogarth's for ſenſe
Six excellent prints, full of ſtrong will plac'd,
In five acts, with twin efforts, two little play wright diſtract,
And if they proceeded without a miſcarriage,
Their thanks are all due to Will's Alamode Marriage
One of theſe is no more, but the other proud elf
Suppoſes he's able to ſtand by himſelf;

NE ſtrives to renew at this inſtant his labours,
Unappall'd by the terrors of two giant neighbours,
Who, ſpite of all tricks, muſt ſo ſure beat him hollow,
They have nothing to do but to gape and to ſwallow
Yet now, with no comrade, the pigmy feels bolder,
Sure ſign he's no wiſer, tho' now he's much older!
Yet, daring to jeſt on the tribe of Muſicians,
Be you his correctors! be you his phyſicians!
With us, ply him off to ſome tune for his ſtings,
Fret the cords of his heart into mere fiddle-ſtrings!

PROLOGUE

To FALSE APPEARANCES a COMEDY, altered from the French, and performed at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane

By the Right Hon General CONWAY

Spoken by Mr WROUGHTON

LAUNCH'D on the boſom of the gentle tide,
With friendly hands its eaſy courſe to guide,
With gilded tackling, and with ſilken ſail,
To catch of kind applauſe the flattering gale,
Say, what ſtrange frenzy in the Poet's brain
Urg'd his frail bark to tempt the ſtormy main,
(Far from the kind'ly ſafe-protecting ſhore)
Where the winds whiſtle and the tempeſts roar?
With ſuch a cargo too, ſuch motley ſtuff!
For 'tis a ſtrange aſſortment ſure enough!
Some proſe, ſome verſe, ſome merry, and ſome ſad,
Some good, we hope, and much I doubt, ſome bad,
Some old, ſome new; ſome Engliſh, ſome from France,
Tho' not their weeping comedy, nor dance
An Abbe, too! a ſight you've ſeldom ſeen,
A parrot cloath'd in black, inſtead of green,
Half church half lay, half clerk half militant!
Tho' in a band, the creature will not cant
He's light too, not o'ercharg'd with cleric lore,—
One good fat Parſon would outweigh a ſcore
He will not therefore ſink us by his weight,
And if he makes you laugh, he pays his freight
We're all above board—did not mean to ſteal,
But to declare our goods, and fairly deal,
All in the legal way of importation,
Tho' there may be ſome ſmall adulteration,
Some merit yet's our merchant author's plea,
From Gallic chains he ſet his drama free
Where the ears wearied with perpetual rhymes,
Like the dull jingle of their clatt'ring chimes;
Where male and female verſe, with conſtant ſtrife,
Drag one ſad tendleſs yoke, like man and wife
But let our blame be bounded as it ought—
No general cenſure ſuits a ſingle fault
How often mix'd in the ſame garden grows
The baneful hemlock with the fragrant roſe!
And 'tis mere common ſenſe each man relies on,
To chuſe the perfume and reject the poiſon
In fame and honour long them ſtage has ſhin'd,
Correct in manners as in taſte refin'd,
We'd not detract in atom from their praiſe,
But add the Civic to the Muſe's bays
And ſhou'd the Genius of this happy iſle
On Gallia's ſons at length propitious ſmile,
While in each breaſt the patriot ſpirit glows,
We'd hail as brothers whom we've met as foes
To the ſame point their generous ardor tends,
The friends to Freedom muſt be Britain's friends
And may the ſov'reign Pow'r that rules above,
Unbounded in its wiſdom as its love,
To no one nation, nor no ſpot confin'd,
Extend that beſt of bleſſings to mankind!

EPILOGUE,

Written by Lieut General BURGOYNE.

Spoken by Miſs FARREN

(A Book of Sketches hanging from her waiſt)

SOLDIERS turn poets!—That's no mighty wonder,
But inſtead of tragic battle, death, and thunder,
Our bard takes FALSE APPEARANCES in hand,
A ſubject he could never underſtand
Peace, then, to efforts in theſe ſcenes diſplay'd,
I come to try the world in maſquerade,
From every borrow'd dreſs to ſtrip the mind,
And, midſt diſtortions, Nature's image find.
This wond'rous mirror!—look at it with awe—
Is what which Addiſon in viſion ſaw,
When beaming o'er each ſex in age and youth,
The hand of Juſtice held the glaſs of Truth
Where it has lain, none knows—by intereſt hid,
In cities dreaded, and in courts forbid;
But with this wreath of fadeleſs laurel round it,
Dropt in the Muſes' walk, our poet found it
Ye party tribes, bleſt with ſo many faces,
Ye know not which to chuſe in certain caſes,

Or

O ye with one, one ever-pregnant smile,
Proof to all changes of this changeful isle;
Maids, wives, and widows—all are in my power
This is no dreaming visionary hour,
For by this light of conscious lamps I swear,
This dear, sweet gift shall shew me what you are Hats off—down fans—no hoodwinks while you re try'd;
And, Sir, your head not quite so much aside
[Offering to lift up the glass
Come, don't be frighten'd, barshness I disclaim
Soft as the modified electric flame,
This subtle influence, tho' 'twould pierce a rock
Shall play, not injure—I'll keep back the shock
Now for it
[Waving the glass over all the House.
Culprits—you are all detected!
[A long pause
Upon my word, better than I expected
Sir, some fond pair, caught in a tender oath,
Sigh'd, look'd, return'd, and felt—a fib in both
Sive wedded sweetings mutually sincere,
Who mean "My devil!" when they lisp, "My dear,"
Sive certain smirks to cover peccadillos,
And keep all quiet on domestic pillows
From high to low, from periwig to feather,
More honest folks were never met together
Yet, hold—methought I saw,—I vow I've got 'em—
O Lord! how near my eye the glass has brought 'em—
Two critics, with whole pocket-books of hints
For FALSE APPEARANCE in to-morrow's prints,
For Bard, and Actors, comments false and true,
To mix with Ministers, and Buff and Blue!
Well, for the Stage there's candor, tho' there's jest,
But will your private satire stand the test?
Look to that hunt, ever with concenter'd rays
This burning glass sets columns in a blaze
Wit, whose clear essence never flames the paper,
Shall separate and mount in pleasing vapour
But the black line drawn against real merit,
The coarse thick virulence of party spirit,
The pen envenom'd, and the hand unknown,
Oh! what a smoke from sulphur, all their own!
This touches few; the general point I yield,
For False Appearance Britain is no field
Witness this audience, to well off to-night,
Witness new audiences whom I invite
Come for the proof of being what we seem,
And take my seat for the world's esteem
Come crowds, and after-crowds, nor dare denial,
On pain of being deem'd afraid of trial:
Come with true pride, with open boldness come,
You'll find me almost every night at home.

MAY 19,

Lacedæmonian Heroes, or, a People Made Happy, a Masque, was performed at Drury-lane, for the benefit of Mr Wrighten a few scenes with singing, merely calculated for a single performance

22 The British Sailor, or, The Fourth of June, a musical Interlude, was acted at Covent garden, for the benefit of Mr and Mrs. Bernard

25 Half an Hour After Supper, a petite piece, of one act was performed the first time at the Haymarket The characters were as follow:

Sturdy, -	Mr Kemble,
Bentley, - -	Mr Williamson,
Capt Berry, -	Mr Iliff,
Robert, -	Mr Johnstone,
Tibitha, -	Mrs Bretesord,
Mrs Sturdy, -	Mrs Edwin,
Nanny, -	Miss Prideaux,
Eliza, -	Miss Heard,
Susina, -	Mrs Taylor

The mischiefs of novel reading are the subject of this piece The story is as follows Sturdy, a plain sensible merchant, has a vulgar wife, a sentimental sister in law, who is fond of novels, and two daughters, one all vivacity and spirits, the other all sensibility and feeling They are discovered at table half an hour after supper, aunt Tibitha reading the History of St George, which had already set Mr Sturdy asleep At length they all depart apparently to rest A scene ensues between Robert and the maids, in which it appears that the valet is as fond of novel reading as the maiden aunt, and retreats with the book We then discover that the young ladies, in concert with Nanny, had plotted to go off that night with two youths who had assumed the characters of gentlemen, and who are immediately introduced Just on their departure they are interrupted by the approach of Mrs Tibitha The gentlemen conceal themselves under the table; the girls behind the curtain In looking for the novel the two swains are discovered, when Bentley pretending that the aunt had long been the object of his passion, and protesting that he came to her, she is prevailed upon after a ridiculous courtship to elope with him After putting her in a post-

chaise

chase he returns to the young ladies, whose father and mother having been alarmed with Mrs Tabitha's shriek enter the apartment An eclaircissement takes place, which proves that the Captain and Mr Bentley are the sons of neighbouring tradesmen The pretended Captain braves it, and goes off vapouring, while Bentley is reconciled to the father, who promises to take him into his counting-house

The dialogue of this piece is neat and lively, but the characters are by no means original, nor has the plot much novelty The performers did justice to it in the acting, and Mr Taylor, the new actress, shewed much spirit and vivacity

28 Miss Hagley, a pupil of Mr Linley, appeared the first time on any stage at Drury-lane, in the character of Narcifa, in Inkle and Yarico, for the benefit of Mr Dignum Of this young lady we shall only observe, that her performance, if it excited no great share of future expectation, was such as to create no present disgust

JUNE 1 A Mr Lloyd appeared the first time at the Haymarket, in the character of Hamlet, with but small success He is a petite figure, with no very expressive or youthful countenance, a good voice, but a manner by no means sufficiently animated or correct He is said to be an itinerant lecturer on astronomy, in which he is likely to be more successful than on the stage

2 Perseverance, or, The Third Time the Best, a musical entertainment, was acted the first time at Covent garden, for the benefit of Mrs Mountain the characters as follow

Frolick, -	Mr Hartstone,
Jack, -	Mr Blanchard,
Sir Nimny, -	Mr Quick,
Mr Granard,	Mr Cubitt,
Lucy, -	Mrs Mountain,
Maid, -	Mrs. Martyr,
Quaker, -	Mrs Pitt

This piece the first production of a young writer, who, should he persevere in employing his talents for the stage, discovers merit enough to convince us that he will be glad to have the present hasty performance forgotten The music, by Giordani, was extremely pretty

3 Is It So? a piece of one act, was performed the first time at the Haymarket the characters as follow

Lord Mayorum,	Mr Hill,
Mr Fidget,	Mr Powell,
Sparkle, -	Mr Barrett,
James, -	Mr Williamson,
Lucy, -	Mrs Powell,
Chit, -	Miss Heard

This is a lively trifle A gentleman, to disappoint a noble and wealthy rival, becomes his valet, has frequent access to his mistress, runs away with her, and whose father thinks every thing as it should be, on discovering his rank and situation This pleasant little drama was well performed

4 Mr Kean, whose talents for mimicry are well known, appeared for the first time on that stage, at Drury-lane, in Mrs Cole, in the Minor, for the benefit of Mr Phillimore, Miss Bates, and Miss Tidswell As far as his abilities extend, this performer did not disappoint the expectations of the audience

8 Pantomicon, a pantomimical selection, was performed at Covent garden for the benefit of M Wild

12 The Giant Defeated, or, The Reward of Valour, a pantomimick romance, was performed the first time at Covent garden for the benefit of Mess Cubitt, Boyce, Cox, and Byrne Both the above pieces were showy and splendid, and possess that kind of merit which has lately been much patronized by the Public

22 A new farce called The Soup was attempted to be performed, for the first time, at the Haymarket The piece, very ill received to be performed, the audience so capricious in humour, that they hissed the very first scene, and with a disdain of candour that we have rarely witnessed, continued to kick disturbing a clamour during the remainder of the performance, that it was almost impossible to collect the following circumstances of the plot

CHARACTERS

Baron de Fortheim,	Mr Kemble,
Count de Wurtzendal,	Mr Hill,
Count de Narcisse, -	Mr R Palmer,
Major Reimbert, -	Mr Williamson,
Captain Edelice, -	Mr Johnson,
Bertrand, -	Mr Usher,
Notary, -	Mr Barrett,
Baroness de Fortheim,	Mrs Webb,
Lucette, -	Mrs Taylor,
Eleonora, -	Mrs Kemble

Servants, huntsmen, &c.

FABLE

The Baron, an old sportsman, has promised his daughter Eleonora to Count de Wurtzendal, a nobleman totally devoted to horses. Eleonora loves the Major The Major loves Eleonora Wurtzendal borrows four fine horses of the Major, which he likes so well, that he wishes to purchase them, but the Major cannot be persuaded to part with them for money; Wurtzendal therefore, rather than return the horses, having discovered the partiality of the Major for Eleonora, is willing to resign his mistress for the horses — This is The Swop The old Baron despises

Wurtzendal

Wurtzendal for this behaviour, and having been induced to conceive a good opinion of the Mayor, by a present of a brace of greyhound, which the latter had given to him, consents that he shall marry Leonora

The Prologue was a good one, and given with point It turned on the main incident of the fable, viz the exchange of a wife for a set of horses, an idea which we should say was clearly borrowed from the Jealous Wife, were it not that the Prologue told us the farce had been written in Germin, at least as early as Mr Colman's most admirable comedy

The performers seemed unto us to play well, but their best endeavours could not soothe the tumult of the audience, angry, apparently, before they could judge whether they ought to express displeasure or approbation

The following LINES, spoken by KEMBLE at the opening of the LIVERPOOL THEATRE, June 12, were written by Mr. ANDREWS

IN THIS CHOICE HAVEN of our sea-girt isle,
Where EASE and PLENTY crown propitious toil,
Where spreading Commerce aids each generous art,
Exults the bosom, and expands the heart—
The grateful MUSE, who to your soft ring pairs
Owes the proud station which she here maintains,
True to the DRAMA'S cause, should tender here
Her heart-felt smile, her most expressive tear,
Here should the STAGE its moral MIRROR prove,
And but reflect those virtues that you love
Or if through SATIRE'S guise we sometimes try
To hold up FOLLY to DERISION'S eye,
Ours be the task, by chasten'd rules confin'd,
Gently to twinge, but never wound the mind;
The sprightly thought in forceful language speak,
But raise no blush to crimson BEAUTY'S cheek

Let SHAKESPEARE here with all his wondrous pow'rs
Delight, instruct, arrest the charmed hours,
While rapt ATTENTION leads th' astonish'd mind
Through every varied state of human kind,
And, as the pleasing fiction is held to view,
Confirms each lesson it inculcates, true.

Your youthful DAUGHTERS, in life's dang'rous morn,
When love's soft roses bloom without a thorn,
For JULIET'S woes shall find the pitying tear,
And learn to dread the bliss that's bought so dear;
Nor rashly hazard, with too hasty choice,
The vow unsanctioned by a PARENT'S voice

The crook back'd RICHARD, foe to every good,
Shall prove, no tyrant long can reign in blood;
The PROSPER too, who in our happier day
Shares the rebuild comforts of a lenient sway,
Shall hail the ERA that such joy imparts,
And doubly prize the MONARCH of their HEARTS

Long may returning HEALTH, that kindly spirits,
CIRCLE the CROWN, and LIGHTEN all its cares
May sweet content, and dear domestic joy,
Those permanent delights that will not cloy,
Attend our SOVEREIGN to the vale of years,
Till TIME must close them with a NATION'S TEARS

For me, the new made Monarch, fix'd by fate
To sway the sceptre of this mimic state,
May the reign prosper, as desert shall seem,
Crown'd with unfeign'd plaudit, stamp'd with your esteem

Mr LEDWIN opened the Theatre Royal at Richmond on June 20, with the following Occasional Address, the Stratagem, and the Mayor of Garret

LONG hath your Stage the heavy impost paid
Which needy griping Managers have laid;
And you'd have borne them, had th' ungrateful elves
Not starv'd the Drama whilst they fed themselves
It was too hard to tax both purse and sense,
And fill their stomachs at your heads expence
For me (to let the devil have his due)
I always thought the most to be New,
Besides a world of best intentions too
Could you but penetrate this eager part,
And watch the throbs and workings of this heart,
See how it pants to please, you'd own the sight
Deserves a full and overflowing night.

Since you look gracious, seem inclin'd to hear,
I'll trust one little secret to your ear
I have immense design, such as will wreck,
Will wring the struggling plaudit from each breast.

What, do ye doubt me? 'Pon my word 'tis true.
In proof of what I say, look round and view
Do ye not see my novelties? Then mush,
I'll point them out.—Here Mummius oush
Arrest, with delicate Italian touch,
The first applause.—What colouring! Thergs not such,
So warm in Britain! O'er his merits rove,
There, there are Cupids! Ain't you all in love †?

Then his new Scenery! Lord, how you'll look,
And stare and clap, Oh! such a Captain Cook!
You'll bleed when he is stabb'd, die at his feet,
And yet no copyist, his th' original
My next vast merit I must have a word on,
I cod! d'ye know——I've got you Mrs Jordan——
Mind you cuddle her——for the little rogue
Is a great prize at Drury—nigh in vogue—
Her leg, her ancle, foot, are quite the kick,
She tickles hearts, young ladies, to the quick,
And makes in breeches such a pretty boy,
There's not a prude who would not long to toy
Put your best bibs, best tippets, gown and fallon,
To meet Sir Harry here—he's all the fashion
Will you come and see him, Ma'am? You say yes,— Bravo! I'll promise you shall have a kiss

Now bid, not I, for me accost, I give myself,
A comic set, in my droll oddity,
One Jemmy Jump, a coxcomb, as he grew
In Covent-Garden, crept in fashion you,
What! not one thank you? nor a single clap

Hold your hands, will ye ladies and gentlemen!
I see you smile——your smiles my spirits raise,
I'll try to merit, if you'll try to praise
But, hold! amid these rows, there may be some,
Whose melting hearts might sometimes wish to come
And pay their tear to woe for them, d'ye see
We know and then throw in a tragedy——
One with a tale so horrid!——horrid!——deep
How I'll laugh to see the gallery weep,
And when the gods have sobb'd, and had their cry,
I'll wipe the tear with laughter from each eye——
Oh! may these efforts, then, restore you stage,
And Richmond Theatre be all the rage.

Mr NEWCOMBE's (of Haymarket) Boys on Saturday May 2, acted Julius Cæsar with a correctness throughout and mimicry not a little to their credit. They have every great praise, for what is better—for behind the scene, and when they advanced upon the stage after the play, they seemed so gentleman-like in gravity and decorum, as proved they had been initiated in something more valuable than even LITERARY SKILL.

The performers were these

M Anthony,	Mr Newcombe,
Lepidus,	Mr Hunter,

PROLOGUE,

Written by GEO. KEATE, Esq

OR Man, or Boy, who has not seen in town
A Comic Print—The World turn'd upside down?
Where every system, every law's reversed
Ev'ry new born Infants are the Ancients nurs'd,
Who dandling both their Parents on their knee,
Teach them, with rod in hand, their A, B, C.
There Pigs ill usage will no longer brook,
But murder, rosin, spit, and roast the Cook
Grocers, by their Horses saddled, scour the plain;
By the meek House-Lamb is the Butcher slain,
Women the breeches wear, and shine in arms,
Whilst at their toilets Men improve their charms

† In allusion to three Cupids painted on the ceiling of the Theatre.

Each

Each species change—Day turns the Shade to Night,
Fish fly about in Air—Day turns to Night,
And ill or what should be—appears right.
Thus by our Acts thus Scene held,
Folly was heard but not expell'd,
Your unrefin'd Action fee as clear as
To Fairy Nine twill equally apply,
As I can see the World, on three survey,
Will scan to all full as much Fairy Tarry
As for example, Country, Town, Place,
One is a man that's in, one out of Place;
Observe it while this Whirligig go round,
The flown Patriots at the Levees found,
The Courtier clung'd too, makes as great a stir,
And without mercy hoots the Minister
Should I we the Scenes of private life pursue,
What contradictions op'n to the view!
Out of their element, one shall appear
Eager to follow fashion's mad career
While wrinkles through the bloom of Art are spy'd,
Which Fairy Paint of Roses cannot hide
See ill-match'd Age, defying every rule,
Take lessons at the grown up Dancing-school,
Observe the shoe string which the Infant wore,
Ill suit the raw-bon'd Youth of Twenty four,
Whilst the broad Sash round Hips of Sixty tells,
They only want the Cowl, and the Bell
O! had the World but right and upon ends stood,
Think ye, my gen'rous Friends, we ever should,
A Band of Striplings, personate to you
Scenes which for Heroes only, Shakespeare drew?
Beneath the Roof to Tito and Virtue led,
Tutor'd in Science, bred to Learning bred,
That we should shut our books, and boldly prate
Of injur'd Freedom, and a falling State?
Of the World's Sovreign urge the body doom?
Or fix the Crown of Imperial Rome?
Bold is the task—if haply we succeed,
Crown with applauding hands the perilous deed,
Or to those errors you have view'd before,
Should we to night subjoin one error more,
To its true cause that error you'll assign,
The topsy turvey year of Eighty Nine

EPILOGUE,

Written by G. KEATE, ESQ.

Spoken by CALLIHURSTIA

AFTER Five Acts of blood-shed and of strife,
Behold again Great Cæsar's once-lov'd Wife,
Sorely shock'd at all these horrid deeds,
I've not had courage to put on my weeds—
Then, think not I have brought a Widow's eye,
To meet about and for new Conquests try,
For who amongst you, ugh so-ever look on'd
Dare I now stand forth, and claim a Cæsar's Hand?
All Clients!—know then I've no heart to give,
Till Death shall bid another Julius live;
His wedded Wife to his all conquering name,
Still faithful to his virtues and his fame;
Tho' from the pinnacle of fortune hurl'd,
Reboants I have rul'd the Man who rul'd the World!
Yet hold, Calphurnia—may not some folk fly,
Your husband give you not a fair fair play,
For Dreams oft rule your ardent Theme,
And turn'd to ridicule your boding Dream?
But what ensu'd? Why you and I've lamented,
Nay, why perhaps my caution had prevented
If Husbands won't be counsel'd by their wives,
I'll not let them risk their fortunes and their lives,
Should there be Dr—here, who note with scorn
The fleeting sighs which float 'twixt midnight and the morn!
Our Friends beyond the Tweed are more polite,
They, when they're dozing, call it Second Sight—
What is a Dream?—'Tis an internal spark,
That lights us up strange visions in the dark,
Whilst Fancy summoning her magic powers,
With airy phantoms lulls our slumbering hours
A subject this, which there's a wond'rous scope in—
Some dream asleep, some with their eyes wide open
The Miser on his bed can't lose his care,
Hugging his Gold, he views his Spanish
Ware
The Poet dreams of Bays—the Lawyer Fees,
Which waking, neither ever after sees,
And when young Ladies dream, to them is given
Five Suitors, Jointures, Wedding rings—and Heaven!
The slumbering Curate, in his sleep, conceives
He feels the swelling grandeur of Lawn-sleeves,
But on his head, when he has clos'd his nap,
Can find no Mitre but his Cotton Cap——
In Lottery times what multitudes are found,
All dreaming of the Thirty Thousand Pound!

Tho' each the holder of a ſingle Ticket,
Aſſur'd their One will be the one to nick it!
In ſhort, whether by night or day, it ſeems
That half of human life is paſs'd in Dreams!
Shall I tell mine?—Your looks declare I may
I dreamt that NEWCOMBE's Boys got up a Play;
That each, moſt emulous Applauſe to merit,
The young Old Romans, play'd their parts with ſpirit,
Indulgence beam'd from every manly face,
And gave to female beauty added grace;
Each Actor's heart of every fear was eas'd,
Nay, e'en their new made Manager ſeem'd pleas'd
When Cæſar fell, my Dream, you know, came true,
If right again—I wait to learn from You

OCCASIONAL PROLOGUE to DOUGLAS,
As altered by Mrs CRESPIGNY, and performed at her Houſe April 4th, 1789
Written by Mr FITZGERALD

THE MONARCH's Glory, and the HERO's Fame,
The PATRIOT's Virtue, or the TRAITOR's Shame,
Empires by wiſdom ſav'd, or war deſtroy'd!
Are themes Dramatic Bards have long employ'd
The ruthleſs VICTOR, in his laurel'd car,
Stain'd with the guilty honours of the war;
When trampling on a ſuffering people's laws,
But ill deſerves loud pæans of applauſe,
Nor when the haughty Tyrant meets his doom,
Should PITY's Tears be waſted on his tomb!
But when domeſtic grief directs the pen,
All feel the ſtory—who can feel like Men
Such is the ſcene to-night we bring to view,
And truſt our fate to candour and to you
The tale, well known, has often caus'd a ſigh,
And brought the pearly drops from Beauty's eye
Still may thoſe ſoft emotions freely riſe,
And add new luſtre to the brighteſt eyes;
MATILDA's Woes to every breaſt impart
The throbbing anguiſh of a mother's heart,
Whoſe child by dire miſchance was ſnatch'd away,
Whoſe huſband periſh'd in an early day!
And when her DOUGLAS to her arms reſtor'd,
Recalls the image of her long-loſt lord,
Perhaps ſome breaſt a dormant flame may move,
To feel the warmth of ill-extinguiſh'd love
Some object, once than fame or life more dear,
May riſe to mem'ry with a ſoothing tear!
For fond remembrance ever is prone to dwell
On thoſe we lov'd "ſo long," and lov'd "ſo well"
When Youthful NORVAL, with a noble pride,
Indignant hears the villain's tongue deride;
When ſtung with anger and ingenuous ſhame,
Even filial duty ſcarce conceals his name;
All muſt allow the conſcious pride of blood,
A wiſe illuſion HEAVEN permits—for good!
That pride of blood, that only fears diſgrace,
And dreads to ſully an illuſtrious race;
That generous pride that ſcorns all ſervile art,
And warms in poverty the noble heart;
Feels its own merits, yet would bluſh with ſhame
To rob another of his well-earn'd fame!
Gives life and energy to glorious deeds,
And cheers the dying Hero as he bleeds!
If in our new ſcenes altered Scenes you find,
They owe their merit to a Female Mind,
Whoſe tender boſom, even in fictious grief,
Shrunk from the woe that can't admit relief;
And felt the DRAMA went beyond its art,
Rending the chords that nerve a MOTHER'S heart!
Such motives might the ſternest cenſure bend,
And change the Critic to th' approving Friend!

By PETER PINDAR,

Spoken by Sir FRANCIS BASSET, Bart at his Little Theatre, at TAMELLY PARK, in CORNWALL

HEAVENS, could the ghoſt of playful Theſpis riſe,
How would that old rare actor bleſs his eyes!
To ſee in almoſt every town a ſtage,
How would he triumph in the general rage!
We too in compliſance to half the nation,
To night ſhew ſymptoms of ſtrange inſpiration
Put lo, no pompous theatres ſurpriſe,
No Drury, Covent-garden, ſtrike your eyes,
All here is plainer than a Quaker's hat—
You'll ſay, perhaps, I need not tell you THAT
To pleaſe with homely things indeed we try,
And hope the candid ear and candid eye,
Like Baucis and Philemon, Swift's old ſtory,
Indeed too hackney'd to be read before ye,
Who with two rumbling gods were ſo much taken,
We offer you a ſimple ſlice of bacon!
And yet permit our ſmall theatric boſt,
Not given to egotiſm, for once to boaſt,— Tho'

The' Marlborough, Richmond, fond of gaudy things,
Exhaust magnificence to flatter KINGS;
To HIGHER praise our pigmy stage pretends,
And courts the fame of entertaining FRIENDS.

PROLOGUE

To EVERY MAN in his HUMOUR,
At the Opening of the Countess of ELY's Attic Theatre, in Dublin, on May 7, 1789.
Spoken by Mrs TRANT,

A CLOUD too long had o'er this curtain hung,
Dull every eye, and mute was every tongue;
Our throbbing bosoms own'd the general woe,
And Patriot feelings bade our sorrows flow
While our lov'd Monarch, on the couch of pain,
Implor'd relief, and yet implor'd in vain,
No season that for us, with mimic art,
To trace the various stages of the heart;
To bring fictitious anguish to your view,
Or Fancy's joys with eager haste pursue
But now, Benignant Heaven, with powerful hand,
Restores the Guardian Father of the land,
With kind indulgence hears the general voice,
Warms every heart, and bids each tongue rejoice,
Again the Muse this favourite circle greets,
Again with joy reviews these well known seats
Yet Shakespear's strains still on our faces dwell,
Immortal master of the tuneful spell!
Can none remember?—Yes, I know all must,
O'd Lear deserted, humbled to the dust,
Pierc'd by his thankless daughters' serpent tongues,
Storm, hail, and fire, seem milder than his wrongs
While native, sweetness all their accents breath'd,
Here too were cull'd the flowers light fairies wreath'd,
By spirits pure as Fancy's sovereign drew,
To bask in cowslip bells, and sip the dew,
To glide with printless feet along the plain,
Ride on curl'd clouds, or skim the swelling main—
Past too that scene—we must the truth admit,
Some twenty moons have made our elves unfit
To-night we show, a task indeed for Man,
A full grown groupe design'd by skilful Ben,
That rough old bard, whose honest pride disdain'd
Applause itself, unless by merit gain'd:
His ancient freehold on the three-fork'd hill,
None like ourselves have thus e er dar'd to till,
Tho' in our modern gardens may be found
Full many a bay from Ben's poetic ground
We ask attention—nor will Friends refuse
Favour to US, and honour to the MUSE.

POETRY.

To JOSEPH C WALKER, Esq

Member of the Royal Irish Academy, &c &c.—On reading his Historical Memoirs of the Irish Bards—Dresses of the Ancient Irish—and Historical Essay on the Irish Stage.

WITH deep research and penetrating eyes,
While you pervade the shades where Science lies,
And, vers'd in ancient and historic lore,
The manly records of our Sires explore,
Their customs, manners, habits, language trace,
To truth add lustre, and to wisdom grace,
The hidden treasures of times past unfold,
And e en their very dross transmute to gold:
While thus, when crowds, at time and health's expence,
Provoke derision, you exalt your sense,
The veil of dark antiquity remove,
Our minds irradiate, and our taste improve,
And, fill'd with patriot zeal, the deeds rehearse
Of Chieftains mighty and renown'd in verse,
I, to a Bard's high name who can't aspire,
Smit with congenial feelings, touch the lyre;
Call'd forth by thee my voice impartial raise,
Less to record than testify thy praise;
Thy own rich page from imperfection free,
Embalms thy fame, and needs no aid from me
Oh, had I leisure for the great design,
And talents ample as the theme were mine,
Not thy bright name alone the charter'd band
That blest with Learning's beams their native land,
And give her claim among the Nations birth,
The best in effort, tho' not least in worth,
Should all, if minstrelsy distinction give,
While truth with merit dwells, applauded live
But, worn with toil and circumscrib'd in time,
Ill suits my lot the laurel'd haunts of rhyme.
Tho' fancy sometimes fluttering on the wing,
Tempts my rash hand the soothing harp to string,
In ceaseless tumults each vibration drown'd,
Emit, if any, but a feeble sound.

Some happier genius hence for ſong admir'd,
May catch the hint, and, as of old, inſpir'd,
To diſtant ages make the worthies known,
And with his country's glory fix his own
Here all my hopes and my ambition end,
Suffice it me to be approv'd thy FRIEND

BOLLITREE*,

NEAR ROSS, HEREFORDSHIRE

By JAMES MERRICK,

Tranſlator of the Pſalms and Triphiodorus, and Author of Poems in Dodſley's Collection †

NEAR where proud Penyard's woods ariſe,
Whence Cambria's hills ſalute our eyes;
On a fair ſpot enclos'd with wood,
That long the rage of time has ſtood,
Stands BOLLITREE, in days of yore,
Ere Lancaſter the ſceptre bore,
Well known to fame ————
Old Grunt, 'tis ſaid, had ſeen the place,
And Hereford's renowned Grace
There deign'd to ſpend a ſocial hour,
While virtue charm'd him more than pow'r.
When hapleſs Richard's wretched reign
Caus'd Britain's ſons to ſeek the plain,
Its maſter ‡, lov'd of Hereford,
Join'd with him, and drew the ſword;
And whilſt our Henrys bore the ſway,
At Bollitree how bleſs'd the day!
When fam'd Llewellin rul'd the land,
And gallant Eſſex held command,
A branch § from this old ſpot deriv'd,
In Spain right hardy deeds atchiev'd
There Cales (unhappy) felt a blow,
That laid her lofty turrets low,
And when he too ſevere a fate,
Brave Alex felt the axe's weight,
Firm in his much lov'd land he ſtood,
And ſeal'd his friendſhip with his blood.
But late from hence high Honour bore
Ev'n to remoteſt Indus's ſhore,
In evil hour, adoring twain ‖
In beauty's bloom he preſs'd the plain.
Ah, hapleſs youth, of ſoul ſincere,
Receive the heart-bedewing tear.
Since fate thy vital thread has ſhorn,
Eternal laurels grace thy urn!
Sacred to you, deſerving dead,
This ancient fabrick rears its head.
Arches with ivy overgrown,
And walls of moſs-bemantled ſtone,
Again reſtor'd in awful ſtate,
Your honour'd memory await.
Accept the humble tribute paid,
And peaceful ſleep each hallow'd ſhade.

ODE

Written at WOTTON in LINCOLNSHIRE, 1763, in grateful Commemoration of Refreſhment afforded to a Traveller, wearied in ſearch of Horncaſtle College, and reſting on the Bank of a clear Pool in that Village

By RICHARD GOUGH, Eſq

"Gratitudini ſacrum"

Imitation of HORACE, Carm. III. 13.

FOUNTAIN of Wotton, clear as glaſs,
What traveller ſhall dare to paſs
Thy ſtream unnotic'd by!
Here will I waſte the grateful hours,
Pouring out wine and ſcattering flowers,
While on thy banks I lie.

When I return, a ſportive kid,
Whoſe budding horns defiance bid
To all the rival herd,
Tho' now he wantons o'er the plain,
Thy cooling ſtream with blood muſt ſtain,
In ſacrifice preferr'd.

What tho' no trickling murmurs ſound,
To lull thy villagers around,
No art confines thy ſtreams,
Thy ſtreams were form'd for real uſe,
And not deſign'd to give a looſe
To poets idle dreams.

Far from the din of arms and arts,
Fix'd in the unfrequented parts
Of Lincoln's drear land,
Alike the Hunter and the Sea
For uſefulneſs muſt yield to thee,
Tho' thou haſt leſs command.

Thee the fierce dog ſtar raging high
In flaming heat ſhall never dry,
To thee the weary bull,
Tir'd with long turning of the ſoil,
Soon as he leaves the plough-ſhare's toil,
Retires his thirſt to cool.

To thee the fleecy ſtragglers crowd,
Their gratitude in bleatings loud

Thy kind relief proclaim:
And pilgrim I, who weak astray
The Wotton's dwains relief'd my way,
Immortal life thy name.

ODE FOR HIS MAJESTY's BIRTH-DAY, June 4, 1789.

I

AS when the demon of the summer-storm
Walks forth, the nountide landscape to deform,
Dark grows the vale, and dark the distant grove,
And thick the bolts of angry Jove
Athwart the watery welkin glide,
And streams the aerial torrent far and wide
If by short flits the struggling ray
Should dart a momentary day,
Th illumin'd mountain glows awhile,
By faint degrees the radiant glance
Purples th horizon's pale expanse,
And gilds the gloom with hasty smile
Ah, fickle smile, too swiftly past!
Again resounds the sweeping blast;
With hoarser din the demon howls,
Again the blackening concave scowls!——
Sudden, the shades of the meridian night
Yield to the triumph of rekindling light,
The reddening sun regains his golden sway,
And Nature stands reveal'd in all her bright array

II

Such was the changeful conflict, that possess'd
With trembling tumult every British breast,
When Albion, towering in the van sublime
Of Glory's march, from clime to clime
Envied, belov'd, revered, renown'd,
Her brows with every blissful chaplet bound;
When, in her mid career of state,
She felt her monarch's awful fate!
Till Mercy from the Almighty's Throne
Look'd down on man, and waving wide
Her wreath, that, in the rainbow died
With hues of soften'd lustre shone,
And bending from her sapphire cloud,
O'er regal grief benignant bow'd;
To transport turn'd a people's fears,
And stay'd a people's tide of tears;
Bade this blest dawn with beams auspicious spring,
With Hope serene, with Healing in its wing,
And gave a Sovereign o'er a grateful land
Again with vigorous grasp to stretch the sceptre'd hand

III.

O favour'd King, what rapture more refin'd,
What mightier joy can fill the human mind,
Than that the Monarch's conscious bosom feels,
At whose dread throne a nation kneels,
And hails its father, friend, and lord,
To life's career, to patriot sway, restor'd,
And bids the loud responsive voice
Of union all around rejoice?
For thus to see when Britons bow,
Warm and spontaneous from the heart,
As late their tears, their transports start,
And Nature dictates Duty's vow
To thee, recall'd to sacred Health,
Did the proud city's lavish wealth,
Did crowded streets alone display
The long-drawn blaze, the festal ray?
Meek Poverty her scanty cottage grac'd,
And flung her gleam across the lonely waste!
Th' exulting isle in one wide triumph strove,
One social sacrifice of reverential love

IV

Such pure unprompted praise do kingdoms pay,
Such willing zeal, to thrones of lawless sway?
Ah! how unlike the vain, the venal love
To Latian rulers dealt of yore,
O'er guilty pomp, and hated power,
When stream'd the sparkling panegyric shower;
And slaves to Sovereigns unendear'd
Their pageant trophies coldly rear'd!
For are the chains, that blend
Monarch with man, to tyrants known?
The tender ties, that to the throne
A mild domestic glory lend;
Of wedded love the league sincere,
The virtuous consort's faithful tear!
Nor this the verse that Flattery brings,
Nor here I strike a Syren's strings:

* The tomb stones in the adjoining church-yard proclaim the longevity of the inhabitants.

The LILY and the ROSE.

By W COWPER, Eſq.

THE nymph muſt loſe her female friend,
If more admir'd than ſhe;
But where will fierce contention end,
If Flowers can diſagree?

Within the garden's peaceful ſcene
Appear'd two lovely foes,
Aſpiring to the rank of QUEEN,——
The LILY and the ROSE!

The Roſe ſoon redden'd into rage,
And ſwelling with diſdain,
Appeal'd to many a poet's page,
To prove her right to reign.
The Lily ſ height beſpoke command,
A fair imperial flower,
She ſeem'd deſign'd for Flora's hand,
The ſceptre of her power.
This cruel bick'ring and debate
The goddeſs chanc'd to hear,
And flew to ſave, ere yet too late,
The pride of the parterre.
"Yours is," ſaid ſhe, "the nobleſt hue,
"And yours the ſtateſier mien,
"And till a third ſurpaſſes you,
"Let both be deem'd a QUEEN!"
Thus ſooth'd and reconcil'd, each ſeeks
The loveliest Britiſh fair;
The ſeat of empire is her cheeks,
They reign united there!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

[FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE.]

Conſtantinople, April 15.

ON the 13th inſtant the Sultan, attended by all the grandees, went on horſeback to the moſque of Eyub, where the ceremony of girding on the imperial cimetar was performed with the uſual pomp, amidſt a great concourſe of people. In the proceſſion from the ſeraglio through the city, a ſum of money, to the amount of 15,000l. in ſmall ſilver pieces, loaded on ten mules, was thrown amongſt the populace, and what has not always been the caſe on ſimilar occaſions, no one loſt his life in the ſcramble. His Highneſs returned by water down the harbour, and was ſaluted by all the ſhips, as well Chriſtians as Turks. The firſt entertainment given by the Sultan was a tournament, as more conſiſtent in the time of war than muſick and dancing.

St Peterſburgh, May 15. The ſon of General Kamenſkoy, who commands the army in Moldavia, arrived here yeſterday with the news, that on the 27th of April, Gen. Derfelden compelled the Turks to retreat to within 20 werſts of Braila, near Mackſunne, on the river Sireth. In this action 400 of the enemy were killed, and a conſiderable number drowned. A pacha of two tails, who commanded in Moldavia, was taken priſoner, with about 100 men, one piece of cannon, and three ſtandards.

A ſecond courier arrived this day from General Kamenſkoy, with an account that on the 30th of April, Gen. Derfelden attacked the enemy in their camp, near Galatz, on the Danube, and that after an obſtinate engagement of more than three hours, he had totally defeated them. Fifteen hundred Turks were killed, and a pacha of three tails, with a conſiderable number of officers, and about 1000 men, taken priſoners. The camp, with the artillery, ſtandards, &c. fell into the hands of the conquerors, whoſe loſs amounted only to 60 men killed, and 100 wounded.

Stockholm, May 22. On Monday laſt the Senators who had not previouſly reſigned, received a circular letter from the King, by which they were diſmiſſed. Six of them were afterwards appointed members of the new Council, which, according to the late inſtitution, is to tranſact the ſame buſineſs the Senate uſed to do, and to be divided into two departments, one of which is to be named the Court of Revision for judicial affairs, and the other for matters of interior oeconomy. The new Council will conſiſt of ſix Nobles and ſix Commoners in the firſt department, and the latter of eight Nobles and four Commoners.

Vienna, May 30. His Imperial Majeſty has had another return of his fever. He was, however, yeſterday much better, and had begun to take the bark, from which the moſt ſalutary effects are expected.

The laſt accounts from the Bannat ſtate, that the grand army, under the command of Marſhal Haddick, had quitted Opova, and was on the 24th at Weiſskirchen, where now are the head quarters. A conſiderable corps has been detached to Caranſebes, and a ſufficient force remains at Semlin. Troops are alſo ſtationed at Pancova, Kubin, and Ujpalanka.

Intelli-

Intelligence has been received that the Grand Vizir, with an army of one hundred thousand men, has left Ruschuck, and is advancing along the banks of the Danube, towards Cladova, in Servia.

Advice has been received from Moldavia, that the Russians have abandoned their recent acquisition of Gadiacz, and have burnt the town to the ground.

Stockholm, June 5 A corps of about 1100 Russians having assembled at a village called Rushala, on the borders of the province of Carelia, waiting only for the arrival of a sufficient number of pieces of ordnance to make an irruption into that province, Major Gripenberg, who was posted in the neighbourhood, with a battalion of the regiment of Tavastchus and four cannon, resolved to attack the enemy, on the 17th ult though his whole force consisted only of about 250 men On their approach the Swedes were so fortunate as immediately to dismount some field pieces, with which the Russians disputed the entrance of the village, and soon after the powder magazine of the enemy blew up, by which a great number of them perished The battle then commenced, and continued with great obstinacy for upwards of three hours Major Gripenberg computes the loss of the enemy at 400 killed, and a considerable number wounded. He quitted the field, however, though he had only 17 killed, and 30 wounded The Russians also after the action evacuated Ruskiala, and retreated to Sordawalla The Swedes fired with red-hot shot, being informed that the Russians had deposited their powder in one of the adjoining houses. Major Gripenberg has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, every officer under his command has been advanced one degree, and a reward of a Swedish ducat is ordered to be given to each private soldier

The port of Helsingfors is blocked up by a Russian squadron

Warsaw, June 6 The accounts received here of the Turkish force in the Black Sea make it amount to sixteen ships of the line, and twenty one frigates In all, 121 sail, including bomb-ketches, gun-boats, &c

Vienna, June 10 On Saturday last the Emperor had a return of his fever, but he is this morning rather better

Ostend, June 20 An Imperial ordonance was published on the 18th instant, by which all the concessions and privileges granted or confirmed by the Emperor to the province of Brabant, as well as the whole contents of the Joyeuse Entrée, are declared to be revoked and annulled, and a Supreme Council is established at Malines, in lieu of the Provincial Council of Brabant, which is abolished.

MONTHLY CHRONICLE.

ON the 10th of May last, the Reis Effendi, or Secretary of State, informed the Ministers of France and Spain at the Porte, who have been long endeavouring to put an end to hostilities, that he had received orders "Not to listen to any terms of peace, that should not be founded on the following preliminaries The restoration of all places taken from the Sublime Porte during the war, a complete renunciation on the part of Russia to all dominion over the Tartars, and the absolute independence of the Crimea

12 This morning a fire broke out in a warehouse belonging to Mr Goodwin, oil-merchant, the bottom of College-hill, which consumed the whole building, with a great quantity of oil and vitriol. It reached a sugar baker's in Thames-street, which was likewise consumed; as were also the houses of Mr Sykes, sugar-baker, Mr Everet, basket-maker, Mr Duncan, baker, and two others; besides greatly damaging six houses adjoining the warehouse on College hill

M de Langle, and ten men belonging to the fleet of the Marquise Peyrouz, who sailed to the coast of New Holland, to make discoveries, by order of the French Court, were, on landing on the Navigators island, butchered by the natives Their bodies were roasted and devoured by the savages, in sight of their companions, who were unable to avenge the wrongs of their countrymen

From the proceedings of the Privy Council on the Fly injuring the American wheat, we select the following curious facts, to prove the salutary effects of the Elder plant,—the leaves swept over a field—the twigs striking fruit-trees

19 A large party of the Royal Archers, consisting of several Noblemen and men of fashion, met on Friday on Blackheath, to exhibit their skill in that ancient science The prizes were a gold and silver medal, the former of which was won by Robert Fielding, Esq of the Temple, the latter by Mr Waring, of Leicester house

28 Lieutenant Colonel Lenox made a requisition to the Duke of York, as Colonel of the Coldstream regiment, that his Royal Highness would permit call of the officers of that corps, in order that certain propositions, touching his conduct and situation, might be submitted to their consideration His Royal Highness, with his usual address, informed the friend of Mr Lenox, "that he could not possibly oppose any design which might tend to relieve Mr. Lenox from his present embarrassment!" The meeting of this military convention was held on Friday at the Orderly Room, and after a considerable deliberation, adjourned over to Saturday, when the determination was, that "It is the opinion of the regiment, that subsequent to the 15th of May, Lieutenant Colonel Lenox has behaved with courage, but from the peculiarity of the circumstance, not with judgment —The assembly included a very large party of officers, every gentleman pledged his honour to secrecy Lord Cathcart and Lord Stopford attended

29 The French Ambassador's Gala was celebrated this evening, at his house in Portman-square, at which were present the Queen, three of the Princesses, Dukes of York, Clarence, Gloucester and Cumberland

Temporary rooms were built in the gardens, and one purposely for her Majesty to sup in

In the Grand Saloon where the Queen was received, a superb chair was placed, near to which the Princesses were seated After the first ceremonies, a group of dancers, including Madame Guimard, and other principal Opera performers, came forward, dressed in pastoral habits, and presented to her Majesty cornucopias of rich fruits, &c entwined with wreaths of roses, which were laid at her Majesty's feet The effect was pretty, and continued about twelve or fifteen minutes By the Queen's intimation no person was present who had not been introduced at Court

On each side of the Grand Saloon was a transparent painting, that on the right representing the Genius of France congratulating the Genius of England on the recovery of the King, an excellent likeness of whom the Goddess of Health held in her hand, on the left was a representation of the Graces attending her Majesty, and an angel preparing to crown her

The Spanish Ambassador was honoured in the minuets with the hand of the Princess Royal, who afterwards danced with Prince William of Gloucester,—Princess Augusta, Lord Strathaven,—Princess Elizabeth, Lord Salisbury,—Princess Mary, Lord Clarendon, and about twenty more couple

The dances continued until near one o'clock, when the supper-rooms were opened, and displayed a scene of luxury and magnificence scarcely to be described

The Princess Sophia of Gloucester was in a very disagreeable situation in Portman square, when returning from the French Ambassador's Gala Luther through accident, or drunkenness, the coachman fell from his seat, and the horses feeling themselves uncontrouled, ran away with the carriage, and it was with difficulty they were stopped fortunately neither the Highness, nor the Lady in the coach with her, received the least injury, the alarming fright excepted

JUNE 1 The Duke of Clarence gave his grand entertainment at Willis's, the rooms were elegantly decorated, festoons of red and white roses intermingled made a most beautiful appearance

The apartment where the Prince of Wales, Dukes of York and Clarence sat, with their select friends, was splendidly ornamented with blue silk, and flowers in various combinations At the top of the room were three transparencies, representing the armorial bearings of the Royal brothers, on the right side the Coldstream colours with the insignia of the Order of the Garter, on the left, a flag with an anchor, and these words, "United for ever" There were other transparencies of the Royal brothers

2 The Marquis del Campo, the Spanish Ambassador, gave his Gala at Ranelagh in honour of his Majesty's Recovery

The entrance to the Rotunda was formed into a shrubbery, consisting of a great variety of the most scarce and valuable aromatic shrubs

The lower boxes of the Rotunda formed a Spanish camp, striped blue and red, each tent guarded by a boy, dressed in a Spanish uniform The gallery formed a temple of Flora, which was lighted by a great number of gold baskets, containing wax tapers, ornamented with roses, &c

The Queen's box, crimson satin, lined with white satin, hung in festoons, and richly fringed with gold, at the top of which was a regal crown

The orchestra, a magnificent pavilion of white and gold, lined with a green embroidered satin, in which was a table of eighteen covers for the Royal Family.

Oppo-

Oppoſite the Queen's box was a light temple or ſtage, on which a Spaniſh dance was performed by children, which had a pleaſant effect In another arch of the center were beautiful moving tranſparencies, and in a third was a lottery of watches, gold trinkets, medals, &c conſiſting of 600 prizes, the number of ladies invited The great prize was an elegant gold watch, richly ornamented with diamonds, which fell to the lot of Miſs Eliza Sturt —The other prizes conſiſted of all ſorts of faſhionable trinkets, &c etwee caſes, rings, bracelets, fans, pearl pins, medallions of the King, boxes in commemoration of the Gala, pocket-books, ſaſhes, &c —Her Majeſty drew an etwee caſe, with a beautiful medallion of the King

Women ornamented with wreaths of flowers made tea for the company

One hundred valets de chambre dreſſed in ſcarlet, the ſeams adorned with broad gold lace, the coats lined with blue, blue waiſtcoats bound with broad gold lace, and one hundred footmen dreſſed in ſky-blue coats and waiſtcoats, the ſeams ornamented with ſilver lace, and the waiſtcoats bound with broad ſilver lace, waited on the company

The entertainment commenced with the ſinging of the following Ode, the words by Colonel Aubin

Sweet our ſentiments impart,
Every throbbing breaſt rebounding,
Speak the feelings of the heart
View'd by angels with delight,
Hark! they ſhout, The King is living!
Bend the knee, and God adore,
Heaven this GREATEST BOUNTY giving,
Views the future by the paſt
Happy Monarch! who ſurviving,
Views the future by the paſt,
Feels this pleaſure e'en in dying,
To be loved to the laſt

After the Ode was finiſhed a red curtain drew up and exhibited a ſtage, on which about 30 girls and boys, dreſſed in Spaniſh habits, danced ſome Spaniſh dances, which laſted half an hour, and concluded with the tune of "God Save the King"

The figure dances being concluded, her Majeſty and the Royal Family retired to the back part of their box, to view the fireworks from the garden To give additional ſplendour to the whole, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador had employed twenty ſailing boats on the water, illuminated with lamps, which moved backwards and forwards, letting off ſky-rockets The fireworks were uncommonly grand and well conducted

The company having again met in the Rotunda, the country dances began None of the Princes of the Blood being preſent to take out their ſiſters, the four eldeſt Princeſſes honoured Prince William of Gloucester, Earl of Saliſbury, Earl Gower, and the Earl of Clarendon, with their hands.

At a quarter paſt one the Queen and Royal Family retired to their ſupper-room, which was under a rich canopy in the form of a tent, with the crown at top It was of white ſattin, deeply fringed with gold. The ſervice was entirely of gold, and the whole decorations moſt magnificent The table-cloth alone was of the value of ninety guineas There were all ſorts of the choiceſt fruit and the moſt exquiſite wines, ſome of which had been ſent from Spain for the occaſion.

There were two hundred other boxes for the reſt of the company, the lower ones being laid open by the curtains of the tents drawing up, and all ſerved up in the moſt luxurient ſtile

Her Majeſty was handed to ſupper by the Spaniſh Ambaſſador There ſat at the table, beſides herſelf, the four elder Princeſſes, the Duke of Gloucester, and his ſon and daughter A full band played "God ſave the King," during part of the ſupper-time, after which there were catches and glees ſung

The Prince of Wales and Duke of Clarence were preſent, but not of her Majeſty's party The Duke of York came to Ranelagh Houſe in boots and conſequently did not mix with the reſt of the company

The dances continued after ſupper till half paſt five in the morning The Queen and Royal Family withdrew at three

4 The King's Birth-day was celebrated at St James's with all the ſplendour and loyalty which nobility and beauty united could diſplay on ſo joyful an occaſion His Majeſty then entered into the 52d year of his age

At half paſt twelve his Majeſty went from the Queen's houſe to Kew, and at two her Majeſty and the Princeſſes came to St. James's, when the Ode was performed in the Council Chamber

The Drawing-Room began at half paſt two, and was ſo crowded, that, to prevent confuſion, the company paſſed in at one door and out at the oppoſite, after making their congratulations The three younger Princeſſes received the compliments in the Queen's apartments the guards and attendants were all new clothed, which added to the ſplendour of the Court The carriages and chairs were ſo numerous as to fill all the courts and moſt of the avenues to the Palace, and the ſpectators, as well within as without, were exceedingly numerous

The head-dresses of the Princesses were all extremely plain, and ornamented with feathers and wreaths of flowers

Every woman of high fashion, and of each party, was present The general dress was white, ornamented, in compliment to her Majesty, with the constitutional blue, with occasional flowers, and silver spangles

Most of the ladies' dresses had fringes of gold or silver, and the bodies were chiefly spangled with gold and silver
